XXVI. In the mean while Sulpitius the Consul fought prosperously several Battels against the Carthaginians: and he became so encourag'd hereby, that he ventur'd to sail towards Affrica. The Carthaginians resolving not to endure that, made Hannibal again Chief Commander at Sea, who lived all along at Carthage ever since his defeat in Sicily. And having joyn'd several eminent Sea Commanders with him, order'd him to keep off the Enemies Fleet from the Affrican shores. Accordingly he put out to Sea well equip'd for a fight: but a storm hindred them from engaging: which lying very fore on both parties forced them against their wills to take shelter in places more calm; but yet both the Generals recover'd the Ports of Sardinia. There whilst their Fleet lay at Anchor, Sulpitius, to draw the Carthaginians out into the open Sea, tuborns some people to go as desertors, and persuade Hannibal that the Romans were about to sail again for Affrica. He being deceiv'd with this trick, came out in all halt with the Fleet, and fell in with the Consul, who waited for him in a convenient place unawares: where many of the Punic Vessels were sunk before they could know where they were; whilst the favour of the Night, and a storm opportunely arising had cover'd the Ambush laid by the Consul.

XXVII. At length, when they understood their condition, the rest of the Gallies made back to the Haven, or else drove to shore, where most of them were taken empty, the Rowers flying away. Hannibal despairing of being able to defend the Haven, had betaken himself into a Town called Sulcos: where a Mutiny arising he was apprehended by the Carthaginians, who had fled thither from the same Battel, and hang'd; they alledging, that his folly and rashness was the cause of their overthrow. But this Victory a while after caus'd some loss to the Romans. For, when now without any fear of the Punic Fleet, they were waiting the Country very securely and without fear; they were routed by a sudden Incurfion of the Sardinians and Carthaginians under the Conduct of Hanno.

C. Duilius

C. Duilius bore the Censorship this year, and built the Temple of Janus at the Herb-Market. About this time there were two Triumphs: the first that of C. Aquilius Florus, as Consul over the Carthaginians the 4th of October. The second Caius Sulpitius the Consul over the Carthaginians and Sardinians the fifth of the same Month.

Afterwards, when C. Atilius Regulus, Cn. Cornelius Blasio were again Consuls, the Senate order'd that some Ceremonies used for the expiating of Prodigies should be perform'd, because that in Monte Albano, and many other places, and even in the City itself, it had rain'd Stones as thick as Hail. It was order'd that the Latine Holy-days should be renew'd, and a Dictator chosen for that end. Q. Ogulneius Gallus was the Dictator, and M. Latorius Plancianus his Deputy. C. Atilius, who commanded the Fleet, arriving at Tyndaris in Sicily, destroy'd the Punic Navy sailing by in a disorderly manner, and resolv'd to attack it; and accordingly having order'd the rest of the Fleet to follow him, he with ten Gallies, which could be first fitted, advances against the Carthaginians who were got pretty far before by the help of their Oars and Sails which they ply'd with all their might and main.

Hamilcar was then in that Fleet, a great Commander: who seeing but few Ships near him, and others scarce yet got out of the Haven, and that the greatest part yet lay at Anchor, tack'd about, and with his whole Fleet encompass'd C. Atilius, and his Ships. Nine Gallies were sunk presently, being over-pour'd by the numbers of the Enemy, after they had fought it stoutly. But the Admiral, by the help of her Oars, and the Rowers being encourag'd by the presence of the Consul, forc'd its way through, and sav'd her self. For now there were other Gallies of the Romans come up, which chang'd the fortune of the Battel; and then there were eight Gallies of the Carthaginians sunk, ten with their Rowers taken: the rest steer'd their course towards the Liparean Isles. These were their Actions at Sea. Their Land-forces acted more slowly, having attack'd Lipara in vain; but they wreck'd their fury upon such places as were open, laying them waste; and the same Calamity reach'd the Island of Malta not far distant. For these Achievements C. Atilius the Consul had a Naval Triumph for his Victory over the Carthaginians. The same year Atilius triumph'd over the Carthaginians in Sicily the 19th of January. Thus prosperously did the Roman Affairs succeed, so that they now being superiour at Sea as well as at Land, began to consult not only about Sicily and the adjacent Isles, the Conquest of which they made sure of, but also of invading Affrica, and carrying the terror of the War to the very Gates of Carthage.

DECADE II. BOOK XVIII.

Florus his Epitome of the Eighteenth Book of Livy.

Atilius Regulus being Consul, overthrows the Carthaginians in a Sea-fight, invades Affrick, and there kills a Serpent of a prodigious bigness, not without a great slaughter of his Soldiers. He having fought several Battels with the Carthaginians with advantage, and the Senate by reason of his success, continuing him in his Command, he himself by his Letters complains thereof and desires a Successor, affixing (amongst other things) this reason for it, because the Farm his Family liv'd upon, lay unill'd, being deserted by his Wife's and Husbandmen. After this, Fortune being willing to shew an Eminent Example in this Gentleman of a glorious Adversity as well as a great Prosperity, he is overthrown, and taken Prisoner by one Zantippus a Lacedemonian, whom the Carthaginians had entertain'd for their General. The Roman Navies suffer'd grievous Shipwrecks which eclips'd the Glory of all their former successes either at Sea or Land. Tib. Caruncanus Created High Priest, the first Commoner that ever enjoy'd that dignity. P. Sempronius Sophus, and Manius Valerius Maximus the Censors calling over the Senate turn'd out thirteen Members for misdemeanours. And held a survey of the whole City, and registred to the number of 297797 Heads. Regulus is sent by the Carthaginians to the Senate to treat for a Peace, or if that could not be obtain'd for exchange of Prisoners. Upon his Parole to return again, if the same were not granted; But he himself perswaded the Senate to deny both; and to discharge his Promise, goes back, where he is put to death by the Carthaginians with most exquisite Tortures.

THE Consuls next were L. Manilius surnamed Longus, and Q. Ceditius, who dying in his Office was succeeded by M. Atilius Regulus second time Consul. Affrica having hitherto been exempt from all acts of Hostility, first felt the War this year, the Romans entering the Country after a signal Victory gain'd by them over the Carthaginian Fleet. All which Affairs, as they happen'd, as also Regulus his adverse and prosperous fortune, and undeserv'd death, we shall describe in this Book. The year before C. Atilius being Consul, the Carthaginians, notwithstanding in a Sea-fight they first retreated with the loss of many of their Ships, yet look'd upon themselves not inferior to their Enemies because they had sunk some of their Gallies also: whilst the Romans reckon'd themselves to have gain'd a signal Victory.

Hence the two Nations with equal Courage and Emulation apply'd themselves to Maritime Affairs. And in pursuance hereof, the Consuls being order'd to transfer the War into Affrica arrived at Messina with three hundred and thirty sail of Ships under their Command, and from thence leaving Sicily on the right hand pass'd by Pachynus to take in some Foot-Companies then quarter'd about the Hill Ecnomus; and Hamilcar the Carthaginian General, and Hanno the Admiral with three hundred and sixty sail put over from Carthage to Lilybæum, and from thence taking their course to Heraclea Minoa, posted themselves in that Port, watching the Enemies motions, and intending to stop their passage to Affrica. The Consuls inform'd hereof, prepar'd themselves diligently to encounter either danger, so that whether they should come to a trial of skill by Sea, or make any descent into the Country, they might not be at a loss when the matter matter came to the puff. Having therefore mann'd their Ships with the best and most courageous Soldiers, they divided their whole Fleet into four Squadrons: the first Squadron being compos'd of the first Legion, the second and third of the two other Legions, and the fourth of the Triarii.

III. The Forces were order'd in this manner: Every Ship carried three hundred Seamen, and one hundred and twenty Soldiers, so that the whole Fleet made about one hundred and forty thousand men; which number was somewhat exceeded by the Carthaginians, having aboard their Navy one hundred and fifty thousand men: but for all that, the Consuls look'd on the Carthaginian Soldiery no ways comparable to their own: but seeing they were to fight upon the main Sea, where the swiftest Saylor, and the most skilful Seamen have the advantage; their chiefest care was to range their Fleet in such an order as might best incounter this danger. At last they rang'd their Fleet in this manner: the two Gallies wherein the Consuls were, they plac'd in the front: to both which they joyn'd the first and second Squadron in two Lines one directly opposite to the other; the Ships standing with their Prows outward: the two Admirals rode almost side by side: but those Ships next to them stood at a greater distance afunder, which still increased with the number of the Ships. Thus when the Gallies in the front stood nearest one another, and those behind farthest afunder, the order of these two Squadrons resembled the figure of a Wedg; but when the third Squadron drawn in one Line fill'd the interval between the two former, the figure of their Battalia was made Triangular. The Ships belonging to the third Squadron tow'd along their Boats and smaller Vessels. Last of all, the Triarii being drawn in a Half-Moon extended out their Wings so as to inclose the rest before them. Thus the Fleet being open before, and close in the Rear seem'd like a Ships Stem being pos'd in an excellent order to defend it self, and attack the Enemy.

IV. When the Carthaginians Generals heard the Roman Fleet was coming, and consider'd that their Town was weak and not tenable, the People cow'd, and fearful, and their Neighbours wavering, and dispos'd to Innovations, they determin'd to encounter the Enemy, being resolv'd to run any hazard rather than let them have a free passage to Africa. And when they had in few words encouraged their men, bidding them remember they were to fight not onely for themselves, but for their Wives and Children, and therefore ought to do it with the greatest Valour possible, they went on board and launch'd from shore having great hopes in their Seamen, and Soldiers.

V. By this time the Romans came on, and not far from Heraclea they engag'd with equal Forces. The Carthaginians had agreed among themselves, that Hanno (the same that had been beaten before Agrigentum) should command the right Wing, and Hamilcar all the rest of the Fleet: and having observ'd the Romans order of Battel, they also divided their Fleet into four parts, the left Wing being drawn in a Half-moon, was order'd to lie near the shore, but the rest of the Fleet stood in three Lines facing the Enemy. Of these Hanno drew out the right Wing, which consist'd of the swiftest Gallies, as far as he could into the main Sea, that he might encompass the Enemy, if the fight should begin any where else.

VI. The Consuls charg'd without delay, the Body of the Punic Fleet with their two Squadrons. Now Hamilcar, to disorder the Romans Battalia, had order'd his men, when they had joyn'd Battel immediately to retreat; which they did, and the Romans eagerly pursu'd them: but they received no damage by reason of the swiftness of their Ships; whilst the Roman Fleet as Hamilcar foresaw, was put in disarray, the Triarii and the third Squadron as yet not moving. Which he no sooner saw, but he gave the signal for his men to tack about, and receive the Romans pursuing them: and upon this arose a doubtful Battel, the Carthaginians having the odds for swiftness of Ships and skill of Mariners, but the Romans for strength of men. Therefore so long as the fight was between the Ships rather than the Soldiers, the Carthaginians prevail'd: but when once they came to grapple Ship to Ship, then the Romans got the Victory; whilst their Soldiers go good at handling their Arms, and now in the sight of their Consuls bravely expos'd their lives, endeavouring to signalize their Valour in the Action.

VII. While things went thus on that side, Hanno, with the right Wing, which had not mov'd yet, bearing upon the Triarii, attack'd them from the Sea, and distress'd them very sorely. At the same time the Carthaginians left Wing changing their former posture, and reducing themselves to a straight Line charg'd the Romans third Squadron, which tow'd their Boats, with their Beaks running full tilt upon the Enemy. The Romans then disengaging themselves from those Boats they towed, prepar'd for fight: and here also arose a sharp Conflict. Thus in three several places there were as many Naval fights as it were, at a pretty good distance one from the other. Having fought a long time upon equal terms, and with doubtful fortune, at length it happen'd, as it generally does, where men are equally engag'd at once in several places, that that side which first defeats a party of the Enemies forces overcomes all the rest: for, Hamilcar being no longer able to withstand the shock, drew off, and the rest of the Punic Fleet was immediately routed.

VIII. Now whilst L. Manlius the Consul was busie in securing the Ships taken from the Enemy, and towing them along, M. Regulus seeing his men engag'd in another place hasten'd to their aid with as many Ships of the second Squadron, as had escap'd without damage from the former service. Soon did the Triarii apprehend their succour, and taking heart again after they had desponded upon prospect of their danger, began valiantly to encounter with the Enemy. Hanno, finding these make a stout resistance, and himself press'd upon behind, hois'd sail, and sav'd himself by flight. In the mean time, L. Manlius seeing the Romans third Squadron driven towards shore by the Carthaginians left Wing directed his course thither, when M. Regulus also came in, who had now secur'd the Triarii and the Long-boats. Thus was the Scene soon shew'd, and they were encompass'd themselves who had just before environ'd the Romans: whom they had once at their mercy pent up and inclosed, and might have destroy'd them to rights; but for fear of the grappling-hooks not venturing too near, they gave the Consuls time enough, inasmuch that they rescu'd their own men, and also took fifty Ships of the Enemies with all the men, inclosing them suddenly as in a toyl: the rest being but few escap'd, stealing away near the shore.

IX. This Battel for variety of Accidents, and the sharpness of the Conflict, as also for the number of Ships lost may scarce be parallel'd. The Carthaginians had sixty three Ships taken, and above thirty sunk: the Victors had twenty four sunk, but none taken by the Enemy. After this Victory being returned to Messina, they spent some time there in refreshing the Soldiers, re-fitting their Gallies, and victualling their Fleet. During which time Hamilcar, who would have hinder'd the Romans from going to Africa, and being not able to do it by force of Arms, betook himself to this Intrigue; he sends Hanno to the Consuls to desire a Peace, thinking to gain time, till the Forces, he expect'd from Carthage, were sent him.

When

X. When Hanno was come to the Consuls, and heard some people crying out, that it was fit he should be treated after the same rate as Cornelius Asina the Consul had been by the Carthaginians five years before; If you do so, says Hanno, defending himself by a sly Complement, then you will not be honest men than the Africans. And the Consuls presently understanding what was said, commanded those to be silent, who had discour'd of making Hanno Prisoner: whom they accoll'd in a Language suitable to the Roman gravity: telling him, You are secur'd, Hanno, of any fear of this sort by the honour of the Roman Name. But the treaty of Peace had no effect, the Carthaginians not acting in earnest, and the Consuls being more desirous of Conquest than Peace, therefore they resolv'd no longer to put off the African Expedition. Nor did the Carthaginians oppose them, though they had once resolv'd among themselves to stop them in their Voyage. But Hanno hastening before to fortifie Carthage, Hamilcar durst not stir, but kept at Heraclea: whilst the Roman Fleet were neither incommoded by the Enemy nor the weather in their Voyage.

XI. There were those that fear'd this long Expedition, and trembled at the very name of Africa: and Mammius a Colonel was one of those who refus'd to obey the Orders of the Consul: but Regulus being highly inrag'd against the man, threatn'd to take off his head if he would not submit. Thus at length the Consul was obey'd, a nearer and greater terrour expelling all fears of the Journey. There is a Promontory call'd Hermeum, which from the Bay of Carthage runs out far into the Sicilian Sea: The foremost of the Roman Gallies arriv'd upon that Coast, and there staying a while till the whole Fleet had come up, the Consuls passing by the African shore came to the Town. Here the Legions first landed, and the Ships being hal'd ashore, some works were made to defend them: the City was invest'd, because it would not surrender at first, and being either deliver'd up or quitted by the affrighted Inhabitants (for both is reported) fell into the hands of the Romans.

XII. And now though the Carthaginians labour'd under great distresses, yet they were very glad, that things had fallen out better to them than they expect'd. For they fear'd, hearing the success of their men at Sea, that the Romans would have march'd out-right to the Walls of Carthage: upon which taking heart again they applied themselves to raise Forces, and to defend the City and the Territories belonging to it. The Consuls in the mean while (having dispatch'd a Message to Rome, both to inform the Senate of what was already done, and also to consult them upon the present juncture of Affairs) fortifie Clupea, intending it for their Head-quarters: and having plac'd a Garrison in it for the defence of the Town and the Country, march'd on with the rest of their forces, wasting that fertile and well-cultivated Country, which had not seen an Enemy since the time of Agathocles: they destroy'd likewise many stately Palaces, and carried away abundance of plunder, besides above twenty thousand men: none daring to oppose them. They likewise took several Towns by storm and surrender: wherein they found some defectors, and set at liberty great numbers of Roman Citizens taken in the last Wars: among whom I take Cn. Cornelius to have been, who was again made Consul two years after.

XIII. In the mean while, those that had been sent by the Consuls to Rome returned with the Senates Commands; whereby, "One of the Consuls was order'd to stay in Africa with such a part of their Forces as they should judge necessary to keep there without prejudice to the Commonwealth: and the other to bring the rest of the Fleet and Forces to Rome." So now Winter approaching M. Regulus remained behind with near fifteen thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and forty Gallies, the rest of the Fleet under the conduct of L. Manlius who safely pass'd the Coasts of Sicily, returned to Rome laden with abundance of spoils and Slaves. We find there were twenty thousand Slaves brought to Rome by Manlius: and that a Naval Triumph was decreed to him. After this Ser. Fulvius Patinus Nobilior, and M. Aemilius Paulus were made Consuls: to these Sicily and the Fleet were assign'd in charge. They were unwilling to call Regulus home in the midst of his Victories and successes in Africa: and therefore he was commanded to manage the War in Africa with the Character of Proconsul.

XIV. This Decree of the Senate none dislik'd so much as that very Person, in honour of whom it was made; who therefore complain'd in a Letter to the Senate, among others giving this reason for his desiring one to be sent in his room, that by the death of his Steward (who was intrusted with the tilling of a little Field of his of seven acres in Pupinia) a hir'd servant of his had taken this opportunity to run away, carrying with him his Household-stuff; wherefore his presence was requisite, lest his Farm being neglected his Wife and Children should be starv'd; upon which the Senate decreed, that M. Regulus his Land should be till'd at the Public charge, the Goods he had lost, restor'd him, and maintenance given to his Wife and Children. These were the manners of those golden days: But as oft as I read or write of such things, I cannot but reflect with myself, how much more lasting is the reward that accrues to men by Valour and Virtue, than by Riches; for the glory of M. Regulus survives so many Ages after him, while the vastest Wealth perishes with, and often before its Owners.

XV. The Carthaginians mean while having constituted two Generals, Asdrubal the Son of Hanno, and Bostar, call'd for a third (Hamilcar) out of Sicily, who came speedily from Heraclea to Carthage with five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. These having held consultation together, determin'd, that their Army should be kept no longer within Walls, as they had done till then, and that the Romans were not to be suffer'd to act as they did at pleasure. Then fir'd with eager resolutions to fight, they led out their Army: while Regulus over-running all the Country around, came at last to the River Bagrada: and when he was incamp'd there, a sudden disaster befell his Army, which was attended with some damage, and greater terrour. For a Serpent of prodigious Size set upon the Soldiers going for Water: and the men being astonish'd and in vain resisting; the Serpent swallow'd up some of them in her jaws and bruised others, twisting her self round about and lashing them with her Tail: some also were destroyed by the venomous scent of this Monsters breath: nay, Regulus was so pester'd by it, that he was forced with all his Army to come and fight for the possession of the River.

XVI. But seeing that he lost many men, and yet could neither wound nor conquer the Serpent, being arm'd with such thick scales as defended her from the Darts they threw at her; he order'd Engines to be plant'd and thus with battering Rams they were forced to storm the Enemy like to some Castle. After some shot made in vain a huge stone broke her Chine, and so cool'd the impetuoufness and fierceness of this formidable Monster; and at last with much ado the Serpent was kill'd; which had occasion'd so great terrour to the Legions and Cohorts, that Regulus protest'd, he had rather storm Carthage than have the same to do again with such another Monster. But the Romans could incamp no longer there for the noisomness of this Serpents Carcass, which corrupted the water with gore, and infected the Country round with the scent. And here Humane pride may blush at its own folly whilst it fancies nothing able to withstand its power.

H

This

This is certain, that one Serpent alive engag'd the whole Roman Army under the conduct of M. Regulus, victorious by Sea and Land, and being kill'd oblig'd them to remove their Quarters. Wherefore the Proconsul was not ashamed to send the spoils of this Enemy to Rome, and to confess the greatness of his fear and joy for the Victory by that trophy and publick Monument. For he caused the Serpents skin to be carried to Rome, said to be one hundred and twenty foot long; and that it was hung up in a certain Temple, where it continued till the times of the Numantine War.

XVII. The Consul decamping from Bagrada, led his Army towards Adis, having expugned and destroyed all the Towns and Castles that lay in his way. But this Adis, the taking of which prov'd a difficult Enterprize, he formally besieg'd, raising Batteries and planting his Engines against the place. When the Carthaginian Generals speeded away to raise the Siege, they sat down upon a Hill over-looking the Roman Camp, but woody and rugged. M. Regulus having consider'd the Site of the ground, and the nature of the Enemies forces, not comparable to his own in Foot, but better appointed for Horse and Elephants, which in an open field would prove formidable, but now were rendred unserviceable in so disadvantageous a place, he wisely taking advantage of the Enemies oversight, resolv'd to attack them before they could amend their Error.

XVIII. Wherefore having encouraged his men, and taking all requisite care for his design, before day-break he sets out of his Camp, and leads his Army up the Hill where the Carthaginians were lodg'd. This boldness of the Romans at first astonish'd the Carthaginians; but afterwards the confusion wax'd greater, when the Elephants and the Horse the main strength of their Army, not onely prov'd unserviceable, but also disorder'd and hinder'd them. The time also encreas'd their consternation, because the Romans had assaulted them unawares, whilst most of them lay asleep; so that several were kill'd in their beds, others cut off by Ambushes laid for them in by-ways and Roads, whilst they stragled for fear not knowing whither to go. But yet the Carthaginian Mercenaries, the Spaniards and Gauls hastily casting themselves into a Battalia, and fighting desperately without the Camp, rendred the Battel for some time very doubtful: the first Legion flying, and the whole Army would have been defeated, had not the Cohorts encompass'd the Enemy, as they were commanded on the other side, and assaulted them in the nick of time in the Rear, when they pressed upon the Romans retreating: who then rallied again, and with fresh courage charg'd the Aggressors.

XIX. Thus the Enemy being assaulted on both sides, were defeated after they had for a while made a very stout resistance. Which the Carthaginians seeing, immediately pour'd out of their Camp, and fled as fast as they could; and as for the Horse and the Elephants when they got to plain ground, their retreat was safe and easie to them, but the Victors having pursu'd the Foot further, return'd to plunder the Camp. In this Battel there were seventeen thousand of the Carthaginians slain, five thousand taken, and twenty two Elephants. The success of this Battel drew not onely the Country thereabouts, but people more remote to espouse the Roman Interest, and within fifty days they won about eighty Towns, whereby the Carthaginians already reduc'd to great straits, were in a manner dejected at the news of Tunis being taken, a place so strong, and but twelve miles distant from Carthage, whereby the Enemy might see whatever palls'd there, the prospect from thence lying open to the Town and neighbouring Sea.

XX. Nor were they onely alarm'd with fear of the Romans, but the Numidians also upon an old quarrel taking this opportunity rose in Arms against them, and by warring and burning the Carthaginian Territories left greater desolation and terror behind them than the Romans did. And now the Country people flocking into the Town, caused not onely a great consternation but a famine too, such a multitude of men necessarily consuming a great deal of provision: whilst some miserable Caytiffs conceal'd their Stores, designing their own gain in these hard times, and hoping to raise the prices of their Commodities, as they grew scarce. Hence it was that the Ambassadors sent by M. Regulus were very welcome, who desiring to have the Honour of having ended the War, and fearing lest another sent in his room should deprive him of it, advis'd the Carthaginians to conclude a Peace. But he, as it were sure of Victory, offer'd it upon intolerable Conditions, so that this Negotiation had not its intended effect.

XXI. The Conditions he propos'd to the Carthaginians, were, "That they should quit all Sicily and Sardinia; that they should restore all the Roman Prisoners gratis, and ransom their own, paying all the charges of the War, and a yearly Tribute besides. To which were added other things no less grievous: "That they should hold the same for their Enemies and Friends as the Romans did: That they should have but one Ship of the long form of building; and as oft as they were requir'd they should set out fifty Galleys completely equipped for the service of the Romans. The Ambassadors being amaz'd at these Demands, and desiring some milder terms from him; says he, "This is your case, you must either overcome, or submit to the Conquerours.

This Message so incens'd the Carthaginians, that though they labour'd under great pressures and necessities, yet they determin'd to endure the greatest extremity, rather than admit Conditions, which had so direct a tendency to inflame them and their People. In this juncture of Affairs, the Ships sent into Greece to raise Soldiers, returned with considerable numbers of hired Soldiers: and among the rest came Xanthippus, a Spartan born, who to his Country Discipline, wherein he had been excellently trained up from a Child, had join'd a suitable experience in Military Affairs.

XXII. He being told how things had gone till then, and informing himself as to the strength of the Punic forces both Horse and Foot, openly declared, that the Carthaginians had not been conquer'd by the Romans, but by themselves, through their Leaders ill conduct, who knew not how to manage their Forces. These words being soon nois'd about, Xanthippus was sent for by the Magistrates, who gave them such clear reasons for his Opinion, that nothing could be plainer. He shew'd them all along what oversights they had committed in their Marches, Encampments and Fights, being us'd to such places as were disadvantageous: and promised them not onely security, but Victory if they should hearken to his Counsel.

XXIII. His Opinion was approved both by the Chief Governours of the State, and also by the Generals themselves, who out of a laudable condescension preferring the Public Interest before their own Reputations, agreed and consented to have the command of the Army committed to this Foreigner. Xanthippus having received this Power, led the Soldiers forth daily into the Field, and exercis'd them in their Arms, teaching them to keep their Ranks, and readily do whatever their Captains should command. The Soldiers comparing this Discipline with the former became more confident of better success for the future: and the whole State, which had been chill'd with fear began now to be inspirited with fresh vigour and warmth.

The

The Officers also of the Army seeing this general briskness of their People, taking good heart, themselves likewise resolv'd to march against the Enemy; and having encouraged their men as the time requir'd, went out against the Romans with about twelve thousand Foot, four thousand Horse, and no less than one hundred Elephants: but what most concern'd the Romans was, to see the Carthaginians contrary to their usual manner, avoiding the hilly rugged Country, and keeping to the Plains. But by perpetual success the Romans were so elevated, that they despis'd an Army so often beaten by them, now under a pitiful Greek Commander. Nay, Regulus himself was not free from the same vanity, being carried away with the flattering smiles of Fortune; and therefore reflecting, that he had defeated the Carthaginians both by Sea and Land, taken almost two hundred of their Towns, and two hundred thousand men; and withal conceiving that he was able to force Carthage it self labouring under such distresses to surrender; he refus'd to grant Peace upon any tolerable Conditions, and wrote to Rome, that he had block'd up Carthage. Thus men of great Spirits often miscarry for want of moderation in Prosperity, than contancy in Adversity.

XXIV. Whilst the Carthaginians were incamp'd in a plain and level ground, M. Regulus, whose main strength consisted in Foot, and therefore should have kept the Hills, ventur'd down into the Plain, thinking every place indifferent for valiant Men to fight in; and for the greater show of his confidence, pass'd a River which ran between him and the Enemy, and advanced within a mile of them. Xanthippus seeing Regulus his ill Conduct declar'd, that now the time was come wherein he should make good his word to the Carthaginians: for having got the Romans tir'd by their journey in such a place as he desir'd, he assur'd himself of Victory. The time of the day seem'd likewise most opportune for Battel: for now it drew towards Evening, so that the Carthaginians acquainted with all the Passes of the Country, might easily escape by Night, if they should be beaten, and nothing could hinder them to prosecute their Victory, if they should prevail. When the Carthaginians therefore consulted what they should do, he conjur'd them by all that was good and great not to slip so brave an opportunity: and perswaded them to joyn Battel, which they easily agreed to, the Souldiers calling him by Name, and with extraordinary alacrity desiring Battel.

XXV. The Command of all therefore being left to this Spartan General; he led out his Army, and rang'd them in this manner: The Carthaginian Phalanx consisting of the main strength of their Foot, was placed upon the Reserve: before which at a convenient distance the Elephants were rang'd in one Line equal to the breadth of the Phalanx. On both the Wings the Light-armed men and the Horse were posted, and behind them on the right Wing, the Mercenary Men of Arms. His Army being drawn in this order, he commanded the Light-Horse as soon as they had charg'd to fall back to their own Men, who were to open their Ranks to receive them: and the Enemy being engag'd with stronger forces, to issue out again from both the Wings, and suddenly flank the Romans fighting with the Phalanx. Regulus on the contrary having rang'd his men in order of Battel, when he saw the Elephants standing in the Carthaginians Van, immediately took this course: the Light-armed he places in the front, the Legions in close Ranks on the Reserve, and the Wings consisted of the Horse; whereby the Army was firm for depth, but took up a much narrower compass than before: so that when danger was fear'd both from the Elephants and the Horse, this order serv'd well enough to hinder the Elephants from breaking in, but in an open Field so much room was left to the Enemies Horse, that they might surround an Army, shrunk into such a small compass.

XXVI. The Onset was made by the Elephants, Xanthippus having caus'd them to advance upon the Romans, and immediately the Romans clashing their Arms, and shouting mingled with the Enemy: The Horse also of both sides joyn'd Battel upon the Wing, and the Romans here over-power'd by greater numbers of the Enemies, when they were no longer able to sustain the shock, fled out-right: while the Foot towards the left Wing, either to avoid the Elephants, or in hopes of an easier Conquest over the Mercenaries, charged, routed, and pursued these to their Camp; but the rest had a harder task of it with the Elephants: who with an intolerable force broke the Ranks, trampled the Soldiers, and destroyed whole Squadrons together.

XXVII. However, the depth of the Army sustain'd the shock for a while, one Rank still supporting another, till the Army in every part began to be distressed at once: those in the Rear being encompass'd by the Enemies Horse, and those in the Front of the Army as many as had broke through the Elephants, were either kill'd by the Phalanx being fresh men and posted to receive them, or else by the Light-horse, who assaulted them on every side. Nor were there fewer kill'd in the flight; for the Elephants and Numidian Horse being sent after them, slew them here and there as they stragled through that open Champion Country. M. Regulus with five hundred was taken alive by the Enemy. Of all the Army not above two thousand men, who had defeated the Mercenaries, escap'd alive making their retreat hastily to Clupea. Of the Punic Army not many fell, besides the eight hundred Mercenaries, that had fought with the Enemies left Wing.

XXVIII. After so great an Achievement, when the Army return'd to Carthage carrying the spoils of the slain, and triumphing for having taken Regulus Prisoner, the Citizens in great numbers pour'd out to meet them: others standing either in the Streets or Balconies, with incredible pleasure enjoyed that sight which they durst not wish for some time before, their minds being scarce able to bear the joy and transports, or to believe the truth of this Victory; for those who but just now being brought to the brink of despair, fear'd to lose their Town, Temples and Country, could scarce believe so sudden a revolution of Affairs, though they saw it; but the eyes and minds of all were most intent upon the Generals themselves: whilst looking upon Xanthippus one while, and Regulus another, by their estimate of this they valued and extolled the greatness of their own General. "For, what a mighty Man must he be accounted, who has outed such a great and fortunate Warriour, so cruel an Enemy, and the terror of Carthage, of such a flourishing Army, a glorious Name, and in fine of Liberty it self, and that so easily and speedily too.

XXIX. They also admir'd Xanthippus the more for his shape and features, seeing so much Valour lay conceal'd under so mean a Stature, and an ordinary Aspect. From hence however Xanthippus got great honour, and no less envy. In declining of which he us'd as great prudence, as in managing the War. For although Carthage owed him an eternal Reward for his services done her, yet he chose to quit all doubtful and slippery hopes, and return home, before the peoples minds or his fortune was alter'd. For men are generally of such a temper, as openly to profess a love to their Country, but privately they mind their own Interest: Therefore as long as they can get Riches and Honours, whilst the State flourishes, they pretend the highest affection for it: but when they are in danger, lest others for their great services and Courage should share share in the fame, they had rather the Commonwealth should want men to promote its Interest, than that there should be any to obstruct their own.

XXX. While they are in hopes to equal others, they envy more secretly and less; but being far distant, when they see themselves depressed, and those Places and Offices, which they thirsted in the hands of the others, what they despair'd by Virtue to achieve, by Calumny, and criminations they are resolv'd to obtain. Hence it comes to pass, that the most virtuous has always the most Enemies to lie in wait for him. Against these designs a man indeed in his own Country is protected by his Friends and Relations: but a Stranger destitute of this support provokes and invites the malice of this bale sort of men, being more expos'd to injuries; for lying open to their wicked designs, he may be ruin'd with little labour, and injur'd without any danger.

And that Xanthippus foresaw this, the sequel manifestly shews; for when he was sailing homeward, "The Carthaginians, as 'tis said, sent men after him to drown him, whilst after they had receiv'd a favour they "disgusted and hated the Author of it, hoping by his death to raze out the very memory of their Cities "having been deliver'd by the valour of a Stranger. Different from these are the reports of others touching Xanthippus his fate: but yet these are such as plainly shew the Punic treachery. "For when he went "away they gave him an old leaky Vessel, which seem'd strong, being newly careen'd; but that this "wary circumpect Man discover'd the Trick, and privately embarking in another Vessel escap'd the danger. An Act of no less treachery, but much more cruel is said to have been done by them about the same time; for the Mercenaries tumultuously demanding their pay for the great service done by them, they put them on Shipboard, promising that in another place they should receive what they desir'd; but being abandon'd and expos'd in a desert Island by the Masters of the Ships commanded privately to do so, they di'd a miserable death, whilst depriv'd of all humane sustenance, left without Ships and Provisions, they could neither get away for the Sea, nor remain there for hunger.

XXXI. In other Authors I find this Act refer'd to those times wherein the Syracusans had War with the Carthaginians: and that that Island was afterwards called Ostodes or the place of Bones. It lies in the main Sea Westward from Lipara; which actions how, or whensoever committed are no ways agreeable to the Carthaginians practice at other times. Nor is it to be admir'd, if those men should treat their Enemies unmercifully, who are so affected towards their Friends and Assistants. Though indeed it is reported, that they us'd the other Captives well enough, because they knew the Romans had taken several of their men, and desir'd to receive them upon exchange.

XXXII. But they could neither moderate nor conceal their spite against M. Regulus, but tormented him as much as they could. For they gave him Diet, that neither pleas'd his Palate, nor strengthened his Body, but only by a slender refection kept him alive to prolong his miseries: but their daily affronts put upon him were more insupportable: for they us'd to frighten him almost out of his wits with an Elephant suddenly brought in to surprize him with his horrid noise and unusual shape; and at last being almost starv'd, he was thrown into the common Jail.

XXXIII. When this news came to Rome, the City was affected with great sorrow and fear too. For now it was expected that the Carthaginians irritated by the greatness of their Calamities, and confidence of Victory, should desire to quit scores with their Enemies, and make Rome feel those evils Carthage had endured. Wherefore the Senate commanded the Consuls to take all possible care of the defence of Italy; and that going themselves with as great a Fleet as they could make to Sicily, and from thence if they saw good to Affrica, they should divert the Enemy from making any attempt upon Italy. The Carthaginians were more desirous to recover their Towns from the Romans, as also to punish the African Revolters, and force by Arms those to obedience who persisted in Rebellion; Clupea however was stoutly defended by the Romans; In Numidia and other places, the War was great, but the Victory easie. Mean while when they had heard of a Fleet setting out from Italy, raising the Siege of Utica they began to repair their old, and to build new Gallies, and diligently prepared all things to hinder the Romans from entering upon Affrica.

XXXIV. But the Consuls us'd such strange diligence at this time, that at the beginning of the Summer they rigged out a Fleet of three hundred Sail completely equipped. With which going into Sicily, they found all things safe there; and leaving Garisons in the most necessary places, they made towards Affrica with the rest of their Forces.

XXXV. But driven by storm to Cossura (an Island situate between Affrica and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybaeum) having wasted the Country, and taken a Town of the same name, there they put a Garison therein. From thence they went on to the Hermean Promontory situate in the midway between Carthage and Clupea, and making one point of the Bay of Carthage. Here the Carthaginians Fleet met them, where they both fought a very sharp Battel, but at last the Romans from Clupea came to assist their own men, and turn'd the Scale, both sides being equal before. In this Battel the Carthaginians had one hundred and four Ships sunk, thirty taken, and about fifteen thousand men kill'd: the Romans lost eleven hundred men and nine Ships. The Navy from thence went to Utica, and the Soldiers disembarking encamp'd before the Town: The Carthaginians came thither also with their Forces led by the two Hanno's: and here they fought a pitch'd Battel, in which the Carthaginians were beaten, having lost about nine thousand men: amongst whom some noble Persons were taken, and kept by the Consuls, who thought by them to redeem Regulus, and those who had undergone the same fate with him.

XXXVI. After this they consulted upon the present state of Affairs, and were in great hopes their African Conquests might still be kept; but yet the Country around being wasted, for fear of a Famine they resolv'd to carry away the Roman Garison from Clupea, and return to Sicily. They brought away great spoils and booty, which being laid up in the Town of Clupea during Regulus his prosperous successes, were much increased by their fresh Victories.

XXXVII. The Fleet arrived in Sicily in very good condition, and the Consuls had been too fortunate, if they had known to use their felicity moderately. But in their return for Italy, they thought to reduce some of the Maritime Towns of Sicily: (though the Pilots in vain dissuaded the attempt, being between the rising of Orion and the Dog-star, when there is always stormy weather at Sea,) they pass'd by the Coast of Affrica which was dangerous and Harboureless, and suffer'd so great a wreck, that there is no Example in this kind of any other so remarkable. In short, of three hundred sixty four scarce eighty could be saved, and those, all their lading being lost. They lost likewise a great number of Long-boats, and other Vessels of several sorts: inasmuch as that from the Coast of Camarina, where the storm first fell upon them, all the shore as far as Pachennus was filled with Carcasses of Men and Beasts, and broken planks of Ships. But King Hiero gave them considerable reliefs in this their distress, who receiv'd them courteously, supplying them with Cloaths, Meat, and tackling for their Ships, and convoy'd them safe to Messina.

The Carthaginians taking advantage of this Calamity, retook both the Isle and Town of Cossura: and immediately crossing into Sicily destroyed Agrirentum, having not been reliev'd when it was besieg'd by Carthalo. Many men were kill'd and taken here: the rest, who made their escape through the middle of the Country into the Syracusan Territories, seated themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympius; and the Carthaginians had made themselves masters almost of the whole Island, had not the Romans diligence in rigging out another Fleet, kept the Confederates from falling away in this ticklish time. For the Consuls were so active in the business, that with an incredible speed they had one hundred and twenty new Ships built in three months space: and Cn. Cornelius Asina, and A. Atilius Calatinus again Consuls, having mann'd the Fleet with several stout men out of the new Levies, were commanded to sail as soon as they could.

This Cn. Cornelius was a great Example of Fortunes inconstancy, which may encourage men to bear Adversity: for he who seven years before being taken by the treachery of the Carthaginians, had endur'd slavery, bonds and imprisonment, now resum'd not only those other ornaments of his Dignity, but even the Consulship it self, and his Fates forc'd from him; for the gaining of which he now rejoyc'd as much as he had griev'd for their loss. The Consuls having pass'd over to Messina, and taking such Ships as they found there (being the relics of the former Wreck) arriv'd at the mouth of the River Himera with two hundred and fifty sail of Ships, and took the Town of Cephalodum, situate upon the same Coast at twelve miles distance from thence, by treachery. From Drepanum, (for they had bent their course thither) they departed disappointed in their designs, perceiving themselves not able to take the place in a little time, and that Carthalo, whilst they were about to besiege it, was coming to its relief.

But not discourag'd with this disappointment, they afterwards perform'd a more important Exploit with better success. For directing their course to Palermo the chief Town in the Carthaginian Territory, and possessing themselves of the Harbour they made a descent almost to the very Walls, and besieg'd the Panormitanes who refused to surrender. The nature of the Country thereabouts, which affords plenty of Timber, further'd their Enterprize, so that having soon perfected their Works, and whilst they vigorously push'd on the Siege, they battered down a Tower lying to the Sea with their Engines: and the Soldiers entering in at the breach storm'd the outward Town called the New, putting many of the Enemies to the Sword: Nor did the old Town hold out long: for when the multitude running thither for shelter, had brought more terror than provision into the place; the Inhabitants dejected with the sight of their danger, and fearing a Famine, sent Ambassadors to the Consuls offering an absolute surrender, with exception onely of liberty for their Persons. But this the Consuls (well knowing the extremities they were brought to) denied to accept of, unless they would at some stated Rate ransom themselves: Hereupon two Mina's were set upon every head, and fourteen thousand of them were redeem'd; the rest of the multitude being almost thirteen thousand were sold with the booty.

This was a remarkable Conquest, and of great importance and advantage; for several Towns in that Coast, and some also more distant driving out the Carthaginian Garisons, embraced the Roman Alliance. The Jetunians first led the way, and the Soluntinians, Petrinians, Tyndaritanes and others presently followed them. This done, the Consuls having left a Garison at Palermo return'd to Messina, and from thence to Rome: but the Carthaginians having lain in wait for them took some Ships of burden with all the Money that they carried away. After this two Triumphs were seen together at Rome: the Consuls the year before being continued in their Authority, held two Naval Triumphs over the Cossurians and the Carthaginians. Ser. Sulpitius triumphed first the sixteenth of February, and M. Aemilius the next day.

This year (being computed the five hundredth since the building of Rome) the African Expedition happen'd; but it prov'd of no effect, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and M. Sempronius Blasus being Consuls put over into Sicily, and failing in their attempt upon Lilybaeum directed their course towards Affrica, being furnished with two hundred and sixty sail of Ships; and whilst they cruis'd upon the African Coasts, and made descents into several places of the Country, they took many Towns, and abundance of prey and booty, but nought of greater moment could be performed, the Carthaginians meeting them everywhere being now more encourag'd, because they had recover'd all that Regulus had taken from them: and no other business hinder'd them, the Revolters being suppress'd and punished.

For Hamilcar having over-run all Numidia and Mauritania, reduc'd those Countries, and imposing a Fine of one thousand Talents, and twenty thousand heads of Oxen upon the People, punished the Ring-leaders, suppos'd to have kept correspondence with the Romans: whereof three thousand were hung on Gibbets. But in the mean while the Romans were not so much incommoded by their Enemies, as by storms and misfortunes at Sea; for the Fleet being driven to Meninx, an Island of the Leosphagi, bordering upon the lesser Syria, all the Ships being dry struck upon the Sand, at an ebb, till the Tide returning brought them off, after they had unladed and were reduc'd to extrem danger: and when they had escap'd this disaster with some loss, fearing such unfortunate places, they presently set sail like men flying before their Enemies: but did not foresee that they were running themselves into as great hazard as that which they avoided: however they had a prosperous Voyage of it as far as Panormus; but when they were making towards Italy, and doubling the Cape Palinurus, that runs from the Lucanian Mountains out into the Main; a violent storm overtook them, wherein one hundred and sixty men of War with several Ships of burden sunk. These continual disasters happening to their Fleet put the City in great fear and consternation; and whilst the Waves and Winds seem'd to deny them the Sovereignty of the Sea, the Senate decreed, that for the future there should not be kept on foot above sixty sail of Ships to be employ'd for the defence of Italy, and transporting Ammunition and Provision to the Armies in Sicily. But C. Sempronius the other Consul, (notwithstanding this fatal Wreck) bore a Triumph over the Carthaginians the first of April; and Cn. Cornelius the Proconsul ten days after did the same. This year there were Censors at Rome; but L. Posthumius (who was also Prætor at the same time) dying in his Office, Cn. Junius Pera his Colleague resign'd the Censorship.

The Summer following C. Servilius Cotta, and P. Servilius Gensinus put over into Sicily, where among other places they took Himera (so called from the River on which it lies) deserted by the Inhabitants, whom the Carthaginians had carried off by Night; but yet they were well enough satisfied with the taking king of so important a place, because hereby the disgrace had been repair'd which the Romans had sustain'd before that Town a little before, whilst through the greediness of some few of the Soldiers, to ingrofs all the spoils to themselves, Himera was lost, just as it was ready to fall into their hands; for a certain Prisoner taken by the Romans, (who had been an Officer in the Town) undertook to betray the Town for his liberty; and being dismiss'd at the time appointed, opened one of the Gates to the detachment, sent to seize the place. The chief of these being got in, and desiring to ingrofs all the booty to themselves, commanded the Gates to be shut after them, and none else to be admitted to come in besides. When this was done, the Thermitanes hearing the stir and noise, took the alarm thereupon: and whilst the Soldiers were over-powr'd by their Enemies, and incapable to receive any relief from their own men without, they rashly squander'd away their lives, and died like fools, being every man put to the Sword. Therme of the Himerians being thus reduc'd, C. Aurelius the Consul determining to besiege Lipara, (which had been several times in vain attempted by the other Generals) detach'd a party of the stoutest Soldiers that were in the Roman Army in Sicily, and carried them over into Lipara in Vessels borrow'd from Hiero. But being to return to Messina, that he might advise with the Diviners and Augures touching the event of the Siege, he left the chief Command of the Leaguer to P. Aurelius Pecuniola his Kinsman (or as others say to Q. Cassius a Tribune) charging him carefully to defend the Works, but not to engage in Battel. But this Man thinking it might make for his honour, if Lipara should be taken in the Consul's absence, contrary to the Orders given him, went and attacked the Town, but miscarried in his rash attempt; for he could not carry the place. And besides, he had much ado to defend the Camp; for the Enemies fallying out upon him in his retreat, cut off abundance of his men, and withal burnt down the Rampier. But at C. Aurelius his return the case was alter'd, for he took the Town, and put great numbers of the Inhabitants to the Sword. Afterwards he proceeded to punish the Tribune, who for his disobedience was turned out of his place, and by the Consuls commands having run the Gantlope was degraded to a private Foot-Soldier. This is a very remarkable severity of Discipline, whereof C. Aurelius shew'd some other Examples in that same Consulship. Lipara being taken, the posterity of Timasitheus (once Governour of that Isle) were exempted from all Taxes and Impositions, which this most grateful People did, to perpetuate the memory of an ancient kindness shew'd them by him. For when they had presented a golden Bowl to Apollo of Delphos, and the Liparean Pirates had taken it away, Timasitheus caus'd both the Present, and the Ambassadors that carried it, to be safely convoy'd in their journey to Greece, and back again to Rome.

In the next place the Romans attempted to besiege Erffa a strong Castle, with forty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, but could neither take it, nor durst they fight a pitch'd Battel with the Carthaginians. For after M. Regulus's defeat, the Roman Legions were so afraid of the Elephants, that ever after they declined the hazard of a Battel: and though both in the Country of Lilybeum and Selinus too they often advanc'd within sixty paces of the Enemy, and fac'd them in order of Battel: yet they did not come on with that briskness they us'd to do; but fearing to come down into the Plains, kept the high grounds, which were hard of access. From whence the Carthaginians were more and more encourag'd, whilst they now began to put some confidence in their Land-forces, and reckon'd their Enemies had lost more by Ship-wrecks than themselves had by Battels: And understanding without the Senates Decree for laying aside their Fleet, they hop'd to recover Sicily again, if fresh recruits of Soldiers were sent them. But they wanted Money: for this long expensive War had drain'd all their Treasuries, and consum'd all they could raise by Taxes. Therefore they sent Ambassadors to King Prothomy, then their Confederate, to borrow two thousand Talents of him: but the King being unwilling to disquiet the Romans (that were his Allies also) proffer'd to mediate a Peace, and accommodate the differences between both: but deny'd the Money, telling them, "That he would assist his Friends against a common Enemy, but not against other Friends."

XLVIII. About the same time Tib. Coruncanus was first made Chief Pontif out of the Commons. There were Censors also this year: because that Office could not be executed the former year; one of the Censors dying, and the other resigning. M. Valerius Maximus Messalla, and P. Sempronius Sophus perform'd the thirty seventh Lustration, wherein 297797 men were polled. The Censors were very secure in their Office: for they depos'd thirteen Senators, and four hundred young Gentlemen were degraded, their Horses being taken away from them. This happen'd through C. Aurelius the Consul his command; who alledg'd before the Censors, that in Sicily being order'd to dismount and work in the Trenches, they had refus'd to comply: when necessity requir'd them to do so. The Consul not thinking this a plenary revenge for their contempt of Discipline, obtain'd also of the Senate that their Arrears should not be paid them. And (I suppose) as times went then: he bore a Triumph as well for the strictness of Discipline maintain'd by him, as for his Achievements in the Wars. This Triumph over the Carthaginians and Sicilians, hapned on the 7th of April. But after all these mighty preparations of both sides (whilst the Romans and Carthaginians were afraid of one another) the Summer of the next year pass'd without any action that is memorable.

XLIX. L. Cassilius Metellus, and C. Furius Pacilus the Consuls, having transported the Legions into Sicily, did neither molest the Enemy, nor were molested by them; though Asdrubal the new Carthaginian General was arriv'd thither from Carthage with two hundred Gallies, one hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thousand Foot and Horse. In this juncture the Senate held several Consults together, and resolv'd to set out a new Fleet: for by drawing out the War at length they saw they should exhaust their Treasury; and besides, their Legions were mightily dispirited after the defeat of Regulus; and though the business should succeed prosperously by Land, yet they plainly discern'd, that as long as the Carthaginians were Masters of the Sea, they could not be kept out of Sicily; therefore they came again to their former resolutions, and placing their hopes in Shipping repair'd their old Gallies, and built new ones. Mean while Metellus being left at Palermo, when C. Furius being return'd from Sicily had call'd the Assembly for Election of Consuls, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Vulso were both of them made Consuls a second time: and the Senate charg'd and commanded them to rig out a Fleet, and to raise men for the service of it. L. Metellus his Commission was prorog'd to him, and he was order'd in the quality of Proconsul to command in chief the Forces in Sicily. Now when Asdrubal saw that one of the Consuls was absent with half the Army, and bethought himself that the Romans had declin'd Battel, though the Armies had fac'd one another in the Field; whilst he could no longer endure to be reproach'd as a Coward by his own men, he set out from Lilybeum with all his Forces, and having had a hard Journey of it through the borders of the Selunians, arriv'd to the Country of Palermo, and there encamp'd. The Proconsul was by chance then at Palermo, to cover the Allies, and Confederates in Harvest-time, that they might reap and lay in their Corn. He being inform'd that there were some of the Enemies Spies lurking at Palermo, commanded all the people of the Town to go out into the Field: and there had them take hold of one another by the hands; and by asking such (as he suspected for Strangers) what they were, and what business they had there? he discovered the Spies: And when he understood by them what the Enemy design'd, perceiving the Carthaginians proceeded very rashly in this Enterprize, he pretended fear, and kept himself within the Walls of the Town, the more to tempt the Enemies to a vain confidence. Asdrubal being therefore more elevated, march'd forwards, and as he went ravag'd and burnt the Country of Panormus, destroying the fruits and products of the Earth, and laying all waste to the very Walls of the Town. But the Proconsul was not mov'd either with the loss or the disgrace: who made account, that if he should forbear but a little while, he might quit scores with the Enemies: but he chiefly expected that they should pass the River Oretus, which runs upon the South-side of the Town; for if this were done, he promis'd himself an easie Victory over them. Now to compass this, he desir'd to have both the courage, and number of his men despi'd by the Enemy, and proceeded very timorously in all things, placing but few men to guard the Walls: This design succeeded as the Proconsul would have it; whilst the Carthaginian General by his rashness, and fortune too by a sudden accident further'd it. For Asdrubal pass'd the River Oretus with all his Foot, Horse and Elephants, and his Army encamp'd by the Walls of the Town, with that contempt of the Enemy (whom they look'd upon as already beaten) that they pitch'd their Tents without any Intrenchments about them, thinking Palisadoes and Breast-works unnecessary things. When the Suters and Merchants brought thither a great quantity of Provisions, and much Wine, the Carthaginian Mercenaries drinking immoderately, fill'd all places with loud noise such as follows Drunkennels. Then the Consul thought it seasonable to draw the Enemy to fight, by sending out some parties of Light-Horse; and the business succeeded so luckily, that whilst one party following another issued forth: at last Asdrubal's whole Army came out of the Camp. Then L. Cassilius the Proconsul, places part of the Light-arm'd men before the Town-Ditch; commanding them to throw their Darts very thick among the Elephants, if they should come nearer to them: and if they were press'd themselves, that they should retreat into the Ditch, and again fall out from thence. He commanded likewise the Tradesmen and Rabble of the Town to fetch abundance of all sorts of Missiles, and to throw them over the Walls, lest the Light-arm'd should want any: He placed the Archers upon the Walls whilst he himself, with the Men of Arms of the Cohorts stood in Battalia within the Gate, which look'd to the Enemies Right-wing. Mean time, those that were engag'd, one while being press'd by the great numbers of the Enemies retreated in good order, and anon supported with fresh succours of their own men detach'd by the Consul to their relief flood the shock: whilst the Masters of the Elephants inflam'd with emulation, and willing to gain the glory of the day entirely to themselves (without Asdrubal's sharing in it) charg'd the Enemies briskly, overthrowing all that stood in their way: and when the Romans retreated to the Town, following the pursuit rashly, they went on to the very Town-Ditch: But here whilst Arrows were showr'd as thick as Hail from the Walls; and the fresh men posted before the Ditch ply'd them continually with their Launces: the Elephants engag'd with the Wounds they receiv'd, fell back upon their own men, breaking the Ranks, and disordering the whole Army. The Consul, when he saw what was done (crying out that the time of his Victory long look'd for was come at last) sallied at the Gate: and here an Army of men drawn up in good order, easily routed those, who were cow'd and out of order. A great number of men fell both in the Battel, and in the flight too. A certain accident belike (which should have reliev'd the distressed) contributing to their ruin: for at the same time the Punic Fleet appeared, to which as their onely Sanctuary, when the multitude confusedly ran for fear, many of them were trodden down by the Elephants: others killed by the Pursuers; and a great number as they swam, or else tumbling down as they went a Ship-board in a hurry, perished in the Sea. And the Romans among their many great successes, never gain'd either before or since so signal a Victory: which inspir'd them with fresh Courage, and struck such a terror in the Enemy that made them quit not onely all hopes, but even the thoughts of Land-fighting during that War. Twenty thousand Carthaginians are said to have been slain in that action; twenty six Elephants were taken there, and all the rest afterwards. For the Proconsul considering that the Elephants being fierce and untractable could not easily be brought to hand, unless it were by men acquainted with their nature, promis'd by Proclamation to set such Prisoners at liberty, as would help to catch them. And these having first caught the tamest and gentlest of them, by their means easily brought the rest to hand: L. Metellus sent them all to Rome, having us'd a new Invention in transporting them by Sea. For having no Ships fit for that use, of several Hogheads joyn'd together (a piece of Timber being laid betwixt every two Hogheads to keep them tight) he made a float, which after it was board'd and cover'd with Earth, and the sides made up look'd like a Stable, so that the Elephants mistrusting nothing entred into it, and not being sensible they went by Water (a thing they cannot endure) were landed at Rhegium.

Asdrubal after this defeat escap'd to Lilybeum, but being condemn'd at Carthage, he was taken and put to death as soon as he return'd. The Carthaginians mean while seeing their Forces routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily except Lilybeum and Drepanum lost, and the Romans again puissant both by Sea and Land being provided with a new Fleet, resolv'd to make Peace; which now they would be glad with all their hearts to have concluded upon any reasonable terms. And bethinking themselves of M. Regulus, and the Conditions of Peace propos'd by him, they looked upon him as the fittest Instrument to obtain a Peace for them, or what next to that would prove their greatest comfort, an exchange of Prisoners; and they doubted not but that he would use his utmost endeavour and application in the business, if it were onely to serve his own turn. For what Man could be thought so hard-hearted, as not to desire a release from the miseries of a Prison, to see his Children, and enjoy his Country, liberty and honour.

M. Regulus had a Wife and Children at Rome: his Kinsmen and Relations were either Senators or else in Offices, and his Brother a Consul. He himself was belov'd by the Senate and people of Rome for his prosperous Exploits, and pitied for his Calamity. For which reasons therefore they could pitch upon no man, that would be more diligent in managing the business for them, or more likely to prevail in it. Regulus undertook the thing, not out of any hopes or design of advantage to himself (as it afterwards appear'd) but onely to persuade the Senate more effectually by his presence to maintain their own Interests.

And now being joyn'd with the Carthaginian Ambassadors: when he came to the City he would not enter into it, though he was desir'd to do so, alledging, that the Senate according to Ancient Custom ought to give Audience out of the Town to Ambassadors sent from an Enemy. When the Senate was assembled, assembled, He said before the Carthaginian Ambassadors, that being by the Law of Arms made a Captive of the Carthaginians, he came to present them with a memorial from his Masters, in order to have a Peace concluded upon such terms as both Nations should think fit, or if that were not granted to have an Exchange of Prisoners. When the Ambassadors withdrew he follow'd them: and though the Senate mightily importun'd him, yet he would not be present at their Debates, before the Carthaginians had consented to it; then he sat down silent, till he was ask'd his Opinion, which he deliver'd in words to this effect:

- LIX. "My Lords, I am yet a Roman, and through my body (as Fate would have it) is in the power of the Enemy: my mind being none of Fortunes Slaves remains what it was before; wherefore in compliance with this, which I properly call my own, rather than with that which is another mans, I advise you neither to exchange Prisoners, nor to make Peace. Whilst the War is afoot, 'tis wholly against your Interest to restore the Prisoners: for they require several Captains for me and many young men for an old one: among whom there are some (I know) that you do not despise. But to end the War unless upon very good Conditions, is both unbecoming men of your Wildom, and also prejudicial to the Public. I am very sensible of the many difficulties you meet with in waging this War; for great Enterprises cannot be achieved without much labour, and expences. But if you compare the Carthaginians condition, and your own together, you will find all the advantage on your side; we lost once ('tis true) a great Battel; but we have often routed them since, and our Victory at Palermo has dejected their Spirits more than their success against me had elated them. They have lost all Sicily except one or two places, and in the other Islands they have had but ill success. You have a Fleet now which the Carthaginians dare not encounter though they were always superiour by Sea: Nor have the losses sustain'd by storms so much impair'd your strength, as encreas'd your caution. As for Money perhaps both sides want it equally: but your Italians will be more obedient to you, than the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom they never lov'd, and of late have hated mortally. For those who without any injury or provocation revolted to me; after their Country is wasted by their former Masters, their Cattel driven away, Money extorted from them, and their Princes slain; what do you think do they expect, but that a new Army come into Africa from hence? Beside that 'tis easie for you to levy Soldiers, having such plenty of men fit for War of the same Language, Manners, Religion, Kindred, and Country to one another. I look on this to be a matter of that grand importance, that for this reason you are able to dispute the Victory with the Carthaginians, though you come short of them in all other respects. For what will a mercenary Army signify against such Forces as these? and though they should be of any use, yet the Carthaginians by their cruelty have render'd it as hard a task for themselves to raise foreign Soldiers, as to maintain those they raise. Xanthippus, to whom Carthage perhaps owes all, she had to lose since, being ingratfully and perfidiously treated stands for an Example to others to deter them from rashly entering into the Service of a People, that requites the greatest kindnesses with the greatest injuries. Besides the common rout of Barbarians, that stupid and mercenary Race will be afraid to serve a People eminent and notorious for their cruelty to their own Countrymen: of whom so many have died either by the Hangman or their Fellow-Soldiers hands. Others being expos'd in desert Islands, instead of having their Arrears paid them, met with strange and dismal deaths and punishments, such as not to be us'd by men. My Lords, You see here the reasons by which I am induc'd to persuade you neither to grant the Carthaginians Peace, nor an exchange of Prisoners.

- LXI. The Senate liked the advice well enough, if they could but have follow'd it, without prejudice to the Adviser; but the more he neglected his own Interest to promote the Public, the more they pitied him: and it was manifest that the Senate was resolv'd, by any means to have a Person of so generous a Soul restor'd to his Country. And now 'twas the talk of the Town, that since Regulus was come to his own again, he might rightfully remain, or be forced to abide there, and the chief Pontif affirm'd, That if he would stay at Rome, he might do so, and not be forewarn. To which he with such a Spirit and Aspect, as the Senate were amazed at, spoke to this effect.

"How long, O Romans, do you demur upon the point? follow my Advice and forego your care of my safety. 'Tis vain for you to endeavour after that which will prove neither pleasant to you, nor profitable to the State, nor honourable to my self. Perhaps whilst the thing is new, you would be well pleased to converse with me: but as soon as the impetus of that short-liv'd pleasure had spent it self, you would more abhor me for returning upon such dishonest terms, than you long'd for me in my absence. I am resolv'd not to stay in a place, where after my African slavery, I am not capable to live suitable to the port of a Citizen of Rome: and if I was ever so desirous to remain here, yet the Oath (I took) and reverence of the Gods prohibits me: For the Deity, by whom I swore to return to Carthage, if I am forewarn, will punish not onely my self, but the Senate, and people of Rome for the perjury. For certainly, if there be a God, he must needs be affronted by perjuries and profaneness. But if any one imagines that I may be absolv'd from the Oath: that such absolutions are recorded in our Augural Books and Rituals: That Ceremonies and Sacrifices may atone for false-swearing and perjury; I would have him remember that the Majesty of the Deity is not to be appeased with any inventions of men, when affronted by perjury: nor is it rational to conceive, that Spots contracted by sins may be washed away by the blood of Sheep and Oxen.

- LXIII. "As for me, I know the Carthaginians are preparing exquisite tortures for me, but I think perjury a more terrible thing than all that. For this would really hurt me, whereas their tortures and cruelties can only reach the body of M. Regulus, not his mind. Never think him calamitous, who has learn'd to bear his Calamity. As for bondage, disgrace, pain, poverty and want, I (who never thought them evils) have ceas'd to think them troublesome, after so long endurance. For by bearing them I have learn'd that they were supportable: but if my Calamities be encreas'd to such a degree that a man cannot bear them, Death will quickly put an end to all my troubles. I see therefore that that man is proof against all terrors, who fears not death, whose stroke 'tis in every man's power to prevent; and I would have done so, were it not the part of a man rather to conquer, than fly sorrow and grief; but I have spoken these few words without any order, to let you understand that nothing shall make me swerve from this Principle; and that ye might not pity my condition as that of an unhappy and miserable person: whereas 'tis easie and natural for me to persist in my resolutions; for I must take care to return to Carthage, and the Gods will take care of what I shall suffer there.

They

They say likewise, that the more effectually to persuade the Senate to let him go, he told them, "The Carthaginians had given him Poison, before he was dismiss'd from Carthage, which by degrees preying upon his Vitals, would kill him when he was restor'd to his Country, after the Exchange was made. Certainly this mans steddeness and constancy in Vertue is not parallel'd: who rather than swerve from his honest Principle, courted Affronts, Tortures, Death, and whatever the World does abhor, and that more eagerly than others decline them: which may serve for a good Example to instruct us, that those men can onely face Death in any shape, and will stick to their Principles to the last, who are sensible of the Souls immortality; and that they are not born merely for the present life. For M. Regulus would not have suffered such hard measure, unless he had been persuaded that vertuous Actions should be rewarded after this life, and those which are vitious punish'd. When the Senate had pass'd a Decree according to M. Regulus his Opinion, and all might see plainly, that the Carthaginians would be aveng'd upon him who had persuaded the Senate to reject their Proposals: some were so concern'd at it, that they gave Orders for detaining M. Regulus against his will. Moreover, his Wife Marcia, and his Children filling all places with mourning and lamentation, the Consuls said, That they would neither deliver up Regulus if he were willing to stay, nor hinder him from going.

But he refusing to speak with his Wife, and shunning the embraces and kisses of his little Children, return'd to Carthage and ended his days in great torments: For, having cut off his Eye-lids they kept him for some time in a very dark Dungeon; and afterwards when the Sun shone hottest, he was suddenly brought out, and forced to look upon the light. At last, he was put in a Chest of Wood, stuck full of Nails with the points inward, which was turned towards the Sun; and so narrow, that he was always forced to stand upright: and thus whilst his wearied body, where-ever he turned it, was pierced with Nails, he dy'd by the extremity of the Torture. This was the end of M. Atilius Regulus, which was more glorious than his life, though led with so much honour. He was a Person of incorrupt Integrity, an undaunted courage, and good Conduct: in whom the present or succeeding Ages could find no fault, except it were that he bore his prosperous fortune too weakly, and by refusing the Carthaginians Overtures, entail'd that lasting War to the great prejudice of both Nations. However, M. Regulus atton'd for that fault by his other Vertues, and principally by his admirable constancy in death; being more happy by thus supporting his Calamity, than if he could have avoided this blow of Fate.

When the Senate were informed of Regulus his death and the Carthaginians barbarous usage of him, they deliver'd up the Prisoners of the greatest note and quality to Marcia and her Children; whom they shut up in an Armoury stuck round with Iron Spikes, designing to torment them in the same manner as they had done M. Regulus, and for five days together they gave them no Meat: in which time Bostar the Carthaginian died with pain and hunger, but Hamilcar being a stronger Man was inclos'd with the body of Bostar five days more, and liv'd, having so much Meat allow'd him as would serve to prolong his life in misery. At last, the Magistrates being inform'd of what had pass'd, they gave strict command that they should forbear to exercise any more cruelties towards them, and that Bostar's ashes being sent home, the rest of the Prisoners should be used more moderately. Which shews the difference between these two Nations as to their tempers: whilst the one being no ways injur'd, destroy'd that Vertue by the most barbarous means, which it ought to have ador'd: and the other set bounds even to a just revenge, being not sway'd by the violence of their passions, but influenc'd with Principles of Humanity and Clemency that bright Ornament of all flourishing States and Empires.

DECADE II. BOOK XIX.

Florus his Epitome of the Nineteenth Book of Livy.

Cæcilius Metellus having performed excellent Service against the Carthaginians, had a most glorious Triumph, wherein he led Captive in Chains Thirteen of the Enemies Commanders in Chief, and one hundred and twenty Elephants. Claudius Pukher the Consul, who would needs hazard a Battel in spite of the ill-Auspices: and when 'twas told him, the Sacred Pullets would not Eat, commanded them to be flung into the Sea, to see if they would drink, is worsted in a Sea-fight by the Carthaginians, and being call'd home by the Senate, and order'd to Create a Dictator, nominated Claudius Glicias, a fellow of no Quality or Reputation, who though he were forced to resign the Office, would yet ever after come to the Theatre in his Mantle of State. Attilius Calatinus was the first Dictator that led an Army out of Italy. Prisoners are exchanged with the Carthaginians. Colonies sent abroad to Fregena, and to Brundisium amongst the Salernitines. A Survey taken by the Censors 351222 Citizens numbered; Claudia (the Sister of that Claudius, who fighting in contempt of the Auspices lost the Fleet) being crowned by a throng of people as she was going from a Play, in her passion happen'd to say, Would God my Brother were alive again, and had the Charge of another Armado, he'd quickly make you thinner: For which she was Indicted and Fin'd. Then began two Prætors to be Created at once: A. Posthumius the Consul, when he would have gone out to manage the Wars, is forbidden by Cæcilius Metellus the Arch-Priest, because he was at the same time the Flamen (or Priest) of Mars) and therefore ought not to be absent from the City, lest the Sacred Rights should be neglected. After several Commanders had done brave Service against the Carthaginians, the Consul C. Lucatius, Crown'd the Work with a signal Victory over them at Sea, near the Islands call'd Agates. Whereupon the Enemy begging for Peace, the same was granted. The Temple of Vesta being on Fire, Cæcilius the Arch-Priest with great hazard preserved the Sacred Reliques out of the Flames, two new Tribes added, Velina and Quirina. The Faliscans rebelling, were in six days time reduced to Obedience.

I. WHEN the Carthaginian Ambassadors were departed from the City, the Consuls being commanded by the Senate to transport the Army into Sicily, willingly obey'd, being inflamed with anger against their Enemies for M. Regulus his business, and with emulation and confidence for the Victory of Manlius the Proconsul. Nor did they measure the greatness of this Achievement by the damages of the Carthaginians, because having lost their Men, and so many Elephants, they must needs be weaker towards a further prosecution of the War; but they valu'd their success no less for their having overcome the Elephants, whereby the Roman Soldiers recover'd themselves from their former fear: and they were in good hopes the War might be ended, if they were not wanting to themselves: Therefore both the Consuls having got two hundred Sail of Ships under their Command with four Legions arrived at Palermo: and taking with them all the rest of their Men and Ships, besides what seem'd necessary for the defence of that place, they came to Lilybeum with two hundred and forty men of War, and several Ships more of all sorts: and there in a Council of War resolv'd to besiege the place.

II. This is that noble Siege of Lilybeum, which continued for full ten years from the fourteenth year of this War, and ended not in the taking of the place, or a surrendry of the besieg'd, but determin'd with the general success and event of the War. For both the Romans and Carthaginians well knowing how advantageous that place would be to both of them, either for the defence of Africa, or the Dominion of Sicily, it was besieged and defended with the utmost strength of both Nations. L. Metellus his Triumph afterwards gave the Romans some diversion amidst their trouble and concern for M. Regulus: whilst they did not only entertain themselves with the sight and thoughts of their successes, but also with the sweetness of revenge against this inhuman Nation. The Proconsul triumph'd over the Carthaginians the seventh of September; Thirteen Captains of the Enemies were led before his Chariot, and about one hundred and twenty Elephants: some say more. These afterwards were brought to the Cirque, when they exhibited Shows to the People, and there they had employ'd men on purpose to drive them along the Cirque with Spears in their hands, to the end that the People might learn to contemn those Beasts, which they had so extremely feared. Verrius Flaccus says, they were killed with Darts: because they thought it not convenient to make use of them; and to furnish and supply foreign Princes with such an accession of strength, would be no ways advantageous for the Commonwealth.

III. The same year Victuals were very cheap at Rome, a Bushel of Wheat was sold for a farthing, and you might buy a gallon of Wine, thirty pounds of Raisins, ten pound of Oil, and twelve pound of Flesh at the same Price; because there was greater plenty of these Commodities, than there was of Money, which began to be scarce, the War having been so expensive to the Public. Whilst Affairs went thus at Rome, the Consuls with main force push'd on the Siege of Lilybeum in Sicily; and the besieged with no less vigour withstood their assaults. Their first attack was made upon a Tower, which stands out farther than any other part of the Town towards the Lybian Sea, and this being ruin'd, they made their approaches, and carried on their Trenches to the next Tower, and battered down six Towers after one another. Then they began in order to storm the rest, to fill and level the Ditch for planting their Engines and raising of Batteries, and though the work was difficult and immense: for the Ditch was sixty Cubits broad and forty in depth, yet it was undertaken and carried on with vigour.

IV. The Carthaginians to hinder their approaches, cutting another Ditch more within removed away the Earth, which the Romans threw up: but whilst by the multitude of these that carried in materials the Mount was still raised higher, and the Ditch was levell'd, quitting that design, they built another Wall within.

within. The Governour Himilco having his Eye in every place, and being indefatigable in the business, who besides the Townsmen had ten thousand hired Soldiers under his Command; and by his Sagacity, vigilance and constancy, baffled and disappointed all the open assaults, and closer Stratagems of the Enemies. He kept his own men always in action, and ply'd the Enemies with continual Alarms: He countermin'd their Mines, made retrenchments to hinder their approaches, and placed Guards to defend every breach: In this time they often sallied out, and sometimes did it with such vigour and fierceness, that in those tumultuary Skirmishes as many men were slain as in a pitch'd Battel. In the mean time whilst the Romans thought to undermine the Walls, Himilco commanded Counter-mines to be made, where he saw the Romans threw out the Earth, and when these Mines were finished, presently he sent Soldiers aimed into them, who assaulting the Roman Pioneers being at work and without Arms, slew many of them: and others, whilst they ran to relieve their own men, were burnt with Faggots thrown into the Ditch, and afterwards set on fire.

Notwithstanding all this, the besieged began to be affected with fear and consternation, which some Commanders of the hired Soldiers taking advantage of, and pretending that their stipend was not duly paid them, resolv'd together to betray the Town to the Romans: not doubting but that every Officer might easily persuade his Soldiers to approve what was done. Therefore by Night having stoln privately out of the Town to the Roman Camp, they discover'd the condition of the besieged, and what they design'd to do. There was one Alexon among the Mercenaries at Lilybeum, a Grecian born, a good Soldier and very faithful and Loyal. He having observed the Traitors designs, immediately discover'd the matter to Himilco. Himilco not delaying in such a ticklish time, assembles all the Captains of the hired Soldiers in Lilybeum: tells them what was designed, and who were engaged in it: and reviles them sharply: besides, he exhorts those that were present, not to be partakers in the rashness and treachery of others: he promises to such as would continue faithful all favour with the Carthaginians, great Rewards, and sure pay: whereas those who would commit that infamous piece of Treason, must live hated by Gods and Men. Withal, he divides as much Money among them as he could get together in that hurry: and promises that the Common-Soldiers should be paid as soon as could be.

A Speech made in season is very forcible and persuasive, especially if by the sincerity of our performances we make our words good. For all of them agreed with him, and readily proffer'd their service to keep the Soldiers in due obedience. Himilco, having encouraged and commended them, bids every one immediately to repair to his Soldiers; and to use his best endeavour that they continue them dutiful and obedient: he sends Annibal (the Son of that Hannibal who died in Sardinia) and Alexon the Grecian: first to the Gauls, who knew and respected him: and the other to the rest of the Mercenaries of several Countries, who universally lov'd and esteem'd him. When these two had pass'd their words that what Himilco had promis'd should be duly perform'd, they manag'd the business so successfully, that when the Traitors came back a little afterwards, they were not only abhor'd by all; but also revil'd, and driven away by force. And when these return'd to the Consuls though the design did not hit, yet they had some Rewards, and Lands bestowed on them in Sicily. Thus the Carthaginians almost reduced to the utmost danger by this sudden mischief and contrivance, were at that time preserv'd by Alexon's loyalty and fidelity: who having before deliver'd the Agrigentines, (against whom the Syracusan Mercenaries would have been playing the same Game) justly deserves to have his name recorded in Story.

The besieged afterwards were encouraged with recruits of fresh Men: for the Carthaginians though wholly ignorant of what pass'd at Lilybeum, judg'd rightly, that that place must be reliev'd speedily. Therefore they commanded Adherbal their Admiral to fit out a certain number of Ships, and to put Men, Money and Ammunition into Lilybeum. Hannibal, Hamilcar's Son being sent by him, sayling with a fair Wind from the Ægusian Isles (as they are called) steered his course directly for the Port of Lilybeum, having his Soldiers in a readiness for Battel in the Ships, and intending to force his way through the Enemies if they should oppose him.

Now the Romans at the beginning of the Siege had endeavour'd to stop up the mouth of the Haven, by sinking about fifteen Vessels to the bottom of the Sea, which they had filled with stones for that purpose. Therefore partly through the suddenness and surprize of the thing, and partly for fear of being driven by the Winds into the Port, and dangerous places, they did not go out to meet the Enemies. But Hannibal safely arrived in the Port; and having landed about ten thousand Soldiers, was received with great joy and acclamations by the Lilybeans. When the Romans saw they could not hinder the Enemy from coming into the Town, they consulted together, how they might for the future best defend their Works, which they knew Himilco recruited with such numbers of fresh men would not fail to attack. Nor were they mistaken in their conjecture; for the Carthaginians intending to try the mettle of these fresh Recruits, and the courage of his old Soldiers rais'd and elevated by the arrival of their succours, assembles the whole Army [both the Recruits and the old Regiments] and with hopes of Victory and great Rewards persuades them to sally out, and having dispos'd them in such order (as seem'd most convenient) by day-break attacks the Romans intrenchments and approaches in several places. But the Romans were well provided to receive them, having plac'd strong Guards where they fear'd any danger: so that the Carthaginians were presently encountred very briskly, and many were killed on both sides, whilst in the action such numbers of men were engag'd, and that with so much vigour and resolution; for no less than twenty thousand men came out of the Town, and the besiegers made yet a greater number: for the Consuls having rais'd some Auxiliary Troops among their Confederates in Sicily, had got an Army of one hundred thousand men compleat: of whom there remained at the Siege sixty thousand, the rest being sent away to bring in Provisions, and upon other necessary occasions. But though the Battel was very fierce in every quarter, yet the brunt of it fell, where the Engines stood, whilst the one to defend, and the others to destroy them freely expos'd their lives; being as prodigal of their own blood as they were of their Enemies. There you might see the Bodies of the slain pil'd on heaps in that Quarter, and Post, which they had undertaken to defend from the first: the noise of the Battel, and the terrible rattling of Arms was encreased by another tumult, whilst a great company of men arm'd with fire-brands and Torches in their hands rush'd on (maugre all dangers and opposition) through the thickest of the Enemies to burn their Works: and the Romans were well-nigh forc'd to retreat, and to leave the Engines to the Enemies, who press'd so rudely upon them. But Himilco seeing several of his men fall, whilst the Romans maintain'd their ground still without shrinking, founded a Retreat, and first quitted the Battel. Neither did the Romans pursue them, being contented to have saved their Engines, which once they had given for lost.

- X. The next Night Hannibal unknown to the Enemies, who after the toils and fatigues of the Battel could not watch him, going away, went to Drepanum to Adherbal, having carried away with him the Cavalry, which in such a place could not be serviceable to the besieged, but elsewhere might do good service; and so they did. For, making excursions out of Drepanum, they render'd it very dangerous to travel the Country, and there was no fetching any provision to serve the Camp for them: for they snapp'd several of the Foragers, who stragled far into the Country, and distressed the Roman Allies all manner of ways, inasmuch that the Consuls were at a loss what to do. Adherbal also gave them continual alarms by Sea, for all of a sudden he us'd to ravage sometimes the Coasts of Sicily, and sometimes those of Italy, doing all the mischief he could possibly, to the Romans. Hence it came to pass, that a great scarcity of Provision arising in the Camp (for they had no Victuals left but flesh) a great many dy'd with Famine, and several of the sickness then reigning in the Camp.
- XI. Some thousands having been lost after this manner, it was resolv'd that one of the Consuls should depart to Rome to the Comitia, and carry away all his Legions with him: whereby those remaining behind at the Siege might be more easily furnished with provisions. And now the Romans again attempted to block up the Port, having with greater industry made a Mole of Earth, and Stones, and strengthening this Mole with beams laid across one another, which were join'd with Cramping-Irons to keep the whole more firm together; but the work was very difficult and unsuccessful, because of the great depth of the Sea in that place, whereby it came to pass, that whatever was thrown into it, was dashed in pieces in the descent: and by the first violent Gust of Wind and raging billows that happned, the Mole was quite ruined. Nevertheless, the very noise of the design for some time shut up the Port, which vexed the Carthaginians mightily: for now they had no way left them, whereby they might come to understand the state of the besieged, and there was none that durst undertake to go into the Town.
- XII. At last, one Hannibal (surnamed Rhodijs) a Gentleman of considerable Quality undertook to go and view the state of the Town, and to bring a faithful account of all particulars concerning it: at first the Carthaginians look'd on the thing as a Complement, and so thank'd him, but did not believe him; For they knew that besides the Mole built to stop the mouth of the Port, the Roman Fleet likewise rode there at Anchor to watch and guard it. But Hannibal having equipped a Ship of his own, touch'd at one of the Islands, which lie opposite to Lilybeum: and afterwards from thence sailing with a fair Wind about the fourth hour of the day enter'd the Port, whilst the Roman Soldiers looked on, and stood amaz'd at the boldness of the Man. The Consul however making account to intercept him in his return, order'd ten Ships chosen out of the whole Fleet to be equipped in the Night, and posted on both sides of the Port as near as might be to the mouth of it. Hannibal trusting to the swiftness of his Galley, set out in open day: and the Romans, who had watch'd narrowly for him, when they saw him, bore up in all haste towards him, but his Galley was so good a Sailer, that he was able not onely to escape from them, but even to brave them, sometimes sailing up to their Ships, and sometimes moving round about them: as if he defy'd an Enemy to Battel.
- XIII. By often repeating this piece of bravery he did the Carthaginians great service: for the besieged having an opportunity hereby to hear from their Friends the Carthaginians, and to communicate their necessities to them, were considerably encourag'd, whilst the Romans were vexed to the heart to see the daring Spirit and boldness of the Man. Now that which helped Hannibal very much in this undertaking, was his knowledge of the place gather'd from particular observations he had taken of the safest way for Ships to steer their course through those Washes of Lilybeum: For as soon as he could descry the Town from the Channel, he turn'd his Ship so that the Stern looked towards Italy, and from the Prow the Tower of Lilybeum, which stands over the Sea might be seen, whilst those other Towers lying towards Africa were hid from view, and this they look upon as the securest Road for such as enter that Port under full Sail. And now several others incited by the Courage and good success of Hannibal Rhodius, went into the Town: till the Romans happen'd to take a four-Oar'd Galley of extraordinary swiftness. For though in other places the Winds and storm had ruin'd the Mole, yet it stood, where the Water was shallow: and the Galley happening to strike against that part of the Mole, stuck fast there, and was taken by the Romans with all the men and rigging, being both incomparably good, which prov'd Hannibal's ruin. For having entred the Town by Night, when he loosed from Port in open Day, and saw this Galley meeting him at every turn and motion with a swiftness equal to his own, he thought at first to escape, but failing of that, endeavour'd to resist, when being soon overpower'd he was taken: And the Romans having got this Ship afloat, and narrowly watching the mouth of the Haven, they easily hinder'd any more Ships from coming to Lilybeum.
- XV. The Besiegers hereupon push'd on the Siege more vigorously, and assailing the fortifications next the Sea, drew all the Garison from other quarters of the Town to defend the Posts attack'd: and by this means the rest of the Army, which on the other side waited for this opportunity, were enabled to make themselves Masters of the outward Wall, which was left unguarded: though they could not hold it; for Hannibal coming thither in time with a strong detachment, beat out the Romans again, killing several men upon the place. The besieged afterwards had such good fortune, that they were in hopes of an intire Victory. There hapned at that time a violent Gust of Wind, which as if it had been on purpose, spent its fury against the Romans Engines, inasmuch that it shook their Batteries, and ruin'd the Works they had rais'd against the Town. The besieged soon perceiv'd the matter, and now imagining with themselves, that the Gods had put this opportunity into their hands to execute their often baffled design of burning the Roman Engines, they fallied out in three Bodies, and threw Fire-balls and other combustible materials upon them, the Timber whereof the Engines were made being very apt to take fire, having been fell'd long before, and dry'd in the Sun. The Romans came together from all quarters to oppose the Enemy, but they fought upon great disadvantage; for the Carthaginians by the light of the flames (the Engines now being set on fire) and the violence of the storm, were enabled to cast their Darts with greater strength, and surer aim. Whilst the Romans were hereby incommoded as much as by the Arms of the Enemies: For the Wind bearing violently against them, blew the smok, ashes and flames in their Faces, and drove the Enemies shot with redoubled force upon them; they in the mean while shooting faintly and at random, being not able to take aim in the dark; and the violence of the Wind brake the force of their Shot.

Thus

- XVI. Thus it came to pass, that all the Roman Engines used both for Battery, and Mines were burnt to Ashes. And hereupon they would have risen from before Lilybeum (as despairing of ever forcing the place) had not Hiero by sending to the Camp great Recruits of Provision, prevailed with them to continue the Siege. After this forbearing all attacks upon the place, they fortified their Camp, and resolv'd to leave the success to time.
- The Besieged likewise having repaired the ruins and breaches of their Walls, became more resolute to hold out for the future. But at Rome this news was very unwelcome: however, they were resolv'd to be avenged on their Enemies for the damages susteined at their hands: and one of the Senators, who had spoken some words concerning Peace, is said to have been kill'd in the Senate-house: so steddily and firmly were their minds bent to the War. Great preparations were hereupon made, and ten thousand Seamen raised, and sent over into Sicily, where a great number of Saylor had been lost.
- The Consuls this year were P. Clodius Pulcher, and L. Junius Pullus; though that this same Clodius was the Grand-child of Cecus is falsely reported by some Authors. When Clodius was arrived in Sicily and took the command of the Army before Lilybeum, he assembled the Soldiers, and exclaimed mightily against the Consuls the year before, saying, That more like Besieged than Besiegers, they had through Cowardize and Sloth squander'd their time at Lilybeum, doing nothing, to the great damage and dishonour of the Roman Name. For he was a hot-headed Man, fierce of temper and very haughty: one that vaunted mightily for his high Birth and Parentage, and behav'd himself both in his words and actions like a Man that was transported beyond his Senses; he never shew'd mercy to any Offender, never forgave any fault, but punished the least with immoderate severity, whilst he himself was guilty of most shameful Overights and Errors, and those too in the management of the most important Affairs. For that very Method of the former Consuls, at which he was so much offended just now, we find imitated afterwards by himself. For he also made a kind of Mole to stop up the Entries of the Port: nay, what was yet a more insupportable piece of madness: he with a furious suddenness attack'd Drepanum, and lost a brave Navy by his own precipitousness as much as by the valour and good Conduct of Adherbal. He had persuaded himself, and others, that the Enemy ignorant of the reinforcement lately sent to the Roman Fleet might be surpriz'd at Drepanum. Forasmuch as they would never believe, that the Romans would have either Courage or Power to give them Battel by Sea.
- In pursuance hereof he selected two hundred and twenty of the best Ships, and manned them with the stoutest he could chuse among the Legionary Soldiers, who very ambitiously strove to get themselves lifted for this service, thinking they went to take some certain booty, which was not far distant (Drepanum being situate but fifteen miles from Lilybeum) and silently in the Night weigh'd Anchor, and had a lucky Voyage of it in the dark, being undiscovered by the Enemy. But at the break of day, when the foremost Ships were descry'd from Drepanum: Adherbal was much surpriz'd at this appearance, and doubted not but the Enemy was coming on. Now he had two things propos'd to his choice, either instantly to fight the Enemy, or else to venture a Siege by permitting them to Land. The last of which he dislike'd both as a kind of treachery, and also as a thing dangerous in its consequence. Therefore he assembled all the Seamen upon the shore, and called all the Mercenary Soldiers together: and in few words, but those pat to the business, told them, "How great their advantage would be to fight it out like men of Courage, and if they refus'd to do so, what dangers they must expect from a Siege."
- They entertain'd his words with great acclamations, and Adherbal order'd them immediately to embark, and keeping the Admiral Galley (aboard of which himself was) in their sight to row up after her. As soon as he had given these Orders he weigh'd Anchor first himself, sailing just under the Rocks that hang over the Port, whilst the Roman Gallies at the same time enter'd into it from the other side. Clodius finding he was not to deal with a coward Enemy (as he fancy'd) that would refuse Battel; but one resolv'd to defend himself, and stand the shock, was much surpriz'd at it, and hastily countermanded all his Ships, intending to embattel them in the open Sea; but his Fleet observ'd no kind of order, but sail'd on very confusedly. So that some of his Ships had enter'd the Haven, others were making up towards it, and some got into the mouth of it. Hence it was, that whilst they all strove to retire, the Ships in this hurry ran one against another, whereby their Oars were broken off, and great confusion arose among them: till having got clear of the Haven as well as they could, they immediately drew up in Battel-array close to the shore; for the time would not permit them to chuse a better place.
- The Consul himself who at first had brought up the Rear, now tack'd about, and sailing about before all the rest settled himself upon the left Wing of his Fleet. But Adherbal in the mean while having pass'd by the Enemies left Wing with five Men of War (for no more came up just with him) began to confront the Romans, having the open Sea behind him: and at the same time the rest of his Fleet coming up as fast as they could, join'd these at a just distance according as he had commanded; then ranging all his Ships, he advanced against the Enemy in good order. And now the Flags being hung out from both the Admirals, they fell on very furiously, both engaging upon equal hopes, but the Carthaginians having the better fortune; for tho the Romans exceeded them in number of Ships, yet in all other points they had the advantage. For they had the best Ships, and the skilfullest Seamen: and moreover, they had taken the most commodious place to fight in, so that if they happen'd to be press'd, they should not be streightned for Searoom to retreat into, whilst by the swiftness of their Gallies they might easily elude the Enemy though got never so near them, and encompass him if he should chase them further. The Romans on the contrary being coop'd together close to the shore, had neither room to use their full strength when they charg'd, nor stop safely when they had a mind to it: but as often as they retir'd from the Enemy pressing upon them, they were in danger either of running themselves upon the Shelves, or splitting against the shore.
- Thus whilst they could neither break through the Enemies Fleet, nor charge them behind by reason of the slowness of their Ships and unskilfulness of their Seamen, nor were able by reason of the straitness of the place they were coop'd into, to employ the Soldiers on the Poop for the assistance of those of their men who were distress'd by the Enemy: the Carthaginians having them at their mercy rak'd them sorely. Moreover, the Soldiers besides their present difficulties were dejected upon a religious account, and thought the Gods fought against them for the Consuls rashness in engaging the Enemy at a time when the Auguries portended nothing but ill success: which he not onely disobey'd, but spoke contemptuously of them. For, he commanded the Birds because they would not feed to be thrown into the Sea that they might drink, since they would not eat. Now this made the Soldiers more timorous to engage, whilst they imagin'd that Heaven oppos'd their Cause. But the Author of this fatal blow had wit and courage enough to save himself, self, when all had been lost; for when he saw his Ships all around sunk and taken by the Enemies, he got away with Thirty Ships, that stood next him, making his escape betwixt the Carthaginian Fleet and the shore. And for the better security of his retreat to Lilybaeum, lest the Garrison should annoy him from the Town, he caus'd the Ships to be adorn'd in a triumphant manner, to amuse the Carthaginians, who hereupon imagin'd that the Consul had won the Victory, and that the rest of the Fleet was following after; so that he return'd safely to Lilybaeum, and struck a great terror in the People of the Town.

XXII. The Enemy took Ninety three Ships abandon'd by the Consul, together with all the Soldiers and Seamen, except these who by running themselves ashore got to land, and so escaped; and many Ships (doubtless) were sunk in the Engagement; for Clodius had brought about two hundred with him from Lilybaeum: And the Carthaginians got this great Victory at a very cheap rate; for 'tis reported that they lost not so much as one Man or Ship, and had but very few wounded, whereas the Romans had eight thousand Men killed, and twenty thousand taken Prisoners: And about this time the Carthaginians took several Vessels laden with Corn from Palermo, and carried them to Drepanum; and withal bringing out of the Country about Drepanum some Provisions into Lilybaeum, suppli'd the Besieged with large recruits, and good store of all necessaries.

XXIII. Nor did the Romans ill Fortune at this time stop here, but further distress'd 'em, so as not only to deprive them of all power by Sea at the present, but likewise to put 'em out of all hopes of ever obtaining any. For the other Consul L. Junius with several Ships laden with Provisions for the Army in Sicily, and sixty Men of War. Setting out from Italy, upon his arrival at Messana, met there abundance of other Ships, which were got together to the Port having come from the Army, and from other parts of Sicily: The Consul, when he had join'd these, having got now two hundred and twenty long Ships, and near eight hundred Ships of burthen sail'd for Syracuse, and being arrived there, deliver'd part of the Fleet to the Quaestors to be conducted to Lilybaeum, whilst he himself stay'd at Syracuse waiting the arrival of those Ships, that could not come up with the rest of the Fleet from Messana, as also to take in some provisions, which the Confederates fetch'd from the mid-land Countries. Mean while Adherbal having sent both the Ships and Prisoners (he had taken) to Carthage; whilst success and honour push'd him on to action, join'd Carthalo's Fleet consisting of seventy Men of War, and as many Ships of burthen, with thirty others, and gave him orders to go and bring away, or else destroy the Roman Navy that rode at Anchor before Lilybaeum.

XXIV. Carthalo by day-break entering the Port in a terrible manner, took some of the Ships, and fir'd others; and in the mean time the Garrison rally'd out by Himilco's command, which occasion'd a great Contention through the Roman Camp. Carthalo at last having destroy'd some few and brought away Five Ships, steer'd his course for Heraclea. Whilst he lay in wait thereabouts, intending to hinder the Romans in their Journey to Lilybaeum, he had intelligence of a considerable Fleet, that was not far off. Now Carthalo, several other Commanders joining with him, had got about a hundred and twenty very good Ships, trusting therefore in his present strength and former Victory, he immediately weighs Anchor, and goes to meet the Enemy. The two Fleets came in sight of one another near Gelo, but the Roman Quaestors declining an engagement upon such disadvantages, stood off for Phimias a confederate Town of theirs.

XXV. Now there was no Port in that place, but certain Rocks running out into the Sea, had made it a pretty good Harbour, and here the Romans having landed, prepar'd themselves to receive the Enemy upon the shore; having brought down their Engines from the Town and planted them along the shore for defence of their Ships. The Carthaginians at first thought to besiege the Enemy, making account that they would be frightened into the Town, and leave the Ships for a Prey: But finding that the Romans did not stir away, and that the place they fought in was very disadvantageous, they gave over; and having carried away some few Ships laden with Provisions, went off to the mouth of the Halycus, a River not far distant from thence, intending from thence to observe the Enemies motions at their leisure, whilst their wounded Men were under cure. Other Authors relying upon the Authority of Philinus (as I suppose) report that the Romans had receiv'd some considerable Loss in this place; and that the Quaestors were so much terrifi'd at the first sight of the Enemy, that they left the Ships of Burthen and all others besides the Men of War behind, and made all the Sail they could to recover Phimias. Moreover they tell us of Sixty Men of War, and Fifty Ships of Burthen of the Romans that were sunk in this Battle, and Thirteen more so torn and shatter'd, that they could never be refitted again.

XXVI. Some time after this, whilst the Carthaginians lay at Anchor at the mouth of the Halycus, the Consul having dispatch'd his business at Syracuse, as he was sailing towards Lilybaeum by the Promontory of Pachinus, was discover'd by the Carthaginian Spies. Carthalo advertis'd hereof, in all haste goes to meet the Consul, who was then ignorant of the late action at Phimias, whereby he might fight him far enough from the Quaestors Fleet, so as to hinder him from having any aid from them. When the Consul saw the Punic Fleet at some distance off, whilst he durst not fight, nor could escape from the Enemy advancing towards him, he runs his Fleet into a rough harbourless place, the fear of losing the whole Fleet overcoming the apprehensions of the present danger. Carthalo not daring to follow him, posted himself near a certain Promontory so conveniently situated, that from thence he might at once observe the two Roman Fleets.

XXVII. Not long after the winds blowing roughly at Sea, the Carthaginian Pilots being good Sea-men, acquainted him of the storm that was coming on, and so perswaded Carthalo to quit that Station, and let sail for Pachinus, by which means the Punic Fleet easily escaped the fury of the storm: but both the Roman Fleets were destroyed all to rights by it, inasmuch as that there was not one plank of the Wreck left fit for any use; except two Vessels wherein the Consul afterwards brought all the Soldiers and Mariners preserved from this wreck to Lilybaeum. By this disaster all the Vessels laden with Provision, and above a hundred Ships of War were cast away: but yet part of the Army was saved, several having swim out, or else being cast out upon the neighbouring Coasts.

XXVIII. The Senate having recalled P. Clodius the Consul from Sicily, because of his former miscarriage, began now to despair of any success by Sea, when they heard of Junius his disastrous Fortune. However they went on briskly in their preparations for the Land: And for the Siege of Lilybaeum, they resolv'd to continue it; and therefore several Persons were appointed to carry over Provision for the Army there, according as they should want it; for considering, that as the Carthaginians had the advantage by Sea, so they had it by Land; they still entertain'd good hopes of the final success of the War; for now the Romans had Sicily all at their Devotions, either by Conquest, or else by Confederacy: But they neither liked the

the present Consuls, nor thought the business would ever prosper in the hands of such Magistrates, the Office having been prophan'd through their contempt of the Auspices, and of Religion (of which those two Consuls were both guilty) for L. Junius as well as Clodius had proceeded in his Voyage contrary to all the admonitions of the Augures. Therefore recourse was had to an expedient new, and extraordinary; for it was ordered that a Dictator should be nominated to command the Forces in Sicily, whereas no Dictator till then had ever been General of an Army out of Italy.

P. Clodius shew'd himself strangely insolent at this time; for when he was commanded by the Senate to appoint a Dictator, he (as if by being the occasion of so great a slaughter, he had not offended enough against his Country, unless he expos'd also the honour of Magistracy to contempt) nominated M. Claudius Glycias a Serjeant or Secretary of his, to be Dictator.

At this Affront all the People being highly incens'd against him, he was forced to resign, and summon'd to his trial before the People. The Authors seen by Cicero, report that he was condemn'd; but others say, when Sentence was ready to pass upon him, that he was deliver'd from it by chance, a violent sudden shower of Rain dissolving the Assembly: so that as if the Gods had stop'd all manner of proceedings against him, they did not think fit to bring him to his trial again. But as for Glycias, People being ashamed to see the greatest Honour in the hands of a mean inferior Fellow, he was forced to resign, and afterwards he saw the Plays in his Robes. Aulus Atilius Calatinus was made Dictator in his room, and he appointed Cecilius Metellus to be his General of the Horse, who had triumph'd over the Carthaginians. These men indeed went into Sicily, but did nothing memorable there.

Mean while L. Junius, desiring to repair the disgraces at Sea by some signal Achievement, whilst he watched all opportunities; at last found a way to possess himself of Eryx, by corrupting some of the Town, who betrayed the place into his hands. Eryx is a Mountain the highest in Sicily next Aetna, situate in that part of the Island, which looks towards Italy, in the mid-way betwixt Drepanum and Panormus: but towards Drepanum 'tis more steep and rough. On the top it has a Plain, where stands the Temple of Venus, (called from this place Erycina) the richest and most magnificent of any in Sicily. Below, about the midst of the Mountain, there stands a Town of the same name, of very difficult access; for a Man must wind about the Mountain by long narrow Paths to get into it. Junius having observ'd the nature of the place, plac'd Garisons both upon the top of the Mountain and also in those Streights which look towards Drepanum, being secur'd in his Post, from whence he might easily beat out the Enemy, if he should attack him. He likewise walled Egithallus and strengthened the place with a Garrison of eight hundred men. But Carthalo having landed his men by Night forced the Castle, and the Garrison-Soldiers were partly kill'd or taken, and some of them fled to Eryx.

Authors are very uncertain as to the rest of the Actions of Junius. For some report that he was taken at Egithallus by Carthalo. Others, that to prevent being impeach'd for the loss of the Fleet, he killed himself. And the Account of the Secular Games is as uncertain; it being controverted whether they were then the third time celebrated or fourteen years after, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varrus being Consuls. Yet I think it more probable that the Games fell out this year, Peoples fears after such disasters, together with the hopes of better times, inciting them to the celebration of the same, and a punctual observation of their religious Rites. This year was very fruitful, and twelve pounds of Oil were sold for so many farthings. In the mean while, either the time of this Dictatorial Authority being expir'd, or else Calatinus resigning his Office, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus entered on their second Consulships.

These managed the War in Sicily successfully enough, but yet without any Victory or advantage gotten, which is worth speaking of. They repuls'd indeed the Carthaginians of Drepanum and Lilybaeum, so that they did not so frequently or so far make their Excursions: and also recovered those Garisons which they had in places remoter from the Sea. When Carthalo had often miscarried in his Efforts against these, he resolv'd to go and waste the Coasts of Italy: that by this Alarm at home he might give a diversion to the Consuls good fortune in Sicily: and if they should not be forced to repass the Sea to relieve their people in distress, then he might take this advantage to ravage the Country, and take their Towns; but fortune cross'd him in this his attempt also. For the Praetor with the Militia being sent to cover the Confederate Countries, and check the incursions of the Enemies, oblig'd Carthalo to return into Sicily, laying aside any expectation of the success of his designs. Upon his return the Mercenaries mutinying for want of their pay, he expos'd some of them in desert Islands, and sent many to Carthage to be punish'd, which the rest of their Comrades took so heinously, and were so irrag'd at, that all of them seem'd ready to revolt, whence (it was fear'd) an occasion of a new War might arise. But Hamilcar coming in the very nick of time to succeed Carthalo, set upon these Mutineers by Night, and some he kill'd, and drown'd others: and as for the rest who begg'd his pardon, he admitted them to favour.

This is that Hamilcar known by the surname of Barcas, than whom Carthage never bred a greater or a better Commander: a Person that had wanted a Parallel, unless he had found one in the Great Hannibal his Son. From this time forwards the War began to go harder on the Romans side. For immediately after he had quell'd the mutiny of the Mercenaries: Hamilcar set out with a Fleet of Ships to wait Italy, and far and near ravag'd the Country of the Locrians and Brutians. At this time the Romans having been much obliged to Hiero the Syracusan for his constant love and affection towards them, remitted him the Annual Tribute, which he was engag'd to pay by the Articles of the former League, and established a perpetual Alliance and good Correspondence with him.

Mean while Hamilcar returning from Italy, made a descent into the Country of Panormus, and pitch'd his Camp between Panormus and Eryx at a place very strong by nature, called Eperste, a Mountain on every side steep and craggy, which is of a considerable height, and over-looks the Country all about: it is not of a small compass at the top, but contains one hundred furlongs in circuit: all which space of ground is good either for pasture or tillage, as being conveniently expos'd to the Sea-breezes, which preserves it free from all venomous Creatures. It has also a certain Eminence, which might serve for a Fort, and has a good prospect into the Plains below. Hard by it is a Port very commodious for those that go to Italy from Drepanum or Lilybaeum: being well furnished with fresh Water. There are only three ways by which that Mountain is accessible, two from the Land, and one from the Sea: but all are alike difficult and uneasy. Now that Hamilcar encamp'd here, it shew'd the daring spirit and resolution of the Man, thus to put himself in the midst of his Enemies, whilst he had no Confederate Town near; but trusting merely in the natural strength of the place, and his own Courage and experience in War, he gave the Romans

Centinel Alarms, and annoyed them very much from hence : and withal very much establish'd the Carthaginian Affairs which began now to prosper at home also. For Hanno the other Carthaginian General, who was Hamilear's Rival in the pursuit of Honour and Renown, both to advance his fame, as also to maintain the Soldiers at the Enemies charge without making them burdenson to the Public, carried the War into that part of Lybia which is about Hecatompylos : and having taken that Town brought three thousand Hostages to Carthage.

XXXVI. But their successes were not free from some alloy of cross fortune. For L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Num. Fabius Buteo being Consuls: a Fleet set out at the charge of some private Persons, landed and walled Africa. For though the Senate determin'd again to forbear fighting any more by Sea, yet when the Citizens desired it, they gave them leave to make this Voyage upon condition, that they should restore all the Ships they borrowed from the State : reserving the booty for themselves. Thus a considerable Fleet being got together brought much terror and detriment to the African Coasts : and besides that, they assaulted Hippo Regius no contemptible place, and there destroy'd the Navy of the Hipponensians, and many of their Houses, but being about to return they found the mouth of the Haven shut up with Chains : and here they were forced to use their Wits to escape this danger ; for the Galleys being rowed swiftly, when the Fore-decks almost touch'd the Chain, all the people retir'd to the Hind-decks : by which means the Fore-decks being lightened of their burden easily passed over the Chains : this done, they all went into the Fore-decks, which sinking down with the weight, raised the hind-parts of the Galleys, and made them slide also over the Chains, that they all escap'd the danger, and got clear out of this strait. After this deliverance from so much peril and fear, it was not long ere they fought the Punic Fleet at Panormus with good success.

XXXVII. The Roman Consuls acting separately with their Forces this Campaign, L. Metellus besieged Lilybæum, and Num. Fabius Drepanum. There lies near Drepanum Southward an Island, or rather a Rock, named by the Greeks the Pelian Isle, and by us Columbaria. The Consul by night made himself Master of this, having put all the Punic Garrison in the place to the Sword : but Hamilear who was come in all haste to defend Drepanum, at break of Day went out to recover this place, which the Consul seeing, and not being able to assist his men in the Island, resolv'd to attack Drepanum with his utmost power ; whereupon Hamilear drawing back, the Consul kept the Island, and afterwards made use of that place to annoy and gall the besieged. For by a Mole he join'd it to the main Land ; and because the Walls were weaker on that side, he made his first attack upon the Town from thence, having raised several batteries. Polybius was of Opinion, that the Battels betwixt Hamilear and the present and succeeding Consuls for their number, cannot, and for the likeness of accidents and occurrences ought not to be describ'd : whilst for almost three years together, Hamilear encamped at Epirota, fought very near every day with the Roman Generals, especially after they had lain before Panormus, and left scarce five furlongs distance betwixt them and the Enemy ; it being impossible there should be any cessation of Arms, or respite from action, where two Armies were encamped so near one another : though all this while they never came to a general Battel, in order to a final determination of the War : for several things hinder'd them from this, and especially because both having equal forces, and both equally secured within their strong Holds, even those who were worsted in the Encounter, might soon find a shelter and a Sanctuary in their Camp. Thus it came to pass, that though some were always killed whilst they fought, yet as soon as they turn'd their backs, they retreated safely within their fortifications.

XXXIX. But the same year that Drepanum was besieged, the Punic Fleet infested not onely the Sicilian, but also the Italian Coasts, and Hamilear ravaging all he could set his foot upon, over-ran the Maritime Coast of Italy as far as Cume. By these Inroads, as also by the Battels in Sicily when many of the Romans had been taken Prisoners by the Enemy, the Generals enter'd into Articles with the Carthaginians about exchange of Prisoners : wherein it was agreed betwixt them, That that side which should receive most Prisoners, should pay two pounds and a half of Silver for every head : and the Carthaginians receiving more than they had restor'd, paid the Money according to the Articles. We find two Colonies to have been sent out in Italy this year, to Æsulum and Asinum. The Lustration likewise (being the forty second) was made at Rome this year by the Censors A. Atilius Calatinus, and A. Manlius Atticus. The number of all the People now poll'd came but to 257222. Whereas in the former Lustrum, there had been poll'd very near 300000 Men. So great a multitude of Mortals had the Wrecks and Wars destroyed at that time : but yet for all this, the Army in Sicily was then reforc'd with a considerable supply of men, which was brought thither by the two Consuls M. Octavius Crassus, and M. Fabius Licinus.

XL. These had a very difficult Province to manage and a troublesome Campaign to pass, for there was work enough cut out for them : but not being able to force Hamilear from his strong Holds, they performed no action that is memorable, which was also the Cause of some of the succeeding Consuls by reason of the same disadvantage : Besides that, being young Generals chosen against an old well practis'd Commander, they were forced to spend in preparation, and acquainting themselves with the Site of places, the minds of the Soldiery, and state of the War, more time than remained for action. And for this reason it seems that year, when the time of Elections was at hand, they were inclin'd rather to chuse a Dictator, than that either of the Consuls should be called out of Sicily. Titus Coruncanus was chosen Dictator, in whose name the Assemblies for Election of Magistrates were held : he named M. Fulvius Flaccus General of the Horse.

XLI. Mean while the two Tribunes of the Commons Sempronius and Fundanius, summon'd Claudia Appius Cæcus his Daughter to appear before the People at such a day, because that returning from the Plays, when she was press'd by a throng of People and her Chariot stop'd in the crowd, she had used this direful imprecation : "Oh that my Brother were alive again, that he might lead forth another Fleet ! There was scarce any great or noble Family in all Rome, but either by Blood or Marriage was akin to the House of the Claudii. Therefore she wanted not her Compurgators to defend her, who pleading the greatness of her Family, the good Services of her Father Appius, and frailty of her Sex, alledg'd, "That it was unusual to impeach any Woman before the Commons ; and that the Cause was too slender and light, to make a new Custom commence from Clodia, which neither in thought or deed was guilty of any Treason against the Roman People, and had onely spoken some rash words which she might have spar'd.

XLII. Against which the two Tribunes thus argued : "What impious and cursed words Claudia has spoken, you know already, O Romans ! for what needs there any Evidence, when we have her own confession for the thing ? neither can she deny the matter, if she would ; for she spoke these words in the face of the Sun, having no respect for a multitude of good Citizens upon whom she used this Imprecation. Why

"there-

"therefore should we doubt of the punishment, since we are certain of the Crime ? Have the Laws made too little provision in the matter ? or shall we too strictly insilling upon the letter of the Law, suffer ourselves to be impos'd upon by false interpretations thereof ? They plead that it is an unusual thing to prosecute a Woman before this Tribunal. Suppose it is so : 'tis an unusual thing likewise for any Woman to offend in this nature : nor had we ever an instance of any Woman that committed so great a Villany till now, and I could wish now there were no need of making a President ; for we had rather the World were once grown so innocent, that the Sword of Justice might be asleep in the scabbard, than be forc'd, as now, to draw it out against Criminals with a necessary and expedient vigour, though it may make us seem harsh and severe.

"A strict execution of Laws is necessary for every State, that would support itself : and those Laws ought not surely to be infring'd and violated by any, much less by such Persons as would pass for the *Atlas*es and Pillars of the State ; who being well read and learned in the Laws must of necessity be sensible, that though there is no express mention made of Women in several Laws, yet in the words, if any one, or the like, a Man with half an Eye may see that Sex is imply'd as well as the Male. Is it any thing strange therefore, if we suppose laws made against Treason to reach both Sexes, when even this Claudia is an Example which may convince us, that Women as well as Men may become Traitors. But some are for extenuating and palliating the matter. They would have us look on that as a Peccadillo, which went no farther than words, and not express'd by any overt Act. We must prove (forsooth) that she us'd all her endeavour to compass and bring about a hellish design, kept correspondence with the Carthaginians concerning it, aimed the Rabble, seiz'd the Capitol, and actually involv'd us all in that Mine of Calamity, which by her Curses she imprecated upon us. But Actions are not more punishable by the Laws, than the intentions and designs of Men. Indeed, let a Madman or a Child do any mischief and there is no Action against him ; but that is not the case here. 'Tis certain, that a Mans mind may be understood as well by his words as deeds. She who wishes such things as these, what would she do, if it lay in her power to bring about what she wishes ? But if we despise not others judgments in the matter, (as I am sure we ought not to do :) We may find, that in other Countries an impious Wish has been esteem'd a heinous Crime, and punish'd accordingly. At Athens, a place eminent above any other in Greece for good Government ; a Man has been condemned to die for wishing himself a good Trade, which he could not have, except in times of great mortality, he being one that sold all necessities for the burials of the dead ; and yet those words might have been capable of a fairer construction : whereas this Woman has positively wish'd for the utter destruction of the whole Commonwealth.

"(Says she) That my Brother were alive again ! A villanous wish though she made it purely for her Brother's sake. For why should she desire him alive again, by whole means so many thousands of honest Citizens lost their lives ? Who affronted the Commonwealth no less by his insolence, than he had endamag'd it by his rashness ? Who being condemn'd in the judgments of all men even before his Trial, escap'd not the infamy of the Sentence, but the punishment by mere chance ; And would you, if you had any brains, wish such a man alive again ! whereas she ought to have prayed, that his memory had died with him, his actions and his ashes had been buried in one common Tomb. As other Ladies justly glory in the renowned Actions of their Brethren : so thou (Claudia) shouldst be ashamed of such a Brother if thou hadst any shame ? However let's pardon the Lady, for thus foolishly wishing her Brother alive, supposing she meant well : Nay acquit her too, if the reason of her Vow appear not as abominable as it was insolent. For why would you have your Brother alive again ! that you might comfort your self with the sight of so near a Relation ? No, not at all. What then ? why, that he might command another Fleet. And was't for this, thou wicked Creature, that (as much as in thee lay) thou desiredst to raise the dead, to invert Natures course, and break open the Prisons of the Grave, that thou mightst find him again, by whom we might be all of us ruin'd.

"This is she, Countrymen, in whose favour those men intercede, who whilst they shew themselves kind Relations, little think they forfeit hereby the reputation of honest Citizens, and yet there's not one here intercedes for her but might prevail to have as much pity shewn her (as he pleas'd) had she pitied any of you. But since she has wish'd the confusion of us all, who would be such a tame Fool, as to think a person of so barbarous and inhumane a Spirit worthy any mercy ? Of late when the Censors number'd the People, what groans were heard, what a damp seiz'd upon the City ? For also during those years several actions of ours succeeded fortunately, yet to all good men the Commonwealth seem'd in a dangerous condition, whilst the people number in the Censors Books fell so short of what it was before ; but she's not at all concern'd for the loss of those that perished : She's griev'd onely, because any survive ; She complains the streets of Rome are too much throng'd with People, and wishes for that very Man to live again, by whose means the accounts of the last Poll were so much abated.

"But granting all this, that the Lady is unworthy of mercy, Yet, say they, if she has offended, she deserves to be pardon'd for her Ancestors sake. What, shall we set up this for a Law in our Commonwealth, that if any Person has done any Service to his Country, his Posterity may injure the same, and not be called to account for it ? Our Forefathers surely were not of that mind, who put Manlius to death, when not his Father, or any of his old Ancestors, but he himself had preserv'd the Capitol, the last refuge of the Roman People : He ought not to seek a greater Reward for his Service to his Country, than the satisfaction of his Conscience for the discharge of his duty : And if Ap. Claudius has done his Country any Service, he has been fully rewarded for it : He got Wealth and Honour by it, wherein he flourish'd to his dying day ; though perhaps it would have been better not to mention Appius and the former Claudii, than to remind you again of the injuries and Affronts put upon you by that Family, never inclin'd to popularity. For what other Appius would they have you remember but him, who also spitefully oppos'd your Interests, who chose rather to perish with his Army than be beholden to his Colleague the Plebeian Consul for his preservation, who continued also in his Censorship beyond the time prefix'd by the Law.

"And now let them, if they have a mind to it twit us with the Merits and good Services of the Claudian Family, and proceed as high as the times of the Decemvirate : or even to the first beginning of that Race ; and by all their enquiry they will be enabled to shew how the Woman takes after her Ancestors pride and obduracy, rather than prove that she ought to be spar'd for their sakes. What reason then can they or any man else produce, why this Woman should not be punished ? Alas, are they afraid for her, lest they should lose so vertuous a thing ; which if you fear in the least, O Romans, make

"much of this Claudia, and keep her, so that when other Matrons in times of public dangers go to pray to the Temples, she may hinder their Prayers by her Curses: when they pray for the safety of our Armies, this may with their confusion: when they solicit the Gods, that few may be killed, she may reproach them, if any return safe. Be kind to that Woman, who, whilst other Matrons excite their Children by their Ancestors Examples to Virtue and Loyalty, teaches hers by the Example of P. Claudius to fight rashly, fly cowardly, to destroy the Citizens, and trample upon the Commonwealth. Let her instill into our Noblemens Children these Principles, that they may learn them in their Infancy and imitate them in their riper years. Let those who are in time to be intrusted with the command of your Forces by Sea and Land, be thus trained up, thus principled.

XLVIII. When this Harangue had ended, the People being assembled to give their Votes, gave Sentence against Claudia; whereupon she was fined twenty five thousand pound Brals Money. With which and other Fines Ti. Sempronius the Edile built, and consecrated the Temple of Liberty upon Mount Aventine. Afterwards A. U. 508. M. Fabius Buteo, and C. Atilius Bulbus were made Consuls. Some Citizens were then brought to Fregelle a Maritime Town of Hebruria nine miles from Asium, where a Colony had been planted two years before. This year was fought a great Battel by Sea between the Romans and Carthaginians at Agimurus, which proved successful to neither side, the Carthaginians losing a great number both of Men and Ships; and the Conquerors losing all the Spoils taken from the Enemy, by the violence of Storms and Wrecks.

XLIX. In Sicily Affairs were carried on with the same Conduct and success, as had been done the year before: the War proving difficult to the Consuls, not only by reason of the incommodioufness of the place they were incamped in, but also because of Hamilcar's subtilty: who as he was bold in action, and would venture farther than any man in the Combat, so he was good at Intrigue, and thoroughly versed in all Stratagems, by which means he sultein'd the Roman Power at that time, so, as not only to defend the places he had taken, and harals the Roman Allies both in Sicily and on the Coast of Italy, but also having his Eye elsewhere propp'd up the then tottering Punic Commonwealth, being an active Man, and one that was very resolute, and quick in making the best advantage of any thing that occur'd, as he shew'd at this time. For having a great mind to relieve the Lilybeans, who were chiefly distressed from the Land, he commanded part of the Fleet to put it self in such a posture as if it were going for Lilybeum, at sight of which when the Romans had issued out, he with such Ships, as he had hid in a place out of sight for that purpose, got into the Port, and by his presence and supplies of Provisions mightily encouraged the besieged.

L. Whilst the time was thus spent in Sicily, A. Manlius Torquatus Atticus, and C. Sempronius Blasus being again Consuls, took the command of the Forces. Now the state of the War was not alter'd to the better, but proved rather worse at that time. The Romans, as we said before, had placed one Garison above the Town of Eryx upon the top of the Hill, and another below at the foot of it. So that besides the strength and situation of the place, it was so well guarded, that all People were confident there could happen no danger to the Town; but Hamilcar, whose boldness broke through all opposition that hinder'd him in any Enterprize, performed this great Action in a trice. For, having arrived in the Night with his Forces, and advancing silently about thirty furlongs up the Hill (himself marching at the head of the Army) he suddenly surpriz'd the place: and having put the greater part of those he found within the Town to the sword, he sent the rest away to Drepanum.

LI. From that time the face of things appeared strange, and the War was prosecuted very sharply on both sides: for, Hamilcar lying betwixt two several Carilons of the Enemies, was himself besieged by the lower at the same time that he was besieging the other above him: And now both Romans and Carthaginians having endured incredible pains and labours, no day passing without fighting, performed many noble Achievements during the two years next ensuing, being never tir'd or parted by either Victory or slaughter, but always equal, till a Battel by Sea decided the Controversie betwixt them. A Colony was brought the same year to Brundisium in the Country of the Salentines, twenty years after that Country had been brought into subjection to the Romans. At the same time Ti. Coruncanius, who first of the Commons had been made chief Pontif, died very old, and L. Caelius Metellus succeeded him.

LII. Mean while, C. Fundanius Fundulus, and C. Sulpicius Gallus were made Consuls at Rome. Then also the War went on with Hamilcar in the same manner, and with the same success as before, except that a Mercenary Band of Gauls, and certain others who bore Arms in the Service of the Carthaginians, by reason that they were not paid, and for other injuries, endeavoured to betray the Town of Eryx to the Romans (for they were there quarter'd,) and after their design was discover'd, ran over to the Consuls: and were the first Foreigners that the Romans employed in their Service. Their Forces being thus increased: yet for all this they could not put an end to the War by Land-fights, especially because Hamilcar made such a vigorous opposition, who could neither be trepann'd by Stratagem, nor tam'd by Forces. Therefore they resum'd their resolutions of sitting out their Fleet, and putting to Sea again; for the Carthaginians could not be kept out of Sicily, whilst they commanded the Sea. Besides that the considerable successes obtain'd by some Privatiers formerly gave them pretty good encouragement to betake themselves to Sea Affairs. But they wanted Money, their Treasury having been for a long while much drain'd, and not able to support the expences of so tedious a War.

LIII. Then it was, that the good and noble Spirits of the Roman People administred seasonable aid and support to the Commonwealth labouring under these Pressures and difficulties; for such was the Generosity of the Senators, that in this time of publick danger they were asham'd stingily to save their money, but rais'd a Fond that surmounted the Charges they would be at in building a Navy. For the wealthier Citizens singly, and two or three of the others, according to their Estates, did undertake to set out each one five-oar'd Gally compleatly rigg'd and equipp'd, upon condition to have their Money restor'd them, when better times should come: By this means two hundred five-oar'd Gallies were equipp'd, all which were built after the model of Hannibal Rhodius his Gally; and People were in great expectation, that this Fleet must necessarily determine the War.

LIV. Whilst matters go on in this manner C. Lutatius Catulus, and A. Posthumius Albinus were made Consuls. A. Posthumius was Flamen of Mars; and when he was minded to go to his Province, L. Caelius Metellus the Chief Pontif confin'd him at home, telling him that it was not lawful for a Priest to forego the Duties of his Function; which act of his serv'd as a President for after-times. The Senate at the same time shew'd another instance of their Zeal for the maintenance of their own Religion, by prohibiting C. Lu-

tatius the Consul from consulting the Præstine Oracle, and making use of foreign Auspices and Divinations in the administration of the Common-wealth: Then they apply'd themselves to the business of the War; and because that both the Consuls could not go (one of them being a Priest, and therefore confined at home) and that one would not be able to undergo so great a charge, they concluded to send one of the Prætors, two having been made first that year, with C. Lutatius. That Province fell to Q. Valerius Falco's lot. These getting together all the Ships belonging to the State, and those of private Men, the whole number amounting to three hundred, they set out for Sicily in the close of Winter, the season of action then approaching; and as soon as they were arrived, the Ports of Lilybeum and Drepanum lay open to them; for the Enemy not mistrusting in the least that a Fleet should come from Italy, had returned with all their Navy into Africa.

The Consul who was of himself a brisk active Man, being encouraged with this good fortune at the beginning, besieg'd Drepanum, and at the same time disciplin'd the Soldiers every day to fit them for the Engagement by Sea which was likely to follow; and this he did with such success, that those Soldiers he had brought from home unexpert in Sea-service, were now become excellent Seamen: Mean time whilst Drepanum is besieged both by Sea and Land, and reduc'd almost to extremity, part of the Wall being battered down, the Consul engaging in the heat of the action, received a dangerous wound in his Thigh, and the Soldiers being dismayed at his misfortune ran all about him, and left the assault when the Town was almost taken.

The Consul was not yet perfectly recover'd of his Wound, when it was told him, that a great Fleet of the Enemy approach'd. There were four hundred Ships in all laden with Provisions for the Army, and a great deal of Arms and Money; there was also aboard of them a considerable number of Soldiers, Hanno a Noble Man of Carthage having the chief command of the whole Fleet. This Man was resolv'd by all means to get to Eryx, where he might unload his Vessels, and take in some of Hamilcar's best Soldiers to man the Fleet, and then engage with the Romans. But this design of his though laid with so much advice and wisdom, was nevertheless ruined by the wary and vigilant C. Lutatius the Consul. For considering, that to fight presently with the Punic Fleet now moving heavily beneath the weight and burthen of its own luggage, would be the only means to get the day, he manned his Fleet with the best of his Soldiers; and letting out about the middle of March for the Egatian Isles opposite to Lilybeum, from thence discover'd their Fleet coming from Hieromefus; and having encourag'd the Seamen and Soldiers, he ordered them all to put themselves in a readiness to fight on the morrow.

But next morning in consultation they were very much at a loss, whether they should fight or not; because the Enemy had got the wind of them: and when the reasons on both sides were weigh'd and debated, at last they came to a resolution to fight both against the wind, and Hanno alone, rather than suffer him to unload his Vessels, and to bring the flower of their Land-forces with Hamilcar himself, the most terrible man of those times, into the Engagement: Therefore upon sight of the Enemies Fleet then directing their course for Eryx, in all haste he weigh'd Anchor; and the more to encourage his Men, tho he could not use his Foot, he caus'd himself to be carri'd into the Admiral Galley. The Carthaginians seeing their passage shut up, put themselves into order of Battel, intending to force their way through the Enemies. And the signal being given on both sides, the Battel began very furiously, Q. Valerius performing all the Duties of General, by reason of C. Lutatius his indisposition, which hindered him from commanding in his turn.

The fight did not last long, before 'twas plain which side would have the Victory; for the Roman Gallies being light, assaulted the Enemies that were slow, as they pleas'd themselves: Besides the Romans had now the advantage of them in all other respects. For they had amended upon better experience, whatever before had been inconvenient to them; their Gallies were built after the best form; whatever might hinder them in fight, was carefully removed; their Seamen were strong and expert in their business; and they had the flower of their Legions aboard their Fleet, all which must needs render them victorious. Contrariwise the Carthaginians Gallies were heavy; their Seamen but newly raised and unexperienc'd: For they never dream'd that the Romans durst attempt any thing again by Sea. So that as it must needs happen, the Victory in an Engagement, where there was so much odds, was soon determin'd. The Carthaginians lost a hundred and twenty Ships, whereof seventy with the men (amounting to near ten thousand) were taken, and the rest escap'd by flight to Hieromefus, the wind changing very conveniently for them in the very time of the engagement.

This is that noble Victory obtain'd over the Carthaginians, near the Egatian Isles, according to the account given by Polybius: For other Authors speak of seventy three Ships taken, a hundred twenty five sunk, thirty two thousand Men taken, and thirteen thousand kill'd. The booty was very great, not only in Provisions and Arms, but in Gold and Silver. The Romans lost only twelve Ships. It is reported that a light in the form of a Torch, was seen in the Heavens, from the beginning of the Engagement, which with its point threaten'd the Punic Fleet, a Prodigy shewing the event that succeeded. Hanno with all the Gallies remaining after the Battel, besides those that had escap'd to Lilybeum, returned to Carthage, where he paid for his misfortune with the loss of his Head. C. Lutatius the Consul having gone to the Army at Lilybeum, stay'd there till his wound was thoroughly cur'd, and in the mean while spent his time in reviewing the Ships and Men taken Prisoners, and in giving the necessary orders for the disposing of them: From thence they went to Eryx, and defeated Hamilcar, having kill'd two thousand Carthaginians.

The Carthaginians being inform'd of their great overthrow, wanted not courage for all this to renew the War, but money and Forces; for they could neither furnish the Army at Eryx with necessary Provisions, the Romans being Masters of the Sea; nor in case they should lose this Army, had they any other, either General or Army, wherein they durst confide. Forced then by these difficulties to despair, they sent to Hamilcar, empowering him to do whatever he judg'd most advantageous for the publick; and here he performed the part of an honest faithful person to his Country, as he had shewn himself before an excellent and a brave Commander in its service. For having considered all circumstances, when he saw that after all that he had done, there was no means left to preserve his People but a Peace; he sent Ambassadors to the Consul to treat concerning it; and the Consul was well enough pleas'd with the mention of a Peace; his annual Authority being almost at an end, he could not look for any greater glory, than that of ending the War: But to leave this as a legacy for his Successor, when he might appropriate it to himself, seem'd very indifereet and unadvisable; besides, he was mov'd by the known streights and necessities of the Roman People, and after such tedious continual labours, he judg'd the Common-wealth ought for some time to be refresh'd with Peace; and accordingly when the business had bin debated betwixt both parties, at last the Peace was concluded upon these Articles.

LXI.

- "That the Carthaginians should wholly quit Sicily.
- "That they should not make any War upon Hiero the Syracusan, or any of their Confederates.
- "That they should restore all the Prisoners gratis, as also the Defectors.
- "That they should pay twenty two hundred Eubæan Talents of Silver in twenty years in equal payments.
- "That the Confederates of both should be secured from either, by virtue of this Peace.
- "That neither should have any power to act, or build any Forts within the Precincts and Dominions of the other, or raise any Soldiers in the others Dominions.
- "That neither should admit the Allies of the other into his Alliance and Confederacy.

All which Articles had this proviso in the close: "That they were no further ratified than the Roman People should allow them. But that those who were incamp'd at Eryx, should deliver up their Arms: This point could not be gained, tho the Consul press'd it: For Hamilcar protested he would sooner see himself and his Country ruin'd, than submit to so great a disgrace; but yet he condescended to that Condition of paying eighteen denarii a man, for liberty to march out of Eryx.

LXII.

Then Ambassadors were sent to the Consul and the Carthaginians at Rome, to inform the Senate and People of the conditions the Peace was concluded upon: The People lik'd not the Peace, but sent ten Deputies to examine and consider the business, and when they return'd, they rais'd their Demands higher.

"That they should pay down presently a thousand Talents, and twenty two hundred more within ten years next ensuing.

"That they should not only depart from Sicily, but also from all the other Islands lying betwixt that and Italy.

"That the Carthaginians should not come in any Man of War into Italy, or any of the Islands belonging to the Roman Jurisdiction; nor raise any hier'd Soldiers from thence.

The Carthaginians, to obtain Peace submitted to all these propositions. Hamilcar presently resign'd up his Command before the Articles were solemnly ratified and sworn to; pass'd over to Lilybæum, and from thence to Carthage; a person, who both by his conduct and Valour had out-done all the Commanders that had had any hand in that War.

LXIII.

Thus ended that first Carthaginian War, which lasted twenty four years, being drawn in length by reason of many turns and revolutions, to the great damage of both the Parties, but especially of the Conquerour: For 'tis reported by such as took an account of the particular losses; that the Romans lost seven hundred five oar'd Gallies; whereas the Carthaginians had not lost above five hundred. An evident instance this of the Roman Fortitude, which could not be shaken by any ill success in Battel, nor by the most disastrous Casualties; but under all the toils of War, and with the disadvantage of a poor Treasury, not only encountered the utmost power of its Enemies, and the boistrous shocks of Fortune with an equal constancy, but at last rendred it self Vict'or over both. After this C. Lutatius Catulus, whole year was now expired, was continued in his place some time longer, that he might settle the Affairs of Sicily. One of the new Consuls also was sent thither, namely Q. Lutatius Cerco, Catulus his Brother the Colleague of A. Manlius. These two regulated the Province, and order'd things so well, as to take away all occasion of future Broils and Commotions, which might any way disturb the peace and tranquillity of that Government; and indeed they had but just cause to be jealous of those People, in whom some relics of restles and unquiet humours, after so great and universal a fermentation still remaining might break out again, and work up their turbulent Spirits to Rebellion; and therefore they took away all Arms from the Siculi, who had espous'd Hamilcar's interest, and from the Galls who had revolted from him. The Galls were ship'd away, and banish'd the Roman Territories, as well for other Villanies they had committed, as for their robbing and spoiling the Temple of Venus, when they were quarter'd upon Mount Eryx. The Town of Sicily had Taxes and Contributions assel'd upon them, according to a proportion; and the Island was made a Province, whither a Prætor was sent yearly from Rome.

LXIV.

Mean time the Carthaginian Ambassadors came to Rome, desiring that they might redeem their Men that were taken Prisoners; and they were all restor'd gratis, as many of them as were in publick custody; but those who were in the hands of private men, the Senate ordered to be ransom'd at a certain price: the greatest part of which money for their ransom, was afterwards paid out of the publick Treasury by an Order of the Senate. But sad calamities in the City, very much lessened the joy of the Roman People at that time: For now the River Tybur first overflowing its banks, filled all the lower parts of the City with the inundation, whole streets of Houses were over-thrown by the violence of the stream; and those which were not born away by the rapid torrent, fell down upon the waters returning into its channel; for the inundation lasting several days, had eaten through and decayed the Foundations.

LXV.

This calamity of Water was succeeded by a dreadful Conflagration which begun casually in the night, and having burnt down several parts of the City, destroyed a multitude of Men and Houses: Nor was its fury satisfied with consuming private habitations, but it likewise burnt down all the publick buildings round the Forum. Vesta's Temple at last was all on fire. Then L. Cæcilius the Chief Pontif behav'd himself suitably to his place; for seeing the Holy things in danger by the fire, he cast himself into the midst of the flames, exposing his own Life for the preservation of the Holy things, then deserted by the Vestal Nuns, and rescu'd by him: But this brave Person after his eyes had been quite burnt out, and one of his Arms half burnt, receiv'd besides the satisfaction of his mind for having done so nobly, a suitable reward from his Country, namely, that whenever he went to the Senate-house, he should ride thither in a Chariot; an Honour never granted to any man in Rome before, since its first foundation.

LXVI.

In the mean time Q. Lutatius the Consul with his Brother Catulus, and Q. Valerius the Pro-Prætor having settled Affairs in Sicily, and brought away the Army from thence was returned home. C. Lutatius Catulus, and Q. Valerius celebrated the Naval Triumphs assigned to them, the first on the second of October, and the latter on the fifth of the same Month. There hapned a very remarkable contrast betwixt the Generals, touching Valerius his Triumph: for when a Triumph had been unanimously voted to C. Lutatius, Valerius pleading, that he had signaliz'd himself as much as the other in that business, desir'd, that as he had bore his part of care and danger in the Action, he might also equally share in that Honour which was the reward of it. To which Catulus objected, That he who was commission'd with an inferior Authority, thority, was not in the conferring of Honours to have equal considerations with a Superiour. At last the Controversie growing high betwixt them, Q. Valerius engag'd Catulus to lay in a Pledg for the trial of the business: whether or no he had contributed by his Conduct to the defeat of the Punic Fleet: whereupon Catulus engag'd him also to do the same. Atilius Calatinus was chosen Arbitrator in the business; who asking Valerius, "Whether, if any difference or debate had happen'd in a Council of War, whose Authority would have been decisive in the point, the Prætors or Consuls? As likewise, if they had had several Auspices, which should have been follow'd? And Valerius answering, That in both Cases the Consul had greater Power than the Prætor, Atilius Calatinus without hearing, what Catulus could say, determin'd the Cause in favour of him; because the Controversie seem'd to be concerning the Pre-eminence of Authority. But though Valerius was work'd in this reference, yet for the great proofs of his Valour shewn in that War he obtained a right to Triumph.

The Censors that year (Aurelius Cotta, and M. Fabius Buteo) performed the Lustration, and two hundred and sixty thousand men were polled: two Wards more, the Velina and Quirina being taken in, the number of the Wards was made up thirty five, which number was never after exceeded. And now all that part of Sicily that had been subject to the Carthaginians being subdued, and the Peace concluded, Affairs not onely ran in a smooth course, but the Public security seem'd established upon the firmest foundations. When all of a sudden, a War breaks out, whence no such thing could have been expected, which for some days kept all Italy in suspense with the terror of such an intestine commotion, and it was a matter of no less surprize to see how speedily it was ended. The Falisci (upon what grounds is not known) being incited to Rebel, provok'd the Roman Arms: But the Consuls sent out against them with the Legions reduc'd all this People, and ended the War in six days: yet in the first Engagement (for they speak of two) the Consuls came off with doubtful fortune; being routed by the Enemies Horse, though they had in the Battel defeated their Foot; but the last Battel was fought with such success, that they obtain'd the Victory, and oblig'd the Falisci to desire Peace after they had lost fifteen thousand men. When they surrender'd themselves to be in all points at the discretion of the Conquerours, their Arms, Houses, Household-goods, and half their Lands were confiscated; and their City, the strength whereof had encouraged them to Rebel, was removed from a high craggy Rock into a plain place. The Romans would have treated the Falisci upon their surrender more severely, meditating a sharp revenge against a People that had so often rebelled; but they became more moderate when Papirius (who had drawn the Articles of this Capitulation with his own hand by the Consuls appointment) told them, the Falisci had not put themselves under the Power, but protection of the Romans, which words were received with that Sacred Reverence that they resolv'd to lay no harder conditions upon them. On occasion of this War the year ended with the Triumphs of the Consuls. Lutatius triumph'd the first of March, and Manlius the fourth of the same Month.

DECADE II. BOOK XX.

Florus his Epitome of the Twentieth Book of Livy.

A Colony planted at Spoletum. A War first made upon the Ligurians [now the Genoeles] The Sardinians and Corsicans who had revolted, are subdued. Tutia a Vestal Nun condemn'd for Incest. War proclaimed with the Illyrians for killing an Ambassador, who being overcome, yield up themselves to the Roman Government. The number of Prætors encreas'd to four: The Gauls that dwelt beyond the Alps making an Incurfion into Italy, are cut to pieces; In which War the Romans are said to have had of their own Forces and their Allies three hundred thousand fighting Men. Then first of all the Roman Ensigns pass'd the River Po, where the Insubrian Gauls [or Lombards] after several defeats, submitted themselves. M. Claudius Marcellus the Consul, having with his own hand slain Viridomarus their General, and so obtain'd the Royal Spoils, being the third Man that had that Honour ever since Romulus's days. After this the Illyrians were subdued, and the Illyrians that had fallen into Rebellion, reduced. Upon a survey of the Roman Citizens there were found in all 270213. The Libertini [or Slaves Enfranchis'd] were cast into four Tribes by themselves, called Esquilina, Palatina, Suburrana, and Collina, whereas before they were intermingled with the rest. C. Flaminius the Censor, repaired the Highway called Flaminia, and built the great Circus or Theatre call'd also after his Name. Colonies are carried into the Territories lately taken from the Gauls, and planted at Placentia, and Cremona.

ITALY being again at Peace, the publick Luxury encreas'd together with their Empire and their Security. For, whereas till then Farce or Drolls had made the chief Entertainments of the Roman Stage; Livius Andronicus after the Grecian Mode, presented the people with Comedies and Tragedies, which were first acted C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus being Consuls, at the public Sports. The same year likewise began another sort of Games, or Shows. For on the fourth of the Calends of May, the Floralia were instituted according to the Method prescribed in the Books of the Sibyls, to avert the blasting of Fruits, and all other products of the Earth which blossom at that time of the year. L. and M. Pollicius Malleolus two Brothers, both of them Ediles in the same year exhibited these Shows or Games, defraying the expences thereof out of Fines, which had been laid on those Grasiers that had fed their Cattel upon the Commons grounds. These two Brothers during their Magistracy, were remarkable also upon another account: because they caus'd the Hill afterwards call'd Publicius, to be levell'd and pav'd for the more commodious passage of Waggons that way into Mount Aventine; whereas before it was onely a hard unpassable Rock: as also because he built the Temple of Flora, near the great Cirque.

These

- II. These were the transactions at home. All things were very quiet abroad, only there were some suspicions of a War design'd by the Gauls and Ligurians: that these therefore were the Consuls Provinces, and consequently that the War with the Gauls began then; we have rather a conjecture than any certain account, there being no ancient Authors now left who can furnish us with an exact relation of those things; and as for the next year also, that there was no Peace we may venture to say, because Janus his Temple was not shut, but we are not able to discover in what places, or with what success such War was carried on; nor have we any more account of C. Mamilius Turinus and Q. Valerius Falto's Consulship, but that Ennius was born that year, that ingenious Roman Poet.
- III. The year following when Tr. Sempronius Gracchus and P. Valerius Falto were Consuls, both the Wars with the Galls broke out, and also the Romans at the same time first made invasion with an Army upon the Ligurians, a new Enemy. This Province fell to Tr. Sempronius his share. P. Valerius having set upon the Galls at first came off unfortunately, having lost thirty five hundred men; but in a second Battel he gave them a signal overthrow, wherein fourteen thousand Galls were slain, and two thousand taken: But the Consul was not allow'd to triumph, because of his losses in the former Battel, especially since that even the success obtain'd then, was rather to be attributed to the Roman fortune, than any good conduct of the Consuls: For when he had received intelligence that some succours were coming to him after the first Battel, he declar'd that rather than conquer by the assistance of another, he would perish with his whole Army: And in this freak he expos'd both himself and the Army under his command to great hazard. But Tib. Gracchus manag'd the War against the Ligurians with better conduct and success; for having routed the Enemy in Battel, he with his victorious Army walled a great part of Liguria: From Liguria he cross'd over into Sardinia and Corfica, and having brought from thence abundance of Prisoners, he gave occasion to that Proverb, where we say The Sardinians are set to sale, in a great glut of some mean paltry Commodities.
- IV. But to say the truth, the Romans in those days had a good opportunity, but no just pretension to possess Sardinia and Corfica. The Carthaginians after the Peace of Sicily being engag'd in a long War with their Mercenaries were reduc'd to extremity of danger, whence some others of their hired Soldiers who were in the Garrisons in Sardinia, taking heart, slew Boftar the Punic General, with all his men: They hang'd Hanno also another Commander sent from Carthage to quell and suppress them, having drawn his Army over to joyn with them in their Rebellion; and now having all over the Island put to the sword such as were of the Punic race, they make themselves masters of all the Forts in the Country, until at length upon a quarrel betwixt them and the Sardi, who at length expell'd them out of Sardinia, they betook themselves into Italy, where at last they effected what they could not do a little before whilst they were in Sardinia: For they had in vain invited the Romans before to seize into their hands that Island; but when they came to talk the matter personally, either by their importunity, or else by shewing more plainly the opportunities the Romans had of advancing themselves hereby, they prevail'd with the People to undertake this Voyage into Sardinia, for it is no common virtue to abstain from invading a Neighbour's Territories, when we may easily possess our selves of them: Nor can this inclination be long dissembled by the covetous and the ambitious.
- V. But it seems not improper in this place to enquire more particularly into the original of these things; for the Romans ever since the beginning of that War had zealously asserted the Carthaginian interest, to get themselves the credit and reputation of being obliging and good natur'd to their friends; and therefore they sent no aids to the Rebels, which the Carthaginians had desired them not to do; nor harboured the men of Utica, or any others that revolted from them: Their Merchants they order'd to carry Provisions to the Carthaginians out of Italy and Sicily; but forbade them to have any commerce with the Rebels: They further gave leave to the Carthaginians to raise Soldiers in Italy for that War: Moreover they sent Ambassadors to accommodate and compose their differences, tho it took no effect. But a little before this, they were like to differ themselves with the Carthaginians about some Italians, who carrying Provisions to sell to the Enemy, were taken and imprisoned by the Carthaginians.
- VI. They had now got about five hundred of this sort of People in custody, and it was reported that they had kill'd several more, and thrown them into the Sea, the better to keep their cruelty undiscover'd; which things the Romans took so heinously, that immediately they threaten'd them with War. But the Carthaginians having sent Ambassadors to restore as many as were kept Prisoners at Carthage, to pacify the Roman People, that the rest of the Carthaginians that were taken Prisoners in the Sicilian War, were restor'd without ransom. But Ambition at last got the ascendant over them, and out of policy they thought it high time to pull down a People, with whom they remembered they had fought for twenty four years with very doubtful fortune, and also foresaw that they must do so again, unless they took care in time to prevent it. Wherefore seeing the Carthaginians were loth to part with Sardinia, and having rid their hands of the Mercenaries, were now designing to prosecute the Rebels farther; the Romans took hold of this opportunity, and resolv'd to enter upon a War with them, "unless they laid down their Arms, which in truth they had taken against the Romans, tho they pretended it was done against the Rebels. So that at last the Carthaginians who were loth to engage in a War of this nature at such a time, not only quitted Sardinia to the Romans, but compounded with them to pay twelve hundred Talents over and above the former sum; a thing which ever after so disgust'd and provoked them, that Hannibal's War seems to have been undertaken purely in revenge for these hard measures, and the deep resentment which Hannibal the chief Author of the second Punic War ever had against the Romans, took its rise from no other source but this. But however these things happened afterwards.
- VII. But the new Consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus had then the Gauls inhabiting on this side the Po given them for their Province. That a Colony was this year brought to Valentia, tho some report it, yet the thing is uncertain, unless it be another Valentia besides Vibo, where a Colony was planted fifty years after in the Consulship of L. Quintus Flaminius, and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, which we may believe upon better authority. Now the Consuls in the Territory of the Gauls, whilst they kept their Forces together, had a very prosperous expedition of it: But when out of the desire to pillage and waste more of the Country, they divided their Armies; the Enemy attack'd Q. Fulvius his Camp by night, and almost took it. But the Gauls having gone off without any success in this attempt, return'd a little while after with greater terror and more numerous Forces to the War. For the several Princes of the Boii having under-hand concert'd their measures together, called a numerous multitude of the Gauls inhabiting beyond the Alps, to joyn with them in an Alliance against the Romans.

Mean

Mean while L. Lentulus the Consul, who was march'd off to the borders of Liguria, overcame the Ligurians in a set Battel, for which a Triumph was decreed to him; which he performed upon the Intercalar Ides. There are Authors who tell us, that those Consuls first advanc'd the Roman Banners beyond the Po, and that in several Battels twenty four thousand Ligurians, and Insulbrian Gauls had been kill'd, and five thousand taken Prisoners. But to me it seems more probable that the Romans first pass'd the Po in that general Rising of the Gauls, which followed but a little after, and that the Insulbrians were invaded first in their own Country.

About the same time Ambassadors were sent to Ptolemy King of Egypt to proffer him Aid in his Wars against Antiochus and the Syrians. The King returned them thanks, but as for their assistance he said he did not want it, because they had already agreed upon Articles of Peace. Not long after much to the satisfaction of the People, Hiero King of Syracuse arriv'd at Rome, and was received with all the respect that was due to an Ally; one that had shewn himself their hearty Friend, and shar'd with them in their great Victory. He came to Rome to see certain Games, that were design'd to be celebrated the year following. For the third Secular Games according to some Authors were celebrated during the Consulships of P. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus, and C. Licinius Varus; as we have hinted before. M. Aemilius, and Livius Salinator were appointed as Stewards to prepare all things for the setting out of these Games.

In the mean time the Princes of the Boii, being back'd and strengthen'd with numerous Troops of Auxiliaries of the Transalpine Gauls, sent to the Consuls to demand, "That the Town and Territory of Ariminum should be restor'd to them: for to these places they pretended an indisputable Right and Title, "which if not comply'd with, they threaten'd the Romans with a bloody and most destructive War: The Consuls had not as yet got their Forces together; so that fearing to expose a handful of Men to so much hazard, and yet unable to grant the Gauls their demands, they made Answer, That if they had any business, they should send their Ambassadors to the Senate.

The Gauls lik'd this Proposition well enough, and a cessation of Arms was concluded betwixt both till the Ambassadors were return'd. When the Ambassadors came to Rome, the Senate gave them an Answer contrary to their expectations: and withal made great preparations to oppose this inundation which afterwards came to nothing: Fortune alone baffling them without the effusion of any Roman blood. For whilst the Ambassadors were going homewards, the Boii and the Transalpine Gauls quarrell'd among themselves, upon this account: The Transalpine Army unknown to the Boii march'd to Ariminum, which it was suspected they did with a design to possess themselves of that place: and hereupon they fell out, and having kill'd Ates and Galatus their Kings, laying treachery to their charge, they endeavour'd by force of Arms to expel these Aliens out of their Country. Hereupon they fought very desperately; and when they had weaken'd and broken one another sufficiently, the Transalpine Gauls return'd home; and the Romans grant'd Peace to the Boii, having first taken some part of their Country from them.

This War being so soon ended, the Consuls departed into Liguria, where P. Lentulus defeated all the Enemies Forces that met him; and marching with his Army through their Country took some Cattles by storm, and others upon surrender. And now C. Licinius designing to cross over into Corfica, and being not provided with Ships enough to carry over the whole Army at once, sent M. Claudius Glycias with part of the Forces before, who seeing the Corfi terrified at his arrival, and forgetting his Character and place, and the duty he owed to his Consul, makes a Composition with the Corfi in his own name upon certain Articles, intending to ingross to himself all the honour of having reduc'd the Island; but Varus arriving with the rest of the Army, though the Corfi appeal'd to their Peace made with Claudius, never ceas'd his Attacks upon them, till he had quite subdu'd them. The Senate to free their people from the reproach of having falsify'd their faith, sentenc'd the Author of that dishonourable Peace to be deliver'd up to the Corfi; and when he was not receiv'd by them, they order'd that he should be executed in Prison.

L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus, and Q. Lutatius Cerco were Censors that year, but they did not perform the Lustration, because Q. Cerco died in his Office. Though M. Claudius had been offer'd to be deliver'd to the Corfi, and had been afterwards punish'd, yet these Barbarians could not be satisfied that the Romans had any just cause afterwards to invade them: Wherefore this People, who were still uneasy and discontented for these injuries, were ready enough to rise again in Arms; when they saw their Neighbours the Sardi leading them the way. For some secret Promises of the Carthaginians had wheedled the Sardi to raise a Rebellion, those Barbarians being prone enough to do so, who neither hated their old Masters, nor lov'd their new ones over-much.

When this news came to Rome, it fill'd all people with fear and indignation, not for the loss of Sardinia, which they valued not so much, but because a War with Carthage was like to break out again. But because they thought it would prove the easier, the sooner it was begun, whilst the Carthaginians as yet had not recovered fully their former strength since the late Wars, they determin'd to fall to the business roundly, and immediately to declare War with Carthage: But the Carthaginians, who at this juncture were willing to submit to any terms rather than quarrel with the Romans, were so terrified at this news, that they dispatch'd several Ambassadors to Rome to treat for a continuation of the Peace; but these not prevailing in the business, they sent ten of their principal Men to beg in terms of the greatest submission, that they might enjoy the Peace which was before concluded. But nothing would prevail with this angry and jealous People, till one Hanno the youngest of the Ambassadors, a person of an undaunted Spirit and a bold Addressor, spake thus: "Ye Romans, if you are resolv'd not to grant us that Peace, which we did not buy at your hands for one or two years, but for ever: restore us again Sardinia and Sicily the price thereof: for in private Contracts, when a bargain is broken, no honest Man will require his Commodities again, without restoring the Money paid for the same. At which the Romans for shame, left they might seem to make War upon unjust grounds, dismissed the Ambassadors with a better Answer. So that now C. Atilius Bulbus one of the Consuls, who bore this Office a second time, continued in Italy: but Tr. Manlius Torquatus, to whose lot Sardinia fell, went to his Province; where having at several times defeated the Enemy, he reduced the whole Island, and subdu'd the Sardi: for which Victories he triumph'd before the sixth or the Ides of March.

These things done, and no Enemy appearing, the Romans had repose from Arms, which occasioned the shutting of Janus his Temple an unusual Spectacle to the warlike City; for this sign of Peace had not been seen since Numa's days, very near four hundred and forty years before. For which reason, I think the Romans very unhappy, because that after such toils and labours, they could never reap the fruits of them: for whereas wife Men wage War only for the sake of Peace; this City after so many Wars ended successfully, fully could not often obtain Peace, and could never keep it long. And now within a few months after they were alarm'd again, and forc'd to part with that Peace, the benefits whereof they had but just tasted for both the newly conquer'd Sardi began to shake off the yoke, and some like designs of the Corfi were discover'd, and at the same time in Italy it self the Ligurians made an insurrection.

XV. Hereupon L. Posthumus Albinus and Sp. Carvilius Maximus the Consuls were commanded to raise Forces, which being divided into three parts to hinder the Enemy from joining, and assisting one another, L. Posthumus marched against the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius against the Corfi, and P. Cornelius went to Sardinia; the unwholom air of which Isle caus'd a Plague in the Army, whereof a great number of men, and the Prætor himself died, which made the Sardi very high and stout, till Sp. Carvilius the Consul entering the Island, gave them a signal overthrow, and so cool'd their courage; for which action a Triumph was decreed to him, which was celebrated on the first of April. Against the Ligurians also the Consul with his Consular Army had good success: While at Rome Tutia the vestal Virgin being condemn'd for Incest, which was the more scandalous because she had done it with a Slave, kill'd her self.

XVI. C. Atilius Bulbus, and A. Posthumus Albinus being afterwards Censors, perform'd the Fortieth Lustration. That there were fewer men poll'd this time than before (tho I find no certain number deliver'd) may hence be gather'd, because the Censors the better to stock the Town with People, took an Oath of every man, that he would marry to get Children. This year Cn. Nevius of Capua, who had been a Soldier in the first Punic War, acted Plays first upon the Stage; mean time the Ligurians and Sardi again in rebellion, were assign'd Provinces to the new Consuls. The Ligurian War fell to Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, and the Sardinian to M. Pomponius Matro: Upon some jealousies, that these Tumults and Rebellions were fomented by the Carthaginians, who might privately wheedle the gross understandings of these barbarous People to revolt; Ambassadors were dispatch'd to Carthage, with strict Orders from the Senate, that they should demand the Tribute of the Carthaginians, and also command them not to meddle with any of the Islands belonging to the Roman Jurisdiction, adding threats of War, if they would not comply.

XVII. The Carthaginians had now taken heart again after their late Calamity, especially by the diligence and conduct of Hannibal, who not only reduc'd all those People of Africa, that had revolted, but also enlarg'd the bounds of the Carthaginian Territories, by his great conquests in Spain; therefore they carried it high with the Ambassadors, and answer'd them in very huffing language: For when the Ambassadors as they were commanded, had propos'd to them War or Peace, chuse which they would; they cried out they would chuse neither, but that the Ambassadors should leave them which they pleas'd, and they would willingly accept of it; from whence the piques and animosities betwixt the two Nations were more enflamed, but neither as yet being willing to begin the War, a kind of friendship was in shew maintain'd betwixt them, not that they lov'd one another heartily, but however they abstain'd from open Hostilities. Both the Consuls afterwards upon their return to Rome, when they had given an account of their Exploits, obtain'd a Triumph: Q. Fabius had kill'd many of the Ligurians in battel, and forc'd the rest to keep within the Alpine Countries, and also secur'd the neighbouring Coasts of Italy from their incursions; so that he triumph'd before the first of February over the Ligurians. M. Pomponius afterwards held a Triumph for conquering the Sardi, upon the Ides of March.

XVIII. Notwithstanding all this, the Sardi would not give over, but rather irritated than broken by their disasters; they rais'd a new Rebellion with greater vigour than before. Therefore both the Consuls M. Aemilius Lepidus, and M. Publicius Malleolus being sent into Sardinia, got a great deal of booty out of that Island: which afterwards when they had pass'd over to Corfica, was all taken away from them by the Corfi. There arose at home likewise great broils and disturbances at that time, whilst C. Flaminius Tribune of the Commons, endeavour'd to pass an Agrarian Law. "That the Picene and Gallie Country once belonging to the Galli Senones might be divided betwixt the People. The Senate oppos'd this design, using both persuasions and menaces to the Tribune thereupon; and at last order'd the Consuls to levy Forces for the defence of the Commonwealth. But C. Flaminius persist'd still in his resolutions, being neither to be wrought upon by force nor intricacies, tho his Father too had advis'd him to yeild to the Senate, and not be accounted the Author of a Sedition.

XIX. But he continuing still the same, call'd an Assembly of the People, before whom he began to read this Law; upon which his Father Flaminius in great rage came to the Rostra, and pull'd down his Son with his own hands, and then was shewn a notable instance of obedience and veneration, which men in those days acknowledg'd as due to that Authority Fathers had over their Children: For he, who had condemn'd the displeasure and severe menaces of the Senate, suffer'd himself to be pull'd down from the Rostra by the hand of one old man, and that too when he was in the heat of the action, the Roman People looking on, to whom nothing could be more grateful, than the enacting of this Law. Nor ought the modesty of the Assembly to be pass'd by without notice, who tho they saw all their hopes dash'd and disappointed by the Tribunes departure, yet never so much as mutter'd to shew their dislike of the thing. The Law was thus stay'd off for a while, rather than quite avoided; whilst C. Carvilius another Tribune back'd his Colleague, which was the beginning of corrupting the Commons, and of the Gallie War, which arose eight years after the division of those Lands.

XX. Then M. Pomponius Matro and C. Papirius Mæso being Consuls, went into their several Provinces; the one to Sardinia, and the other to Corfica, in both which places the Enemy was retir'd into the Mountains and Woods, defending themselves more by the natural strength of those places, than by Arms. M. Pomponius therefore seeing it was a harder task to find, than to conquer the barbarous People, caus'd some Hounds to be brought from Italy, to hunt them like wild Beasts out of their covets and lurking holes. C. Papirius having driven the Corfi from the Plains, pursu'd them to the Mountains, where they were in great labour and danger, and many of the Soldiers perish'd either with thirst, or by the incursion of the Enemies; till having found some water and refresh'd the Army, they forc'd the Corfi now dreading a Battel, to surrender themselves. Whilst the Consuls are engag'd in these affairs, the Dictator created for that end, call'd the Assemblies, C. Duilius was the Man, and he chose C. Aurelius for his Lieutenant: The Censors that year were Tit. Manlius Torquatus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus; but these being not return'd according to Law, resign'd. Authors do fix upon this year the beginning of a new sort of Practice, worth our while to mention. The Romans had as yet no Divorces us'd among them since the first foundation of that State. Sp. Carvilius Roga was the first who divorc'd himself from his Wife, because she bare him no Children, having been sworn by the Censors that he would marry a Wife to get Children by her. The People were mightily disgusted, not only because the thing was new, but very heinous, judging it cruelty and injustice, for men upon any account whatever to be divorc'd from their Wives, which were to enjoy an inseparable Union and Society with their Husbands during their lives: and therefore SP. Carvilius was hated for the thing, though he much against his will, to comply with some Friends of his had divorc'd himself from a Wife, with which he agreed well enough, and whom he loved intirely. After which time there happened more Quillets in the Laws touching Espousals, and more wrangling and Suits in the Courts of Judicature; so many new Cautions being found out concerning Marriage, which Niceties were wholly useless, before there were any Divorces.

The same year also another Custom obtain'd, relating to the Honours the Generals received. C. Papirius at the end of his Consulship triumphed over the Corfi upon Mount Albano the fifth of March. The reason of which was this: he had quite subdued Corfica, and therefore challeng'd a Triumph, but could not obtain it from the Senate: his Example was afterwards taken up by several others: so that as often as a Triumph was denied them, they triumphed upon Mount Albano. The same Person afterwards saw the Shows with a Crown of Myrtle on his Head, having chosen that Tree to make his Chaplet of, because he had conquer'd the Corfi in a Field where Myrtles grew. Sardinia and Corfica being now quieted, the Ligurians remained still to conquer, against whom the Consuls M. Aemilius Barbula, and M. Junius Pera Arms, enter'd their Country; and having received intelligence by the way that the Gauls design'd to take fear'd at Rome, left a People delighting in War, and Cholerick, should make some new Effort against the Romans. Wherefore a Proclamation was issued out by the State, forbidding all persons to lend any Money to the Gauls: because both the Boii and the other Gauls got a great deal of Money, as by several other ways, especially by selling of Slaves: and it was suspected, that they would employ it in the War against the Romans. They being enrag'd hereat, and the more embolden'd upon hearing that the Consuls were at present engag'd in the Ligurian War, held Consultations under-hand how to attack the City, whilst the Roman Armies were kept abroad in this long Expedition. But being terrified at the Consuls arrival, they received the Romans in an amicable manner, pretending the greatest submission to them, because they were not yet in a capacity to oppose them. The Consuls also being well enough contented to have smother'd the War, pretended they were come that way only that they might the more commodiously march their Forces through the Gallie Countries into Liguria.

The Censors the former year being illegally return'd had resign'd their Office: Upon which Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, and M. Sempronius Tritidatus this year perform'd the Lustration, being the one and fortieth. Affairs passing thus in Italy, and in the City, a War brake out with the Illyrians, upon this occasion. The Illyrians a fierce sort of People, greedy of prey, were much addicted to Piracy; and they had taken several Italian Merchants sailing from the Port of Brundisium, some of whom they had killed: Complaints thereupon were made to the Senate, which among other businels at first were not much heeded: but at last, when these Pirates became bolder by their impunity, and that complaints were often made of them, it was resolv'd that Ambassadors should be dispatch'd to demand satisfaction of them, as also to intercede in behalf of the Issians, who had lately sworn fealty, and done Homage to the Romans. Now these were a People inhabiting an Isle in the Ionian Sea, whom the Illyrians molested and hated for revolting.

C. and L. Coruncanius were sent upon this Embassy. Whilst these two were upon their Journey, Agron Son of Pleuratus King of those Illyrians who were called Ardyei, to whom they were sent, was taken ill, and died: having left a Son yet a Minor (whose name was Pinnes;) and Tenta his Mother-in-law assisted by her Council, managed the Government. This being a haughty passionate Woman, elated with prosperity, after she had heard the Roman Ambassadors in a slighting manner, told them: "That she would take care, that the Romans should not receive any public damage from the Illyrians; but to forb'd her private Subjects from taking what Prizes they could by Sea, was a thing unusual with the Kings of Illyria. At which words the younger Coruncanius was much urg'd, and using an unseasonable rather than an unjust liberty of Speech, said, "Ay, but Tenta you must know, it is usual with the Romans publicly to revenge injuries done privately, and to help the distressed, and we will endeavour by the blessing of God to compell you forthwith to alter and amend these Methods of your Government. Which words so enrag'd the Woman, that though she dissembled the matter for the present, yet when the Ambassadors were gone, she sent some Ruffians after them, by whom the younger Coruncanius and some others of his Retinue were killed: the rest being clapp'd in Prison, and the Captains of the Ships burnt. The Issian Ambassadors also, by name Caleporus, was kill'd by the same Assassins.

This news no sooner came to Rome, but T. Coruncanius and P. Junius had Statues three foot high erected in memory of them: and War was declared against Tenta and the Illyrians. Tenta being no ways capable of the Regency, had neither by reason, or experience learn'd to correct the Vices and Levities incident to her Sex, but upon the approach of danger, appears as cowardous and sneaking, as she had before shewed her self rash and precipitous. Therefore hearing the Romans prepared to make War against her, she sent to acquaint them, that she was willing to restore all the Men that were alive: but for the rest, who had been murder'd without her consent, she could not answer for them. This Embassy, though it made but a small Attonement for so great an offence, yet because it gave some hopes of composing this quarrel without a War, the Romans desired no further satisfaction in the business, but that the Ruffians, who had murder'd the Ambassadors, should be delivered to them to be punished. The Woman thinking the storm blown over, which had so affrighted her, through levity of mind became again bold and insolent, and declared that she would not deliver up one man; and accordingly to make good these arrogant Expressions by her Actions, presently sent an Army to besiege Issa.

The Romans now resolv'ing not to dally any longer, dispatch'd the two Consuls, Lucius Posthumus Albinus, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus with Forces by Land and Sea against the Illyrians. Cn. Fulvius commanded the Fleet consisting of two hundred Gallies, and L. Posthumus the Legions. Then again, Tenta being affraid sent Demetrius Pharius to desire Peace of the Consuls: who consented to a cessation of Arms, upon condition, that the Illyrians should quit Coreyra, of which they had lately possess'd themselves; of which when the Romans went to take possession, Tenta fancying her self again out of the reach of danger, falls afresh to her former practices, and sends her Forces to besiege Dyrachium and Apollonia. Others relate, "That Coreyra was not surrendered with Tenta's consent, but purely by Demetrius his means, who knowing, that Tenta was minded to charge him with Treason, thought to ingratiate with the Romans, and so shelter himself against her malice, by betraying that Garrison which she commanded. This Garrison of the Illyrians being surrendered, the Coreyreans all with general consent put themselves under the Roman protection, judging there was no other means left to secure them against the injuries of the Illyrians, but making this potent and renowned people the Guardians of their State.

XXVIII. From Coreyra the Consul took his course with the Fleet to Apollonia: and L. Posthumus came thither also, having with the Land-forces passed over from Brundisium. He had with him about 20000 Foot and 2000 Horse. The Apollonians willingly received the Romans, and put themselves under their protection. This place being delivered, they presently went to Dyrrachium which the Romans immediately became Masters of; the Illyrians who had laid Siege to the place, running away when they heard the Army was coming. With the same victorious success the Ardeians were also brought in subjection to the Romans; and Ambassadors of several Nations came from the farthest parts of Illyria promising to submit themselves to them, if they would receive them into their protection; among which were the Parthini, and Atintanes. Demetrius Pharius had a great hand in all these matters, who being carried about with the Consul, by magnifying the Roman Courage and Faith, and exposing the temerity and inconstancy of Tenta brought several People to embrace the Roman Interest, partly by his counsel and persuasion, and partly by his Authority.

XXIX. This done, they proceeded to Issa: and in their Voyage making descents upon the Coasts took several Towns very easily; but Nutria was bravely defended by the Illyrians, and the Victory was here dearly bought, several Colonels and the Treasurer of the Army being lost in the Action. Which losses were however ballanc'd by the Romans, taking twenty Vessels of the Enemies, as they were coming laden with Money and booty from Peloponnesus. As soon as they were arrived before Issa: the Barbarians, as it happen'd at Dyrrachium, rais'd the Siege, and fled into several parts of the County, all of them besides the Pharians, who for Demetrius his sake, a Native of that County, and once Governour thereof under Agrom, were permitted to enjoy their Estates and Liberties under the Roman protection. Tenta hearing these things was strangely confounded in her thoughts, whilst hopes and fear alternately seiz'd her mind; for as the loss of so many Towns, the wasting of the Maritime Countries, and the defeat of her Forces in every place struck a great terror into her; so likewise she took heart again, reflecting on the Valour of the Nutrians, and the season of the year drawing to Winter, when those Seas would be rough, upon which therefore she thought the Romans would be forced to make homewards the sooner. Therefore with a small Retinue, she retir'd to Rhizon a Town lying upon a River of the same name: intending there to wait whatever success should befall her.

XXX. The Methods taken by the Consuls served to nurse in her these vain conceits: for they having committed the best part of the Countries they had conquer'd to the care of Demetrius, carried away both the Fleet and the Army to Dyrrachium. But when she heard that L. Posthumus was left with forty Ships behind, and had levied Forces out of the neighbouring Cities for the defence of the Ardeis, and other Illyrians Friends to the Romans: then Tenta despairing of success, began seriously to think of concluding a Peace upon any conditions: and accordingly at the beginning of the Spring, she sent her Ambassadors to Rome to excuse the matter, as if all that passed had been done by Agrom's Command, the reputation of whose Actions she was compelled to maintain. The Romans hereupon made a Peace, not with Tenta, who had no right to it, and who had deserv'd so ill at their hands, but with Pimneus Agrom's Son, and that upon these Conditions, "That he should pay the Tribute impos'd upon him, quit all Illyria except some few places: and not sail beyond Lissus with above two Vessels and those without Arms. By this Treaty Coreyra, Pharus, Issa, Dyrrachium and the Atintanes became subject to the Romans: the rest which had been under Agrom's Command, was left to Pimneus. Tenta either for fear, or shame, or else because the Romans commanded her, quitted the administration of the Government; which Demetrius Pharius undertook as Protector to the King.

XXXI. Thus at last the differences with the Illyrians determin'd: and the bounds of the Roman Empire were extended to the frontiers of Greece. Mean while the Commonwealth was threaten'd with some danger on the other side: the Gauls preparing for War, and the Carthaginians being arriv'd to considerable Power in Spain, whose growth and advancement, in all mens opinion might prove of dangerous consequence to the Romans. Hafdrubal the Son-in-law, and Successor of Hamilcar, having revenged his Father's death, brought several Nations under subjection to the Carthaginians, partly by his Arms, and partly by his Policy and Eloquence, having also built another Carthage in Spain, (which was called the new Carthage) in a Bay of the Sea near a large commodious Haven.

XXXII. But the danger from the Gauls being nearer home, hinder'd the Romans from making War with the Carthaginians. All they could do at present was to stop the course of their fortune by tying them up to Articles, which might set bounds to their growing Empire. Ambassadors therefore were sent to Carthage as also to Hafdrubal to enter into Articles with them, whereby they were engaged not to pass the Riber Iberus: and not to invade the Saguntines, but leave them to the enjoyment of their Laws and Liberties. These things were done that year, wherein Sp. Carvilius Maximus, and Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus were both of them again Consuls. About the same time L. Posthumus the Proconsul, who had winter'd in Illyria, sent Ambassadors from Coreyra to the Aetolians and Acheans, to present them with a Memorial of all the transactions in Illyria, as namely for what reasons that War had been first undertaken, how carried on, and upon what conditions it was at last concluded; the Ambassadors were received with abundance of Civilities and Respects: because those Nations, and the rest of the Grecians also, perfectly hated the very name of the Illyrians, for those continual Robberies they had made under Agrom and Tenta. When this was reported at Rome, the Senate approv'd what the Proconsul had done, as just and laudable, and thereupon decreed a second Embassy, which should go to the Corinthians and Athenians in the name of the State, to notify to them the Roman Peoples affection and kindness to the Grecians, and their moderation towards all Men: which got the Romans a great deal of love in those parts; and the Corinthians pass'd a Decree immediately in honour of them, whereby they were made free of the Isthmian Games, one of the four Solemn Exercises of Greece.

XXXIII. Besides, the Romans benefits to Apollonia, and other Greek Towns, they looked on themselves principally oblig'd to the Romans for their kindness in restoring liberty to the Coreyreans a Colony of the Corinthians. The Athenians also having embraced the Roman Alliance, decreed, that they should be made free of Athens, and of the most Sacred Mysteries of Ceres. Fulvius the Proconsul in the mean while held a Naval Triumph over the Illyrians: and having led those of the principal note among the Illyrians in the Solemnity, he headed them. This was the first Triumph over the Illyrians.

The

The next year P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Atilius Regulus being Consuls, the number of the Prætors was doubled, and four were made, that they might have two to send into the Provinces of Sicily and Sardinia; of these M. Valerius had Sardinia and its Appendage Corfica allotted to his share, and C. Flaminius had Sicily. At that time People were in great fear of a War with the Galls, which the Boii and Insubres not only between themselves, but together with other Transalpine Nations, were said to have in agitation; for which purpose they had levied great Forces consisting of the Gefata a Gallie People, so called from a particular sort of Arms peculiar to them.

Therefore now besides the usual Expedients, they had recourse to other means for preventing this danger, which with severe Judges nothing could excuse, but the great affection men have for their Country, upon whose account they might be allow'd to act something otherwise unwarrantable. For besides other dangers threatening the State by divine Prodigies, and an Invasion from the Enemy, it was also found in the Sibylline Prophecies, that the Gauls and Greeks were to possess themselves of the City: Now to fulfil this Prediction and avert its dire effects, this slight and Artifice was then practis'd. M. Valerius Messalla, and L. Apustius Tullus being Consuls, by an order of the Pontiffs two Gauls, a Man and a Woman, and as many Greeks were buried alive in the midst of the Beast-market: that so holding part of the Town, they might seem to have complicated that Prophecie.

But this year, among other matters of lesser moment was spent in preparations for the Gallie War now drawing on, incredible numbers of Soldiers were rais'd for this War, all Italy joyning with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Historian, who liv'd about this time, says of the Romans, that they had eight hundred thousand Men compleat in this War, the Romans and Campansians making two hundred forty eight thousand Foot, and twenty six thousand six hundred Horse; the rest of this numerous Army was compos'd of the other Italians. The Veneri and Cenomani also aided the Romans with twenty thousand men, who were order'd to make incursions upon their Neighbours the Boii, that so they might be oblig'd to act defensively in their own Country, and not be in a capacity to join the Enemies: since all the endeavours the Roman Ambassadors us'd to reclaim them from their attempts, prov'd ineffectual; the Veneri and Cenomani being persuaded to enter into an Alliance with the Romans, the Boii and Insubrians persisted in their hostile designs. But yet their Forces were lessen'd, because their Kings durst not bring all the People, but were oblig'd to leave a considerable number for the defence of their Country. With the rest of their Forces being fifty thousand Foot and twenty thousand Horse, they attempted to pass through Hetruria.

In the mean while L. Aemilius Papus, and C. Atilius being Consuls obtained Sardinia, Ariminum, and its neighbouring Country Gaul for their Provinces: for the Sardi dissatisfied with the daily fight of a Roman Pretor and his Mace, rebelled again: but C. Atilius quell'd them very easily. L. Aemilius had a harder task of it with the Gauls now marching towards Rome, having forced their passage through Hetruria. The Governour of that Province seeing he could not stop their passage, made after and overtook them about Clusium, where towards Sun-setting he pitch'd his Camp near the Enemies. The Gauls to entice the Romans to a Battel, having laid the Plot before-hand, in the Night march'd with all their Foot to a Town called Fesula: having left their Horse behind them, who were order'd at break of Day to shew themselves only to the Enemy; and when they had so done, immediately to retreat to the Foot, who by that time were to post themselves in a place fit to receive the Horse, and whence they might surprize the Enemies.

The Romans deceiv'd by this Stratagem, went in close pursuit of the Horse, as if they really fled before them: and continued following them to Fesula where a Body of fresh Men lay posted in Battalia to receive them, when they were tir'd with the pursuit, and now reduc'd to such a non-plus, as it happens in such accidents, that they knew not what course to take. All that remain'd in their power to do, was to sell their lives as dear as they could, and either by their Swords to win the glory of the Day, or else to die in the bed of Honour. But the Gauls besides other things, over-match'd them in point of number: so that with their vast Forces they easily overcame them, having killed above six thousand upon the Spot; the rest fled: the Gauls attempted to take a certain Hill fortified with Rocks, which the greatest part fled to from the Battel; but finding themselves tir'd with marching all the Night, and fighting that day they went away to take some refreshment, leaving a Body of Horse to beset that Hill, which they made no question but would be taken the next day either by force, or surrender. In this nick of time Aimilius the Consul arriv'd there by good fortune, which the Romans might wish, but could not have hop'd for. For at the same time the Gauls marching forwards, the Consul went to Ariminum to cover and defend the Countries bordering on the Adriatic Sea: but when he received intelligence that the Gauls were coming towards Rome, making long marches from Ariminum, by lucky hit he arriv'd in that place: and encamped at a little distance from the Enemies.

The besieg'd on the Hill by the fire seen on that side, guessing rightly that the Roman Army was come, sent out some Men without Arms, the better to pass the Enemies Sentinels undiscover'd, by whom the Consul understanding the state of Affairs, in the greatest haste the time would allow, went before with the Cavalry to the Hill, having order'd the Colonels to follow after with the Legions. And by this time the same fires had given the Gauls notice of the Romans arrival; whereupon they were forced to consult together about their present condition. And here King Aneroestus advis'd not to encounter the Enemy with an Army, landed with such rich Spoils, but depart home, where having laid down their booty, they might return disencumber'd by the business, in case they had a mind to try their fortune again in War. This advice being approv'd by all, they departed before Night; pursuing their Journey through Hetruria along the Sea-side. M. Aimilius having rescued those who had fled to the Hill, and being inform'd of the Gauls departure, was unwilling to fight a set Battel, but yet resolv'd to follow them, intending to lay hold on whatever advantage time would put into his hands.

In this nick of time Fortune on the sudden varies strangely the state of things: The other Consul C. Atilius was arriv'd out of Sardinia with his Legions at Pisa, where having put ashore, he went with the Army toward Rome by Land, taking his course through the same Coast of Hetruria, in which the Gauls were marching. About Telamon a Port of Hetruria, the Foremost-hope of both Armies first met one another; and when the Consul by some Prisoners brought to him was inform'd of the Gauls march, and his Colleagues design, who pursued them at the heels, being surpriz'd at the thing, and hoping the Gauls might be coop'd up betwixt the two Consular Armies, he commanded the Captains to draw the whole Army in a square figure of Battalia, as far as the situation of the ground would permit to do it: whilst in the mean time having observed a certain Eminence which over-look'd the way the Gauls were to come, went before fore with the Cavalry to possess himself of the Post, making all the haste he could to engage the Enemy, assuring himself, that if he should be pressed hard, his Colleague would come up to relieve him; and if the Enterprize should succeed, then the glory and credit of the Action should be all his own.

XL. When the Gauls saw the Enemies upon the Hill, they supposing them to be some parties of Horse sent about in the Night by Aimilius, detach'd a Body of Horse also, having join'd some Dragoons with them to clear the way. Afterwards by some Prisoners being advertis'd of the other Consuls arrival, they were immediately forced to draw their Foot in Battalia, so as to face the Enemies both ways, in the Front and Rear, having their backs turned to one another. For they saw Atilius advancing towards them before, and knew Aimilius was following them behind: against whom they posted some Mercenaries of the Transalpine Gauls (called Gafatae, as is said before, from the Arms they wore) in the Van-guard; and at their backs the Infubres were placed to support them. But the Taurisci and Boii were drawn up against Atilius's his Army. Then they fortified the two Wings with Waggon and Car: and sent away the Booty to a Hill hard by with a good Guard to attend it. By this time C. Atilius had begun the fight upon the Hill: from whence Aimilius guess'd his Colleague was come, of whose Journey he had no intelligence before, except that he was arrived at Pise. Therefore suddenly resolving what course to take, he commanded his Cavalry likewise to advance speedily to the Hill, where the fight was.

XLI. Here the Horse engaged very furiously, and C. Atilius the Consul was kill'd, and his Head carried to the Kings of the Gauls. But the Romans standing firmly together maintain'd their ground to the last, and charging the Enemy with their utmost vigour, forced them to fly. The Battel betwixt the Horsemen of each side thus pass'd over; the Foot engag'd. And here the fight both for numbers and force of Men, and also for their order of the Battel was terrible to behold: whilst numerous multitudes of Gauls intercepted betwixt the two Roman Armies fought with both at once: so that it could hardly be judg'd, whether that form of Battel was more advantageous to them, because fighting with the Enemies forces separated from one another, they were secur'd at their backs, and also incited to Valour by not having any hopes of a Retreat: or else that it was more hurtful to them, whilst they were thus pent up betwixt the two Confular Armies. But as the prodigious Stature and dreadful aspects of the Gauls, terrified the Romans, so at the same time they were encourag'd to fight not onely for Honour and Renown, but also for those rich Spoils, the golden Bracelets, and glittering Habillments, wherein the Gauls Van-guard appear'd richly equip'd.

XLII. Having join'd Battel, the Light-Horse first attack'd the Enemy, and that with so much fury, that they cut off great numbers of them, especially where the Gafatae fought, who in a bravado, to shew their Courage stripp'd themselves, and stood naked in the front of the Army. But the long and narrow Target (which the Gauls use) not covering the whole Body, they were expos'd as Marks to the Enemies shot, which were directed so sure as never to miss them: And thus they fell to no purpose, being neither able to wound their Enemies at a distance, nor to come to Hand-strokes whilst the Light-Horse fought aloof off, and would not close in with them. In this desperate condition part of them rushed furiously in upon the Enemies, and before they could come to grapple with them hand to hand, were shot by the Roman Javelins: others making their retreat by little and little, broke the Ranks, and disorder'd the Army. Thus the Gafatae were discomfited by the Light-Horse, and in the mean time the Men of Arms attacking the Infubrians, and Boii, and Taurisci on every side, slew abundance of them.

XLIII. But yet for all this they stood resolutely to it, being in all respects equal to the Romans, except their having such bad sort of Arms, upon which account they had much the worst on't: being so ill appointed, that they could neither defend themselves, nor offend the Enemy; For the Gallic Sword is onely fit for cutting, and has ne'r a point to make a pass or thrust withal: besides it bends almost to the Hilt with the first stroke, and does no kind of Execution afterwards till 'tis straitned again by pressing upon it with their Feet. The Victory, for which the Romans already stood so fair, was soon determin'd at the return of the Cavalry from the pursuit of the Gaulish Horse; for they pour'd down from the Hill, and attacked the Enemies Flank so furiously that they could not longer maintain their Posts against so rude a shock, which was so much the more impetuous and irresistible, because they came upon them from the higher grounds, bearing down all in their way. This is the account given by Polybius of the Battel in Hetruria; from whom others differ upon very improbable grounds: for who would imagine the business done otherwise? As that a Storm in the Night forc'd the Gauls to fly as if they fear'd the Anger of the Gods? That C. Atilius receiv'd his death while he attacked them in the Rear? and that when both Armies thereupon had for some time contain'd themselves within their own bounds, L. Aimilius set upon the Gallic Army and then totally routed them? Nor do those People deserve more credit, who change the place where the Battel was fought, from the Sea-side to the Country of Aretium.

XLIV. 'Tis agreed on all hands, that forty thousand Gauls fell at that time, and about ten thousand were taken with Concolitanus one of their Kings: the other King Anerocstus, who was much esteem'd both for his Valour and Power, got away with a small Retinue, and in his flight cut his own and his Friends throats. Great was the Booty that was taken, which the Consul caus'd to be restor'd to them, from whom it had been taken away at first, the Owners knowing every one their own goods. From thence marching with his own and Atilius his Army by the borders of Liguria into the Country of the Boii, that he might reward the Soldiers for their late Service, he gave them the plunder of all the Country; and within few days after carried the Army to the City, having loaded them with Booty and Spoils: and at his return the public joy was the greater, because that War had struck such a terror into the People, as none before it ever did.

XLV. Therefore there was scarce ever a Triumph so generally applauded with the acclamations of the People as this of Aimilius: being of it self glorious and magnificent enough, and that both in respect of those renowned Exploits performed by the Consul, and also of the quantity and value of the Spoils born in it; among which were several Standards of the Enemies: many golden Chains and Bracelets the Ornaments of their brave Men. But Briomarus, and other Princes of the Gauls drew the Eyes of the People most upon them, whom L. Aimilius by way of mockery led into the Capitol with their Swords girt about them, as if now they were about to keep their Oath, wherein they had sworn never to take off their Belts, till they had entered the Capitol. This Triumph of L. Aimilius the Consul over the Gauls was holden the fifth of March. The same year I find that the one and fortieth Lustration was performed by the Censors, Q. Claudius Centho, and M. Junius Pera. Now the fear of the Gaulish War was laid aside, but the Romans had not as yet taken their fill of Revenge: and therefore the Gauls were assign'd the Province to the two Consuls of the year following.

Tit.

Tit. Manlius Torquatus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus were again both of them Consuls. To them the Army, and all other necessities belonging to War, were readily and cheerfully appointed. For the Romans were in good hopes after so great a Victory, if they ply'd the business vigorously, that the Gauls might be driven from all that tract of Land which borders upon the Po. The Consuls marching out with their Forces forc'd the Boii upon their first appearance to surrender immediately: But the Expedition afterwards slacken'd because of the Peltence, and continual rain. Some Authors write, that these Consuls having pass'd the Po, fought and overcame the Infubres in a pitch'd Battel, killing twenty three thousand, and taking five thousand of them. But we are more inclin'd to rely in these things upon Polybius his Authority. In the mean while because the Consuls hinder'd either by the way, or else by bad Weather could not arrive out of those remote Countries in time to the Assemblies of Election, L. Cecilius Metellus was made Dictator, who appointed Fabius Buteo to be his Lieutenant. The Assemblies being call'd, C. Flaminius and P. Furius Philus were made Consuls. These, as I suppose, were the first Romans who with an Army pass'd the Po, where the River Padusa runs into it, having made an irruption into the Country of the Infubrians. This boldness of the Romans cost them a great deal of labour, and much blood. For in passing the River, and whilst they were encamping themselves, they lost a great many men by a fierce Attack, which the Enemies made upon them.

The fears and jealousies caus'd by this news were much increas'd by Prodigies. For it was reported, that in the Country of Picenum a River ran with blood, and in Hetruria the Heavens seem'd all on fire, at Ariminum three Moons appear'd at once, besides a Vultur had sat for several days together in the Forum at Rome. But as for the great Earthquake in Caria, and the Rhodian Colossi happening to fall about the same time, these things were not thought to concern the Romans. The Augurs being consult'd about the other Prodigies, answer'd, That the Consuls seem'd to have been unduly chosen; and the Senate sent Letters after them to recall them home. The Consuls in the mean time having made a Truce, drew off from Infubria: and having got the Auxiliaries together in the borders of the Cenomani, began again to ravage the Plains at the foot of the Alps: and the Infubrians enrag'd at this, took the golden Shields out of the Temple of Minerva, which were call'd Unmoveable, because it was not lawful to stir them but in times of extreme necessity; and came with an Army of fifty thousand to encounter the Romans.

The Consuls received the Senates Letters about this time; but C. Flaminius, whether guessing what was in them, or else inform'd thereof by his Friends, perswaded his Colleague, not to open the Letters before they had fought the Enemies. Being thus resolv'd upon an Engagement, they consult'd together what they should do with the Auxiliary Troops of the Gauls, considering that the making light of their Service would prompt them to mischievous designs, as on the contrary the employing such men might furnish them with an opportunity to accomplish the same. For they were very jealous of this Peoples levity and infidelity, especially now in a War undertaken against their Neighbours and Kindred. At length they came to this resolution in the point: They sent the Gauls over the River, and afterwards broke down the Bridges; so that the Romans now could receive no harm by them, and having no room left to run away, they were oblig'd wholly to trust to their own Valour. After a sharp Engagement the Romans at last got the Victory, the honour of which action belongs to the Tribunes, not the Consul. For C. Flaminius had drawn his Army to near the bank of the River, that there was no room left for the Soldiers to retreat: which doubtless would have prov'd the destruction of the whole Army, had the Enemies press'd on, and oblig'd them to give never so little ground. The Gauls main Effort consist'd in their first charge, which was very brisk, but this flash being sustain'd, afterwards there was nothing formidable in them. This the Tribunes by experience of former fights knew well enough: and therefore they arm'd those Soldiers in the first line with Spears and Partizans, to put by the Enemies blows withal, after which they might throw them away, and draw out their Swords, when the Battel began.

The Gauls Swords were bent and blunted immediately by those Spears: which whilst they endeavour'd to straiten again, the Romans closing up to them with their Swords drawn, quite took away all the use of their Axes from them. For their Swords being us'd onely for cutting and slashing, require some room to wield them, otherwise they'd do no Execution; but the Romans though never so close to the Enemies, could pass at their Breasts or other parts of their Bodies as they pleas'd. Nine thousand Gauls are said to have been kill'd, and about double that number taken. After this Victory the Enemies Country was ravag'd far and near, and great Booty carried away. The Consuls after this Exploit read the Senates Letter, which when P. Philus was about to obey, C. Flaminius looking on this as a Sham contrived by the Senate out of spite and envy, averr'd that there was no fault in their Auspices, no ill Omens at their Choice: whereof their Victory was an evident demonstration; and therefore that he would not depart till the War was either ended, or the time of his Office expir'd. Besides, he said, He would take care the Roman People should be no longer sham'd and abus'd with the ridiculous observance of Auguries, and such kind of pretences.

But P. Furius persisting in his Opinion, Flaminius his Army searing left after he was gone, they could not be secure enough in a hostile Country, by great importunities prevail'd at last with him to stay some days longer, but yet he would act nothing afterwards: Whilst in the mean time C. Flaminius took some Castles, and a Town of some note in that Country, and endeavour'd by bestowing the Booty on the Soldiers to gain their affections, now that he was like to have some Contest with the Senate. For People were so angry with the Consuls at this time, that none went out to meet them, as the Custom was: and a Triumph was denied not onely to C. Flaminius, but likewise to P. Philus for his sake. At last, Flaminius his great Interest and favour with the Commons prevail'd, so that he enter'd the City in a triumphant manner the ninth of March. Many rich Spoils were carried in this Triumph, and great store of Arms: as also several golden Chains, of which C. Flaminius erected a Trophy to Jupiter in the Capitol, having inverted the Gauls Vow, who had promis'd their Mars a Chain out of the Roman Spoils. The other Consul triumphed over the Gauls and Ligurians the 12th of March.

By this means the Senates displeasure was rather enflam'd, than asswag'd, inasmuch that the Consuls were immediately after their Triumph constrain'd to resign their Office. And through a like severity about the same time two very noble Persons were deprived of the honour of the Priesthood: M. Cornelius Cethegus, for not laying the Entrails upon the Altar according to Order, and Q. Sulpicius, because that his Miter had fallen off from his Head whilst he was sacrificing. The Consuls having resign'd their Office, the Assemblies for Election of Consuls were call'd by a Dictator; wherein M. Claudius Marcellus was chosen Consul, who after he had been vested in his Office, took Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus to be his Colleague.

league. These two refused to grant any conditions of Peace to the Insubrians, who desir'd it: M. Marcellus out of Ambition and desire of Conquest, stiffly opposing all Proposals that tended that way. Nay, the Gauls themselves seem'd rather to carry on designs of War, than Peace: for they had newly got thirty thousand Gesates into their Service, which were join'd by a far greater Body of the Insubrian Gauls.

- LII. The War being thus begun, the Consuls in the Spring took the Field; and in the first place invested Acerræ, a Town situate betwixt the Alps and the Po. Britomarus, seeing it would prove a difficult task to raise this Siege, taking with him ten thousand Gesates, resolv'd to ravage the Country near the Po. Whereupon the Consuls divided their Forces, so that Cn. Cornelius with the rest of the Army maintained the Siege, and M. Marcellus march'd out with two thirds of the Cavalry, and a detachment of Light-Arms to cover the Roman Allies. For this Service he took out but six hundred Men, but those were the lightest and nimblest in all the Army: with these and the Cavalry he march'd Day and Night without intermission towards the Enemy, and coming up with them about Clasidium, before he could refresh his own men, he was forced to engage against his will through the fierceness of the Gauls, who being superiour in number, and arrogating to themselves the prehemience above all other People in Horsemanship, immediately march'd out as it were to destroy the Consul's Army, which according to their intelligence had in it but few Foot. M. Marcellus advanc'd to meet the Enemy, having drawn out his men in length as far as he could, lest he should be surrounded by the numerous multitudes of the Gauls: And now the two Armies were ready to engage, being but a small distance asunder, when on a sudden as Marcellus was going to charge, his Horse affrighted by the noise and yelling of the Gauls, started back. Whereupon the Consul fearing, lest this Accident should be taken for an ill Omen, and thereby discourage his Soldiers, wheel'd about his Horse, and worshipp'd the Sun: as if that had been the reason why he turn'd back, it being an ancient Custom for such as pray to the Gods to turn themselves round.

- LIII. 'Tis reported, that before the first Onset, he had Vow'd to dedicate the best of the Enemies Arms to Jupiter Feretrius; and that afterwards when he saw Britomarus at the head of his Troops, his Arms glittering with Gold and Silver; he concluded those must be the Arms, which he had vow'd. And now the King himself having seen the Roman General, advanc'd a good way before the rest of his men, challenging him to fight both by his words, and brandishing of his Arms: Whereupon M. Marcellus came on, wounded the King through his Armour with his Lance, and afterwards having dismounted him, laid him dead with several Wounds. Then alighting from his Horse, and holding Britomarus his Arms in his Hands, he lifted up his Eyes towards Heaven, saying, "Thou Jupiter Feretrius, who art privy to all the noble Exploits of Valiant Commanders in Battels: Lo, I in thy presence, the third Roman that ever did so, being a General, having slain a General, present, consecrate now these magnificent Spoils to thee; "Do thou grant us equal success during the rest of the War.

- LIV. Marcellus after this returning to the fight, they began to engage furiously, the Romans fighting very courageously, whom their Consuls Valour and success had fill'd with desire of Action as well as hopes of Victory. And hereupon the Gauls were routed Horse and Foot: and a handful of Men overcame a very numerous Army, which seldom happens. The Consul then having first pick'd up the Spoils of the Camps returned to his Colleague, who having possess'd himself of Acerræ, where he found a great quantity of Provisions, with much ado defended himself against the Enemy about Milan a Capital Town of the Insubrian Gauls. But by Marcellus his arrival the Scene was much alter'd. For both the Gesates went home when they heard their King was slain; and also the Milaneses being abandon'd by them, could not defend their City. So that great numbers of the Insubrians being killed, and Milan and Como taken, the other Towns afterwards, and the whole Nation of the Insubrians surrendred themselves, having obtain'd conditions of Peace that were reasonable enough, part onely of their Lands being confiscated.

- LV. M. Marcellus having performed his charge, held a very splendid and magnificent Triumph over the Insubrian Gauls and Germans the first of March. This is the first mention of Germans in Roman Story, these being some Mercenary Soldiers rais'd in Countries beyond the Rhine, who came into Italy under the conduct of Viridomarus. Some of whom and also of the Gauls being taken Prisoners (Men of huge size and Stature) went before the Victors Chariot among the most precious Spoils. The Consul himself followed after, who made a gallant Show carrying the Arms he had devoted in his hands to Jupiter Feretrius, on whom the Army richly clad and equipped attended, and as they went celebrated the Consuls Praises with Songs and Acclamations. When the Cavalcade had come in this order to Jupiter's Temple, M. Marcellus alighting from his Chariot hung up in that Temple the Magnificent Spoils, being the third Man after Romulus and An. Cornelius Cossus, and the last too that ever did so. The Roman People view'd these Arms with greater pleasure, because the Enemies were said to have Vow'd the Romans Arms to Vulcan: and the joy for this Victory was so great, that the Senate and People of Rome out of the Spoils made a Present to Apollo's Shrine at Delphos, of a golden Bowl, and bestow'd on their Confederates and Friends round about some of the Arms taken from the Gauls. To Hiero King of Syracuse, besides some of the Spoils they sent the piece of that Corn, which he had furnished the Romans with during the Gallie War.

- LVI. The Istrians were the next Enemies they had, who annoying the Seas by Piracy took several Vessels belonging to the Romans, that were laden with Corn; against whom the two Consuls P. Cornelius and M. Minucius Rufus being sent, subdued some by force, and oblig'd others to surrender themselves. But yet I do not find that these triumph'd: because (I suppose) their Victory had cost a great deal of Roman blood.

- A.U. 533. This year there arose in Spain a Star of malevolent influence upon several Kingdoms and People: Hannibal, Hafdrubal's Successor; of whose life and Exploits many things are to be deliver'd in the course of this History by a greater hand. Mean while L. Veturius, and C. Lutatius march'd out with their Forces to the Alps: and rather using Treaties and Negotiations, than Arms with those People, they brought over several of them to embrace the Roman Alliance.

- A War brake out again with the Illyrians at this time by reason of Demetrius Pharius his Tyranny: who pretending his Alliance with Rome, molested the neighbouring Nations, as he pleas'd himself: and therefore Complaints were made against him from several parts.

- LVII. He trusting in the Power, in which upon his revolt from Tenta he was sett'd by the Romans, and his being Protector to Pimæus during his Minority, whose Mother Tritenta he had married, he carried himself with as great State as a King; and because troublesome and insupportable as well to his Countrymen, as Neighbours. And even those People of Illyria, that were the Roman Confederates and Allies, he

he endeavour'd to subdue: and having put to Sea with a Fleet of fifty Pinnaces well manned, he sail'd beyond Leijon contrary to the Treaty made with the Romans, and walled the Cyclades [small Islands in the Archipelago] and forced some of the People to pay him Tribute. And now he had got on his side as many of the Istrians, as were disaffected to the Romans since the late War, and forced the Arintines to join with him. Neither did he regard the Romans at all; for he thought now they were engag'd in the Gallie War, and likewise were under apprehensions of another with Carthage, they would have neither Power nor leisure to revenge their Confederates quarrel, or to afford them protection. Beside, he doubted not but he should be assist'd with what Force he pleas'd by Philip King of Macedon, because in his War with Cleomenes he had lent him Aid, being himself General of the Illyrian Auxiliaries.

A War therefore is declar'd against him, and preparations were made accordingly. Mean time L. Aemilius, and C. Flaminius the Censors performed the Lustration; wherein 270213 men were polled. At that time a multitude of freed men, which liv'd dispers'd amongst all the Tribes, gave great disturbances to the City; so that the Censors in imitation of Q. Fabius Maximus reduced them into four Tribes, the Esquilina, Palatina, Suburana and Collina. C. Flaminius in the same Censorship, paved the High-way, as far as Ariminum, and built a Cirque; both which Works were call'd by the name of their Author, the Flaminiæ Cirque, and the Flaminiæ Way. The same Censors propos'd to the Commons the Metilian Law concerning Fullers, not supposing the Care of those meaner things to be below the regards of their great Office.

At this time the Rebellion in Illyria oblig'd the Senate to send M. Livius Salinator, and L. Aemilius Paulus the Consuls to that Province. Demetrius on the other side was preparing very briskly for War, having put a Garrison into Dimalus, and provided all other things that were necessary for holding out a long Siege. In some places he caus'd the principal men to be kill'd, whose loyalty he suspected, and deliver'd the government of their respective Towns to such as were his own Creatures and Adherents; and out of his whole Kingdom he selected a Body of six thousand men, which he kept with him for the defence of Pharus. Whilst these things pass'd on thus, L. Paulus the Consul march'd out in the beginning of Spring came to Illyria: and understanding that the Enemies reli'd very much upon the Works and defences of Dimalus, thought by them an impregnable Fort, he judg'd, that if he could take this place, he might put the Enemy into a great consternation: Whereupon he sat down before it, and his men made such brisk attacks upon the place, that it was taken by storm within seven days after it had been first invest'd. Nor was the Consul mistaken in his opinion; for the report hereof being immediately spread through the neighbouring Cities, Ambassadors came from all places round yielding themselves up to the Romans.

The Consul having accepted their submissions and taken them under his protection, went to the Isle of Pharus, where Demetrius his Palace stood, which when he found to be well furnished with Provision, strongly guarded with Soldiers and also fortified with Works, and besides with the Presence of the Tyrant, fearing the tedious toyl of the Siege, contriv'd this cunning Intrigue to hasten the Victory. Having carried over his Army by Night, he posted the best part of them in a certain Wood, where they stood undiscover'd by the Enemies, whilst he himself went in open light with twenty Ships to a Port next the Town, where he drew out the Pharians, amongst whom Demetrius himself came to hinder the Enemies from landing. When the Battel was joyn'd, several Parties coming in one after another to relieve their men; at last the Town was left without any guard to all. And in the meantime the Romans, who had landed in the Night, passing by certain by-ways possess'd themselves of a Hill betwixt the Town and Port, lying at an equal distance from either, whereby the way was block'd up, so that those who had got out of the City could not return in thither again.

Demetrius seeing what was done, took the best course that could be, considering his circumstances. For leaving the present engagement and countermanding his Men; He told them, "You see how much the Enemy dreads your Valour; for, betaking themselves to such Stratagems as these, they confess, they distrust their Arms against you. Having got in in the Night they stole into this Country, whereof, if I am not much mistaken in you, they shall enjoy no more but what will serve for their Graves, having paid for it with their lives. Now you my Pharians, and all others of the Illyrian Race be mindful this day of your Countries and your own Honour: and let the Romans know, that it was not the effect of your Cowardize, that ever they triumph'd over the Illyrians; it was neither Fulvius nor Publius by their Arms or Conduct, but Tenta by her rathness and folly that then destroy'd the Illyrians and not to mention other things, you may remember, that if Tenta had chose rather to make me her Friend, than her Enemy, the Romans then would not have had such an easie Victory of it. But because I depend very much upon your Valour, and the season requires Action more than Words, I'll be short with you, You have Arms, and Courage to use them; you see what danger you are in, and there is no way to avoid it, but by Valour. Let us therefore march on against the Enemies, who are just now got out of their lurking-holes, leaving these who are landing; for if we shall rout them, these will return to their Ships in greater haste, than they left them.

Having thus encouraged his Men, he march'd in order of Battel to attack those who were posted on the Hill, who received them very warmly, and stood their ground till the men that were landed came up, and assailing the Enemy behind, rout'd them with great slaughter. Some few fled back into the Town, the rest got off by certain by-ways. Demetrius, who in some private places had some Vessels lying ready if any danger should happen, embark'd in one of them, and fled to Philip King of Macedon; where being admitted to be one of that King's Favourites, by flattery and tyrannical Counsels he debauch'd the mind of that young Prince, inclin'd before to Vertue and moderation; and prov'd the Author of the Roman War, and of several other mischiefs.

After this Battel Pharus was taken by the Romans, which was plunder'd and destroyed by the Generals Order. The Consul afterwards having settled the Affairs of Illyria, returned to Rome to sue for a Triumph, the Summer being now far spent.

In the relation of this War also, I have chosen to follow Polybius; though I know that in other Historians the glory of that Victory is equally given to both Consuls, who having sent for Demetrius to come to them, because he obeyed not, first attack'd him in the Isle of Iffa, and overcame him by the aforementioned Stratagem; and afterwards having taken Pharus by treachery, drove out Demetrius from thence.

However,

However, the Senate pardon'd the Illyrians for King Pinnes his sake, whom they knew innocent in respect both of his mind and his age ; and renewed the League with him, only adding some clauses to the former Articles. In the mean while L. Aemilius celebrated a most splendid Triumph over these Nations : and some Authors say, that M. Livius triumphed after this War ; but yet most speak nothing of him, I suppose, because L. Paulus his Actions were more glorious so as to eclipse the Fame and Honour of his Colleague. But the trial and Sentence of the same M. Livius afterwards was a thing most remarkable. For both he and L. Paulus being maliciously impeached, as if they had not equally divided the Booty among the Soldiers, and converted a great part of it to their own use, underwent their Trial : L. Paulus Ambustus hardly escap'd, and all the Tribes except Mucia condemned M. Livius : which disgrace he took so heinously, that afterwards he quitted the Town, and retir'd from all Company till the occasions of the State call'd him back again to manage publick Affairs.

LXIV. But these things happened during the Consulships of P. Cornelius Scipio, and Tib. Sempronius Longus. The same year, whilst M. Livius, and L. Paulus were yet Consuls, one Archagathus the Son of Lyfanius came from Peloponnesus to Rome, who professing Physick was made free of the City, and a House was bought for him at the public charge in the Aelian Street : a thing not worth the relating, except because this was the first time that ever any practis'd Physick in Rome, temperance and unknight Remedies having hitherto served for the preservation of Peoples health. The same year Colonies were brought to Placentia and Cremona in the Gallic Country, which was the principal cause, that incens'd the Boii and Insubres, so that they began to cast their Eyes upon Hannibal, who was then with all his Forces besieging Seguntus, by the ruin of which place he made his way to come and fight with the Romans.

But these great Commotions, which brought on such a terrible War, must be trac'd from their first source and Original.

DECADE III. BOOK I.

E P I T O M E.

THe Occurrences of the second Punick War in Italy are related. 5, &c. Annibal, the Carthaginians General, contrary to the League, passes over the River Iberus, and after eight Months severe Siege, takes Saguntum, a City Allied with the Romans. 18. Whereupon Ambassadors are sent to Carthage to complain of this Infractiō of the Peace, but they refusing to give satisfaction, War is declared against them. 24, &c. Annibal having got over the Pyrenæan Mountains, and defeated the Volscians who would have hindered his Passage, marches on through part of France to the Alps, and with great labor and difficulty having also pass'd those Mountains, and beat back the Gallick Inhabitants there, who oppos'd him, descends into Italy, and overthrows the Roman Cavalry near the River Ticinus. 46. In which Conflict P. Cornelius Scipio being wounded, was rescued, and his Life saved by his own Son, the same who afterwards was surnamed Africanus. 56, &c. Annibal having again routed the Roman Army upon the River Trebia, advances over the Appenine Hills, where his Soldiers were much distressed by the foul Weather and violent Tempests. 60, &c. Cn. Cornelius Scipio prospers in his Wars against the Carthaginians in Spain, and takes their General Mago Prisoner.

JUSTLY may I Preface to this Part of my Work, what most Historians are wont to profess in the beginning of the whole of Theirs, That I am about to write the Story of one of the most memorable Wars that ever happened in any Age of the World: I mean, That which the Carthaginians, under the Conduct of their General Annibal, waged with the People of Rome. For never did more wealthy and potent Nations engage against each other in Arms; nor were they themselves at any time so strong and formidable as at this Juncture: And as they were not ignorant of each others Courage and Military skill, but had sufficiently experienced the same in the former War between them; so also, they were so equally match'd, and the fortune of the Field so variable, that for a long time that side seem'd nearest to Ruine, who at last obtained the Victory. Besides, their spights and animosities against each other, were in a manner greater than their Forces; the Romans taking it in scorn and indignation, that Those whom once already they had vanquish'd, should of their own accords now begin a War with their Conquerors; and the Carthaginians no less enraged, because the Romans manag'd their Success with so much insolence and covetousness, as rendred, they thought, their ulage altogether insupportable. 'Tis also reported, That when Amilcar after finishing his War in Africk, was upon his Expedition into Spain, as he was Sacrificing for good Success, Annibal his Son not then above nine Years of Age, came coaxing of him (as Children use to do) to take him along with him; whereupon the Father brought him up to the Altar, and with his hand laid thereupon, caus'd him to swear, That he would ever be a mortal Enemy to the People of Rome, and fight with them as soon as he was able. This Amilcar being a Person of great Spirit, was, no doubt, exasperated as well at the loss of Sicily and Sardinia; of which the former, he thought was too hastily surrendred by those that without cause despair'd of Defending it; and the latter, during the Broils in Africk fraudulently seized by the Romans; as also for the Tribute which (beyond what was capitulated) they had arbitrarily impos'd upon his Country.

II. Disquieted with these thoughts, he manag'd Affairs so both in the African Commotions (which ensued for the next five Years after the Peace concluded with Rome) and after that in his Spanish Wars (where for nine Years together he diligently, and with mighty success, encreased the Punic Dominions and Grandeur) that all the World might see he design'd still a greater War than what he had in hand; and if he had lived, there is no question but he had brought those Carthaginian Arms upon Italy, wherewith it was afterwards Invaded under the Conduct of his Son; but his seasonable Death, and Annibals Non-age, deferr'd the Storm a little longer. In the mean time, between the Father and the Son, Asdrubal was Commander for almost the space of eight Years. This Asdrubal had been Amilcars Favorite; at the first (they say) for his Youth and handsome Face, but afterwards, for those signal marks of Gallantry and Prudence which he manifested upon all occasions, preferring to be his Son-in-Law; and in respect of that Alliance by the Interest of the Barchine * Faction (which carried a mighty sway both in the Army, and with the Commons) he was now advanc'd to the Sovereign Conduct of the War, though much against the Will of the principal Noblemen. He manag'd Affairs more by Policy and Intrigue, than Force and Violence; and by treating, entertaining and caressing the Neighboring Princes and Grandees, won the Affections and good Will of several Nations, and by that means encreased the Carthaginians Dominions and Power, rather than by force of Arms. But for all this Peace with Foreign States, he was never the more secure of his own Life at home; for a certain barbarous Fellow, whose Master he had put to death, watching an opportunity, lop'd off his Head, and being apprehended by some that were by, kept his Countenance, and look'd as unconcern'd as if he had escap'd; nay, when he was all mangled and torn with Tortures, he seem'd to smile, so far did the joy of his mind and sweetness of revenge, over-balance the pains of his Body, and render them as it were insensible. With this Asdrubal, because he had such a singular dexterity at insinuating into Foreign Nations, and uniting them to his Interests, the Romans had renewed the League upon these two Conditions, That the River Iberus should limit the utmost extent of their Dominions on either side; and that the Saguntines, who were situate between the Territories of both Nations, should enjoy their Ancient Liberties.

* Some say this was the common Name of the Commons-Party at Carthage, in opposition to the Nobility, whereof Amilcar had made himself Head; others, that Amilcars Father was named Barcha, and that this was only the Faction of that particular Family.

III. There being now a new Commander to succeed in the room of Asdrubal, there was no doubt to be made, but the favor of the Moblie would join with the Prerogative choice of the Soldiery, who presently carry'd young Hannibal to the Head-Quarters, and with a vast Shout and unanimous consent, saluted him as their General: For (you must note) whilst he was yet very young, Asdrubal had sent for him to the Army, and the matter was debated in the Senate at Carthage, where they of the Barchine Faction urg'd how fit it was, That Annibal should be train'd up in the Camp, and enur'd to Affairs of War, that he might be qualified to succeed his Father in serving the Publick. But Hanno, the Head of the contrary Faction, stood up and told them, That both what Asdrubal desired was very just and reasonable, and that yet he was of Opinion, it ought not to be granted. They all began to stare at him for this odd saying, and knew not what to make on't, till thus he continued his Speech: That flower and beauty of Youth which Asdrubal himself part'd with, and prostituted long since to Annibals Father, to use or abuse at his pleasure; the same he thinks he may with good right challenge and expect from the Son: But it little becomes the Dignity of our State, to have our Youth, under pretence of following the Camp and Military Institution, debauch'd and made Catamites to the Lusts of our Generals: Are we afraid that Amilcars Son should not soon enough be Ambitious? or too late grasp after his Fathers immoderate Commands and Power, which (in a Free-State) wanted but little of absolute Royalty? Or are we in doubt that we should not time enough be Slaves to his own Child, whose very Son-in-law usurps the Conduct of our Armies as due to him by right of Inheritance? For my own part 'tis my judgment, That this lofty-spirited Youth should rather be kept at home in strict obedience of Law, and taught under Civil Magistrates to live in equal condition with the rest of his Fellow-Subjects, for fear, lest one time or other, this Spark blaze too high, and put us all into a Combustion.

IV. A few, and those in a manner all of the best Quality and soundest Judgment, approved Hanno's advice; but (as it commonly happens where Votes are numbred, not weigh'd) the greater part over-rul'd the Better. Annibal being sent into Spain, at his very first coming, attracted the eyes and affections of the whole Army: The Soldiers fancied that their old General Amilcar was reviv'd, and come again amongst them; They thought they beheld the same vigor in his looks, the same vivacity in his eyes, the very same Martial features and generous lineaments in his whole countenance; but after a little time, so much he had insinuated himself into their good Opinion, that the memory of his Father was the least part of his Recommendation: Never was there a temper so well fitted by Nature to discharge two the most contrary Duties; viz. both to Command and Obey, so that you could not easily determine, whether he was more belov'd of the General for one, or of the Army for the other; for neither would Asdrubal, when there was any hazardous Service in hand, chuse to prefer any before him to manage it; nor did the Soldiers put greater confidence in any other Leader, or would ever more daringly adventure themselves than under under his Conduct. He had an admirable Courage to grapple with any Dangers, and no less Prudence in the midst of hazards to extricate himself by good Counsel: No Fatigues could weary out his Body, nor damp the resolution of his Mind; he could equally endure extraordinary Heat and excessive Cold: For his Diet, he measured both his meat and drink by his Appetite, and Natures necessities, not the pleasure of his Palate: For sleeping or for waking day or night, was all one to him, for only then when his Affairs left him at leisure would he take his repose, wherein he was nothing curious of a soft Bed, or to have no noise about him, for often has he been seen taking a sound nap amongst the Sentinels and Corps-du-Guards upon the bare Ground, with nothing but a Soldiers course Jacket thrown over him: His Apparel no braver than the rest of his Companions, but much delighted to be seen in excellent Armor, and to have the best Horses could be got. Whether amongst Horse or Foot, he would still be a great way formost; the first always in a Charge, and the last in a Retreat. But these so great and Manly Virtues, were counterpois'd by as mighty Vices; His Cruelty was inhumane, and though the Treachery of his Nation be famous even to a Proverb, yet he exceeded the rest of his Country-men for Falshood; he had no Truth, no Honesty, no fear of the Gods, no regard to his Promises or Oaths, no Conscience, no Religion. Thus dispos'd by Nature both as to Virtues and Vices, he serv'd full three Years under Asdrubal, during which time he omitted nothing that was fit either to be known or done by a Person like to prove another day one of the greatest Commanders in the World.

V. From the first day he was declared Generalissimo, as if Italy had been his Province, and he had receiv'd a Commission to war with the Romans, hating delays, left some Misfortune should take him off, as it had done his Father first, and Asdrubal afterwards, he resolv'd to attack the Saguntines. But knowing that thereby he should undoubtedly provoke the Romans to take Arms in their Defence, as being their Allies, he thought fit first to lead his Army into the Borders of the Olcades (a People beyond the River Iberus, rather taking part with the Carthaginians than being under their Jurisdiction) that he might not seem principally to aim at the Saguntines, but to have been drawn upon them by the course of his Successes, and after he had subdued all the bordering Nations, necessitated (as it were) to join them to the rest of his Conquests. Here he first won by force Carteia, a rich City, and the Metropolis of that Province, and plundered it, which so terrified the smaller Towns, that they submitted and became his Tributaries; whence he march'd back his Victorious Army, loaded with Plunder to New Carthage [now Cartagena] to take up their Winter-Quarters. Where having engaged the affections as well of his own Country-men, as of his Allies, partly by distributing the Pillage very liberally amongst them, and especially by paying the Soldiers punctually all their old Arrears, early in the Spring he took his March against the Vaccei [a People of Old Castile.] He also storm'd Hermancia and Arbacala, two Cities of the Carteians, the latter of which made a stout Defence by the multitude and valour of the Townsmen; and those that escap'd from the former, joining themselves with the banish'd remnant of the Olcades (a Nation vanquish'd last Summer) rais'd also the Carpetani [Inhabitants of Toledo] and fell upon Annibals Army, in their return from the Vacceians, not far from the River Tagus; Annibal knowing his Men to be so charg'd with Spoil and Pillage, declin'd to come to a pitch'd Battel, but encamp'd on the Bank of the River, and as soon as the Enemy were in their first sleep, and all hush'd, gets his Army over to the other side, where he again encamp'd at a convenient distance, leaving them room enough to pass by him, but determining to attack them in their passage; in order whereunto he commands his Cavalry to Charge them as soon as they should take the Water, and before his Foot upon the Bank he post'd forty Elephants: The Carpetani with their Associates, the Olcades and Vacceians were an Hundred thousand strong, an Army invincible if they had fought upon equal ground, but being naturally fierce, and confident in their numbers, and withal believing that the Enemy was retreated for fear, they concluded the only obstacle of their Victory was the Rivers being between them, and therefore setting up a shout, all in an huddle without direction of any Leader, ran into the River here and there, every Man at the place that was next him. From the other Bank Annibals Body of Horse advanced into the Water to oppose them, where in the middle of the Channel they fought, but upon very unequal terms; for the Enemies Infantry having no firm footing, and afraid lest the River should not be fordable, were easily to be toppled down even by unarmed Cavalry if they did but spur on their Horses amongst them, whereas the Horse having their Bodies and Arms at liberty, might in the midst of the Stream ride securely, and either Charge them with Handy-stroaks, or kill them at a distance with their Darts and Lances; abundance of the formost were drowned, and not a few by the violence of the Current driven to Land just in the mouth of the Enemy, where they were trod to pieces by the Elephants; the hindmost with more safety got back to their own Bank, but being scatter'd before they could rally together, and recover themselves out of that Consternation, Annibal with his Army in good order entered the River, beat them from the Bank and made them run for't, and having harra's'd all those Countreies in short time brought the Carpetans also to an entire submission.

VI. Now were the Carthaginians Masters of all beyond the River Iberus, except the Saguntines, with whom they had yet no War; but to administer occasion for it, a quarrel is fomented between them and some of their Neighbors, especially the Turdetani, and he pretended to favor the latter, who indeed was the only Instrument that under-hand set them all at variance; which at last the Saguntines perceiving, and that he intended not so much to act as a Mediator for an amicable compofure of their differences, as to seek colourable pretences to destroy them with open force; they difpatch'd away Ambassadors for Rome, to crave affiftance againft that violence which was certainly coming upon them. The Consuls of Rome at that time were P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus, who having introduced the Ambassadors into the Senate, and propos'd the matter, It was resolv'd, That Ambassadors should be sent into Spain to inspect the state and condition of their Allies, who should, if they found cause, solemnly require Annibal to forbear all acts of Hostility against the Saguntines, who were Friends and Confederates with the People of Rome; and from thence to sail over into Africk to Carthage, and there give in a Memorial of the Complaints of their Allies: But before these Ambassadors could set forwards, certain Intelligence arriv'd, That Saguntum was already (much sooner than any body expected it) actually Besieged. Then the whole matter is again taken into confideration by the Senate; some advis'd forthwith to difpatch the Consuls into the Provinces of Spain and Africk, with Commission to make War both by Land and Sea; others thought it better to bend all their Forces wholly against Annibal in Spain. Nor wanted there some Opinions, That a matter of such vast Importance was not rashly to be undertaken, and that therefore they should stay for the return of the Ambassadors before they proceeded to a final Resolution. Which last advice seeming most safe, was embraced, and the Ambassadors so much the sooner hastned away, viz. P. Valerius Flaccus, and Q. Rebins Pamphilus, first to Annibal before Saguntum, and thence to Carthage (if he would not desist) to demand him the said Annibal to be deliver'd up into the Romans hands to be punish'd for violating the League.

VII. Whilst the Romans amus'd themselves with these Consultations, Saguntum is assaulted with the greatest violence imaginable: This City was abundantly the richest of any beyond the Iberus, situate well nigh a mile from the Sea: The Inhabitants are said to be Originally descended from the Isle of Zant, but mix'd with some People that came from Ardea, a Town of the Rutilians; in few Years time it became a place very rich, strong and considerable, as well in respect of the Revenues and product of their Lands, and their great Traffick by Sea, as for the multitude of Inhabitants, and that strict and sacred Discipline whereby they would remain firm to their Allies, though it were to their own destruction. Annibal, after he had Invaded their Territories with a formidable Army, and harra's'd all the adjacent Country, Invested the City, but chiefly made his assaults three ways; there was one corner of the Wall shooting out into a more open Valley, than any other part all thereabouts, against which he resolv'd to erect his Works call'd Vineæ, [certain Galleries or Blinds made of Timber and Hurdles] under covert of which his Men might make their approaches, and bring up their Battering-Rams to play against the Wall: But as the ground at a distance seem'd very even and fit for such purposes, so in the Procefs of their Work it did not at all answer expectation, for it was commanded by a vast Tower, and the Wall it self (as being at a place most expos'd to danger) was there built more high and strong than any where else, besides the choicest and ablest Men were Post'd there to make the most vigorous Defence where there was like to be the most violent Attack: These first, with their Darts and Lances thrown at a distance, beat off the Enemy, so that the Pioneers could not with any safety follow their Work; afterwards, they not only pepper'd them from the Tower and the Walls, but grew so hardy as to Sally out upon them, and not only beat up their Guards, but many times would enter their Trenches and Works; and yet in all these daring Skirmishes lost not more Men than they cut to pieces of the Carthaginians; nay Annibal himself, unadvisedly approaching too near the Wall, happening to be wounded in the Thigh with a light Javelyn, so that for the present he fell down; his Men were thereat so daunted and in such disorder, that they had like quite to have deserted all their aforefaid Engines and Fortifications.

VIII. Then for some days, till the Generals hurt was cured, the Siege indeed was continued, but no great Assaults made; however, though they had a Cessation from actual Conflicts, yet on both sides they were as busie as ever in preparing new Devices and Engines wherewith to mischief one another; whereupon a little while after the Service grew hotter than before, and in several places at once, even in some where you would think it impossible; these Galleries were carry'd on, and the Battering-Rams brought up to the very Wall. Annibal had plenty of Men to spare, for 'tis said, he had not less than an Hundred and fifty thousand Men in Arms; but the Townsmen, what with framing and managing Engines to annoy the Enemy, and what with defending themselves in so many places, had all their hands full, and more than they could well perform: For now were the Walls continually battered by the Rams, and in many parts thereof shattered, but at one place above the rest a breach was made so wide, that the City lay open and naked to the Enemy; and and presently after three Towers, and all the Wall betwixt them, fell down with an horrible crash, infomuch that the Carthaginians then verily perswaded themselves the Town was their own: At this Breach, as if the Wall had protect'd both Parties before, they met in heaps, and fought with equal fierceness, as if the one side had been as eager to come out as the other to get in. This Engagement was not like those tumultuary Sallies and Skirmishes which are wont to happen at the assaults of Cities, wherein one party has the better of the other; but seem'd to be a formal Battel, or pitch'd Field, in the open space between the breaches of the Wall and the Houses of the City, which stood at a little distance within: On the one side they were transported with hope, on the other with despair; the Punicks looking upon the City as taken, if they did but strive a little more, and the Saguntines resolv'ing now to fortifie and defend their native City with their Bodies, since it now was destitute of Walls; nor would any one retreat a step for fear an Enemy should advance in his place, and so get ground: The closer the Fight was, the more were kill'd and wounded, for there was not a Dart flung, not a blow struck almost, but it must do some Execution either on their Bodies, or at least on their Armor; but especially the Saguntines us'd a Weapon call'd Falerica, which they lanced in manner of a Dart, having a long shaft and round, except at the end where it was headed with Iron, bound about with Tow smeared with Pitch; the Iron head was three foot long, that it might pierce through both the Armor and the Body; but if it happened only to stick in the Target without reaching the Body, yet it was very terrible, because being flung after the middle was set on fire, by its motion through the Air, it burn'd more violently, and so forced those on whom it lighted to fling away their Armor, and remain naked to receive the blows that afterwards were made at them.

IX. When thus for a long time the Battel had continued doubtful, the Saguntines taking heart because they had been able to defend themselves so long, even beyond their own hopes and expectation, and the Carthaginians looking upon themselves as little better than vanquish'd because they had not complicated the Victory; the Townsmen all at once on a sudden set up a shout, beat back the Enemy to the ruins of the Wall, and there being encumbred in their Retreat, thrust them clean out, and at last put them to a disorderly flight, and chased them as far as their Camp. In the mean time news came, that Ambassadors were arriv'd from Rome, but Annibal sent some to meet them at the Sea-side, giving them to understand, That he thought it would not be safe for them to venture their Persons amongst the Arms of so many barbarous Nations; and that for his own part, amongst those dangerous and troublesome Affairs he was engag'd in, he had no leisure to give Audience unto, or treat with Ambassadors: But well he knew, That upon refusing to admit them, they would forthwith away to Carthage, therefore he had sent Letters and Agents before to the chief Persons of the Barchine Faction, to prepare the minds of that Party, that nothing should be granted in favor of the Romans, or to his own prejudice.

X. So their Ambassy thither was altogether as vain and without effect, as to him, save only that they were there entertain'd and had Audience. Hanno alone, though the whole Body of the Senate was against him, pleaded the Cause of the breach of League, and was heard with great silence and attention in respect of his Authority, rather than for any consent they yielded to his Opinion: I have often (said he) in the name and for the sake of the Gods, who are the Witnesses unto, and Judges of solemn Treaties and Leagues, admonish'd and forewarn'd you, That you should not send any of Amilcars race unto the Camp; That neither the Ghost nor Progeny of that Man would ever be at quiet, nor any Peace with the Romans be inviolably observed, whilst there remains one alive of the Barchine Name and Family: But sent you have, notwithstanding all my Cautions, and conferr'd the chief Command of your Armies upon a Youth enflam'd with the ambition of being an Absolute Monarch over you, and who perceives nothing can be more conducive to such his Designs, than the raising one War after another whereby he may always live in Arms, and surrounded with Legions: By this indiscreet Action, you have as it were administred fuel to the Flame, and fed that Fire which already scorches and in time will consume you. At this instant your Armies besiege Saguntum, contrary to your League and Solemn Capitulations: What can you thence expect, but that ere long the Roman Legions should encompass our Carthage, under the conduct of those very Gods who in the former War took Vengeance upon us for the like perfidiousness? What? Are you yet to learn what kind of Enemy it is you hereby provoke? Or have you forgot your selves, or the Fortune of both Nations? Your good Lord General, forsooth, would not admit into the Camp the Ambassadors of our Allies, coming also on the behalf of those who were likewise in Alliance with us, and thereby have violated the Law of Nations. These Ambassadors of our Friends, having received a greater affront than ever is wont to be offered to the Publick Messenger of Enemies, address themselves now to you, to demand satisfaction for the Injuries sustained, desiring you to keep that League to which you are sworn; That you would not make your Generals fault your own, by justifying or suffering it to pass with impunity; Without engaging you in the Quarrel, they only require him to be deliver'd up to Justice who is the Offender, and insolently guilty of all these Infractions of the common Peace; The more gently they deal, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more obstinately obstinately will they, I fear, continue their just Resentments and Severities if once you shall necessitate them to it. Reflect upon proceedings past, set before your Eyes the Overthrows you sustain'd at Eryx and the Ægatian Isle, and all the Calamities which ye suffered for Four and twenty years (space as well by Land as Sea; nor was a Beardless Boy then your General, but his Father, Amilcar himself, a second Mars, as those of that Gang were wont to magnify him; but the mischief on't was, we could not then (as we were obliged by Treaty) hold our hands off from Tarentum in Italy, just for all the World as we must now be meddling with Saguntum; therefore the Gods as well as Men took the matter in hand, and in the end vanquish'd us, though with fair words and specious pretences we made it seem doubtful which Nation was the Aggressor; the Issue of the War determin'd it, and as a just Judge, where the Right was, bestow'd the Victory. Carthage it is, against which Annibal at this instant is raising his Mantlets, and his Galleries, and all his Warlike Engines; 'Tis her Walls he batters so fiercely with the Ram; These very Ruines of Saguntum (I wish I may prove a false Prophet) will fall on our heads; The War begun with the Saguntines, must be fought with the Romans: What then, says some body, shall we deliver up so brave a Man as Annibal to them? I know my words will be of small weight or authority in that matter, because of the old Feuds between his Father and my self; yet I must avow, That as I rejoiced when Amilcar dyed, for this very reason, Because if he had lived, we had before this time been involv'd in Wars with the Romans; so looking upon this Youth, an Imp of his, as the very Fury and Fire-brand of such a War, I cannot but hate and detest him; and (rather than that should happen) do not only think him fit to be surrendred to them to expiate the breach of the League, but if no body demanded him, to be Transported as far as there is Sea or Land, and to be eternally Banish'd to some place so remote, as his name might never hereafter reach our Ears, nor his turbulent Genius have any influence to disturb the Repose of our State. 'Tis therefore my judgment, That we presently send away Ambassadors to Rome to give the Senate satisfaction, and others to Annibal, commanding him forthwith to withdraw the Army from Saguntum, and to deliver up the said Annibal himself to the Romans, according to the League; and that a third Ambassy be dispatch'd to the Saguntines, to make them reparation for the Injuries they have sustained.

XI. When Hanno had concluded his Speech, there was none thought it necessary to answer him, and bandy the matter with words, so intirely prepossessed was almost the whole Senate in Annibals favor, only they told Hanno, That he had made a virulent Harangue, and talk'd more like an Enemy, than Flaccus Valerius himself the Roman Ambassador. To whom afterwards this Answer was return'd, That it was not Annibal, but the Saguntines themselves that begun the War; and that the People of Rome would deal unjustly, If they should prefer the new Amity of the Saguntines, before that of the Carthaginians who were their most antient Allies.

Whilst the Romans thus spend time in Ambassies, Annibal finding his Soldiers weary'd with continual Skirmishes and toil in the Works, gave them a few days refreshment, setting Guards to defend his Galleries and Engines of Battery, and in the mean time endeavors to raise the Spirits of his Men, sometimes provoking them against the Enemy, and sometimes encouraging them with hopes of Booty. But when one day he told them, They should have the whole Pillage of the City, they were so enflam'd and eager, that if he had presently led them on, no force seem'd able to resist them. The Saguntines as they were quiet this while from fighting, being neither assaulted by the Enemy, nor yet making any Sallies; so they ceased not night or day from Fortifying themselves, and making a new Retrenchment behind the Breach. But after this short Calm, the Storm was more furious than ever, nor could they tell (so various were the Attacks, Shouts and Alarms on every side) where they should first apply themselves to make Defence: Annibal himself was present in Person to hearten on his Soldiers that were driving up a Tower upon Rowlers, so high, that it over-look'd all the Fortifications of the City; which approaching near the Walls, well furnish'd in every Story with Catapulta and Balistæ [two sorts of Engines, the first of which shot whole shoals of great Arrows, Darts, and the like Weapons, the other discharg'd showers of great and small Stones] they therewith beat off the Defendants; and Annibal taking that opportunity, sent about Five hundred African Pioneers to undermine the Wall near the bottom; nor was it hard to be done, being built after the old fashion with Loam instead of Chalk, so that it quickly came all tumbling down much further than they had weakn'd it, and through those large Breaches whole Troops of armed Men entered at once into the Town, and withal possess'd themselves of a little Hillock, and got thither all their Engines, and raised a Wall about it, so that they might have within the City it self a Bastilion of their own, that like a Castle might command all parts; on the other hand, the Saguntines ran up a Counter-mure to secure that part of the City that was not yet taken: Thus both sides fortifie and fight with the utmost diligence and courage; yet though they dispute the ground by Inches, the City daily grows less and less, they still defending stoutly so much as was left, until at last scarcity of all Necessaries by reason of the long Siege, encreasing, and their expectations of relief as fast diminishing, the Romans, their only hope, being so far off, and round about them nothing but Enemies, mies, they seem'd almost ready to despair; yet then for a while their Spirits were bouy'd up by some disturbances amongst the Oretanes and Carpetanes, which oblig'd Annibal himself to repair thither: For those People discontented at too rigorous Levies of Soldiers that had been made amongst them, had seized some of the Muster-Masters, and threatned to revolt, but by Annibals sudden arrival in those Parts, were quell'd, and glad to lay down their Arms.

The Siege of Saguntum in the mean time was nothing slackned, for Maharbal the Son of Himilco, whom Annibal had left Commander in Chief, so bestirred himself, That neither his own Soldiers, nor the Towns-men, found any miss of the General. This Maharbal had made some fortunate Attacks, and with three Rams shattered several parts of the Wall, and shewed Annibal at his return every place full of fresh Ruins; whereupon, the Body of the Army is presently brought up to storm the Castle or main Citadel it self, where a most desperate and bloody Fight was maintain'd, with great multitudes slaughtered on each side, but in conclusion one part of the said Fortrefs taken. Things being in this extremity, there were some small hopes of Peace by the mediation of two Persons, Alcon a Saguntine, and Alorcus a Spaniard; Alcon supposing he could prevail somewhat by way of Entreaty, unknown to the Saguntines, got by night to Annibal; but after he saw all his Lamentations would do no good, and that nothing but severe Conditions were propounded as from an incensed Conqueror, instead of an Envoy, he resolv'd to turn a Fugitive, and so continued with the Enemy, alledging, That whoever should offer to move his Country-men to a Peace on such terms, they would certainly kill him. Which terms were these, That they should make restitution and satisfaction to the Turditanes for all losses and damages, surrender up whatever Gold or Silver they had, and departing out of the City but with one suit of Apparel apiece, dwell at such place as the Carthaginians should appoint. Alcon affirming, That the Saguntines would never accept of those Conditions: Alorcus replied, Where all things fail, the stoutest Courages will fail and be glad to submit to Fortune; withal, offering himself to carry those Articles, and use his endeavors to compass a Peace. He was at that time a Soldier in Annibal's Army, but publickly profess'd a kindness for the Saguntines with whom he had formerly sojourn'd, and been kindly entertained: Who having openly surrendred his Arms to the outmost Sentinels, pass'd over their Works, and was carry'd (as he desired) to the Prætor of the Saguntines, where presently there flock'd together a multitude of People; but the rabble being dismiss'd, and the Senate assembled, Alorcus made a Speech to them to this effect.

"If Alcon your Fellow-Citizen, as he came to Annibal to desire Peace, would have brought you back those only Conditions on which you may have Peace, from Annibal, I needed not have given my self or you this trouble, who am come neither as an Agent from Annibal, nor yet as a Fugitive; but seeing the said Alcon remains with the Enemy, either through your fault or his own; his own, if he pretended causless fear; but yours, if indeed those go in danger of their Lives at your hands that tell you the truth, I have thought fit for that old kind Entertainment I had amongst you, to come unto you, That you might not be ignorant, that there are still some Conditions both of Life and Peace to be had. And that I have no design in this Address to advance any other Persons interest, but do it purely for your Good; this one consideration may, I think, sufficiently assure you, viz. That all the while you were able to defend your selves, or had any probable hopes of being relieved by the Romans, I never mentioned a syllable to you about Peace: But since you now justly despair of any timely aid from the Romans, and that neither your Arms nor your Walls are longer able to defend you, I bring you Overtures of a Peace more necessary, I confess, than equal; and which there are good hopes to effect, if what Annibal offers as a Conqueror, you will be content to accept as persons Conquered, and not so much regard what you part with as lost (since all will be the Conquerors) as to look upon what is left, as freely given you. Your City, a great part of which he has ruin'd, and in a manner taken it all, he is resolv'd to dispossess you of, but will allow you your Territories, and assign you a place whereon you may build a new Town to dwell in. He requires all your Gold and Silver, publick and private, but leaves your Persons, your Wives and Children, free and untouch'd, if you please to march out with each a single suit of Apparel. Remember, 'tis an Enemy and a Conqueror that Commands all this, and though it may seem harsh and grievous, yet your present deplorable Fortune perswades you to accept thereof; nor do I despair but if you resign all to his good pleasure, he may perhaps remit some part thereof: However, I think you were abundantly better yield to all these his Demands, than to suffer your Bodies to be slaughtered or enslaved, your Wives and Children to be ravish'd before your faces, and carry'd away Captive, to undergo the barbarous Outrages of insolent Conquerors, and other usual Extremities of War.

The People thronging round to hear what news this Alorcus brought, had by degrees mix'd themselves with the Council, and all of a sudden the chief of them, before any answer was return'd, withdrew themselves, and brought out all the Gold and Silver they had, as well publick as private, into the Market-place, and when they had cast it into a great Fire

Fire hastily made there for that purpose, most of them threw themselves headlong after it into the midst of the Flames, and so perished with their Treasure rather than they would part with it: This set all the City in an uproar and consternation, which was encreased by a lamentable shriek much about the same time heard from the Castle; for a certain Tower that had been long batter'd, fell down, and at the breach a Regiment of Carthaginians rush'd in, and gave their General notice, That the Town was in disorder, and abandoned of its ordinary Guards and Defence: Annibal knowing there was no delay to be used, when so favorable an opportunity presented it self, instantly storm'd the City in every part with all his Forces, and in a moment made himself Master of it, giving out Orders, That all persons above fourteen Years of age should be put to the Sword; which Command, though cruel, was yet almost necessary as appeared in the event; for who would spare, or indeed could give Quarter, to such as either shutting themselves up with their Wives and Children, voluntarily burnt their Houses over their own Heads, or else in their Armor would never give over fighting till they dyed?

XV. Thus was the Town won, with great store of Pillage in it, though a great deal was destroyed on purpose by the Owners; and that such was the rage of the Conquerors, as scarce made any distinction of Age in the general Execution, for all that the Soldiers were to have the benefit of the Prisoners; yet 'tis certain, there was made a considerable sum of Money of the Goods they sold, and abundance of rich Household-Furniture and costly Apparel sent to Carthage. Some write, that this City Saguntum was taken the eighth month after the Siege began, that thence Annibal retreated to take up his Winter Quarters, at New Carthage, and that in the fifth month after he set forth from Carthage, he entered Italy; which if true, then it cannot be, That P. Cornelius, and T. Sempronius, were the Consuls to whom the Saguntine Ambassadors address'd themselves when they were first in danger of a Siege, and who also, whilst they were in their Office, fought with Annibal, one of them at the River Ticinus, and a little afterwards both of them together at Trebia. But either all these things must have been dispatch'd in less time, or Saguntum was not first besieged at the beginning of the year wherein they two were Consuls, but rather taken then; for the Battel at Trebia could not be so long after, as to fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Consuls; for Flaminius entered his Consulship at Ariminum, being created by T. Sempronius the Consul, who after the Fight at Trebia came to Rome on purpose to hold the Elections, and then return'd to the Army at their Winter Quarters.

XVI. About one and the same time, both the Ambassadors came back from Carthage to Rome, bringing word, there was nothing but War to be expected, and tidings arriv'd of Saguntum being destroy'd; whereby the Senators felt various Passions all at once struggling in their Breasts, grief and pity for their Allies thus unworthily Massacred, shame because they had not sent them aid in time, rage and indignation against the Carthaginians, and such an extream fear for their own State, as if the Enemy had been at their very Gates; so that in these agitations of their Souls, they rather encreased each others trembling, than setled themselves into any orderly Council. "They knew well, both that they never had to deal with a fiercer and more Warlike Enemy, and that the State of Rome was never more resty, feeble, and undisposed to War: That the Sardinians and Corsicans, the Istrians and Sclavonians, had but challeng'd and made bravadoes, rather than exercised in good earnest the Roman Arms; and with the Gauls they had had tumultuary Skirmishes, but scarce any serious Fights. But the Carthaginian was an old try'd Enemy, a People that for the space of Three and twenty years in continual most sharp and difficult Services amongst the several Nations of Spain, had always come off Victorious, being train'd up to all the toils and arts of War, first by Amilcar, and then by Asdrubal, and now under Annibal a most valiant and able General; under whose Conduct they pass the River Iberus, flush'd with a late Victory, and the spoils of a most opulent City, drawing after him a Train of so many Nations of the Spaniards, whom he has already hardened and inur'd to Wars, and will no doubt raise the several numerous Tribes of the Gauls, a People at all times ready enough to take Arms and do mischief, so that henceforth they were to wage War with all the World, in Italy, and under the very Walls of Rome.

XVII. The Provinces were already nominated to the Consuls, but now they were ordered to divide them by Lot; Spain fell to Cornelius; to Sempronius, Africk and Sicily: The standing Forces for that Year were decreed to be six Legions of Romans, and as many of the Allies as the Consuls should think fit, with as good a Fleet as could be equipped. So they were muster'd Four and twenty thousand Roman Foot, and Eighteen thousand Horse; of Allies Four and forty thousand Foot, and Four thousand Horse, and Two hundred and twenty Gallies with five course of Oars on a side, and twenty Barks fitted out. The preparations made, a Bill was preferred to the People, Whether they would Will and Command War to be declared against the People of Carthage? which being pass'd in the affirmative, publick Supplications were observed throughout the City, wherein the People beseech'd the Gods, That the War might succeed well and happily which the People of Rome had Decreed.

The

The Forces were divided between the Consuls, as followeth; Sempronius had the Conduct of two Legions, each consisting of Four thousand Foot and Three hundred Horse; and of Sixteen thousand Foot and One thousand eight hundred Horse, of the Confederate Forces; and for Sea-service, One hundred and sixty long Ships, and twelve Barks: With which strength for Sea and Land, he was sent into Sicily, from thence to Invade Africk, if the other Consul should be able to keep Annibal out of Italy. To Cornelius were assign'd the fewer Forces, because L. Manlius the Prator was sent into Lombardy with a considerable Army; especially as to Ships, Cornelius had but a few, viz. only Sixty Gallies of five Benches of Oars on a side, because it was suppos'd the Enemy would not come by Sea, nor any occasion happen in those parts for much Service on the Water. He had also with him two Legions of Roman Foot, with their just Complement of Horse, and of the Allies Fourteen thousand Foot, and Twelve hundred Horse. In Lombardy, and the Coasts of the River Po (call'd of old Cisalpin a Gallia) there were two Roman Legions, and Fourteen thousand of the Associate-Infantry; a Thousand of their Horse, and Six hundred of the Romans, which that Year were all brought into Service against the Carthaginians.

Things being thus in readiness, that it might appear they proceeded with all the Formalities of Justice and the Law of Nations, before they would actually begin the War, they again sent Ambassadors into Africk, employing therein Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Aemilius, C. Licinius, and Q. Baebius, Persons venerable both for their Age and Quality, whose Errand was, To demand of the Carthaginians, Whether or no it were by Publick Council and Order that Annibal assaulted Saguntum? And if (as 'twas believed they would) they should avow the Action and justify it, then to give them defiance, and declare open War against the People of Carthage. The Romans being arrived and admitted to Audience, after Q. Fabius had made the aforesaid Demand according to their Instructions, one of the chief only of the Carthaginians made him this answer: "As your former Ambassy, O Romans, was vain & groundless, when you would needs have had Annibal delivered up to you for Besieging Saguntum of his own head, so this, though it seem in Words more mild and plausible, is, in truth, more rude and affronting: Then was only Annibal charged and demanded; now we are urged to own that as a Fault which is none, and then, as if we had confess'd a Crime, you shall require Satisfaction: But I must tell you, That you mistake the Question, which is not, nor ought to be, Whether Saguntum was attack'd by private or publick Advice? but, Whether justly or unjustly? For whether it were done by our Commission, or of his own head, is a matter that belongs to our cognizance, who only have the right of chastizing our own Citizens for transgressing our Orders: All that we have to debate with you, is, Whether it were not lawful for us to Invest that Town notwithstanding the League? And since it pleases you, That we should distinguish between what Commanders do by Orders from the State, and what they attempt of themselves; we must remember you, That there was a League between us and you, concluded by your Consul Lucatius, wherein there is a Clause comprizing the Allies of both Parties, but not a word concerning the Saguntines, with whom you had then no Alliance. But afterwards, in the Treaty with Asdrubal, the Saguntines were indeed excepted, against which I shall alledge nothing but what you your selves have taught me; for you denyed your selves to be any way obliged by that League that was made on your behalf by the said Consul Lucatius, because it was not done either by the Authority of the Senate, nor Command of the People; and therefore you would have another League drawn up anew, and entered into by publick Assent: If therefore your Leagues are not binding to you, unless concluded with your Approbation and Command, then neither can this Treaty of Asdrubal's oblige us, which he entered into not only without warrant from us, but even without our privity or knowledge. Forbear therefore these Discourses of Saguntum and Iberus, and speak plain, what you have so long designed in your minds, That you are resolved upon any pretences to quarrel with us. Then Q. Fabius the Roman folding up the skirt of his Gown: Here, quoth he, within this Lappet we offer you Peace and War, take which you will: At which word they all cryed out no less stoutly, Even which you will your self; and when he letting loose his Robe, had told them, Then there I denounce War against you: They all reply'd, We cheerfully accept thereof, and doubt not but to manage it with as much Courage, as now we entertain the Tidings of it.

This direct Demand and down-right denunciation of War, the Romans thought more for their Honor, than to stand arguing longer about the Right and Justice on't from the Terms of the League, as well before, as especially now since Saguntum was destroyed. Though yet had it been a matter to be determined by Reasoning, 'twas plain on their side; for the League with Asdrubal was not in the same Tenor, nor to be compared with that concluded by Lucatius, since that of Lucatius had an expresse Clause, that it should hold good and firm, If the People of Rome should approve it, but in Asdrubal's there was no such Exception; and besides, as by tacite consent for so many years during his Life it was approved of, so neither after his Death had they desired to have it altered. Yet still, put case they should stand wholly to the first Treaty, the Saguntines were therein sufficiently com-prehended under those general Words, The Allies of both Parties excepted: For neither was it said, The Allies that then were, nor, that none afterwards should be received into Alliance. Since therefore they might by the Treaty assume new Associates, who can imagine it just or reasonable either, That none should be received into Amity for any merits whatsoever; or that being once received, they should not be Defended? Provided, That no Allies of the Carthaginians should be solicited to break with them; or having of their own accord revolted from them, should be entertain'd into Friendship by the Romans. The Roman Ambassadors (according to their Instructions) went from Carthage into Spain, to visit the several Cities there, to endeavor to draw them to their Confederacy, or alienate them from the Carthaginians. They addressed themselves first to the Bergusians, by whom being courteously received, as weary of the Punick Government, they excited several petty Nations beyond Iberus, to a desire of Innovations. Then they came to the Volsicians, whose shrewd Answer (reported through all Spain) wholly averted the rest of the People from joining with the Romans: For thus the eldest of their Council accosted them: With what face can, you Romans, desire we should prefer your Amity before that of the Carthaginians? Since, when the Saguntines had so done, they were by you their Allies more cruelly betrayed, than by their Enemies the Carthaginians destroy'd? For my part, I conceive you must go and seek you Confederates where the Calamities of Saguntum were never heard of: To the People of Spain, the yet smouldering Ruines of that miserable City are, as a doleful Example, so an illustrious Warning, That none ever hereafter repose confidence on Roman Faith, or trust to their Protection. Immediately they were commanded to depart the Volsician Territories; nor did they afterwards meet with any kinder Language in any Diet or Council in all Spain; so that having in vain traversed that Country, they went their ways into France.

XX.

There they thought it a new and terrible sight, to see them all repair to Council in their Armor (for such was the mode of the Country:) But when, extolling the Valor and Glory of the People of Rome, and the Grandeur of their Empire, the Ambassadors desired, They would not allow the Carthaginians (who were about to Invade Italy) a passage through their Dominions; such a laughter and shout was set up, as could scarce be appeased by the Magistrates and Graver sort, so silly and impudent a request it seem'd to them, to think that the French would be such Coxcombs, as rather than suffer the War to pass into Italy, to turn it upon themselves, and expose their own Country to be harass'd and ruined for the sake of Strangers. But at length the noise being qualified, this Answer was returned to the Ambassadors: That neither the Romans had deserved so well, nor the Carthaginians so ill at their hands, that they should embroil themselves or take Arms for the one, or against the other: But rather on the contrary they had receiv'd Intelligence, That the People of their Nation were by the Romans driven out of their antient Possessions in Italy, forced to pay Tribute, and treated with all sorts of Outrages and Indignities. The same, or such like Answers, they met with in the rest of the French Assemblies; nor received any kind Entertainment or friendly Language till they came to Marseilles, from whom, being their Old Allies, and who had narrowly pry'd into all Intrigues, they understood, That Annibal had already prepossessed the French; but withal, That they were not like long to continue in good Terms with him (they were a People of such a fierce and untractable temper) unless continually beset their Grandees with Gold, of which that Nation is most greedy and covetous. Having thus pass'd through, and amongst the several People of Spain and France, the Ambassadors return home to Rome, quickly after the Consuls were gone into their respective Provinces, and found the Eyes of the whole City altogether intent upon the fortune of the War; it being credibly related, That the Carthaginians had already pass'd the River Iberus.

• XXI.

Annibal, after the taking of Saguntum, being retired to New Carthage for Winter-Quarters, and advertised of all that pass'd both at Rome and Carthage, and that he was look'd upon not only as the General, but the Promoter too, and sole cause of the War; so soon as he had divided and sold the rest of the Pillage that remained, thought good now no longer to conceal his Intentions, but assembled the Soldiers of the Spanish Nations, and thus discoursed them: "I believe even you your selves, Fellow Soldiers! cannot but see, that having now reduc'd all the States of Spain to Obedience and Peace, we must either lay down our Arms, and disband our selves, or transfer the War into other Lands; for so shall these Nations flourish, not only with the advantages of Peace, but reap the fruits of War and Victory, if we shall bravely endeavor to acquire both Riches and Glory from others. Since therefore our Campaign is like shortly to lie at a further distance, and it is uncertain when you may again have an opportunity to visit your own homes, and what there is dear to every one; therefore to such of you as desire to go see your Families and Friends, I am willing to give free Pass-ports; but withal, strictly charge you, to be back again here at the Rendezvous, early in the Spring, That then, the Gods being our Assistants, we may go in hand with a War that cannot fail to yield us a plentiful Harvest of Wealth and Glory. There was not one, in a manner, to whom this free leave of visiting their Native Homes, was not very welcome, because they had already a longing to see their Relations, which was encreased by the thoughts of being removed moved to a greater distance from them. This rest all Winter, between the Labors past and those they were to undergo, refresh'd as well their Minds as their Bodies, and prepared them to endure all fatigues as briskly as ever.

In the very beginning of the Spring, according to the aforesaid Edict, they came again to a Rendezvous, and Annibal having taken a Muster of all the Auxiliaries sent from the several Nations; Marching to Cadix, there paid his old Vows to Hercules, and obliged himself in new ones, If the rest of his Undertakings should succeed prosperously. And now dividing his Cares, as well for a defensive as offensive War, left whilst he with a tedious March by Land through Spain and France, went to Invade Italy, Africk should lie naked and exposed to the Romans, who easily from Sicily might cross the Seas, and make a descent upon the main Continent; he thought fit therefore to secure home, by sending thither a grand Detachment, and in lieu thereof desired Recruits from Africk, especially of Archers and Javelineers lightly Armed, That as interchangable Pledges of Fidelity, the Africans might serve in Spain, and the Spaniards in Africk; both like to prove the better Soldiers, by being far from their own Countries. He sent into Africk One thousand three hundred eighty five Foot, armed with short Targets, and Eight hundred and seventy Slingers of the Balearean Isles, and of Horse mix'd of several Nations, One thousand and two hundred. All which he ordered partly for a Garison for Carthage, and the rest to be distributed through Africk as occasion should require; Likewise he deputed Commissioners into the several Cities to press Soldiers, of whom Four thousand select Youths of the best Quality were carry'd to Carthage, both to strengthen the Garison, and remain as Hostages.

XXII.

Nor was Spain in the mean time to be neglected, especially because he was not ignorant that the Roman Ambassadors had gone their Circuit amongst them to tamper with the Chief Persons, and solicit them to a Revolt; he therefore committed the charge of that Province to his Brother Asdrubal, a Person diligent and stout, and furnish'd him with considerable Forces, for the most part transported out of Africk, viz. Eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty African Foot, Three hundred Ligurians, Five hundred Balearians (or Slingers, from the Isles Majorca and Minorca;) To which Infantry was added the following Horse, viz. Three hundred Lybiphaenicians (a mongrel People, partly sprung from the Carthaginians (who were of Phenician Extract) add partly from the old Inhabitants of Libia or Africk) and of Numidians and Moors dwelling on the Sea-coast, One thousand eight hundred, with a few small Troops amounting to about Two hundred, from the Illyriates in Spain; and that nothing for Land-Service might be wanting, he also accommodated him with Fourteen Elephants: Furthermore considering, that 'twas probable the Romans would again chuse to make use of that sort of War, viz. Marine, whereby in the former Contest they chiefly got the Victory; he ordered him a Fleet to guard the Coasts, consisting of Fifty Gallies of five banks of Oars apiece, two of four, and five of three rows of Oars; but only the five last, and Thirty two of the first sort, were Man'd and fitted out.

From Cadix the Army returned to their old Winter-Quarters at New Carthage, and from thence along by the City Etruvissa, to Iberus and the Sea-coast. There, 'tis reported, Annibal saw in a Dream, a young Man, for shape and beauty Divine rather than Humane, who said he was sent by Jupiter to be his Guide into Italy, and therefore bid him follow him, without ever looking behind him, or turning his eyes to one side or t'other; Which accordingly he did for a while, never looking either back or besides him, but at last, that Curiosity natural to Man, wondering much and inquisitive to know what it might be behind him, which he was so strictly forbidden to behold, prevailed with him so far, that he could not forbear turning his eyes that way, where he saw a Serpent of a wonderful size, all the way as it went, bearing down vast Woods and Groves before it, and immediatly followed a great storm with dreadful Thunder-claps; and when he ask'd the meaning of this confusion and prodigious sight, he was told, 'Twas the desolation of Italy; That therefore he should go on in his Expedition and inquire no further, but suffer the Destinies to remain unveloped in their Natural obscurity.

XXIII.

Overjoy'd with this Vision, he Ford's his Army over the River Iberus, divided into three Bodies, consisting in all of Ninety thousand Foot and Twelve thousand Horse, sending some before, who with Presents might conciliate the favor of the Gauls (amongst whom he was to pass) and also to discover the Passages of the Alps. Then he over-run the Illyriates, Bergusians, and Ausetanians, and the Province of Lacetania [now the Bishoprick of Barcellona] which lies at the foot of the Pyrenean Mountains: Over all which Tract he made Hanno Governor, that he might have at his Devotion those Passes and Streights which join France to Spain, allowing him Ten thousand Foot and a thousand Horse to keep them in subjection. Whilst now the Army was begun to be drawn into the Pyrenean Thickets and Hills, and the report ran more certainly current amongst the Barbarous Auxiliaries, that 'twas the Romans they were designed to fight against, Three thousand Foot of the Carpetanes deserted the Service, not so much terrified with the War, as at the tediousness of the Journey, and the insuperable passage of the Alps: Annibal being loth either to force them back, or retain them against their Wills, lest thereby he should provoke the rest that were as fierce and savage as they, to a mutiny, did of his own accord send home above Seven thousand more, whom he perceived to be weary and have no stomach to the Service, pretending that the said Carpetanes were also dismissed with his free consent.

But lest lingering and idleness should likewise debauch the Courage of the rest, he presently passes the Pyrenean Hills, and Encamps before the Town Illeberis. The French, although they were told the War was designed only against Italy, yet because there was a report that the Spaniards on the other side of the Pyrenean Mountains, were set upon and conquered by Force, and great Garisons imposed upon them, therefore the Heads of several Nations, for fear of being Enslav'd, betook themselves to Arms, and Rendezvous'd at Roussillon. Of which Annibal having advice, apprehending more the stop and loss of time, than their Arms, sent Messengers to their several Princes and Chiefs, That he in Person would have a Friendly Conference with them, and that the Meeting might be the more easie, They should either advance nearer to Illeberis, or he go on further towards Roussillon; For as he was ready with joy to receive them into his Camp, so he would make no difficulty to venture himself amongst them, since he came a Guest, not an Enemy into France, and was resolv'd, if they would but permit him, not to draw a Sword until he was entered Italy. This pass'd by Carriers between both Parties, but presently after, the French Chiefs remov'd towards Illeberis, and came willingly enough to Annibal, as being before brib'd by his large Presents, and so gave him free leave to march his Army through their Territories, under the Walls of Roussillon.

XXV. In Italy all this while they had no further News, than only that Annibal was pass'd beyond Iberus, which tidings was brought to Rome by the Envoys from Marseilles; yet, as if he had already pass'd the Alps, the Boii were revolted, and soliciting the Insubrians (those of Milain) to join with them; which they did, not so much for the old grudge against the Romans, as because they could not endure those Colonies which were brought into the Cisalpine Gallia, along the Banks of the Po, at Placentia and Cremona. So having suddenly taken Arms, they made an Incurion into those parts, and gave such a terrible Alarm, that not only the Rustick rabble, but even the Roman Triumvirs who were sent thither to assign and allot the Lands, not thinking themselves safe within the Walls, fled to Mutina [at this day call'd Modena] whose names are said to be C. Lutatius, A. Servilius, and T. Annius. As for Lutatius there is no dispute, but instead of A. Servilius and T. Annius, some Chronicles have Q. Acilius and C. Herennius; others, P. Cornelius Asina, and C. Papirius Mafso. It is also uncertain, whether it were the Ambassadors sent to Expostulate with the Boii that were abused, or whether it were only to the Triumvirs as they were measuring out the Ground that violence was offered. Whilst they were besieged in Modena, the Enemy being both unskill'd in the Arts of assaulting Towns, and of all others the most cowardly and unapt for any Martial Exploits, knowing not how to do any thing but lie idling before the Walls, did at last make Overtures for a Peace: But when Commissioners at their request came out to Treat with them, they, contrary not only to the Law of Nations, but also in violation of their present safe Conduct, detain'd them Prisoners, refusing to release them, unless the Hostages they had formerly given were discharged. Intelligence hereof arriving at Rome, and that the Garison at Modena was in danger, L. Manlius the Prator with great Indignation, and more hast than good speed, leads an Army thitherwards. In those days there were mighty Woods upon the Road, and for the most part uninhabited, so that venturing along there without his Scouts abroad, he fell into an Ambuscade, and not without difficulty and great loss of his Men, recovered the open Champaign Country, where he Entrench'd himself, and because the Gauls [for these Boii were a Branch of that Nation] had not Courage to attack their Camp; his Soldiers hearts were a little lightened, and yet would not but be sensible they had receiv'd a shrewd Blow, and were much impaired. Then they began to March again, and as long as they were in the open Fields, no Enemy appear'd, but as soon as they entered another Woody place, fell upon their Rear, cut off Eight hundred of their Men, and carried away six Colours, putting the whole Body into great Terror and Consternation; but as soon as they were got past those pathless Thickets and Forrests, both the Gauls ceased to molest them, and the Romans gave over their fears, who easily defending themselves in the open Country, made hast to Tanetum, a Village on the Bank of the Po, where with Entrenchments and Works they cast up, and supply of Provisions sent them down by the River, together with the assistance of those Gauls call'd Brixians, they secured themselves against the Enemy, whose multitudes were daily encreased.

XXVI. After this sudden tumult was reported at Rome, and that the Senate was advertised, that besides the Punic War, they were also like to be embroil'd with the Gauls, they immediately issue out Orders, That C. Attilius the Prator, with a compleat Roman Legion, and Five thousand of the Allies listed on a new Levy by the Consul, should go to relieve his Brother Manlius, who accordingly march'd to Tanetum without any Encounter; for upon news of his advance, the Enemy was frighted and fled. Also P. Cornelius having newly raised another another Legion in the room of that which was sent along with the Prator, departed from Rome with sixty long Ships, by the Coasts of Tuscany, Liguria, and within view of the Salyan Mountains, till he arrived at Marseilles; and having landed his Men, Encamped by the nearest mouth of the Rhone (for that River being divided, discharges it self in several Channels into the Sea) scarce believing, That Annibal was yet got over the Pyrenean Mountains, till advise came, that he was already come up to the Rhone, and contriving to Transport his Army over it; wherefore, not knowing where he might encounter him, and for that his Men were scarce yet well recovered of their being Sea-sick, he sent out Three hundred chosen Horse, with Marseillian Guides, and some French Auxiliaries to discover the posture of the Enemy. Who having pacified the rest of the Nations, either fearing to stir, or brib'd with money to be quiet, was now come to the Territories of the Volcans (People of Avignon) a potent Nation that inhabit on both sides of the Rhone, who mistrusting they should not be able to keep off Annibal from that part which lay beyond it, that they might secure the rest by the advantage of the River, carry'd almost all they had to the other side, and there Posted themselves. The rest of the Borderers on the River, as well as those in whose Countries he quartered, Annibal easily prevail'd with to supply him with what Vessels they had, and in building of new ones; for both he was desirous to get his Army over as soon as possibly he could, and they were as willing to be rid of the burthen of Quartering so vast a multitude; so that there was quickly got together a World of Lighters, Barges, and sorry kind of Boats which the Country People had for their ordinary use; other new ones were also made, first by the French, out of the hallowed Trunks of Trees, and afterwards the Soldiers seeing how easie it was, and that they had materials enough, fell to making themselves such Canoo's, regarding no neatness, so they would but float upon the Water, and carry them over and their Baggage.

But when all things were in readines for their Transportation, the Enemy on the other side daunted them, for they covered all the Bank with Armed Men, both Horse and Foot; Annibal, to give them a diversion, orders Hanno the Son of Bomilcar, in the beginning of the Evening, with a strong Detachment, most of them Spaniards, to march up the River one days journey, and getting over the River where he could find a conveniency, to march round with all secrecy, that upon occasion he might fall upon the back of the Enemy. The French Guides appointed for this Expedition, led him up almost Five and twenty miles, to a place where the River dividing it self, made as it were a little Island, and so its Channel became less deep, and afforded a convenient passage: Therefore cutting down Timber in all hast, they built them Punts and flat-bottom'd Boats, to carry over both Men and Horse; but many of the Spaniards made no more, but clap'd their Bucklers and Cloaths upon certain Leathern Bottles, sat themselves aloft thereon, and wafted over in a trice; and the rest of the Party upon Rafts and kind of Boats. Then they Encamp'd near the Rivers side, being weary both with their long march, and this hard work; but after one days refreshment, their Leader being intent upon his Design, they advanc'd from thence, and gave notice by great smoaks that they were got over, and not far off; whereupon Annibal, that he might lose no time, gave his Army the Signal to transport themselves as fast as they could. The Foot had their Wherries or Canoo's ready prepared and fitted, and abundance of Barges or large Vessels placed up higher in the River, to break the force of the Current, and render it more smooth and safe for the said little Boats that pass'd below them, carry'd the Cavalry, except such Horses as swam cross, as many empty ones did after the Vessels, their Bridles being tyed to the Stern; but such as were saddled and harnessed to be ready for present Service, were transported in the Barges or Ferry-Boats.

The French in heaps stood upon the opposite Bank, with loud hooping, hallooing, and singing after their barbarous manner, clattering their Targets over their Heads, and brandishing their Weapons in their right hands; though yet they were not a little startled to see such a power of Vessels coming upon them, with the hideous roaring of the Water, and no less terrible shouts and clamors both of the Water-men and Soldiers, endeavoring to break through the Current, and of those yet behind on the other Bank, encouraging their Fellows that were passing. But whilst they were thus concern'd at the sight and noise before, a much more dreadful Out-cry arose behind their backs, Hanno having surprized their Camp, and presently after was up at them with his Brigade; so that now they were astonish'd, and in equal danger on all sides, for they had not only a mighty power of Armed Men that were got on Land from the Vessels, to deal with, but also an unexpected Army furiously charging them in the Rear: The French, after they had made head a while, and found all resistance vain, where they spyed the Coast most clear, broke through, and so in great fear fled several ways into their respective Towns and Villages. Annibal then at leisure wafting over the rest of his Forces, condemning now all French interruptions, Encamped himself: For transporting the Elephants, I suppose there might be several devices propos'd, because 'tis variously related; some say, That having brought them altogether to the Bank, one of the wildest and fiercest of them being purposely provoked voked and enraged by his Keeper, when he run at him, the Fellow, as to save himself, took the Water, and the Beast in that fury followed him as he swam, thereby drawing after him all the whole drove to do the like; and as any of them fearing the depth failed to wade, the very force of the Stream carried them downwards till they came to the other Bank. But it is more credibly related, That they were conveyed over in Vessels, which as it was safer counsel before it was practised, so when 'twas done, was more easie to be believed: They made (these Authors say) a very large Raft of Two hundred foot long, and fifty broad, which, that it might not be carryed away with the Current, they fix'd with strong Ropes on the upper part to the Bank, and covered it over with Turfs and Earth like a Bridge, that the Beasts might boldly venture on it as on firm Ground: To the farthest side of this, was join'd very even, a Ferry-boat of the same breadth, but only One hundred foot long, fitted to pass the River; then the Elephants being driven along upon the first fix'd Boat, as in an High-way, their Females formost, when as many as 'twas thought convenient were pass'd into the second, presently the same was loosned, and so tow'd away by certain Gallies to the other shore. Thus when the first were landed, they went back and fetch'd more, till they had them all; whilst they were on the long Bridge they shew'd no fear, but when the Barge was put off, and they parted from their fellows into the broad River, they were a little troublesom, by thronging one another, those on the outside giving back as much as they could from the Water, until at last seeing nothing but Water all round, the very fear made them be quiet; yet some few were so unruly, that they fell into the River, but by reason of their bulk and heaviness stood firm against the Torrent, and casting their Keepers, by wading warily where it was Fordable, got safe to Land.

XXIX. Whilst the Elephants were Ferrying over, Annibal sent out Five hundred Numidian Horse to discover the Romans Camp, Where they were? of what strength? and what they intended? This Party, the Three hundred Roman Horse sent out upon the like Errand from the mouth of the Rhone, as aforesaid, happened to encounter with; between whom happened a Skirmish more fierce and bloody than could be expected from the smallness of their numbers, for besides many wounded, there were kill'd out-right near upon as many on the one side as the other; but just as the Romans were almost tyred out and spent, the fear and flight of the Enemy, yielded them the Victory: Of the Numidians who were worsted, were kill'd above Two hundred; and of the Romans side who were Victors, One hundred and sixty, but some of them French, that they had took with them for their Guides and assistants: As this was the first Hansel, so it may well be accounted an Omen of the whole War that followed, portending as in the end and upon the whole matter, a prosperous event to the Romans, so likewise that it was to be doubtfully disputed, and with great hazard and slaughter. The Conflict thus over, each Party return'd to their own Army.

Now as Scipio could not resolve what Measures to take, but as he found the Enemy to shape his course; so neither was Annibal yet certainly determined, whether he should pursue his intended march for Italy, or fight the Roman Army that was now so near him; but he was diverted wholly from engaging at present, by the arrival of Ambassadors from the Boii, and of Matalus a petty King amongst them, who offered to be both his Guides in his Journey to Italy, and sharers with him in all dangers, affirming, That in their opinion his best way was to begin the War, with his strength intire, and unweakened by any other Service. The main Body of his Army had no small apprehensions of the Enemy they were to cope with, for the remembrance of the former sharp and tedious War, was not yet obliterated. But much more did they dread so vast a Journey, and the thoughts of the Alps, whose very name to Men altogether unacquainted in those parts, was very terrible.

XXX. Annibal therefore having fix'd his Resolutions to go on, and march directly for Italy, calls his Soldiers to an Assembly, and partly by reproof, and partly by encouragement, endeavors to prepare their Spirits for the Expedition, in an Oration to this effect: I cannot but admire, Gentlemen Soldiers! what strange and sudden fear hath of late invaded your Breasts, which ever heretofore have been utter strangers to that Womanish Passion. You have served in the Wars so many years, and always Victorious; who left not Spain till you had rendred all its several Nations, and that vast Tract of Land which reaches from Sea to Sea, Tributaries and Vassals to Carthage; you who took the Romans, demanding all that were at the Siege of Saguntum to be delivered up to them as Malefactors and Slaves, in so much scorn and indignation, that you pass'd the Iberus full of generous Resolves, not only to chastize that Insolence, but even root out the Roman name from under Heaven, and for ever Enfranchise the World from their Tyranny; and in order to so glorious a design, did then declare, You would think no March too long, though it should be even from the setting to the rising of the Sun; yet after you now see the far greater part of your Journey already dispatch'd, The Pyrenean Hills and Thickets, amongst fierce and desperate Nations, happily surmounted; that we have pass'd over the great River Rhone, notwithstanding either the rapid fierceness of its Current, or those thousands of French which stood armed on its Banks to hinder us: Now that we are got within sight of the Alps, the other side of which is Italy, Italy, Will ye faint and languish with a lazy Cowardize, when you are even upon the very Gates of your Enemy? What Monsters do you fancy these Alps to be? They are nothing in the World but a parcel of high Hills; and suppose them a little higher than the Cliffs of the Pyreneans, there is no Land (I am sure) that reaches up to Heaven, nor any place for Men unsuperable: These very Alps are inhabited, they are Plowed and Tilled like the rest of the Earth, and both breed and feed great numbers of Cattel, and other living Creatures: Are they indeed accessible and to be pass'd by a few, but unpassable to whole Armies? rather the more they are in company, the more helpful they must needs be to each other: These very Ambassadors you see here lately arriv'd, have no wings, nor did they fly over the towering tops of the Alps; nor were their Ancestors born and bred there, but strangers, that with their Wives and Children, after the manner of those that seek new Countries to inhabit, did often in vast multitudes safely Troop over these Mountains, to dwell in the more pleasant and plentiful Plains of Italy: What should there be unpassable or impossible to a Soldier, carrying no burden but his Arms? What pains did ye take, what dangers and hazards did you freely expose your selves unto daily for eight long months together, for the taking of Saguntum? and now when you are going to conquer Rome, when the reward of your Travel is no less than a City that is Mistress of the World: Shall any thing seem so hard or difficult as to stop your March, or divert your Courage from such glorious hopes? Shall it be said, That the Gauls heretofore by main force made themselves Masters of that very place, which the Carthaginians now despair of being able to get at? You must therefore either shamefully confess your selves inferior for valor and spirit, to a Nation that of late days you have so often vanquish'd; or else never hope for, or think of any other end of your March, until you come to those fair Fields that lie between Tyber and the Walls of Rome.

Having with such Discourses rais'd the hearts of his Soldiers, he ordered them to be- XXXI. take themselves to rest, refresh their Bodies, and prepare for their March. The next day crossing from the Banks of the Rhone, he advanc'd towards the Inland parts of France, not because that was the directer Road to the Alps, but because the further off he was from the Sea-side, the more out of danger he should be of meeting the Romans, with whom he resolv'd not to fight (if he could avoid it) till he got into Italy: After four days march he came to a kind of an Island made by the two Rivers, the Saone and the Rhone, which issuing out of different parts of the Alps, after they have in several Courses ran through a good part of the Country, there at length fall together and unite their Streams, and the Meadows lying between them are called, The Isle. Not far from thence inhabit the Allobroges [People of Dauphinois and Savoy] a Nation even so long ago inferior to none in France, either for Wealth or Power, but at that Juncture at variance amongst themselves, occasion'd by two Brothers contending for the Crown: The elder (whose name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the Kingdom) being Deposed and Justled out of the Throne by a younger, and a lusty crew of the Youth of his Faction, who had more Might, though less Right on their side. This Quarrel was refer'd to Annibals Arbitrament, as seasonably as he could wish, who made a very Just Award, and no other than what the Senate and Nobles would have given, viz. That the Elder Brother should be restored to his Kingdom, and all Animosities be buryed in Oblivion: For which good Office, they plentifully furnish'd him with all sorts of Provisions, and especially Cloaths, which he thought fit to provide before-hand, by reason of the sad reports he heard of the extremity of cold he must expect to meet with on the Alps.

Having settled the Differences amongst the Allobroges, pursuing his Journey to the Alps, he pass'd not straight forward, but turn'd towards the left hand to the Tricastins, and from thence by the Territories of the Vocontians into the Country of the Tricorians, meeting with no obstacle all the way until he came to the Durance; a River likewise flowing out of the Alps, but the most difficult to be pass'd over of any in all France; for though it carries a vast quantity of Water, yet 'tis no way Navigable, nor will bear any Vessel, because being kept within no certain Banks, it runs at once in several different Channels, and not always the same, but is continually casting up new Shelves and Heaps, and making new deep Passages and Whirl-pits in the Ground (which renders it very unsafe and difficult for a Foot-man to wade through it) besides the Torrent rolling down perpetually great stones, and vast quantities of pibbles and gravel, makes it yet more dangerous: It chanc'd too at that time to be higher than ordinary, by reason of some showers that had lately falln, so that much ado they had to get over it, being no less discouraged by their own fears and uncertain out-crys as they pass'd through it, than by difficulties of the place it self.

P. Cornelius the Consul, about three days after Annibal dislodg'd from the Banks of the XXXII. Rhone, came up with his Army in excellent order to the place where the Enemy lately Encamp'd, resolv'd immediately to have given them Battel: But finding the Works deserted, and that 'twas unlikely he should easily come up with them who had so far got the start of him, returned to his Ships at Sea, hoping for a safer and more seasonable opportunity of Encountering Annibal as he descended from the Alps. But that his Province, Spain, might not be left altogether naked of Roman Succors, he sent his Brother Cn. Scipio with the greater part part of the Forces against Asdrubal, with Commission not only to defend their old Allies, and conciliate new ones, but to drive Asdrubal out of the Country, whilst he himself with a very small Company return'd to Genoa, with intent to guard Italy with that Army which lay Quartered about the Po.

Annibal, from the River Durance, march'd chiefly through the Champion Countries without any disturbance from the Inhabitants, to the foot of the Alps; which Mountains, though they had heard much of before by report (which is wont to make things that are uncertain to us, seem much greater or more terrible than they are in truth) yet seeing now near hand their prodigious height, cap'd with Snows, that seem'd almost intermingled with the Heavens themselves. The rude mis-shapen Cottages built on the sides of steep Rocks, that over-look'd the Clouds; the Cattel, Sheep, Oxen and Horses sing'd with cold; the People barbarous, and with long shagg'd hair like Savages: In a word, all things living or inanimate parched, and stiff with continual Frosts, and nothing to be seen but a general Scene of deformity and horror; the near prospect, I say, of all this, renewed his Soldiers fears; and to encrease their apprehensions of danger, they were no sooner marching up the first Ascents, but there appeared, setting over their heads, multitudes of the Mountaineers who had seized the Hills, who if they had lain in Ambuscade in the interjacent Vallies, and all at once charg'd upon them, must needs have done great execution. Annibal hereupon orders his Ensigns to make an Halt, sends out some French to view the Ground before, by whom, understanding there was no passage that way, he pitch'd his Camp amongst those craggy steep rough places, upon as large and plain a Valley as he could find. By the same French Scouts (who not much differing in Language or Looks from the other Gauls that dwelt in the Mountains, could easily mix themselves amongst them) he was informed, That they only guarded the Hills in the day time, but in the night every one slip'd away to his own harbor. Therefore having for one whole day made several Bravado's and Parades, as if he would openly force his Passage; towards night he retreats back again to his Camp: but in the evening as soon as he perceived the Enemy were gone home from off their Guards, making abundance of Fires in the Camp for shew, more than were necessary for those that were to stay there, and leaving with the Cavalry the Bag and Baggage, and most of the Infantry, himself in Person, taking with him the most active and nimblest of his Army, and such as were most lightly Arm'd, in an instant got through the Streights aforesaid, and Posted himself on those very Hills, which the Enemy was before posselt of.

XXXIII. As soon as 'twas day, the rest of his Army dislodg'd and began their March: At the same time the Mountaineers at their usual Signal, repairing from their Forts towards their place of Guard, seeing some of the Enemies had already made themselves Masters thereof, and others hastening thither, were extremely daunted, and for a while stood as Men astonish'd; but afterwards, perceiving Annibal's Soldiers embarrass'd in the Streights, and disorder'd in their March, the Horses being wonderfully frighted, imagined, that if they could but add a little to that terror, it might be enough to destroy them, and therefore to alarm them ran up and down like mad, over-thwart the Rocks, and through blind Passages with which they were well acquainted, so that henceforth the Punicks were at once incommoded, both with the inconveniencies and dangers of the Passage, and the attacks of these lurking straglers; yet still there was more ado amongst themselves (whilst every one strove who should first escape the danger) than with the Enemy. But indeed, nothing troubled and discompos'd the Army so much as their own Horses, which, with the various shouts and out-cries, redoubled by the Echo's between the Rocks and the Vallies, were continually startled; and if any of them happened to be struck or wounded, they would keep such a flinging about on those narrow Precipices, that they overthrew and made great havock both of Men and all sorts of Carriages: Besides, the throng was so great, and the Streights on both sides so steep and craggy, that many Men were jostled down head-long a mighty height, and some of them in their Armor; but especially the Sumpter-Horses, and Beasts for carriage, by reason of their heavy Loading, were tumbled down with their Packs, making an horrible rumbling from one Rock to another, as if it were the fall of some Castle or great Building. All which, though a very grievous spectacle, yet Annibal for a while look'd on, and kept the party that was with him together, until he saw his Army, by the continual peltings and disturbances of the Enemy, put into such disorder, that he was afraid they would leave their Carriages and Baggages behind them, which being lost, all his labor would be in vain: To prevent therefore this mischief, he ran down from the upper Ground, and with a smart Charge quickly sent packing all the Mountaineers, but therewith encreas'd at first the tumult amongst his own Men; however, in a moment that was over, when they found their Passage now free from the troublesome interruptions and clamors of the Enemy, and so, silently and at their leisure march'd all through that narrow Pass. After which he took a Castle (the chief Fort in those parts) and several neighboring Villages, and with the Cattel there taken Feasted his Army for three days together, in which space being not at all hindred by the Inhabitants, nor so very much encumbred with the difficulties of the Ways, he had made a pretty considerable progress in his Journey.

They came next to a Coast well Peopled for such Mountainous places. Here Annibal XXXIV. was like to have been over-match'd, not by open Force, but in his own Arts, fraud and ambush. Certain antient Persons, Governors of Castles, come to him as Agents from the Country, telling him, That being better instructed by the useful examples of other Mens misfortunes, they had made choice rather to try the Friendship, than tempt the force of the Carthaginian Arms, and therefore should readily obey whatever he should command, entreating, That he would be pleas'd to accept of such mean Provisions as they were able to afford, together with Guides for his Journey, and Hostages for the true performance of what they promised. Annibal, neither over-hastily believing them, nor churlishly slighting the Overture, lest they should then prove his open Enemies, gave them good Language, receiv'd their Hostages, made use of what Provisions they brought in, and followed their Guides, but in good order, and with caution as in an Enemies Country. In the Van-guard were the Elephants and Cavalry; next he himself in Person with the Flower of his Foot, diligently looking round about with a watchful Eye. When at last they were entred into a narrow Pass, that on one side lay under a steep Hill which commanded it, the barbarous people started up out of their Ambush, and all at once Charg'd them Front and Rear, with Weapons from a distance, and close blows, and also rolling down vast Stones upon them as they march'd; but the greatest number came behind upon their backs, against whom the Foot faced about, and undoubtedly, if his Rear had not been very strongly guarded, he had that day received a notable Overthrow; for even as 'twas, they were reduc'd to an extremity of danger, and the very brink of ruine, for whilst Annibal delay'd to advance with his Division into the Streights, for that he had not left any Succors in the Rear-guard to secure the Foot, as he himself was a defence to the Horse, the Mountaineers came over-thwart and flank'd them, and breaking through the Files, cross'd upon him and beset the way before him, so that he was forc'd for one night to take up his Lodging there, without either Horse or Baggage.

The next day the barbarous People making their Incurfions more faintly, he joined his XXXV. Forces, and got clear of that Streight, not without considerable loss (but more of Horses than Men.) Thenceforwards the Mountaineers, not in a posture of War, but rather like Robbers, molested them by falling on some of the Van, and at other times picking up straglers in the Rear, as each place gave opportunity, or the carelessness of his Men admitted occasion. The Elephants in the Front, as they could march but slowly through those narrow Passages, so where they went they secured those about them, because the Enemy having never seen such huge Creatures before, durst not come near them. On the ninth day he got to the top of the Alps, having been forc'd to march for the most part through places before untrodden, and often wandering out of the way; either by the treachery of his Guides, or when they durst not trust them, by marching into Vallies that promised fair, and guessing the way at a venture: Here he lay Encamped two days to refresh his Soldiers, wearied out with the toil of clambering up thither, and the frequent Skirmishes and continual Alarms they had had; and several of the Sumpter-horses lost in the Passage, following the track of the Army, came up to them. But as they were thus over-toil'd with tedious Travel, a new disaster happened by the falling of a deep Snow, For the Pleiades were now come to set with the Sun [which happens in those parts about the middle of November] and Winter hastned on apace. When therefore at break of day the Standards began to advance, the Army march'd very heavily through the Snow, which covered all the Ground very thick, and faintheartedness and despair seem'd to appear in every mans countenance; Annibal marching a pretty way before the Standards up into a certain Promontory, yielding a long prospect all about, commanded his Soldiers to Hault, and there shewed them Italy, and the goodly Champian Fields about the Po, that lay under that side of the Alpine Hills, telling them, That now they had mounted not only the Walls of Italy, but even those of the City Rome; that the rest of their march would be plain, and all the way down-hill, and that after one or two brushes at most, they should be absolute Masters of the Bulwark and Metropolis of Italy. Then more cheerfully did they march on, no Enemy troubling them unless by petty Robberies upon an advantage. Yet their descent was indeed more difficult than their getting up (for as the Alps on the Italian side are shorter, so they are more steep and strait,) all the way being almost a Precipice, narrow, and so slippery, that as they could hardly keep themselves from tumbling, so if they did but happen to stumble never so little, there was no recovering their foot-hold, but both Horses and Men fell down one on the top of the other.

But after this, they came to a Rock much more difficult to pass, for the crags thereof XXXVI. were so steep down-right, that scarce the nimblest Soldier, though not at all encumbred with Arms or Baggage, could creep down it, do what he could to catch hold with his hands on the twigs and shrubs that grew about it; this place being before by Nature a kind of Precipice, by a late vast fall of Earth near a thousand foot high, was render'd yet more abrupt; abrupt. There the Horse-men making a stop as if they had been come to their Journys end, and Annibal admiring why they did not march on, word was brought him, That 'twas impossible for them to go any further that way; which he himself going in Person to view it, found to be too true, and that he must of necessity fetch a compass about, through places where no Road lay, and which had never yet been trodden; for here there was no going on further; for whereas over the old untouch'd Snow, there was new faln, in which being not very deep, their feet as they went easily made impression, but when the same with the trampling of such a multitude of Men and Horses, was thaw'd, they were fain to go up on the bare Ice underneath, and through the slabby Liquor of the melting Snow o'th' top: There a sad and untoward strugling they had, for as they could not tread sure upon the slippery Ice, especially being so very steep, so when they fell, if they went to get up by the help either of their hands or knees, down they came again; nor were there any stumps or twigs whereon they might take hold or stay either hand or foot; and as for the poor Beasts, all they could do was to tumble and wallow on the glassy Ice and slabby Snow, and sometimes being faln, with their flinging to and fro, and endeavoring with their hoofs to take faster hold, they would break into the hard congealed Snow underneath, and so stick fast as if they had been caught in a Trap.

XXXVII. At last, when both Man and Beast were quite tyred out, and all with strugling to no purpose, they Encamped on the top of an Hill, having first, with much ado, cleared the place for that purpose, such abundance of Snow there was to be shovell'd away; after which, the Soldiers were set to work upon a Rock, through which only they could hope for a Passage, and in order thereunto having fell'd abundance of huge Trees thereabouts, and made a mighty Pile of Wood against it, when the Wind blew fresh to encrease the fire, they set it a burning; and when the Rock was thus made red hot, they poured Vinegar upon it to soften it, and so with their Pick-Axes and other Tools, wrought it away, and with little winding Paths made a passage both for their Horse and Elephants. This work took them up four days, by which time their Horses were almost starv'd; for the tops of the Mountains are generally bare of Grass, or if there were any, 'twas covered up with the Snow; but the Vallies have some little Banks lying towards the Sun, and Rivers withal near the Woods, convenient for Habitations; there the Horse were put out to grass, and two days rest allowed the Army to refresh them after their hard labor on the Rock; from thence they descended into a plain Champian Country, and found both their March more easie and pleasant, and the Inhabitants more humane and tractable.

XXXVIII. These are the chief Occurrents of this tedious and renowned March: They entring into Italy the fifth month after their advance from New Carthage (as some write) having in Fifteen days pass'd over the whole Alps. What Forces Annibal had when he arriv'd in Italy, is variously related by Historians; they that speak with the most, mention One hundred thousand Foot, and Twenty thousand Horse; they that make the least on't, say, but Twenty thousand Foot and Six hundred Horse. L. Cincius Alimentus, an Author of great Authority, and who avers that himself was taken Prisoner by Annibal, would satisfy us, but that he sets down the number confusedly, by adding to the rest the Gauls and Ligurians that join'd him after he came down the Alps; for with them he counts Annibals Army to consist of Eighty thousand Foot and Ten thousand Horse (yet 'tis probable that from all parts there came more thither than so, which is also attested by some Writers.) The same Author relates, that he had it from Annibal himself, That after he had pass'd the Rhone, he lost six and thirty thousand Men, and a vast number of Horses and other Cattel, especially on the Coasts of Piedmont, which Nation lay next to the Cisalpine Gauls as he went down into Italy. Which being a thing generally agreed, I so much the more admire how it comes to be made a dispute, on which side he pass'd the Alps, and that it should be commonly believed, That he went over the place called Peninnum, and that the top of the Alps was so called, quasi Peninnum, a Penis, from this march of the Carthaginians: Cælius says, he took his way over the top of Cremon; but as either of both those Passes would have brought him not amongst the Piedmontez, but through the Mountains of the Salassi, to the Gauls called Libuans; so neither is it probable that those Roads into France were open or known so long ago, considering that which led to Peninnum was environed with fierce and barbarous People, half Germans; and certain it is (if the allusion of the Name should seem of any weight) That the Veragrians who inhabit that very Peak, know nothing of its being called so from any march of the Punic that way, but from a certain Consecrated Place on the very ridge of the Hill, which the Mountaineers use to call Peninnum.

XXXIX. It fell out very opportunely to favor Annibals first proceedings, That the People of Piedmont, the next Nation he came to, were at that time engaged in Wars with the Milanais; nor could he conveniently assist either party, being busie in refreshing his Army, that now grew more sensible of the harms they had received by the rigours of their March, than before whilst they actually labored under them; for ease after such toil, sudden plenty upon pining scarcity, and good and delicate keeping after all kind of sordid nastiness, had strangely disordered their Bodies. Which Considerations moved P. Cornelius the Consul, as soon as he was arrived at Pise, and had received from Manlius Attilius the new raised Army (though yet trembling under the disgrace of their late overthrows) [by the Boians and Gauls] to hasten towards the Banks of the Po, that he might fight the Enemy before they were well recruited: But by that time he got to Placentia, Annibal had removed his Camp, and by force taken one, and that the chief City of the Piedmontese, because it had slighted his Friendship; likewise the Gauls about the Po, out of inclination as well as fear, were to have join'd with him, had not the sudden arrival of the Consul retain'd them in obedience, just as they were studying a fit time and occasion for a revolt: At the same instant Annibal had quitted Piedmont, and come amongst the said Gauls, imagining, that standing in this wavering posture they might easily be made comply with him, when he was once present on the place. The Armies were now almost within sight of each other, and two Generals met, who though as yet not thoroughly known to one another, had notwithstanding an high esteem of each others Parts and Conduct; for the name of Annibal had been famous amongst the Romans, even before the destruction of Saguntum; and Annibal could not but believe Scipio to be some excellent Person, if it were for no other reason but this, That he above all others, was chosen out to be Commander in Chief against him; and that which further encreased their mutual value of each other, was, That Scipio on the one side who was left behind in France, should be here ready to encounter Annibal as soon as he came into Italy; and on the other side, That Annibal should not only have the Courage to attempt, but the Fortune to accomplish so daring an Expedition over the Alps. However, Scipio to prevent the Enemy from crossing the Po before him, removed his Quarters to the River Ticinus, and to hearten on his Soldiers before he fought, made an Oration to them to this effect.

"If I were now to lead the same Army into the Field which I had with me in France, I would spare my pains of speaking to you. For what need would there be of encouraging Rhetorick, either to that Cavalry which so gallantly routed the Enemies Troops on the Banks of the Rhone? or to those Legions with whom I pursued this very Enemy, whose Retreat and declining to come to a Battel, I took to be an acknowledgment of our Victory? But since that Army as it was levied for Spain, does still under my Command, but the immediate Conduct of my Brother Cn. Scipio, continue there, where the Senate and People of Rome have thought fit to employ them; That you might have a Consul for your General against Annibal and his Carthaginians; I have of my own free will offered my self to this Service. Being therefore a new Commander to you, and you new Soldiers to me, I think it not amiss to express my self in a few words to you all, that ye may not be ignorant what kind of War you are engaged in, nor of the quality of the Enemy. You are, Gentlemen! to fight with a parcel of People, whom already in the former War you have Routed and Defeated both by Sea and Land; a People, that for these twenty Years have been your Tributaries, and from whom you conquered Sicily and Sardinia, and hold them to this day by the Law of Arms, as the just Rewards of your Valour, and Trophies of your Victories. Therefore I doubt not, but in this Dispute both you and they will be no otherwise affected than as Conquerors, and Persons crush'd and vanquish'd are wont to be, when they meet together; nor is it their Courage, but their Necessity that brings them on now to Fight, unless you can believe that those who durst not venture an Engagement whilst their Army was sound and entire, should be so wonderfully encouraged by the loss of two parts both of their Horse and Foot in their passage through the Alps (for more are perish'd there, than remain alive) as now to have greater confidence in themselves than then? But some may say, Though indeed they are but few in number, yet they are valiant and brave, of courageous Minds and able Bodies, such Men for strength and stoutness, as scarce any force in the World can stand before them. Yes verily! the clean contrary way: For in truth, they are but mere shadows of Men, pinch'd with hunger, half starv'd with cold, lost for want of keeping, almost choak'd and eaten up with nastiness and Vermin, bruised and weakened between Cliffs and Rocks; besides, their Limbs are benum'd and useless, their Joints stiff with cold, all parts of their Bodies chilled with Frost and Snow, their Arms battered, broken and spoil'd, their Horses lame, and such lamentable poor Jades as they can hardly rise alone. These are the Horse-men, these the Foot you are to encounter with, not worthy to be called an Enemy, but only the Enemies last Relicks, the Skeleton of a Carthaginian Army: Nor is there any thing I am so much afraid of, as lest the Alps should rob you of the honor of the Victory, and the World ascribe Annibal's overthrow to those Mountains, as if they had utterly defeated him before ever you came up to Charge him: But perhaps it was most just and proper they should not fall by Humane Hands, who had already proclaimed Wars against the Powers Divine; That the Gods themselves should chastise a General and People that had so impudently violated their Faith and Solemn Leagues, and leave us (who were injured but in the second place) only the glory of finishing what they have so fairly begun to our hands.

"I cannot apprehend that any man here should suspect that I speak thus magnificently only to encourage you, whilst in my own Breast I have other Sentiments; for without the least dishonor I might have gone into Spain, my peculiar Province (where I was before with my Army) and where I might have had my Brother both an Assistant in Counsels, and sharer in all Dangers, and Asdrubal for an Enemy rather than Annibal, and the brunt of the War undoubtedly more easie than could be expected here; yet as I sail'd by the Coasts of France, upon the report of this Enemy I presently Landed, dispatch'd away my Cavalry to find them out, and advanc'd with my whole Army as far as the Rhone: 'Tis true, I had only an opportunity to engage them with a Body of Horse, and therein I clearly defeated them: As for their Foot, they getting away in an hurry, more like a Flight than a March, not being able to overtake them by Land, returning to my Ships, with as much Expedition as was possible (considering what a compass I was to fetch by Sea and Land) I was again in the Teeth of him at the foot of the Alps. Can it then be thought that I declin'd fighting with this Enemy who is (forsooth) so formidable? and now stumbled upon them unawares? Or rather is it not most evident, that I have pursued him at the heels, and provok'd and dar'd him in a fair Field to decide the Controversie? For the truth is, I have a mighty mind to try, Whether now of a sudden within these last twenty Years, the Earth hath spawn'd Carthaginians of better mettle than their Ancestors? Or whether they be not of the very same Stamp with those whom we cut to pieces at the Agatian Isles, and whom you sold at Erix for eighteen Stivers an Head? Whether this Annibal be (as he pretends) a second Hercules, and one that emulates the Glories of that mighty Champions Adventures? Or a Fellow left by his Father a Tributary Vassal of the People of Rome? A Person, who if the barbarous wickedness he has committed at Saguntum did not make him desperate, would have some regard to his Native Country once already Conquered, or at least to his own House and Family, and that Treaty and League which remains written with his Father Amilcar's own hand, who at the Command of our Consul was glad to abandon Eryx, and though fretting and vex'd at heart, durst not refuse those severe Laws and Conditions of Peace imposed upon his vanquish'd Carthaginians, and who tamely yielded both to quit Sicily, and pay Tribute to the People of Rome. Therefore would I have you, Gentlemen Soldiers! Fight with him not only with that Gallantry and Courage as you shew against other Enemies, but with as much Rage and Indignation as if you were to chastise your Slaves taking Arms in Rebellion against you. We might, had we been so minded, when they were shut up at Eryx, have destroyed them with the greatest of all humane Tortures, Famine; we might have sail'd with our Victorious Armado to Africk, and in few days space, without any opposition considerable, have razed their proud Carthage, and level'd her Walls with the dust: But we pardon'd them upon their humble Submissions, and took them to mercy; we gave them Liberty, when we had them fast and they had no way to escape; nay, when we could have treated them as conquered Slaves, we condescended to make a League with them, and accepted them as Allies whom we might have made our Subjects: And when afterwards they were distressed in the African War, we regarded them as under our care and protection. In requital for all these Kindnesses, they come now under the Conduct of a rash hair-brain'd young Man, to invade and ruine our Country. I wish we were to dispute only for Honor and Glory, and not for our Safety and our Lives; but the truth is, we are not now to fight (as formerly) for the Possession of Sicily and Sardinia, but for Italy it self, and all that is dear to us: If we do not overcome the Enemy, we have no Army in reserve to encounter or resist them, nor are there any more Alps to obstruct their March whilst we raise new Forces. Here, Gentlemen! it concerns you to stand to't as stoutly as if you were to fight them under the very Walls of Rome: Let every one of you therefore consider, That he is this day not only to defend himself, but his Wife and little Ones also by the Gallantry of his Arms; nay further, besides all his private Domestical Interest and Concerns, let him continually call to mind, That the Eyes of all the Senate and whole People of Rome are at this instant fix'd upon us; and as our Behaviour and Courage shall be at this Juncture, such for the future will be the State and Fortune of that City, and all the Roman Empire.

XLI.

Thus did the Consul Harangue his Romans. But Annibal supposing it best to raise his Mens Spirits by some martial Representation and daring Deeds, before he began to encourage them with Words, drawing up his Army in a Ring, set in the middle the Mountaineers that he had taken Prisoners, bound as they were in Chains, and flinging before them such Arms as they were wont to use, demanded of them by an Interpreter, Which of them, upon condition he might have his Liberty, and a good Horse and Arms given him if he prov'd the Conqueror, would be willing to play a Prize at Sharps, and fight for his Life? whereupon they all cry'd out, They would wish no greater favor; and each of them, whilst the Lots were drawing, prayed heartily, it might fall to his share to be one of the Combatants: accordingly as every one happened to be drawn out by the Lot, he would leap for joy amongst his

Comrades

Comrades (who congratulated, and at the same time envied his good Fortune) and dancing after their Country fashion, hastily snatch'd up the Arms and prepared for the Conflict; and all the while they were fighting, such an Heroick temper of mind appeared, not only amongst those poor Wretches that were the Actors of this Traggy-Comedy, but even in the Spectators, as cryed up and applauded those that dyed gallantly, no less than those that were Victorious.

After he had thus entertain'd them with several couples one slaughtering the other, he dismiss'd the rest, and then drawing up his Soldiers to an Audience, is said to have made the following Speech at the Head of them.

"If you shall but retain anon the same generous Courage and greatness of Mind in the consideration of your own Fortune, which but now you shew'd in beholding this Example of other Mens, I dare boldly, Fellow-Soldiers! affirm, That we have already got the Victory: For this was not merely a dumb shew to divert you, but an emblem to admonish you, a clear mirror that represents your own present state and condition; nay I know not, whether Fortune has not encompass'd us with worse Chains, and greater necessities than our Prisoners: On both hands you are enclosed between two Seas, without so much as one Ship to render your Escape possible; just before you is the Po, a greater River and more violent than the Rhone; behind you are the Alps, which even when you were fresh and lusty you could scarce get over: So that in short, Gentlemen! here you must resolve, as soon as you look the Enemy in the face, either to Conquer or Dye, and the same Fortune which imposes this necessity of Fighting, does propose to you, if you get the day, such Rewards, as Men cannot wish any more great or glorious, from the Immortal Gods; If we were only to recover by our Valor Sicily and Sardinia, taken from our Ancestors, it were a sufficient Prize, and enough to encourage us to daring Endeavors; but now not only those Islands, but whatever else the Romans in so many Triumphs have won and heaped up together, whatever they enjoy or possess, shall, together with the Owners, All be entirely ours. Go on then, o'th' Gods name, and take Arms in assured hope of so rich and inestimable a Booty: You have spent time enough in Forraging a few sorry Cattel on the vast Mountains of Portugal and Aragon, yet have you met with no recompence suitable to your many toilsom Labors and desperate Hazards. The time is now come that shall make you all amends, and abundantly satisfy your pains and tedious march over so many Mountains and Rivers, and through so many Warlike Nations, all standing on their Guard; here is the place which Fortune designs to make the utmost limit of your wandering and toil; here will the Crown all your past Services with ample Rewards.

"Fancy not that because this War looks big, and is much talk'd of, therefore it must needs be a difficult thing to get the Victory; for, alas, many times both a slighted contemptible Enemy has given a bloody blow, and Nations and Kings of mighty Renown, have with ease in a moment been vanquish'd: Set but aside this glittering splendor of the Roman Name, and what is there wherein they may in any respect be comparable to you? To say nothing of your continual Warfare for Twenty years together, with such wonderful Courage and equal Success; it will be enough to remind you, That from Hercules's Pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmost bounds of the Earth, through so many fierce and most Warlike Nations, both of Spain and France, you are come thus far with a constant train of Victories, and now you are to engage with a raw new-raised Army, that this very Summer has been slaughtered, routed, and hemm'd in by the Gauls, a parcel of fresh-water Soldiers, as yet mere strangers to their General, and he as little acquainted with them. Ought I, who was almost born, at least altogether Educated in the Tent of my Father, the most renowned Warrior and ablest Commander of his Age; I who have subdued both Spain and France, and overcome not only the Alpine Nations, but, which is much more, have mastered the very Alps themselves; ought I to be put in ballance with this upstart Captain of half a years standing, a Deserter of his own proper Army, and who, if one should this day show him the Carthaginians and Romans without their respective Banners and Colours, would not, I am confident, be able to tell which Party he was Consul of: But this is that, Fellow Soldiers! which I am not a little proud of, That there is not one of you, but has with your Eyes beheld me perform some brave Military Exploit or other, and of whose Valor I have not been a Spectator and Witness, and can my self reckon up the very time and place where each of you achieved some signal Honor, and those whom I have a Thousand times applauded and rewarded: In a word, I that have been the Pupil of you all, and train'd up by you in the Art of War, before ever I came to be your General, am Marching into the Field against an heap of Men that know not, and are unknown to one another.

Which way soever I cast my Eyes, I behold you, methinks, all full of Gallantry, Courage and Strength; The Infantry, old experienced Soldiers; The Cavalry, Whether those mounted on the brave stout manag'd Horses of France and Spain, or the light Barbs of Africk, whom their nimble Riders can govern without a bridle, are all choice Men, and of the most Generous Nations; you, Gentlemen, that are our Allies and Copartners in Glory, I know to be most Faithful, and no less Valiant; and as for you, my stout Carthaginians, you are under a double Obligation to acquit your selves like Men, as well for the sake of your dear Native Country, as out of just hatred and revenge: We have begun the War, and descended with Banners displayed into Italy; it becomes us therefore to fight so much the more resolutely, and with greater Courage, as those commonly who are Assailants come on with braver hopes and brisker spirits than the Defendants: Besides, you have the resentments of Grief, and Injury, and Indignation, to spur you on against this insolent Enemy, who had the impudence to Demand, first me, your General, and afterwards all you that were at the Siege of Saguntum, to be delivered up (forsooth) into their hands as Slaves, and executed with the extreamest Tortures. A Nation excessive Cruel, and so intolerably Proud and Ambitious, that they count all things their own, and the Affairs of the whole Earth to be managed as they list; They will prescribe with whom we shall have War, and with whom we may make Peace, and the Terms and Conditions of Both; They will needs restrain us, and limit our Empire to such and such Hills and Rivers, beyond which we must not budge on pain of their high Displeasure; but in the mean time they themselves know no Bounds, nor will observe nor to hold any Capitulations. Presume not (say they) to pass the Iberus, meddle not with Saguntum at your peril; Saguntum stands on the River Iberus, stir not one step forward we charge you. They are not content with the Injustice of taking away our Antient Provinces, Sicily and Sardinia, unless they may ravish Spain too out of our hands: And should I abandon that Realm, they would no doubt straight pass over and invade Africk, they would do, I say; nay, they have already constituted the two Consuls of this present Year, one to be over Spain, and the other over Africk, so that nothing have they left us but what we can win and hold by the Swords point. They may be faint-hearted and think of running away, who have some place of refuge to retire to, who can when they fly, get safe by easie and peaceable Passages into their own Territories, and be sheltered in their own Country: But as for you, there is a necessity you should play the Men, having not the least prospect of security but in your own incomparable Valor, and therefore making no account of any Mediums between Victory and Death, on certain despair of all shifts besides, must resolve either to overcome, or if Fortune should deny you that Honor, to fall bravely in the Battel, rather than basely in the Rout, and to dye Fighting rather than be kill'd Flying: If this be but deeply imprinted and fix'd on all your Hearts, if this be your general Resolution, I will repeat it once again, The day is yours. Never did the Immortal Gods give any Mortals a more pointant incitement to Victory.

XLV. The spirits of the Soldiers on both sides being by these Orations enflam'd to fight, the Romans made a Bridge over the River Ticinus, and to secure the Bridge erected a Fort. Whilst they were busie at that work, the Enemy sent out Maharbal with a party of Five hundred Numidian Horse to forrage the Territories of the Romans Allies, but with particular Orders to spare the Gauls as much as he could, and withal to solicit their Chiefs to a Revolt. The Bridge finish'd, the Roman Army march'd over into the Insubrians Country, and Encamped within five miles of Dimoli, a Village where Annibal had his Head-Quarters, who dispatch'd Orders instantly to recal Maharbal and his Horse, perceiving there was a Battel towards; and thinking he could never enough hearten on and encourage his Men, assembled them again to an Audience, where he publicly propos'd to them the following Rewards if they would act gallantly and win the Day; viz. That he would endow every Man of them with fair Lands, either in Italy, Africk, or Spain, as each of them should chuse, to remain free to them and their Heirs; or if any would rather have a present sum of money, than Land, he would content him with Silver; such of the Allies as desired it, should be made Free Denizens of Carthage, and for such as should rather chuse to return home, he would be so kind to them, as they should not wish to exchange Fortunes with the best of their Country-men. Furthermore, to all servants attending their Masters, he promised to set them Free, and give their Masters two slaves in lieu of each of them. And for their assurance that all this should be accomplish'd and made good, holding a Lamb in his Left hand, and a great Flint-stone in his Right, he solemnly wish'd and pray'd, That if he fail'd in any point, Jove and the rest of the Gods might so destroy him, as he there kill'd that Lamb, and presently with the Stone dash'd out its brains: Then all fancying the Gods to be engaged on their side, full of hopes, and counting every moments delay to be but so much a deferring of their Victory, with unanimous Shouts and Acclamations they cry'd out for a Battel.

XLVI. The Romans for their part were nothing so jolly, for besides other Discouragements, they were terrified with some late Prodiges; as that a Wolf had come into their Camp, and after it had worried those that stood in its way, made its escape unhurt; and a swarm of Bees settled on a Tree that was just over the Generals Pavilion. Which ominous Tokens being expiated by Sacrifices, Scipio with his Cavalry and light Darters, advanc'd towards the Enemies Camp, where whilst they were near hand viewing their Forces, how many, and of what condition they might be, Annibal being abroad on a like Design with his Horse, happened to encounter them; at first they saw not each other, but the Clouds of Dust raised by the March of so many Horse and Men, gave each Party notice of the Enemies approach; whereupon both made an Halt and prepared for an Engagement. Scipio planted his Archers and French Horse in the Fore-front, the Romans and stoutest of the Allies for Reserves. Annibals main Body consisted of great Barbed Horse, and the fleet Numidians on either Wing: But on the first Charge the Roman Archers retired back unto the second Battalions amongst the Rere-guard, by means whereof the Horse alone fought a good while sharply, and with equal success, but by and by their Horses being disordered by the Foot-men, intermingled amongst them, and many of the Troopers either thrown off, or forced to alight from their Horses to assist such of their Fellows as they saw environed and overmatch'd; the Conflict in most places seem'd very doubtful, until the Numidians that were on the Wings, having wheel'd about at some distance, appeared on the Rear: That sight perfectly dismayed the Romans, whose Consternation was encreased by their Generals being wounded, who not without great difficulty was rescued and carry'd off by his Son, though then but a mere Lad, and in his first Apprentiship of Arms, but the very same for whom Fate had reserv'd the Glory of finishing this War, and who was afterwards surnamed Africanus, for his signal and absolute Victories over Annibal and the Carthaginians. However, the greatest Defeat was of the Archers, whom the Numidians first attack'd: The rest of the Horse-men, in close order, having receiv'd their Consul into the midst of their Squadron, protected him not only with their Arms, but their Bodies, and with a Retreat neither timorous nor disorderly, conveyed him to the Camp. The Historian Cælius gives the Honor of the Consuls preservation, to a certain Bond-slave Native of Liguria: But I would rather attribute it to his own Son, which most Authors affirm, and the same has obtain'd the suffrage of Common Fame.

This was the first Encounter with Annibal, by which it easily appear'd, both that the XLVII. Punicks were superior in Cavalry, and also that for that reason the Champion Countries, such as are those between the Po and the Alps, were not a fit Seat for the Romans to manage this War in. The Night following therefore, Scipio, having ordered his Men silently to pack up their Baggage, dislodg'd from the River Ticinus, and hastened to the Po, that over the Bridge of Boats he had laid cross that River, before it was broken down, he might without danger from the Enemies pursuit, re-convey his Army back again. They were got to Placentia before Annibal was certainly informed of their remove; however, he took Prisoners about Six hundred that staid behind, and were too long on the hithermost Bank a breaking down the Bridge, which he was not able to pass, because being once loosned at both ends, 'twas carry'd down and dispersed by the violence of the Current. Cælius relates, That Mago with the Cavalry and Spanish Foot, presently swam over the River, and that Annibal forded over the rest of his Army at certain shallows above, having set his Elephants in the Water higher, to break the force of the Stream. But this they that are acquainted with the River will hardly believe, for though we grant the Spaniards, after their fashion, could get over on their Bottles, yet 'tis not probable that the Cavalry in their Arms could with safety swim through so strong a Current; and besides for the rest, it would have taken up too many days time to have march'd about to find out Fordable places in the Po, where so great an Army and all their Baggage could be got over: I rather agree with those Authors who say, That they were two days before they could find a fit place to make a Bridge of Planks joyned together, on which Mago and the Spanish Light-Horsemen were sent away in pursuit of the Enemy; and that whilst Annibal staid on that side busie in getting over his Foot and Carriages, he gave Audience to the Gauls Ambassadors, and within few days Encamped within six miles of Placentia, where the next day he drew up into the Field and offered them Battel.

The Night following the Romans sustained some loss in their own Camp, but the hurry XLVIII. and tumult was greater than the real harm; about Two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse of the Gallick Auxiliaries, cutting to pieces the Guard at the Ports, fled away to Annibal, by whom they were courteously entertain'd, and with promises of large Rewards, dismissed every one to his own Town, to sollicite and engage their Country-men in his Favor. Scipio suspecting this to be but an earnest of the Gauls revolt in general, and that they having hereby rendred themselves obnoxious, would all madly take Arms, though his late Wounds were yet very sore, did at the relief of the fourth Watch, the next Night Dislodge with great silence, and drew his Army towards the River Trebia, upon higher ground, and amongst Hills not so accessible for Horse: But here he came not off so cleverly without the Enemies notice as he did at Ticinus; for Annibal sending out first his Numidians, and afterwards the rest of his Cavalry, had undoubtedly slain very foul upon their Rear, had not the Numidians, for lucre of Booty, turn'd out of their way to rifle the abandoned Camp; where, whilst they spent time in rummaging every corner, without any Pillage that might make amends for that delay, the Romans got out of their reach, being already pass'd the Trebia, and pitching their Tents on the other side; only some straglers and loiterers they overtook and put to the Sword on the Rivers side. Scipio not able any longer to endure the pain of his wound, jolted with Travelling, and also thinking it prudent to wait the coming up of his Colleague (for he had advice, that he was recalled from Sicily) chose out the safest place he could find by the River to Encamp on, and strongly fortified it. Annibal having also sat down with his Army not far from thence, was not more elevated with his success in the late Horse-conflict, than troubled with Scarcity, which began to press him more sorely every day than other, as he march'd through an Enemies Country where no provision was to be had: Understanding therefore that the Romans had got together and laid up great store of Grain, at a Town called Clafidium, dispatch'd a Party thither, who making ready to attack the place, had an Overture of a Surrender, and at no great price; for Dafius Brundifinus the Governor, corrupted with Four hundred pieces of Gold, yielded up the Garrison to Annibal, which serv'd the Carthaginians as a Granary all the while they Quartered at Trebia: The Prisoners taken there were very civilly treated, that in this beginning of the War he might spread the fame of his Clemency.

XLIX.

Whilft the War by Land stood thus at a stay about Trebia, several considerable Actions happened both by Land and Sea on the Coasts of Sicily, and other Islands that lye near Italy, as well before the Consul Sempronius arriv'd there, as afterwards. The Carthaginians had sent out twenty Gallies with five ranks of Oars apiece, and a Thousand Soldiers well armed to plunder the Sea-coasts of Italy; nine of them came to the Island Liparae, eight to Vulcaus, and three by stress of weather were driven into the Streights of Sicily, and being there discovered from Messina, Hiero King of the Syracusans, who by chance was there at that time attending the Roman Consuls arrival, sent forth twelve Ships against them; nor did they, being so over-powered, offer to make any resistance, but suffered themselves to be boarded and carry'd away into the Haven of Messina. The Prisoners gave an account, That besides that Fleet of twenty Sail, whereof they were part, bound for Italy, there was another Navy of Five and thirty Gallies designed for Sicily, to sollicite the old Allies there to revolt, and particularly to seize upon the City and Promontory of Lilybaeum; and that they believed the same Storm which dissipated their own Fleet, had cast these others upon the Island Aegates. All this Information the King, by an Express from Messina, communicates to Emilius the Prætor, who had charge of the Province of Sicily, and advises him to secure Lilybaeum with a strong Garrison. Whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels that were with the Prætor, were presently dispatch'd to the several Cities of that Province to take care, that lusty Guards be kept, and above all that Lilybaeum be held in a good posture of defence: He likewise issued a Proclamation, That the Allies bordering on the Sea-coasts should bring aboard ten days Provision ready dress'd; and that all the Mariners and Soldiers be in readiness to go on board at an hours warning, and that the Inhabitants along the Coasts should keep watch, and from their Watch-Towers and Beacons, discover and give immediate notice if any Enemy appeared. So that although the Carthaginians purposely slackned their Course that they might come up to Lilybaeum but a little before break of Day, yet they were perceiv'd at a distance, both because the Moon then shone all Night, and they came with Sails hoisted up. Notice being given from the Watch-Towers, the Town immediatly took the Alarm, and all the Ships in the Port are mann'd, the Soldiers being divided, some to go aboard, and others to guard the Walls and Gates. The Carthaginians perceiving their Design was smok'd, and that they were not like to catch them napping, kept without the Haven until the Morning, spending the time in taking down their Sails and preparing for an Engagement: When it was now broad day-light, they stood out further to Sea, that they might have room to fight, and the Enemy have free egress with their Ships out of Port; nor did the Romans decline to follow them, encouraged both with the remembrance of the success they had formerly in that very place, and confiding in the number and courage of their Soldiers.

I.

No sooner were they out at Sea, but it plainly appeared that the Romans were desirous to grapple and come to a close Fight; on the contrary the Carthaginians held off aloof, willing to manage their business by Art and sleight rather than down-right Force, and to make trial of the goodness and agility of Ships, more than of the strength of their Armor, or valor of their Men: For as their Fleet was sufficiently supplied and furnish'd by their Allies with Mariners, so they were but thin of Soldiers, and wheresoever the Romans could get to grapple with and board any of them, they had not Men at Arms enough to resist them; which being once perceived, both the Romans gathered heart by reason of their advantage in numbers, and the others were no less discouraged by their paucity. In short time seven Punic Ships were hemm'd in and taken, and in them One thousand seven hundred Sea-men and Soldiers, amongst whom were three Carthaginian Noblemen, the rest of their Fleet made their escape: The Roman Navy returned safe and intire into the Haven, having only one Ship shattered, which yet they made shift to get home with the rest. About the time of this Engagement, and before the same was known at Messina, the Consul Sempronius arriv'd there, and as he entred within the Sound, King Hiero met him with a gallant Navy richly gilt and adorned; and passing out of his Royal Ship, went aboard the

Consuls,

Consuls, and Complemented him upon his happy Voyage, bidding him welcome to Sicily, and wishing him good success; then gave him an account of the present state of the Island, and designs of the Carthaginians against it, withal assuring him, That as heretofore, when but a Youth, he assisted the People of Rome in the former War, so with no less good will and resolution would he serve them now in his Age, by accommodating the Consuls Legions, and also the Mariners of the Allies employed in the Fleet with sufficient Cloaths and Provisions of all sorts gratis: telling him further, That Lilybaeum, and other Maritime Towns, were in very great danger, there being some seditious Spirits amongst them that were banking after alterations, and willing to change their Masters. Therefore the Consul resolv'd to Sail to rights to Lilybaeum, and the King with his Navy Royal accompanied him; but in their Voyage received Intelligence of the afore-mentioned Engagement in those parts, and how the Enemies Fleet was scattered, and all their Ships either put to flight or taken.

At Lilybaeum the Consul dismissed King Hiero and his Fleet, and leaving the Prætor to guard the Coast of Sicily, he himself crossed the Sea to Malta, then in the hands of the Carthaginians. And upon his arrival, the Governor, Amilcar the Son of Gisco rendered up himself, and near upon Two thousand Soldiers together, with the Town and whole Island; from whence, within few days, the Consul returned to Lilybaeum, and sold all the Prisoners (except those that were of eminent Quality) for Bond-slaves. Having thus sufficiently secured Sicily on that side, he sail'd to the Isle Vulcano, where part of the Enemies Fleet was reported to ride at Anchor, but could meet with none there; for it happened, they were already gone over to walt the Coast of Italy, and having foraged as far as the Territories of Vibo, gave Rome it self no small Alarm: whereof the Consul upon his return to Sicily, having notice, and withal Letters from the Senate of the descent of Annibal into Italy, commanding him therefore, with all expedition to repair to his Colleagues assistance; In great perplexity having so many Irons at once in the fire, he Embark'd his Army, and sent them by the Adriatick Sea to Rimini, ordered his Lieutenant Sex. Pomponius, with Five and twenty long Ships, to secure the Lands of Vibo, and the rest of the Sea-coasts of Italy. With Emilius the Prætor he left a Fleet of Fifty Sail to guard Sicily; and after he had settled the Affairs of that Island, he himself, with ten Ships, Coasting along Italy, arrived at Rimini, whence marching his Army to the River Trebia, he joined his Colleague.

Now were both the Consuls, and all the strength the Romans could make, opposed against Annibal: The Roman Empire must be defended with these Forces, or else all their hopes were gone; yet one of the Consuls discouraged with the late defeat of his Horse, and his own wound, was desirous to defer engaging; but the other coming fresh, and so much the more fierce, would endure no delay. The Country between the Trebia and the Po, was then inhabited by the Gauls, who in the Contest between these two mighty Nations, contain'd themselves in a kind of Neutral posture, making full account of the good will of that Party which should have the better; with this the Romans were well enough content as long as they attempted nothing against them; but Annibal resented it very ill, often saying, That he was invited thither by the Gauls, to restore them to their Liberties. In this angry mood, and to relieve his Men with Plunder, he sent out a Detachment of Two thousand Foot and a thousand Horse, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls intermix'd, to Forrage all those parts as far as the Banks of Po. The Gauls that before were wavering and indifferent, found themselves obliged now wholly to turn from those that offered them these Injuries, and join with those that might protect them: Whereupon they sent Agents to the Consuls, imploring the Romans to assist a Region, which merely for its Inhabitants fidelity to them, was wasted and harassed. Cornelius liked neither the Cause, nor thought the present Juncture fit to enter into any such Treaty, for he thought he had reason to suspect the sincerity of that Nation, as well for many other treacherous Pranks, as especially (to pass by former Disloyalties) for the late perfidious Revolt of the Bœii. Sempronius on the contrary, was of opinion, That there could not be a greater Obligation to retain the Friendship of the rest of their Allies, than to see those defended who first openly declared themselves on their side. And whilft his Colleague demurr'd upon the matter, sent his Horse, with near a Thousand Archers cross the Trebia, to defend the Gallick Territories, who falling upon the Enemy there as they were straggling and disordered, and besides most of them over-loaded with Plunder and suspecting no such matter, put them into a terrible Consternation, cut abundance of them to pieces, and pursued the rest home to the Out-Guards of their Camp, whence being repulsed by multitudes that issued forth, they were again re-inforced with fresh Parties from their own Army, and renew'd the Battle, which though, upon the whole matter it was very dubious, and neither side had much to brag of; yet Fame attributed the Victory to the Romans, rather than to the Enemy.

But no Man made so great a matter on't as the Consul Sempronius, who seem'd overjoy'd, and boasted, That with the very same part of the Forces (to wit the Cavalry) which under the other Consul lost the day, he had been Victorious; That the Soldiers were now sufficiently refresh'd, nor was there any one that desired to delay fighting, save only his Colleague, who (he thought) was more weak in his mind than his body, and with the thoughts of his late Wound, would henceforth, as long as he liv'd, never brook pitch'd Fields and the sight of Weapons; but 'twas not fit to sit still and grow old in their Camp without action, merely to humor one crazy Person; for to what purpose was this lingering and spinning out of time? Was there any third Consul coming up, any other Army to be expected? That they must remember the Carthaginians were now in Italy, almost within sight of the City, and that they came not now to recover Sicily and Sardinia, heretofore taken from them when they were welfavour'dly beaten, nor to possess themselves of that part of Spain which lies on this side the River Iberus, but utterly to drive the Romans out of their Native Soil, and that dear Land wherein they were born and bred: How will (quoth he) our brave Fathers, that were wont to wage War round about the Walls of Carthage, sigh and mourn if they shall see us their degenerate Off-spring, two Consuls with our compleat Armies, lie trembling within our Trenches in the midst of Italy? and the Carthaginians already to have added to their Dominions, all the whole Country between the Alps and the Appenine Hills. At this rate he continually talk'd when he came to visit his wounded Colleague, and abroad in his own Pavilion, almost publickly to all the Soldiers. That which the more spur'd him on, was, because the Election-days drew nigh, and he was afraid lest the War should be devolv'd to the new Consuls, and besides, was greedy to lay hold of this opportunity whilst his Colleague was indisposed, to grasp the whole honor of the Victory to himself alone; therefore commands the Soldiers to prepare for a Battel, Cornelius in vain opposing it. Annibal was quick-sighted enough to discern what was most for the Enemies advantage, and therefore could scarce hope that the Consuls would attempt any thing rashly or improvidently. But when first by Report, and afterwards by Experience, he found that one of them was naturally of a temper hot and furious, believing that he might be grown yet more fierce and self-conceited, by being puffed up with his late imaginary Victory over his Forragers, did not despair of a fit opportunity to do his business; and was very intent and solicitous to lose no time, whilst the Enemies Soldiers were yet but raw and unexperienced, the ablest of their Generals disabled by his hurt; and whilst the spirits of his French Auxiliaries were up and brisk, of whom he had a great multitude, whom he knew would still grow more faint and less servicable, as they were drawn further off from home. For these and the like Reasons, whilst Annibal was wishing for a speedy Battel, and desirous to provoke them to it rather than fail, he had advice by his Gallick Scouts (who could with more safety perform that Office, because those of that Nation serv'd in both Armies) That the Romans had made ready for an Engagement: Whereupon, with all speed, the crafty Carthaginian began to view the Ground all about for a fit place for an Ambuscade.

LIV.

The River ran in the middle between the two Armies, with very high Banks, and there abundance of Sedge and Weeds growing, as also Bushes and Brush-wood, as such uncultivated places are wont to be over-grown with, which Annibal himself in Person having taken a view of by riding round it, and finding the same was thick and high enough to cover Horse as well as Foot: This, quoth he to his Brother Mago, is the Spot where you shall be posted: Go chuse you an hundred of the stoutest Men you can find in all the Cavalry, and as many more out of the Infantry, and bring them to me at the first Watch in the Evening; in the interim let them refresh themselves: So the grand Officers that attended about the Generals Tent, were for the present dismissed. At the time appointed, Mago brought his selected Men: I see (saith Annibal) you are all gallant Men, but that you may be as strong in number as courage, let each of you chuse out of the several Troops and Bands, nine more like himself: Mago will Conduct you to the place where you shall lie perdue, and I dare assure you, that you shall find the Enemy as blind as Beetles in these stratagems of War. Mago having taken charge of these thousand Horse and thousand Foot, Annibal at break of day orders the Numidian Horse to pass the River Trebia, and to ride up and brave the Enemy at their Ports, and by Darting upon their Out-guards to provoke them to a Battel, but with directions, after some Skirmishing, to retreat leisurely, and by degrees train them down towards the River. These were his Orders to the Numidians. The rest of the Officers, both Horse and Foot, he commanded to let all their Men first take their Dinner, and then arm'd and mounted to expect the Signal. Sempronius upon the Alarm raised by the Numidians, drew out first all his Cavalry, being very confident on that part of his Forces, afterwards Six thousand Foot, and in fine, all his whole Army to a place which he had before designed in his mind, being extreme eager of Fighting. It happened to be Winter time, and snowy weather in those places between the Alps and Appenine Mountains, the sharp cold of which was increased by the neighboring Rivers, Lakes and Moors. His Horse and Men being hastily drawn out thither, having not first eaten any thing, nor been baited, nor any Provision made against the cold, had scarce any heat left in them; and as they approached nearer the vapors of the River, the more the chill Air pierced them. But when pursuing the retreating Numidians, they were forc'd to wade through the Water (and being swell'd with a shower over night, it was then Breast-high) as soon as they came out again, their whole Bodies seemed congealed, and so stiff, that they were scarce able to hold their Weapons, and also the day being now far spent, began to faint for hunger.

But

But Annibals Soldiers, who had rousing Fires made before their Tents, and quantities of LV. Oyl distributed amongst every Company to annoint and supple their Limbs, and keep out the cold, and also had eat lustily and at leisure; as soon as notice came that the Enemy was pass'd the River, cheerfully, and with Bodies as vigorous as their Minds, betook them to their Arms and drew up in Battalia. The Slingers and light-arm'd Men, making up about Eight thousand, he placed in the Front before the Standards, then the Foot that were better Arm'd, even the main strength and flower of his Army. In the Wings he bestowed Ten thousand Horse, and on the outside of each Wing set the Elephants equally divided.

The Consul finding his Horse as they were in their full career upon the pursuit, to be unexpectedly Charg'd by the Numidians, making head against them, founded a Retreat, and received them in amongst the Body of his Foot. He had with him Eighteen thousand Romans, Twenty thousand of the Allies, and some Auxiliaries of the Cenomani, the only Gallick Clan that continued faithful and firm to the Roman Interest; with these Forces on both sides they engaged. The Fight was began by the Slingers, but they not being able to sustain the Charge of the Roman Legions, were with the rest of the Light-arm'd Infantry soon drawn off to the Wings, whereby the Roman Horse were much over-powered and distressed; for as they were but Four thousand in number, and consequently of themselves scarce able to cope with Ten thousand Horse of the Enemy, so they were already tired out with Service in the former part of the day, whereas most of Annibals were fresh; under which disadvantages, and especially being now over-whelm'd with a storm of Stones and Darts cast upon them by these Balearian Slingers and Archers, the Roman Horse were not able to bear up; moreover, the Elephants that appeared on the Extremities of the Wings, wonderfully frighted their Horses, not only with their strange shape, but also with an uncouth smell, and made them, do what their Riders could, run away in disorder. The Battel between the Infantry was carry'd on with equal Courage and Stoutness of mind, but not with a like strength of Body, which the Punicks brought with them into the Field, having just before refresh'd themselves; but on the other side, the Romans Bodies were fasting, and weary, and benumm'd with cold, yet merely by their natural Valour they would have made good the Field, if they had only been engaged with Foot: But the Slingers, after they had routed the Roman Horse, charged the Infantry on both Flanks, and the Elephants broke into the very middle of them. And withal, Mago and his Party (as soon as the Roman Army was improvidently pass'd by their place of Ambuscade) fiercely Charged them in the Rear, and put them into great Conternation. Yet amidst all these fatal Circumstances, their Main-Body stood a good while firm and immoveable, and especially (beyond all expectation) against the Elephants; for certain Light-harness-men, appointed for that purpose, did so pelt them with their casting-darts, as made them turn tail, and following hard after them gall'd them under the tails (where by reason of the tenderness of the skin in that place, they are soonest wounded) and so made them run away.

These Elephants, when Annibal saw them flying back, and ready to run upon his own LVI. Men from the Main-body to the Flanks and Rear, he commanded them to be driven up to the Left Wing, and to Charge the Gallick Auxiliaries of the Romans, whom they presently disordered, and made them run like mad: This was a new discouragement to the Romans to see their Auxiliaries routed, and therefore being now surrounded on all sides, and fighting as it were in a Ring, near Ten thousand of them seeing no other means to escape, broke clean through the African Main-body (which was corroborated with Gallick Auxiliaries) not without a mighty slaughter of the Enemy: And finding they could neither return to their Camp, the River being between; nor for the Rain, well discern how to succor their Fellows, they took the way strait to Placentia: After which, there were several Irruptions made on all sides, but most of those that went towards the River, were either drown'd before they got over, or whilst they delayed to go into the Water, overtaken and cut off by the Enemy: Those that fled, here and there scattered through the Fields, lighting upon the track of the first Battalion that escaped, followed them to Placentia, some whom the fear of the Enemy had made so bold as to take the River, got safe over to their Camp. The Rain and Snow together, and intolerable severity of the cold destroyed many, both Men and Beasts, and in a manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the pursuit no further than the River Trebia, and returned into their Camp so clumsy and half-frozen, that they were scarce sensible of their Victory. And for that reason, when the Guard of the Roman Camp, and what Soldiers were left, pass'd the Trebia on Rafts the Night following, either they did not hear them for the noise of the tempestuous Rain, or else not being able to stir for weariness and wounds, made as if they knew nothing of it; so that without being molested by the Enemy, the Consul Scipio with a silent march brought his Company to Placentia, and from thence crossing the Po, pass'd to Cremona, that one Colony might be over-burdened with Quartering two Armies all Winter.

The

LXVII. The news of this Defeat caus'd such Consternation and Terror at Rome, that they already fancied the Enemy with displayed Banners was advancing up to rights to that City; nor had they any thing of hope or help to defend their Gates and Walls from the violence of his Assaults. One Consul had been worsted but a while ago at Ticinus, the other recalled from Sicily: Now both Consuls, and two compleat Consular Armies being overcome, and as good as destroyed, what other Generals, what other Legions had they to send for in this Extremity? Whilst they were under these dreadful Apprehensions, the Consul Sempronius comes to Town, having made a very hazardous Journey, by reason the Enemies Horse were continually scouring the Roads, so that he escap'd rather by good luck at a venture, than any hopes he could have either to avoid them, or to resist them, if met with. After he had held the Elections (the only thing for which he was at present wanted) he returned again to the Winter-Quarters. The Consuls chosen, were Cn. Servilius, and C. Flaminius.

But the Romans could not be at quiet even in their Winter-Quarters, being continually molested by stroling Parties of Numidian Horse, and, in Mountainous places which were troublesome for them to pass, by Troops of Celtiberians and Portuguese, as better acquainted with Hilly and steep Passages. Thus all Provisions were cut off, except what was brought in Boats down the Po. The City Placentia standing a mile and an half off that River, had a Mart, or place of stowage for Vessels, Provisions and Goods, on the River side, strongly Fortified and Garisoned. In hopes to storm it, Annibal comes with his Horse and Light-arm'd Foot, and the better to effect his purpose, march'd very privately in the Night to surprize them; but the Centinels took the Alarm in time, and set up such an Out-cry, that it was heard to Placentia; whereupon, as soon as it was Day, the Consul came up with his Horse to their Relief, having ordered his Foot to follow in Battel Array: In the mean time the Fight was managed by Horse, and Annibal happening to be wounded, the Enemy was therewith much daunted, and the place happily preserv'd. Having rested not many days, and before his Wound was thoroughly well, Annibal was abroad again, designing to take Vidulumvia, a Mart-Town which had been Fortified by the Romans during the War with the Gauls; after which it became well Inhabited, by a mix'd People out of several Nations, and at this time the fear of being Plundered, made all the Boors of the adjacent Country retire thither for shelter. This multitude (such as they were) being buoy'd up with the report how bravely the Garison near Placentia defended themselves, took Arms, and advanced forth to encounter Annibal, who met with them as they were upon their March disorderly, and not in a posture for Fighting; so that on one side there being only a raw undisciplin'd Rabble; on the other, a Captain that could rely on his Soldiers, and the Soldiers on their Captain: He, with a handful of Men, routed all this tumultuous Multitude consisting of no less than Five and thirty thousand. The next day having treated for a surrender upon Articles, they received a Garrison within their Walls; and being required to deliver up all their Arms, after they had so done, a signal is given to fall on and plunder the Town as if it had been taken by Storm. Nor was there omitted any kind of Out-rage that is wont to be Recorded by Historians on such occasions, such lamentable Examples of all manner of Cruelty and Lust, and inhumane Insolence, they practis'd upon these poor wretched People.

LXVIII. These were Annibal's Winter-Expeditions, after which, the Frosts being intolerable, he allow'd his Soldiers some short Repose; but upon the first approach of the Spring, quits his Winter-Quarters, and marches for Tuscany, to reduce that Nation too, as he had done the Gauls and Ligurians, either voluntarily or by force, to his obedience. But as he pass'd over the Apennine, so dreadful a Tempest happened, that it almost exceeded all the Calamities he met with on the Alps. The Rain, with a fierce Wind, drove full in their Teeth; at first they stood stone-still, seeing they must either lay away their Armor, or strive in vain to march with it against the Weather, whilst the violent Gusts whirling them round were ready to fling them to the Ground; but then the violence of the Weather taking away (as it were) their Breath, they sat down with their backs Wind-ward. When on a sudden the Heavens rattled with horrible peals of Thunder, and flash'd with dreadful Lightenings, so that affrighted in two Senses at once, and terrified both with their Ears and their Eyes, they became all astonish'd with fear. At length it Rain'd so fast as if it had been poured down by Pail-fulls; and withal, the Wind blew higher than before, wherefore they thought it necessary to Encamp in the very place where they were thus caught by the Tempest: But this was to begin a new Labor and Difficulty; for neither could they spread any thing for a Covering, nor fix the posts for their Tents securely; nor could what was pitch'd down abide the fury of the Wind, which rent and tore, and hurried away all before it. After a while, the falling Rain being congealed aloft over the tops of those bleak Mountains, turn'd into a storm of Hail, and came upon them with such a Force, that every one was glad to leave his Work, and clap themselves flat on the Ground groveling on their Faces, rather smothered than covered with their Tilts and Hillings. After which ensued that Night, so bitter and excessive a Frost, that there was not one of all that that miserable heap of Men and Beasts, that was able for a great while the next Morning to raise himself and get up alone, for their Sinews were so benum'd with cold, as they could scarce bend their Joints; at length, by bestirring and chafing their Limbs they got some warmth, recovered their Spirits, some few began to make Fires, and the rest got thither to thaw and recruit themselves. Thus for two days they remained there as if they had been Besieged, unable to stir. Abundance of Men and Cattel perish'd here, and seven of those few Elephants that surviv'd the Battel at Trebia.

Hereupon Annibal quits the Apennine, and returns towards Placentia, within ten miles of which he Encamped, and the next day advanc'd with Twelve thousand Foot and Five thousand Horse against the Enemy. Nor did Sempronius the Consul (for he was now come back from Rome) decline the Combat. The two Armies were that day within three miles distance of each other, next morning they fought with mighty Resolutions and various Success. At the first On-set the Romans had so much the better of it, that they did not only worst the Enemy in the Field, but pursue them home to their Entrenchments, and afterwards assaulted and endeavored to break in after them into their Camp. Annibal having Posted a few stout Men to defend the Ports and Rampart, retired the rest thick and close together into the midst of the Camp, ordering them to watch for the Signal when they should fall forth: It was now near three a clock in the After-noon, when the Romans having wearied themselves in vain, seeing there was no hopes of making themselves Masters of the Camp, sounded a Retreat: Which Annibal perceiving, and that they gave over the Assault and were marching back to their own Tents, immediately sent out his Horse on the right and left hand after them, and himself in Person with the whole strength of his Infantry, sallies out through the middle of the Camp. There has seldom been known a more bloody Fight, or wherein greater slaughter was made on both sides, than this would certainly have been, if the Day would have permitted them to dispute it longer, but Night parted the Conflict in the heat of their Courage; so that the number kill'd did not answer the fury of the Combatants, and as it was a drawn Battel, so the loss on each side was much alike, about Six hundred Foot and Three hundred Horse-men being kill'd of either Party; only the Romans loss was greater in respect of Quality than number, because some of the Order of Knights, five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies, were that day slain. After this Bout, Annibal march'd into the Ligurians Country, and Sempronius to Luca: To welcome Annibal upon his coming amongst the Ligurians, they delivered up to him Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius, two Roman Questors [Treasurers or Paymasters] whom they had surprized by an Ambuscade, together with two Colonels, and five others of the Equestrian Order, (whose Fathers were as good as Senators fellows) thereby the better to assure him, that they would keep the Peace and Alliance they had made with him firm and inviolable.

Whilst these Transactions happened in Italy, Cn. Scipio is dispatch'd with a Fleet and Army into Spain. Having set Sail from the Mouth of the Rhone, and compassed the Pyrenean Mountains, he arriv'd at a place called Emporia; where landing his Army, partly by renewing the antient Alliances, and partly by contracting new, he reduced all the Seacoasts from the Lacetanians up as far as the River Iberus, to the Roman Obedience; whereby he acquired such great Reputation for his Clemency, that it spread not only through those Provinces which bordered on the Sea, but amongst those Mountainous and fiercer Nations which dwell'd up far within Land, so that not only Peace was concluded with them, but they took Arms to assist him, and list'd several stout and able Companies for his Service. Hanno, the Enemies Governor on this side the Iberus (whom Annibal had left there to guard those Parts) was not ignorant of these Proceedings, and therefore before all was gone, and the Country wholly alienated, thought good to encounter him; and Encamping within view, drew out into the Field. Nor did the Roman judge it his Interest to defer the Dispute, for well he knew he had to do both with Hanno and Asdrubal, and were better fight them single than conjoin'd. Nor did the Battel prove very hazardous, Six thousand of the Enemy were kill'd, and Two thousand taken Prisoners, with the Guard of the Camp; for both the Camp was over-run, and he that Commanded there in Chief taken, and also the Town Sciffis which lay hard by, won by Assault, but the Plunder thereof not much worth, as being the Household-stuff of poor barbarous mean people: The Camp afforded the Soldiers better Booty, for there they got the Baggage, not only of the Army now routed, but of that too which went with Annibal into Italy, who left their choicest Goods behind them on that side the Pyrenean Mountains, that they might not be incommoded in their March.

Asdrubal, who before he had any certain Intelligence of this Over-throw, had pass'd the Iberus with Eight thousand Foot and One thousand Horse, purposing to make head against the Romans at their first arrival, upon the news of the Field and Camps being both lost, diverted his March towards the Sea. Not far from Tarragon, he found the Soldiers of the Armado, and Mariners wandring and stragling over the Country (so usual it is for Success to breed negligence) whereupon sending out Parties of Horse every way, with great slaughter ter he chased them to their Ships: Yet not daring to continue longer in those parts, left Scipio should surprize him, he got back to the other side of Iberus. For indeed, Scipio upon news of this new Enemy, march'd with all speed to Tarragon, but came not up till they were gone, and having punish'd such Captains as were the occasion of the late loss there, leaving a competent Garrison in that Town, return'd with his Navy to Emporiae. He was no sooner gone, but Asdrubal was in his place, and having inveigled the Illygetes (who had given Hostages to Scipio) to a Revolt; he, with their assistance, wasted the Territories of all the Romans Allies thereabouts that continued faithful to them. This rous'd Scipio out of his Winter-Quarters, at whose approach the Enemy again quitted all the Country on this side Iberus: Scipio with a terrible Army invades the Illygetes, who were now abandoned by those who were the Authors of their Defection, and having driven them all into Athagnagia, (the Metropolis of that Nation) beleaguered that Town; but within few days accepted of their submission, upon their giving him a greater number of Hostages than before, and paying down a considerable sum of Money. Thence he advanc'd against the Ausetanans, Allies of the Carthaginians, bordering on Iberus, and having Besieg'd their City, surprized with an Ambuscade, the Lacetans coming in the Night to relieve their Neighbors, just as they were ready to enter the City; of whom Twelve thousand were kill'd, the rest generally glad to fling away their Arms, fled scatteringly through the Fields to their own home. Nor did any thing protect the Besieged so much as the Season, it being Winter, and very prejudicial to the Assailants; for in all the thirty days they lay before the Town, there was scarce one, but the Snow lay at least four foot deep, and so covered the Galleries and Engines of Battery that the Romans had provided, that when the Enemies often attempted to Fire them, that alone preserved them. At last Amusius their Chief, having made his escape to Asdrubal, they Articled to pay twenty Talents of Silver to avoid Plundering, and so surrendered. And Scipio carryed back his Army to their Winter-Quarters at Tarragon.

LXII. That Winter in and about Rome happened many Prodigies, or at least (as commonly it happens when the Peoples minds are once tainted with Superstition) many were reported and rashly believed; amongst the rest, *That an Infant but six months old, a Free-mans child in the Herb-Market, cryed out with a loud voice, Io Triumphe! as Soldiers were wont to do at a Triumph. Also in the Beast-Market, an Ox of his own accord went up three Stories high, and thence flung himself down, to the great amazement of those that dwell'd in the House. That the resemblance of a Navy of Ships had been seen in the Air: The Temple of Hope in the Herb-Market burn'd with Lightning: That at Lanuvium a Spear shook and brandish'd itself; and a Raven flying into Juno's Temple, and perch'd upon the very Shrine or High altar: That in the Territories of Amiternum, there were seen in many places the shapes of Men walking at a distance all in white Garments, but as Folks came nearer they vanish'd: That in Picenum it rain'd Stones; and at Cære the Lots were found to be, or at least seem'd to be much less than they really were heretofore: And that in France a Wolf came up to a Centinel, snatch'd his Sword out of its scabbard, and ran away with it. As for diverting the Presages of the rest of these Prodigies, the Decemvirs were ordered to consult the Sibylline Books: But for its raining Stones in Picenum, a Nine-days Solemn Festival was appointed; and for diverting the other ill Omens, the whole City was almost continually employed. Now above all other things, the City was solemnly purged, greater Sacrifices than ordinary Offered to the particular Gods, whom the Decemvirs reported were to be appeased; a Present of Forty Pounds weight in Gold (One thousand four hundred and forty sterling) sent to Juno's Temple at Lanuvium; a Statue of Brass dedicated to Juno in Aventinum: At Cære where the Lots were diminished, a Lectistern, or grand Procession appointed; and Supplications to the Goddess Fortune in Algidum: At Rome too, there was a Lectistern Solemnized in Honor of the Goddess of Youth, and publick Prayers at the Temple of Hercules: Express commandment given to all People to frequent all sorts of Shrines with their Devotions, and four Sacrifices of the greater kind, Offered to the God Genius; and besides all this, C. Attilius Seranus the Prætor, was ordered to pronounce a Solemn Vow, if the Commonwealth should for the space of ten years continue in a good condition. By these Expiations deriv'd from the Books of the Sibyls, the minds of the Mobile were pretty well eased of their Superstitious fears.*

LXIII. Flaminius, one of the Consuls Elect, to whom the Command of those Forces that Quartered at Placentia, fell by Lot, sent an Ediçt and Command to the present Consul, That the said Army should Rendezvous at Rimini on the fifteenth of March: His design being to enter upon his Consulship in the Province, remembering the old Brangles he had had with the Nobles, both when he was Tribune of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Consul; as well about the Consulship of which they would have deprived him, as afterwards concerning his Triumph which they denyed him, but especially the Senate regarded him with an ill Eye, for a late Law which Q. Claudius a Tribune of the Commons had unjustly carryed against them, only by the help of this Flaminius himself a Senator; viz. That no Senator, or Senators Father, should have any Ship at Sea bearing above

Three

Three hundred Amphores, [or about eight Tuns Burthen] for such were thought sufficient to bring the Fruits and Commodities arising out of their Lands and Country Farms, up to Rome; and as for Gain by Traffick, 'twas look'd upon unbecoming Persons of their Quality. The matter having long been bandied with great Contention, contracted not a little Envy from the Nobles on the Proposer, but no less Favor from the Commons, and indeed it was upon that score that they now chose him the second time Consul. Therefore suspecting the Senate would endeavor to keep him at home under colour of unlucky Auspices, or for holding the Latine Holy-days, or some such pretences, he giving out as if he would only take a Country Journey whilst yet he was a private Person, departed secretly to his Province. When this was discovered, it exasperated the Senate more than ever: 'Tis not (said they) now with the Senate that C. Flaminius quarrels, but with the Immortal Gods; when he was before made Consul without due Auspices, and both the Gods and Men recalled him out of the Field, he would not obey; and now conscious of his former Miscarriages, has avoided going to the Capitol, and making the Solemn Vows, merely that he may not on the Day he should enter on his Office visit the Temple of Almighty Jupiter: That he may not see and consult with the Senate, who justly are offended with him, and whom he alone cannot endure: That he may not proclaim the Latine Festivals, and perform the solemn Rites to Jupiter Latialis on the Albane Mount; nor would he, after he had luckily offered up his Orisons in the Capitol, set forwards in his Robes of State towards his Province; but is gone away like some Scoundrel that follows the Camp, without any Ensigns of his Authority, or Lictors and Officers to attend him; crept away privately and by stealth, no otherwise than if he had been forc'd to leave his Country, and were sent to Banishment rather than employed in an Office of Trust and Honor; as if, forsooth, he thought it more for the Honor of the Commonwealth to enter into his Magistracy at Rimini than at Rome, and to put on his Consular Robes in a paltry common Inn, than in his own House and the presence of his Domestick Gods. In short, they all agreed, That he should be recall'd, and compell'd, first to dispatch all the Rites and Ceremonies due to the Gods and Civil State, before he should take upon him the Command of the Army and depart into his Province. On this Ambassy (for under that Character they thought fit to send) were employed Q. Terentius and M. Antistius, but could no more prevail with him, than the Senates Letters did in his former Consulship. For a few days after he entred upon his Office, and whilst he was making his Oblations, a Calf, after he was stuck, got out of the Sacrificers hands, and not only sprinkled many of the standers by with his Blood, but caus'd those that stood behind, and knew not what the matter was, to take their heels and run away as in a fright; which many People look'd upon as an ill Omen, presaging some great Conster-nation or Calamity. Having soon after received two Legions from Sempronius, last years Consul, and two more from C. Attilius the Prætor, he began to march his Army cross over the Appennine into Tuscany.

DECADE III. BOOK II.

E P I T O M E.

2, 3. Annibal comes into Tuscany, but in his way thither, marching for four days and three nights together through the Marshes or Fens without any sleep, lost one of his Eyes by a Defluxion of Rheume. 3, 4, &c. The Consul C. Flaminius, a rash inconsiderate Man, venturing to fight against several ill Auspices (as, That the Field-Ensigns could not be pluck'd out of the Ground by the Standard-Bearers, which therefore he caused to be dug up; and a violent fall from his Horse head-long as soon as he Mounted) soon after surrounded by Annibal in an Ambuscade near the Lake called Thrasymenus, is kill'd, and his Army defeated. 6. Six thousand Romans which there broke through, afterwards surrendering their Arms upon Maharbals promise, They should march away freely, are by Annibals perfidionsness kept Prisoners. 7. In the general lamentation at Rome for this Overthrow, two Matrons dyed for very joy at the unexpected sight of their Sons, whom they supposed to have been kill'd. 10. In regard of the said Defeat, by the directions of the Sibyls Books, there was Vowed a Sacred Spring, (viz. That all the Cattel then brought forth, should be Dedicated to the Gods.) 12. After this, Q. Fabius Maximus being sent Dictator against Annibal, declines to fight, as loth to put the Soldiers, daunted with their late ill Fortune, so soon upon the hazard of a Battel against an Enemy fust'd with so many Victories, contenting himself only by lying always near, to hinder them from attempting any great Exploit. 14, 26. M. Minucius, General of the Horse, (a Man of a proud spirit, and rash in his undertakings) by reproaching the Dictator as negligent and a Coward, prevails so far upon the People, as by their Ordinance to be joyned in equal Commission with him. 28. And having divided the Army, fights in a place very disadvantageous, where his Legions being distress'd and like to be cut off, 29. Are by the timely coming in of Fabius, relieved and rescued from that imminent danger. 29. Minucius overcome with this favour, joyns again with Fabius in the same Camp, stiles him Father, and commands his Soldiers to do the like. 16. Annibal having over-run Campania, is between the Town Calilinum, and the Mountain Callicula, hemm'd in by Fabius, but by a Stratagem of tying little Barms of dry sticks unto Bullocks horns, and setting them on fire, frighted away the Roman Guard that kept the pass at Callicula, and so escaped. 23. He also when he burn'd all the Neighboring Country, forbore to do any damage to the Dictators Lands, to render him suspected at Rome of holding a secret Correspondence with him. 47. After this, when Æmilius Paulus and Terentius Varro were Consuls, and Generals of the Army, Annibal, near a Village called Cannæ, gives them a mighty Overthrow. 49. There were slain in that Battel, Five and forty thousand Romans, with Paulus the Consul, and Four-score Senators, and Thirty other Persons of Quality that had been either Consuls, Prætors, or Ædiles. 53. After which defeat, several young Noble-men in despair enquiring to leave Italy, P. Cornelius Scipio, a Colonel, who afterwards was surnamed Africanus, comes amongst them with his Sword drawn over their Heads, swearing, He would presently kill the first Man that should refuse the Oath that he should tender, and so made them all oblige themselves in an Oath not to abandon their Country. 7, 19, 20, &c. This Book also describes the Consternation, and general Mourning of the City, by reason of the said defeat of their Army; and withal, some Actions in Spain achieved with better success. 57. Opimia and Floronia, two Vestal Virgins condemned for Incest. By reason of the scarcity of Soldiers and serviceable Men for the Wars, Eight thousand Slaves are put in Arms. 60, 61. The Senate refuses to redeem their Men that had suffered themselves to be taken Prisoners, though Annibal offered it; and go forth to meet the Consul Varro, and welcome him home with thanks, because after such an amazing Blow, he had not given over the Cause of the Commonwealth as desperate.

I.

The Spring was now come on, when Annibal removed from his Winter-Quarters, and as before (when he attempted it) he was not able to get over the Apennine for the intolerable Cold, so he continued there thus long not without great fear and hazard; for the Gauls, whom he had drawn to his side by hopes of Prey and Plunder, seeing that instead of Foraging and getting Booties from others, their own Territories were made the Seat of War, and oppressed by the Armies of both Parties lying upon them all Winter, began to hate him, more than they did formerly the Romans: Several times had their Princes contrived to destroy and cut him off by Treachery, and it was only by their own perfidionsness to each other (whilst with the same levity wherewith they conspired against them, they betray'd their Fellows, and detected their Conspiracies) that he escaped their hands. As also by frequent changing sometimes of his Clothes, and sometimes of his Head-piece, and by being almost continually in motion, he endeavored to secure himself: However, the apprehensions of these Dangers cause him to quit his Winter-Quarters so much the sooner.

About the same time, viz. on the fifteenth of March, Cn. Servilius entred upon his Consulship at Rome, and after he had propos'd the Affairs of the Commonwealth to the Senates consideration, their envy and spight against C. Flaminius (his Colleague) was afresh renewed, saying, That they Created two Consuls but had but one: For what just and lawful Authority, what fortunate Success can that other have that is gone? Since such a Magistrate ought always to carry the same with him from the City, from the publick and his own private Affairs, after he had Celebrated the Latine Festivals, perform'd the Sacrifice on the Alban Hill, and duly made made his Vows in the Capitol. But since without discharging all these necessary Rites, he departed hence only in the Quality of a private Person; as the Auspices of Government could not accompany or follow him; so neither being gone without them, can he in a foreign Soil receive them new and entire as they ought to be. The business look'd the worse, because at the same time People were terrified with stories of Prodigies related from several places: That in Sicily certain Soldiers Darts were on a sudden on Fire; and in Sardinia, as a Trooper was going the Rounds under the Walls, his Staff burn'd in his hand; That strange Fires had been frequently seen on the Sea-shore; That two Shields sweat Blood, and some Soldiers were struck dead with Lightning; That the Body of the Sun appear'd less to the sight than it was wont to do; and that at Præneste red-hot burning Coals fell from the Skie; That at Arpi there were seen in the Air the shapes of Targets or Bucklers, and the Sun fighting with the Moon; That at Capena two Moons rose and shone together in the day-time; That the Cæretan Waters ran mingled with Blood, and the very Fountain of Hercules cast up Water with Bloody spots; and as People were reaping in the Antian Fields, certain Bloody ears of Corn fell into their Skeys; At Falerii the Heavens seem'd to open with a mighty Chafin, whence shone forth a wonderful Sight; That the Sacred Lots of themselves grew less and less, and one fell out of the Pitcher with this Inscription,

Behold! Mars brandishes his dreadful Spear.

About the same time the Statue of Mars at Rome in the Appian way, near the Images of the Wolves, was observ'd to Sweat; and at Capua the Heavens seem'd all on fire, and something like the Moon to fall down in a great shower. Hence men came to take notice of, and believe other Prodigies scarce worth mentioning; as that some Goats, instead of Hair bore Wool; that an Hen was turn'd into a Cock, and a Cock into an Hen. These things as they were reported being inquired into, and the Authors brought before the Senate, the Consul propos'd and desired that House to take into their consideration the Affairs of Religion: who Decreed, That these threatening Tokens should be expiated, some with the greater sort of Sacrifices, others with young sucking ones; That for three days space there should be Supplications at every Shrine: And as for the rest, after the Decemvirs had inspected their Books, such Atonements should be made, as the Gods in their Verses should fore-tell to stand with their pleasure. Accordingly, by the directions of the Decemvirs it was Ordered, First, That to Jupiter should be made and consecrated a Golden Thunder-bolt of fifty pound weight [worth about One thousand eight hundred pound sterling] and the like of Silver to Juno and Minerva; besides, that to Juno the Queen on Mount Aventine, and Juno the Preserveress at Lanuvium, Sacrifices of the bigger sort should be offered: That the Ladies and Matrons should make a Collection amongst them, every one contributing as much as she could, for a Gift to the said Juno the Queen, and bring it to Mount Aventine, and there celebrate a Lectistern; nay, the very Libertine Lasses, or Women that had been Slaves, but had got their Freedom, were all to bring in their Pence according to their respective Abilities for a Present to Dame Feronia the Goddess of the Woods. These matters being dispatch'd, the Decemvirs Sacrificed with great Bullocks in the Market-place of Ardea; and lastly, by directions from the aforesaid Books, in the Month of December, they made their Offerings in the Temple of Saturn at Rome, and a Lectistern was appointed (where the Senators themselves officiated) and withal a publick Feast celebrated, and the Saturnalia [or Feasts of five days continuance, where the Servants sat at Table and Masters waited, in memory of the Liberty men had in Saturns reign] were day and night Proclaimed throughout the City, and the People commanded to observe and keep that as an Holy-day for ever.

Whilst the Consul at Rome is thus busie in appeasing the Gods, and making his Levies, Annibal quitting his Winter-Quarters, and having advice that the Consul Flaminius was already advanc'd to Arretium, would needs (though he were shewed a better Road, but somewhat further about) take the nearest way through the Marshes and Fens, which happened too at that time to be more than ordinarily overflow'd with the River Arno. In the Van he placed the Spaniards and Africans, and all his old beaten Soldiers (the Flower and Strength of his Army) together with their Baggage; That wherever they should be forc'd to stay, they might not be to seek for necessaries. Next followed the Gauls or French, being desirous to keep that sort of People in the middle, and the Horse made up the Rere-guard: Mago, with the Numidian Light-Horse coming last of all, who had orders to keep the Army close in their March and prevent straglers, especially the French, if any of them wearied with the toil or tediousness of the March (as they are a People tender, and not able to endure much hardship) should either offer to run from their Colours, or loiter behind. The Van-Guard, which way soever their Guides led them, pass'd resolutely through thick and thin, wading through great Rivers and deep kind of Pits and Quagmires, and though they were almost drowned, or buried in the mud, yet still they followed their Colours. But the Gauls, if they chanc'd but to slip, down they came, and when they were down were not able to rise again out of the dirty Sloughs and Holes; they had neither courage of mind to support their Bodies, nor so much as hopes left to bouy up their Spirits; some made a sorry shift to drail along their weak and fainting Limbs; others quite overcome with weariness, lay down and died amongst the Beasts, who also were every where sprawling and ready to expire: But that which most of all undid and destroyed them, was want of Rest, for they had now march'd four days and three nights continually without sleep. At last, finding all the Country still over-flow'd, and no dry ground where they might lie down, they piled up their Snapfacks and Baggage on heaps in the Water, and laid themselves down thereon; and others, glad of any thing that appeared above Water, made the Bodies of their Horses and Cattel that tumbled down in heaps one upon another, serve them a while instead of Beds to get a nap: As for Annibal himself (who was already troubled with his Eyes, occasioned at first by the distemperature of the Spring, suddenly varying from great heats to excessive colds) he was mounted on an Elephant, the only one he had left alive, which carry'd him high enough out of the Water; yet by reason of this overwatching himself, and the moist Nights and damps of the Fens stuffing his Head with Rhumes, and having no opportunity for remedy by Physick, he lost the sight of one of his Eyes irrecoverably.

III. Having at last, with the loss of many of his Men and Horses, got through the Marshes, on the first dry ground he came at, he pitched his Tents, and received advice by his Scouts, that the Roman Army continued under the Walls of Arretium. Then with the utmost diligence he endeavored to find out the designs and temper of the Consul; the situation of the Country; which way he march'd? what store of Forces and Provisions he had? from whence supplied? and all other things necessary to be known. As for the Country, 'twas one of the most fertile in all Italy, as being the Champian Fields of Tuscany, between Fesula and Arretium, abounding in Corn and Cattel, and Riches of all sorts. The Consul fierce and proud, valuing himself not a little because he had once before born the same Office; a Man, that as he not much regarded either the Laws or Authority of the Senate, so he had paid no great Reverence to Religion, or the Gods themselves. This rashness of Mind implanted in him by Nature, Fortune had cheris'd and augmented by several Successes both in Civil and Military affairs; whence 'twas easie to collect, that such a person that neither respected Gods nor Men, would be apt to act all things violently and hand over head: That he might the more be plunged into the ill effects of this complexional rashness and indiscretion, the subtle Punic resolves to provoke and exasperate him; leaving him therefore on the left hand, Annibal marches by Fesula to Forrage Tuscany, and gives him at a distance as dreadful a prospect as possibly he could, of the havock and devastation he made by Fire and Sword. Flaminius, who would not have sat still though the Enemy had been quiet, when once he saw the Lands and Goods of his Allies thus haras'd and destroyed, as it were just under his Nose, thinking it redounded much to his disgrace, that the Carthaginians should march thus at their pleasure through the midst of Italy, and at this rate might quickly advance even to attack the Walls of Rome, whilst all the rest in the Council of War advis'd for Safety rather than Bravery; That he should wait till the coming up of his Colleague; that having join'd their Armies, they might with united hearts and Councils manage the War; and that in the mean time, by sending out a Brigade of Horse and Light-arm'd Foot, he would give a check to the Enemy, and restrain them from this licentious Plundering. He in a Passion flung out of the Council, and presently gave the Signal both for a March and a Battel: Nay, quoth he, let us sit still eternally under the Walls of Arretium; this belike is our Habitation, and all the Native Country we regard; Let Annibal escape our hands, and lay all Italy desolate as he lists; Let him over-run and utterly destroy all before him with Fire and Sword up to the very Walls of Rome, and let us not budge till the affrighted Senate send for C. Flaminius, as of old they did for Camillus from Vei to their rescue. As thus he reproach'd them, he at the same time commanded the Standards forthwith to advance, and in a Fury mounts himself, but his Horse presently happened to stumble, and threw him with his Head foremost on the ground. Whilst all that were about him were terrified with this Accident, looking upon it as an ill Omen at the beginning of his Enterprize, word was brought that one of the Ensigns could not be pluck'd out of the Ground by all the strength and endeavors the Standard-bearer could use; whereupon turning to the Messenger, What? says he, hast thou brought me Letters too from the Senate to forbid me serving the Publick? Go, tell them they must dig it out, if their hands are so benum'd with fear that they are not able to pluck it up; which being accordingly done, he began his March. The chief Officers which gave contrary advice, being now more disheartened with this double Prodigy, but the common Soldiers over-joyed at the forwardness and animosity of their General, were full of hopes, without considering what Grounds they had for such their confidence.

IV. Annibal had wasted the whole Country between the City Cortona and the Lake Thrasymenus, with all manner of Hostility, that he might the more provoke the Enemy to revenge these Injuries done to their Allies. He was now come to a place that seem'd framed by Nature merely for an Ambuscade, just where the Lake Thrasymenus flows up nearest to the foot of the Hills of Cortona; for there lies between only a very strait and narrow Passage, as if there had been left that space of Ground, for such a purpose and nothing else; beyond

it the Plains open wider, and so you come to the brow of the Hills. Annibal in the open ground pitch'd his Camp for himself, his Africans and Spaniards; but his Slingers, and other Light-arm'd Soldiers, he led round about behind the Mountains: His Horse he Posts near the Mouth of the Pass, behind certain rising Grounds that very conveniently sheltered and kept them out of sight, that so, as soon as the Romans were entred, the Cavalry clapping behind them, they should all be shut up between the Lake and the Mountain. Flaminius being come to the Lake over-night, about Sun-setting, early the next Morning before it was full day-light, without ever sending out according to the custom of War any Scouts before, to discover the Coasts and posture of the Enemy, pass'd the aforesaid Streight; but no sooner did he begin to spread his Army on the open Plain, but he might perceive the Enemy, I mean that part of them only which were before him, for those behind and over his head did not yet shew themselves. Annibal having now got the Enemy into the Toil, and every way surrounded, quickly gives the Signal for them all to fall on, who rushing down every Man the nearest way he could; that which made the matter appear the more surprizing to the Romans, was, that a Fog rising from the Lake was much thicker on the Plain where they were, than on the Hills, so that the Carthaginians could see one another from their several Posts, and the better Charge them all at once: But the Romans perceived not themselves entrapped, till they heard the shout quite round them, and were forced to fight both in the Front and on the Flank, before they could draw into Battalia, and indeed before they could fit their Arms, or almost draw their Swords.

In this general Consternation the Consul alone shewed himself nothing daunted, he set in order, as much as the time would give him leave, the Ranks which were apt to be confus'd by their turning themselves every way as they heard the several clamors; and where-ever he came, or could be heard, encouraged and commanded them to stand to it and fight stoutly, telling them, That 'twas not making of Vows, and lazily imploring the help of the Gods, but their own manly Courage, and Arms, that must bring them off; That they must cut their way with their Swords through the midst of their Enemies thickest Battalions, and that where there is least fear, there is generally least danger. But for the noise and tumult, neither his Advice nor his Commands could be heard; and so far were his Soldiers in this distraction from knowing their proper Colours, Ranks and Places, that they had scarce understanding and resolution enough left to take their Arms, and put them on as they should do for a Battel, so that some of them were surprized and beat down, rather oppress'd and clogg'd with their Armor than defended by it, and so thick was the Mist, that their Ears were of more use to them than their Eyes; yet at the groans of their wounded Fellows, and resounding strokes on their Bodies and Arms, and the shouts of the Valiant intermix'd with the shrieks of the timorous, they could not but be continually turning their Faces and casting their Eyes every way about them: Some as they were flying, light into an heap of those that were fighting, and forc'd to joyn with them because they could get no further; some having recollected their spirits, returning to Charge the Enemy, were stop'd and driven backwards by heaps of their own Men that were running away. At last, having attempted every way in vain to get forth, and seeing plainly that as they were thus shut up on one side by the Lake, on the other by the Mountain, and both in the Front and Rear by the Enemy, there was no possible hopes or means to escape but by fighting their way through, then every one became a Captain, and encouraged himself to fight manfully: Thus was the Battel renewed, not in that order as they were wont; first by the Principes, then by the Hastati, and at last by the Triarii; nor some before the Standards, others after, and every Soldier in his particular Regiment, Company and File, but hickled-pickled, as Fortune jumbled them together; to it they went Pel-mel, and as every mans heart serv'd him, so he marshal'd himself to fight, either before or behind; nay, so eager and intent they were, and all the faculties both of Body and Soul so intirely taken up with fighting, that although at that very instant there happened a most dreadful Earth-quake, which threw down a great part of many Cities in Italy, turn'd the Courses of great Rivers out of their antient Channels, forced the Sea up a long way into fresh Rivers, overturned Mountains with mighty falls, and levell'd Vallies and Hills, yet there was not one Man in this Battel that in the least perceived it.

The Conflict had now lasted near three hours, every where sharp, but near the Consul most fierce and cruel; for as he was attended with the stoutest and bravest Men, so for his own Personal Valor and Gallantry he came not behind the best of them, but in his rich Armor, wherever he saw his Men distressed or over-powered, thither presently he flew to their aid, and shewed no less care and good nature in succoring and defending his Friends, than courage in Charging furiously the Enemy; until at last a certain Knight of Milain, named Ducarius, knowing him by sight as well as by his Arms, cries out to his Countrymen, Yonder is the Consul, the same who cut to pieces our Legions, and plundered our City and Territories; now will I presently offer him up a Sacrifice to the Ghosts of our Fellow-Citizens, that by his means were piteously slain; saying this, he clapp'd spurs to his Horse, and with an irresistable violence Charged in amongst the thickest of the Enemy, and having first cut off a Squires head that interposed himself, seeing him come so fiercely, he in the next place ran the Consul himself quite through the Body with his Lance; and fain he would have disarm'd and rifled him, but some of the Triarii step'd over the Corps with their Targets, and kept him off. Thence many began to take their heels, and presently neither the deep Lake nor the high Mountain could stop their fear; were the way never so strait, or never so steep, like blind men they venture on't, in hopes to escape; and Horse and Man, Man and Arms are tumbled head-long one upon another. A great number seeing no other means to get away, endeavored to wade through the Lake, finding it fordable on the edges, and went so far till nothing but their head and shoulders appeared above Water; and some (so inconsiderate was their fear) sought to save themselves by swimming, which being an endless and impossible work, they were either drowned, their breath and spirits failing, or else after they had made much haft, and took excessive pains to no purpose, with much ado made back again to recover the Land, where the Enemies Horse (that were now advanc'd a pretty way into the water) miserably cut them to pieces. Six thousand, or thereabouts, of the Van-Guard, charging desperately through that Battalion of the Enemy which was right before them, got safe out of the Plain, and seized on the top of a little Hill, altogether ignorant of what became of their Fellows, for by reason of the Fog they could not see what pass'd, nor learn the Fortune of the Battel, only could hear their shouts and cries and the clattering of Armor. But by this time that the Romans all gave ground, the Sun being got pretty high, dispell'd the Mist, and then they could clearly see that all was lost; therefore for fear the Enemy (who had discovered them at a distance) should send their Cavalry to fall upon them, they got up their Ensigns and hastned away with all expedition; but Mabarbal with all the Horse he could make, pursued them all Night, and the next day being almost come up with them, who besides other Calamities were almost ready to faint for hunger, they came to a Treaty with him, who promised, That if they would surrender their Arms, they should be freely released, and without being strip'd go whether they list; which Annibal perform'd as Religiously as Carthaginians are wont to do; for no sooner were they in his power, but he detained them every one Prisoners, and loaded them with Chains.

VII. This is that noble Battel at the Thrasymenan Lake, one of the most memorable of those few Over-throws which the People of Rome had hitherto sustained: Fifteen thousand of them slain in the Field, and Ten thousand more dispersed in their flight all over Tuscany, by several by-ways got at last to Rome. Of the Enemy Fifteen hundred kill'd out-right; but on both sides a great number dyed afterwards of their Wounds. The loss is differently related by several hands; but for my part, as I love not to write vain Untruths, or any thing without good warrant (a trick most Authors are too much guilty of) I have herein chiefly followed Fabius, one that was living at the time of this War. Such of the Prisoners taken as were of the Romans Allies, Annibal set at liberty without Ransome, but the Romans themselves kept in strict Custody; the Bodies of his own Men cull'd out of the promiscuous heaps of the Dead, he ordered to be buried, and also caused diligent search to be made for the Corps of Flaminius, to bestow thereon the honor of a Funeral, but they could not find it.

Upon the first Intelligence brought to Rome of this Defeat, the People ran altogether in a fright and tumult into the Forum, and the good Wives wandered about the streets, enquiring of all they met, What news from the Army? and what this disaster was that People talk'd of? At last the Multitude being assembled thick (as it were to a publick Audience) and turning to the Town-Hall and the Senate-House, and calling frequently on the Magistrates to know the matter; a little before Sun-set, Marcus Pomponius the Prætor came forth, and said, There was been a great Battel fought, and we are worsted; and though he spake no more words, nor told them the certainty of any particulars, yet filling one anothers heads with Rumors, they carryed home news, That the Consul, and a great part of his Forces were slain; that very few were left alive, and those either scattered by flight through Tuscany, or else taken Prisoners by the Enemy. And look how many Casualties can possibly befall a routed Army, into so many perplexities were all their minds distracted, who had any Relations that serv'd under C. Flaminius, all the while they were ignorant what was the true Fortune of each, nor did any Man certainly know what to hope or fear. On the morrow, and some days following, abundance of People, but most Women, stood at the Gates waiting to see their Friends come home, or some that could tell tidings of them, and flock'd about every one they met, asking a thousand Questions, nor could they that were of their acquaintance get rid of their continual Enquiries: There might you have seen an Alphabet of Faces, and read in their looks whether the news each had received were good or ill, and Houses fill'd with those which at their first coming knew not whether their business would be to Congratulate or Condole. The Female Sex especially, were extream as well in Joy as Grief; one standing at the Gate, spying on a sudden her Son returned safe, is reported to have expired whilst she embraced him; and another, who had received false news of her Sons being slain, as she sat mourning at home, he happened to come in, which so transported her with excess of Joy, that she immediately fell down dead. The Prætors caused the Senate for divers days to sit close, from Sun-rising to Sun-setting, consulting, With what Forces, and under what Conduct, they might be able to resist and give some check to these Victorious Carthaginians?

Before they were come to any certain Resolution, advice arrives of another late disaster, viz. That Four thousand Horse dispatch'd away by Servilius the Consul, under the Conduct of C. Centenius the Pro-Prætor, to the assistance of his Colleague, were hemm'd in by Annibal in Umbria, for thither, upon news of the Armies defeat at Thrasymenus, they had diverted their march. This Intelligence variously affected Mens minds, some taken up already with thoughts of a greater Calamity, counted the loss of the Horse would be but small in regard of the former defeat; but others judged, That what happened, was not so much to be esteem'd by the importance of the thing it self, as by their present Circumstances: For as it happens in the Natural Body of Man, if it be weak and crasse, every disorder or disease is more grievously felt and proves more dangerous, than a much greater injury or distemper to a person that is sound and strong; so when any Calamity comes upon the Body Politick of State, already enfeebled and languishing, we are to measure the same not so much by the greatness of the loss, as by the tender and decayed strength, unable to endure any thing whatsoever that does surcharge or agrieve it. Therefore at last, the City applied themselves to that sovereign and oft-approved Remedy, long desired, but not yet administr'd, viz. The appointing of a Dictator. But since the Consul was absent, who alone it was thought, had power to nominate that Magistrate, and Italy was so over-run by the Enemy, that it was not safe sending Letters or Messengers unto him, nor any president could be shewn that ever the People at any time did create a Dictator; They therefore chose Q. Fabius Maximus, with the title of Pro-Dictator, and M. Minucius Rufus General of the Horse, who had Commission from the Senate, To fortifie the Walls and Towers of the City; To post necessary Guards where they saw cause; To break down what Bridges they thought fit; To impede the Enemies march, and if they could not clear Italy of the Carthaginians, yet at least to defend the City against them.

Annibal in the mean time marches directly through Umbria as far as Spolito; and having grievously wasted all the Neighboring Country, attacks that City; but being repulsed with great loss of his Men, guessing by the strength of that one Colony against which he had such small success, how difficult a matter it would be to assault Rome it self, he diverted his course into the Picene Territories, not only abounding in Fruits of all sorts, but full of rich Plunder besides, which his Soldiers equally covetous and poor, greedily pillaged and carry'd away. There for some days he kept a standing Camp, to refresh his Soldiers wearied out with their Winter Marches, and untoward Passage through the Fens, and especially with the late Battel, which prov'd more fortunate in the Event, than flight or ease in the Conflict it self. When he thought he had sufficiently recruited his Men (who of themselves were more inclinable to Forragings and Booties, than unprofitable ease and lying still) he dislodged and journeyed forwards, spoiling first the Prætutian and Hadrian Fields, and afterwards the Marsians, Marrucins and Pelignians, as far as Arpi and Luceria, the next Province to Apulia.

Cn. Servilius the other Consul, having had some small Skirmishes with the Gauls, and taken one of their Towns of no great note, after he was advertiz'd of the defeat of his Colleague and his Army, apprehending the Mother City of his Country to be now in danger, that he might not be absent in the last Extremity, hastned towards Rome.

Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator, the same day he entred upon his Office, assembled the Senate, and beginning first with matters of Religion, telling the Fathers, That the late Consul C. Flaminius had committed a greater fault by his neglecting the Ceremonies and Auspices, than either by his rashness or unskilfulness; and that the Gods themselves were to be consulted, what Atonements they would accept of to allay their displeasure, prevailed so far, that, (what is rarely done but on the account of some direful Prodigies) the Decemvirs were commanded to Inspect the Sibylline Books, who from those fatal Leaves reported to the Fathers, That the cause of the present War, was a Vow made to Mars not rightly performed, which must be renewed and accomplished in a more ample manner: That the great Games must be Vowed to Jupiter, and Temples to Venus Erycina, and to Dame Mens, the Goddess of Understanding. Moreover, that a solemn Supplication and Læstifern should be Celebrated, and a publick Vow made of a Sacred Spring [that is, to give the Gods all the young Cattel that should be brought forth in one whole Spring] if they prospered in the Wars, and the Commonwealth should be continued in the same state as before the War broke out. The Senate, because Fabius was taken up with the management of Affairs Military, ordered M. Aemilius the Prætor, according to the directions of the Colledge of Pontiffs, to take care, That all these Religious matters be with all speed performed.

Upon these Ordinances of the Senate, L. Cornelius Lentulus the chief Pontiff, when the Prætor came to consult their Colledge, gave advice, That in the first place the business of a Sacred Spring should be propos'd to the People, for without their consent it could not be Vowed;

Vowed; whereupon the same was propounded to them in this form of Words following: "Pleaseth it you, and do you command that the thing be done in this manner? If the State of the People of Rome and Quirites shall (as I desire it should) for the space of five years next ensuing, continue safely preserved in these Wars between the Romans and Carthaginians, and with the Gauls on this side the Alps, Then the People of Rome will perform an Oblation and Gift given and vowed, viz. That all the Increase whatsoever which the Spring shall yield and afford of Sheep and Swine, Goats and Kine, from the day that the Senate and People shall appoint, shall be Sacrificed to Jupiter, provided the said Animals be not before dedicated to some other of the Gods? Provided, That he that Sacrifices may do it when he will, on what conditions he will, and in what manner soever he shall have done it, the same may stand for good and rightfully performed. If the Beast that should be Sacrificed, happen to dye, let it not be accounted Sacred, nor be imputed as a fault to him who ought to have offered it. If any one unawares shall wound or kill any of these Animals thus Vowed, let it not be accounted Criminal in him. If any shall steal or hide any of them out of the way, let it not be imputed for wickedness unto the People, nor to him from whom it shall be so stol'n or hidden. If any shall Sacrifice it on an unlucky day, wherein Sacrifices are forbidden, let it be counted rightly Sacrificed. If the Senate and People shall Ordain these Sacrifices to be done, or shall Sacrifice sooner than any private Man, let the People be thereby discharged and freed. To this purpose also were the Great Games before Vowed, performed, the Expences thereof amounting to Three hundred thirty three thousand three hundred thirty and three pieces of Brass-mony, called Asses, and one third part of an As [some reckon it to be 1041 l. 14 s. 4 d. sterling] besides the Sacrificing of Three hundred Oxen to Jupiter, and many white Oxen to the rest of the Gods, and other Oblations. After these Vows solemnly pronounced, and performed accordingly, a publick Supplication was Proclaimed, and in Procession they went with their Wives and Children; not only the Citizens, but those too of the Country, their private Estates depending upon the fate of the publick. The Lectistern was set out with great Magnificence, and continued three days, the Decemvirs having the ordering thereof; the Sacred Beds were openly exposed to be seen, one for Jove and Juno, another for Neptune and Minerva, a third for Mars and Venus, a fourth for Apollo and Diana, a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta, and a sixth for Mercury and Ceres. There were Temples vowed, that to Venus Erycina, by Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator, for so 'twas required in the fatal Books, That he should do it, who had the chief Office and Authority in the City. The other to the Goddess Mens, was Vowed by Otacilius the Prator.

XI. Matters of Religion being thus dispatch'd, the Dictator desired the judgment of the Senate touching the War, and important Affairs of the State; what Legions, and how many they thought fit to send against the Victorious Enemy? Their Lordships Decreed, That he should receive the Army from Cn. Servilius the Consul, and levy besides, both of Citizens and Allies, so many Horse and Foot as he pleased; and should act and order all other things according to his own discretion, as he should judge it most expedient for the Commonwealth. Fabius declared, He would only add two new Legions to the Army under Servilius, which being accordingly raised and lifted by the General of the Horse, he appointed a Rendezvous at Tibur such a day; and set forth a Proclamation, Requiring all that dwelt in Towns or Castles unfortified, to repair into places of safety; and that all should depart out of the Villages in those parts through which Annibal was to march, but first to set fire on their Houses and destroy their Corn, that he might find no Provisions or Accommodations. Then he himself set forwards towards the Consul and Army, along the Flaminian Road, and on the Banks of Tiber near Otricoli, saw the Consul and his Horse at a distance coming to meet him; whereupon he dispatch'd an Officer to warn the Consul, To come without his Lictors to the Dictator (for to him now belong'd those supreme Ensigns of Authority:) The Consul readily obeyed, and their meeting represented the Dictatorship as a thing of great Awe and Majesty, both to the Roman Citizens and their Allies, the Grandeur of that Office by its disuse for some years being almost forgot. Letters came from Rome, That certain Ships of Burden transporting Victuals and Provisions from Hosia into Spain for the Army there, were set upon and taken by the Carthaginian Fleet near the Haven of Cossa; therefore the Consul was immediately dispatch'd for Hosia, to Man out what Ships he could find there, or at Rome, with Soldiers and Mariners of the Allies, and therewith pursue the Enemies Navy, and secure the Coasts of Italy. At Rome a power of Men were lifted, for even the Libertini, or Servants enfranchized, that had Children, and were of Age fit to bear Arms, were obliged to take the Military Oath; out of these City-Regiments such as were under five and thirty years old, were drawn out and put aboard the Ships, the rest left at home as a Guard for the City.

XII. The Dictator having received the Consuls Army from the hands of Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, march'd through the Sabines Country to Tibur, where he arriv'd the very same day on which he had appointed the new-raisd Forces to meet him there. From whence by crossing the Country into the High-Road called Via Latina, he returned unto Præneste, and so on towards the Enemy, sending out his Scouts diligently before to give him Intelligence, and and resolv'd not to run the hazard of a Battel in any place, unless compell'd by necessity. The first day he came within sight of the Enemy not far from Arpi, they instantly drew out and offered him Battel; but finding him to lie quiet, and no tumult in his Camp, Annibal began to upbraid them to his own Men, saying, That now at length they might perceive the Martial hearts of the Romans, were brought down and daunted; That by refusing to fight, they did openly recede from their ancient Valor and Glory, and acknowledge themselves inferior both in Strength and Courage. Having said thus, he retreated to his Camp, not a little vex'd inwardly (for all this vamping,) that henceforwards he found he should have to do, not with a rash General, like Flaminius or Sempronius, but that at last the Romans grown wiser by their late Errors and Calamities, had made choice of a Captain that was a Match for Annibal, who indeed was more apprehensive of the Prudence and Conduct of the Dictator, than of his Force. However, having not made trial of his constancy, he still endeavor'd to disquiet, and tempt him if he could to a Battel, by oft removing of his Tents, and destroying the Lands of his Allies just under his nose; one while he would seem as in fear to march away in an hurry clean out of fight, and then on a sudden he would stop, and lie close in some by-corner, to see if he could take him at an advantage on the Plain. But Fabius march'd above upon the higher Grounds, at such a convenient distance, as neither to neglect him, nor yet to encounter him. He kept his Soldiers for the most part strictly within their Camp, unless upon urgent and necessary occasions; and when Parties were sent out for Forrage or Wood, he would not suffer them to go in small numbers, or stragling, but in such order as might secure them from the Enemy. His Guards of Horse and Light-arm'd Foot, were so formed and always ready against any sudden Alarm, as both rendred all things safe for his own men, and easily check'd the Enemies plundering, cutting off their stragling Forragers if they ventured too far from their Camp. Thus he would never put the main Chance all at once to a venture, and by these small Essays, and continual Skirmishes (safely attempted, because he had always Reserves and Relief at hand) he enured and heartned up his Soldiers, almost quite dispirited with their late frequent Overthrows, and made them at length less distrust their own Valor or Fortune. Yet all these sober Counsels of the Dictator, and his prudent management of Affairs did not more vex Annibal, than they did his own General of the Horse, who wanted nothing but the Sovereign Command to precipitate the Commonwealth; for being a Man naturally fierce, in all his Undertakings violent, and too full of Tongue; first among a few of his own Gang, but afterwards publicly throughout the Army, he would envigh against and reproach the Dictators proceedings, calling him instead of a confederate, staid and sober Person, heavy and dull; and instead of wary, timorous and a Coward; attributing to his Virtues, the names of the next neighboring Vices; and having a singular knack at undervaluing his Superiors, did thereby extol and magnifie himself; a most base Art, which yet hath too often succeeded in the advancement of those that use it.

Annibal marches from Arpi into Samnium, Forrages the Country of Beneventum, takes the City Teleisa, and by committing all kind of Outrages, endeavors on set purpose to provoke the Roman General, if he could incense him with so many Indignities and Calamities of his Allies, and so draw him to fight on even hand. Amongst that multitude of the Italian Allies taken Prisoners by Annibal at the Lake Thrasymenus, and freely released, there were three Gentlemen of Campania that serv'd on Horseback, whom he had allured with Gifts and Promises, to bring over their Country-men to his Interest. These Blades brought him word, That if he would but bring his Army into Campania, he should be Lord of Capua. And though the thing it self seem'd of too great moment for Persons of their Quality to effect, and rendred Annibal doubtful, sometimes apt to credit, and by and by distrusting their advice, yet at last it prevailed with him so far, as to resolve to march out of Samnium into Campania, and therefore charging them to make good their words, and be ready to meet him with their Countrymen, and especially some of their Chiefs, he dismiss'd them away before to prepare for his coming. Then he commands his Guide, to lead him into the Province of Casnum, having been informed by those that knew the Country well, That if he seized that Pass, he would stop the Romans from being able to come up to the relief of their Allies: But the nearness of the names, and the vast difference there is between the Carthaginian Language and the Latine, caus'd the Guide to mistake Caslinum for Casnum, and so turning from the Journey intended, brought him along through the Coasts of Alifanum, Calatinum and Calenum, into the plain Champian Region of Stella, where Annibal seeing the Country environed round about with Hills and Rivers, calls for his Guide, and asks, Whereabouts in the World he was? Who answered, That he should that night Quarter at Casalinum. Then, and not before, the mistake was discovered, and that Casnum was a long way off in another Country. The Guide, for a terror to others, he scourged first with Rods, and then Crucified him; and having fortified his Camp, dispatch'd Mabarbal with the Cavalry into Falernum, who laid waste all the Country as far as the Waters of Sinnessa; the Numidian Horse committing great slaughter wherever they came, but the flight and fright of the People was much greater than the real harm; and yet could not all this Terror, Terror, when their Country was round about on a Flame, and nothing but War and Calamities threatned on every side, startle those faithful Allies from their Allegiance to the Romans; and the reason was, because they were Govern'd with a just and moderate hand, and thought not much to be subject unto their Betters: The only Bond of Loyal Fidelity.

XIV. Fabius lying encamped near the River Vulturnus, whilst the most pleasant part of Italy was all on fire, and the Villages far and near smoaking with Ruines and Desolation; as he was leading his Forces over the top of the Mountain Massicus, the murmurs in his Army were renewed, and the Ring-leaders of the Mutiny enkindled it afresh; for they had been for some days pretty quiet, because marching faster than ordinary, they imagined that hast was made to prevent the Devastation of Campania: But when they were come to the farther edge of those Hills, and had before their Eyes both the Enemy, and the flaming Houses of Falernum, and their Colony at Simuesse, and yet heard no mention of coming to a Battel: "What? Are we come thus far, quoth Minucius, only to feed our Eyes with the Miseries of our faithful Confederates? To see our dearest Friends destroyed with Fire and Sword? Or if we have no compassion for our Allies, are we not ashamed to be idle Spectators of the ruine of our own Citizens? Those whom our Ancestors sent as a Colony to secure these parts from the Sammites, 'tis not now the Neighboring Sammite that waists and consumes them: But Carthaginians, strangers that come from the furthest parts of the World, are by our delays and cowardize advanced thus far into the Bowels of our Country. So much, alas! do we degenerate from our Fathers gallant Spirits, That the very Coasts which they thought it a disgrace to their Empire, to suffer the Punic Fleet to sail near, we now can tamely behold full of Numidians, and under the Command of our Enemies the Moors: We, who but a while ago when they were going to attack Sammium, took it in such indignation and disdain, and called the Gods and Men to witness the violation of the League, stand still and gaze upon Annibal now he is furiously battering the Walls of a Roman Colony. The smoke of the Villages and Fields all on fire is ready to put out our eyes, and our ears are every minute pierced with the woful cries of our Associates, imploring our help as often as they do the Gods, and we fool away time in leading our Army (as if they were a company of Goats) through shady Woods, and over the tops of unpassable Hills, hid in Clouds and Thickets, as if we were afraid of the Sun as well as of the Enemy: If the brave Furius Camillus had been of the humor to relieve Rome from the Gauls by ranging over Hills and Forests, at the same rate as this new Camillus, forsooth, (the only Man sought out to be Dictator in our distress) goes about to recover Italy from Annibal, Rome at this day had assuredly been French; and really I cannot conceal my just apprehensions, that if we go thus coldly to work, our Ancestors courage did only so often preserve that City from others, that by our negligence it might fall into the hands of Annibal and his Carthaginians. But that brave Man, a Roman indeed, on the very day that word was brought him at Veii, That the Senate and People had chosen him Dictator, although Janiculum was high enough whereon he might have fate and view'd the Enemy at his ease, chose rather immediately to descend into the Plain, and the very same day in the heart of the City (where now the Gallick Tombs remain as Monuments of his Courage) and the next day between Rome and Gabes fell upon and cut to pieces the Legions of the Enemy. What shall I say of that which happened many years after, when at the Streights of Caudium we were put under the Yoke by the Sammites? Tell me, I pray, did Lucius Papirius Cursor by scampering over the Sammian Hills, or not rather by attacking and pressing hard upon Luceria, and daring the Victorious Enemy, take off the yoke from the Romans, and impose it on the proud necks of the Enemy? What was it but Expedition that gave the late Consul Lutatius a Victory? For the very next day after he got sight of the Enemy, setting upon their Fleet overfraught with Provisions, and encumbered with their own Munition, he compleatly destroyed them. 'Tis mere folly to think that by sitting still, or sluggish Prayers, we shall vanquish our Foes; Our Forces must buckle on their Armor, descend into the Plain, and charge them lustily man to man. 'Twas by daring and by doing, by bold Action and hardy Execution, that the Roman State hath arrived to this height of Empire and Glory, and not by those faint dreaming Counsels which Cowards call the wary Policies of War. Whilst Minucius made these Harangues, a multitude of the Roman Colonels and Gentlemen of the Cavalry flock about him; nor were the common Foot Soldiers unacquainted with his Rodomontado-Discourses, so that if it had been put to most voices amongst the Soldiers, 'tis not to be doubted but they would have preferred Minucius before Fabius their General.

XV. Fabius having an Eye to his own Men, as well as on the Enemy, and resolving first to shew that his mind was not by either of them to be conquered, though he well knew these delays were not only condemned in his Camp, but had rendered him censured and ill spoken of at Rome, yet he spent the whole Summer persisting in the same method; so that Annibal frustrated of his chiefest hopes of a desired Battel, was now to look out for Winter-Quarters, ters, for that Country afforded present, but not lasting Plenty, as abounding in Fruits and Vineyards, and such pleasant accommodations, rather than in Corn and the staple Necessaries of Life. Fabius by his Scouts was advertisd of this, and knowing that the Enemy must return by the same Streights, as he came in, to Falernum, seized on the Hill Callicula, and the City Casilinum, and Posts there sufficient Garisons; that City divided by the River Vulturnus, parting Falernum from Campania. Himself brings back his Forces through the same Hills, sending L. Hostilius Mancinus with Four hundred Horse of the Allies, to discover the posture of the Enemy. This Gentleman being one of the young Gallants that were wont to hear and admire the General of the Horse fiercely declaiming and spurring them on to Action, after he had advanced a pretty way, as only to gain Intelligence and view from some safe place the Enemy, lighting upon some few Numidians stragling through the Villages at an advantage, cut them off, and therewith his mind was so set upon Fighting, that he forgot the orders of the Dictator, who expressly commanded him, To march very warily, and to be sure to retreat before the Enemy got sight of him. The Numidians, now one party, and then another, sometimes charging and sometimes retreating, trail'd him on almost to their very Camp, thereby wearying both his Horses and Men. And then Cartalo, Commander in Chief of Annibals Cavalry, coming out with a full Body against him upon the Spur, before they came within Dart-shot put the Romans to flight, and had the pursuit of them for almost five miles together. At last, Mancinus seeing that neither the Enemy would give over the Chase, nor any hope was left to escape them, prevailed with his party to face about and Charge them; but being every way over-match'd, he himself, and the choicest of his Troops, were hemm'd in and slain, the rest in a scattered flight got first to Cales, and thence through By-lanes and unknown ways to the Dictator. Minucius, as it happened, the same day joyned Fabius, having before been abroad to Garison a Pass that lay between Tarracina and the Sea, lest Annibal, if the Appian Way were left without defence, should slip into the Roman Territories: The Dictator and General of the Horse, with united Forces, pitch'd their Camp in the very road where Annibal was to march and not above two miles distance from the Enemy.

The next day the Carthaginians drawing out their Men, took up all the space between the two Camps; and though the Romans were Posted just under their own Rampire, a place no doubt of great advantage, yet the Punics with their Light-Horse to provoke them to a Battel, came up and charg'd them sometimes near hand, by and by retiring, and then rallying afresh; yet still the Romans kept their Ground, the Encounter being slow, and more to the liking of the Dictator than of Annibal, of whose side Eight hundred wereslain, and but Two hundred of the Romans. Thenceforwards Annibal seem'd shut up, and as it were Besieged within Casilinum, whilst the Romans had Capua and Sammium, and other rich and powerful Nations, their Allies at their backs ready to bring them in Provision. On the contrary, the Punics were like to take up their Winter-Quarters between the Rocks of Formii, and the barren Sands of Linternum, and certain Lakes that yielded nothing but a prospect of horror. Nor was Annibal insensible that he was now out-done in his own Arts of Policy; therefore seeing he could not get off through Casilinum, but must take the Mountains, and march over the top of Callicula, fearing lest the Romans should fall upon his Army enclosed in the Vallies between the Hills, he contrived a Stratagem terrible to look at, to beguile their Eyes and frustrate their Expectations, and therewith resolv'd in the beginning of the Night to approach with all secrecy the Mountains: The parade of his device was thus; He caused to be gathered out of the adjoining Villages abundance of Fire-brands; then he took certain Bavins, or small Faggots of Bruil-wood and dry sticks, all which he tyed fast to the Horns of Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild a great number that he drove before him, amongst other Booties gotten out of the Country, making in all near Two thousand head of Cattel; ordering Asdrubal, That as soon as it grew duskish he should drive that Herd, with their Horns set on fire towards the Mountains, and as near as he could to those Passes where the Enemy kept Guard.

No sooner was it dark, but he dislodg'd his Army with great silence, the Oxen being driven a little before, and when they came near to the foot of the Hills and narrow Streights, upon a Signal given, the Bavins are lighted, and the Cattel violently forc'd up the Mountains, who being frighted as well with the Flames on their Heads, as especially by the heat and pain when they burnt down to the quick of their Horns, run every way about as if they had been mad, whereby as if all the Woods and Hills had been on a light Fire; the Coppices round about seem'd to blaze, and the tossing of their heads encreasing the Flame, look'd as if Men were running up and down with Torches and Flambeaus. The Guard appointed for those Passes seeing so many Lights on the tops of the Hills, and as it were over their Heads, concluding themselves circumvented, quitted their Posts, making towards the highest ridges of the Mountains, where they saw fewest Lights, as the safest places for their escape: There they lighted on some of the wandering Cattel, and first at a distance seeing them as breathing Flames, thought it a Miracle, and stood still in astonishment; but when they perceived it to be only an humane Trick, reckoning themselves betray'd betray'd and over-reach'd, with a sad cry they betook themselves to their heels, and stumbled upon some of the Enemies Van that were Light-arm'd; but on both sides they were afraid to begin any skirmish in the Night, and so little Action happened until next Day: Annibal in the mean time with his whole Army getting through the Streights, having there slain some of the Enemy, Encamped next Morning in the Alifan Territories.

XVIII. Fabius perceiv'd this Tumult, but imagining it might be some Trepan, and always hating Night-work, kept his Men within their Trenches. As soon as 'twas light there was a conflict on the top of the Hill, where the Romans being somewhat superior in number, would easily have vanquish'd the Enemies Light-arm'd Squadron, as having already hemm'd them in, had not Annibal sent back a Spanish Regiment, who being more used to Mountainous places, and more apt and ready to clamber over Rocks and Precipices, both by the agility of their Bodies, and the slightness of their Harnes, avoided, and were too hard in that kind of skirmish for their Enemies, who were heavy-arm'd, and went to fight on the Plain and keep their Ground, so that in this unequal Dispute almost all the Spaniards got off safe, and the Romans with some loss retreated to their Camp: Which Fabius presently removed, and passing the Streights sat down above Alifus, in a place high-situate and well fortified. After this, Annibal making as if he would march through Samium to-rights for Rome, returned back, wasting and spoiling the Country as far as to the Pelignians: And Fabius hovered still on the Hill-tops between them and Rome, neither keeping far off from the Enemy, nor yet closely engaging them. At last Annibal departed from the Peligni, and retired into Apulia as far as Gerione, a City, which upon the falling down of part of their Wall, was for fear abandoned by its Inhabitants. The Dictator Entrench'd his Army in the Country of Larinum, and being sent for home to Rome for dispatching certain solemn Sacrifices, he not only laid his Commands upon the General of the Horse to forbear fighting in his absence, but by way of Advice and Intreaty, did as it were beg of him, That he would rather trust Prudence than Fortune, and be guided by him, rather than follow the ruinous steps of Sempronius and Flaminius; That he would not think the time spent in vain, though there had been not much actual Fighting, for 'twas no contemptible service that they had kept so powerful an Enemy almost all the Summer in play, and by dallying with him prevented his designs; That Physicians sometimes by prescribing Rest, do as much good as with all their Purging and Bleeding; That it was no small matter, that we have left off being overcome by this Enemy, which so oft has worsted us of late, and that we have got some breathing time to refresh and recruit us after our losses. Having given these Admonitions (but all in vain) to the General of the Horse, away he went to Rome.

XIX. In the beginning of the Summer wherein these Occurrences happened in Italy, War was also begun in Spain both by Sea and Land. Asdrubal added ten new Ships to the number of those left him ready rigg'd and fitted by his Brother; and setting out of New Carthage with his Army, as they march'd on the shore, Himilco (whom he had made Admiral) with a Fleet of forty Sail coasted along by them; being thus prepared to fight the Romans, whether they should meet them at Land or Sea. Cn. Scipio, upon advice that the Enemy had taken the Field, thought at first to have done so too, but afterwards not judging it fit to hazard a Battel at Land, by reason of the reports of the vast Assistance that was come in to the Enemy, putting his choicest Soldiers on board, with a Fleet of five and thirty Sail he set out to Sea, resolving there to engage them. The second day after he look'd from Tarracone, he cast Anchor about three Leagues distant from the mouth of the River Iberus; and sent out two Marseillian Pinaces to discover the Enemy, who brought advice, That their Fleet rode in the Mouth of that River, and their Army lay Encamp'd just by upon the shore. Therefore that he might surprize them unprovided, and attack them with all the terror he could when they least expected it, he presently weighs Anchor and makes towards them. Along the Coasts of Spain there are many Towers, built upon the highest Grounds, which serve both for Beacons to discover, and also as Forts to withstand Thieves and Rovers. From thence the Fleet was first descry'd, and notice by a Signal given thereof to Asdrubal, so that the Alarm and Tumult began first at Land in the Camp, before it came to the Ships; for as yet there was no dashing of Oars, or other ordinary noise of Mariners heard, and the Capes on either side hinder'd the Enemies Fleet from being seen there where the Punicks lay, so that they were in full security; when on a sudden, certain Horse-men came one after another from Asdrubal, commanding the Soldiers (who were either wandering on the shoar, or asleep in their Tents, expecting nothing less than an Enemy and fighting that day) to get on board with all speed, and betake themselves to their Arms; for the Roman Navy was already not far from the Mouth of the Haven. Within a while, Asdrubal in Person with his whole Army drew down to the Sea-side, and all things are in an hurry, the Mariners and Soldiers promiscuously tumbling into their Ships in such confusion as if they had fled from shore, rather than were going to Sea to fight an Enemy. They were scarce all got on board when some began to put off, either weighing their Anchors, or for expedition cutting Cables; all that they did was with more haste than good speed; with the Soldiers harnessing themselves to fight, the Sea-men were were hindered in managing their Tackle; and the Sea-men bustle and running to and fro hinder'd the Soldiers in getting ready. By this time the Romans were not only come up with them, but had put their Fleet in a posture to begin the Engagement. The Carthaginians were no less disorder'd by the Tumult and hurly-burly of their own People, than by the attack of the Enemy; and having made a proffer of Fighting, rather than fought to any purpose, they tack'd about and fled, and the mouth of the River not being large enough to receive so many of them huddling in all together, they run their Vessels on ground any where, and the Men some waded, others leap'd on shore; some with their Arms, and some without, fled to their own Army, which stood drawn up in Battalia on the Strand: However, in the first On-set, two Carthaginian Ships were taken, and four sunk.

The Romans, though they saw the Enemy Masters at Land, and standing in Battel-array all along the Banks, yet they neglected not to pursue their trembling Fleet, and as many of the abandoned Ships as had not either broke their Stems on the shore, or stuck fast in the Sands by the Keels, they tow'd off to Sea; and so out of thirty Sail, carry'd away with them five and twenty: Nor was the taking of them so happy a fruit of their Victory, as that by this one slight Engagement they were Masters at Sea, and had all those Coasts at their devotion; therefore they sail'd to Honofca, and making a descent upon the Land, took that City by storm and plundered it; thence set forwards to New Carthage, plundered all the adjacent Country, and burn'd the Suburbs up to the very Walls and Gates. Well laden now with rich Pillage, the Fleet came before Loguntica, where Annibal had laid up abundance of Cordage for the use of his Navy, of which they took away as much as they need'd, and burnt the rest; nor were they content only to coast along the Continent, but stood over to the Isle Ebusus, and having for two days together assaulted the chief City of that Island; when they saw they did but spend time in vain, left it, pillaged the Country, burnt several Villages, and got better booty there than on the Main-land. Here arriv'd Ambassadors from the Balearian Isles to Treat with Scipio for Peace. After this steering his Course back again to the hither parts of his Province, Agents resorted to him on the same Errand from all the People that dwelt along the Iberus, and from many in the furthest parts of Spain, so that no less than One hundred and twenty several States or petty Nations, did then become absolute Subjects to the Roman Government, and gave Hostages for their faithful Obedience: By which means the Romans being reinforced at Land, made an Expedition as far as the Forrest of Castulo, and Asdrubal was glad to retire into Portugal near the Ocean Sea.

XXI. The rest of the Summer was like to be quiet, and had proved so for any thing considerable that the Carthaginians did to the contrary: But besides that, the natural temper of all Spaniards is restless, and desirous of new Commotions, Mandonius and Indibilis, who before was a petty King of the Illegetes, after the Romans were retreated from that Forrest towards the Sea-coasts, raising their Country-men in Arms, fell upon the peaceable Territories of the Romans Allies, and plundered them; against whom Scipio sent a Detachment of Three thousand, with some Auxiliaries lightly arm'd, who easily routed them, as being but a tumultuary Rabble, kill'd many, took some, and the rest generally fled away without their Arms. This Insurrection drew back Asdrubal, that before was marching towards the Ocean, to return on this side the Iberus to protect his Confederates. The Carthaginians lay encamped in the Lands of the Ilercaonians; the Romans near their new Armado, when sudden News arriv'd, That the War was diverted another way; for the Celtiberians, who had sent the principal Persons of their Country Ambassadors and Hostages to the Romans, being privately excited by a Message from Scipio, took Arms, and with a formidable Army invaded those parts which remained under the Carthaginian Government, storm'd three Towns, and afterwards bravely engaging Asdrubal himself in two set Battels, kill'd Fifteen thousand of his Men, and took Four thousand Prisoners, with many Military Standards and Colours.

XXII. The Affairs of Spain were in this posture, when P. Scipio arriv'd there, being sent by the Senate (who had continued his Command after his Consulship expired) with thirty long Ships, and Eight thousand Soldiers, and great store of Provisions, which at a distance seem'd a mighty Fleet by reason of the great number of Ships of Burthen that attended him, and with no small joy both of the Romans and their Associates, was welcom'd into the Port at Tarracon; where Scipio landing his Army, joined his Brother, and thenceforwards by united Councils and with one accord managed the War: Therefore whilst the Carthaginians had their hands full of the Celtiberian War, without any delay they pass'd the Iberus, and not finding any Enemy to oppose them, march'd directly for Saguntum, because 'twas reported, that the Hostages of all Spain delivered into the custody of Annibal, were kept there in the Castle, but with a small Guard about them. That was the only Pledge which kept all the Cities of Spain in awe, for though they were inclinable enough to enter into League with the Romans, yet they durst not do it, for fear it should cost them the Lives of their Children: But they were all eas'd of those apprehensions, by the crafty, rather than faithful Counsel of one Abelex, a Spanish Noble-man at Saguntum, that had hitherto join'd with, with, and been very trusty to the Carthaginians, but now (as 'tis the nature for the most part of these Barbarians) with this change of Fortune he resolv'd to shift his Party; and considering, that if he should fly to the Enemy without having done them some signal Service, they would not much esteem the accession of his Person, but look upon him as infamous and of no regard, and therefore applyed his mind to get these Hostages at liberty, as the greatest favor he could possibly do his Country-men, and the readiest means to bring over their chief Men to take part with the Romans. But well he knew, that without warrant from Boftar Governor of the Castle, those that had the custody of the Hostages would do nothing; he begins therefore to wheedle with Boftar himself, who at that time lay without the City by the Sea-side, to prevent the Romans from entering the Haven: After he had taken him aside in private Discourse, he represents to him the present state of Affairs, That it was only fear that had hitherto kept the Spaniards quiet and in obedience, because the Romans were too far off to assist or protect them; But now the Roman Army being advanced on this side the Iberus, will be a sure refuge, and ready to back them on in any Insurrection; and therefore seeing they could no longer be retained by fear, it would be the best way to secure their Affections by kindness, and some signal favor. Boftar in some admiration demanding, What Obligation was it possible for him now all of a sudden to lay upon them, that might be effectual for such a purpose? Why, quoth the other, send home the Hostages to their respective Cities: This will be a most welcome Courtesie both to their particular Parents and Relations, who are Persons of the first Quality and Interest in those places where they dwell; as also to the several Nations in general. Every man (you know) is desirous to be trusted, and for the most part Credit frankly given to any one, obliges him the more firmly to be faithful. The charge of conducting home the Hostages I desire may be committed to me, that I may by my pains improve this my Counsel to the best advantage; and as the thing in it self cannot but be very acceptable, so I may by Words represent the greatness of the Obligation in its fairest colours. Having with such Discourses perswaded the Man (who happened not to be so subtle and crafty as most Carthaginians were wont to be,) away steals he privately in the Night to the Roman Guards, and meeting with some Spaniards that served there as Auxiliaries, was by them carried to Scipio, and acquainted him with the Affair. And after mutual promises of secrecy and performance, and a time and place agreed on for delivering the Hostages into his hands, returns as secretly back again to Saguntum, and spent the next day with Boftar, in receiving his Orders, telling him, He would carry the Youths out in the Night, the better to avoid the Enemies Guards; so about the hour appointed, he called up those that had them in their Custody, and began his Journey; and as if he had been altogether ignorant of what happened, led them directly to the place where the Romans, by his own treachery, lay in Ambush to intercept them, being conducted into the Roman Camp. The Hostages were surrendered to their respective Relations by the Romans as their own act, but freely in all respects, as Boftar had intended to deliver them, and as if it had been transacted in the name of the Carthaginians; yet the Romans got more good will and greater thanks, than the Carthaginians could have expected in doing the very same courtesie: For the Spaniards having experienc'd them to be Proud and Oppressive whilst their Affairs were prosperous, would have concluded this Kindness to be an effect only of their present fear and weak condition: But Scipio, being before unknown, conciliated a great opinion of his Clemency and good Nature, by so liberal and generous an Action at his first coming amongst them: And Abelox was look'd upon as a prudent Man, that had not without good Reason exchanged the Friendship of the former for that of the latter. Henceforward the Spaniards, with one consent, were studying a Revolt, and they had presently taken Arms, but that the Season of the Year obliged both Romans and Carthaginians to break up the Campaign, and betake them to their Winter-Quarters.

XXIII. These were the Occurrences that pass'd in Spain the second Summer of the Punic War, whilst in Italy the Politick delays, and wariness of Fabius, gave the Romans some intermission and breathing-time after their several Defeats; which, as it did not a little vex Annibal, and put him to his trumps, to see that now at last the Romans had made choice of a General that was resolved to manage the War according to Reason and Judgment, and not hazard any thing upon the Capricio's of Fortune: So on the other side, this wise Conduct of his, was slighted and condemned amongst his own Citizens, as well the Soldiery abroad, as the Gown-men at home, especially after it happened, That in his absence the General of the Horse had rashly fought the Enemy, with a Success more joyful and applauded, than really great or advantagious. Besides, there were two other things that contributed to make the Dictator the worse thought of; one contrived by the deceitful Policy of Annibal, who being told by some Renegades, which were the Dictators particular Lands, when he utterly destroyed the Country round about, and laid all level with the Ground, gave a strict charge to his Soldiers, to forbear all acts of Hostility there, and not to touch any of his Estate, Tenants or Possessions either with Fire or Sword, or do them the least injury; on purpose to raise Jealousies, as if the Dictator held secret Intelligence with him, and that this preservation of his Lands were but a reward paid for his suffering him to go on so

so long plundering and wasting others without controul: The other, arose from an Action of his own, at the first indeed suspicious (because done without waiting for the Senates Commission and Approbation) but in the up-shot redounding, no doubt, to his singular praise and honor: It was about Exchange of Prisoners; for having Capitulated with the Enemy (as had been formerly practised in the first Punic War) That Prisoners should be mutually released, and that side that received more than they gave, to pay the other Two pound and an half of Silver [between seven and eight pounds sterling] for every Head. It happened, that Fabius received Two hundred and forty seven Prisoners more than he could ballance; and the Senate, after a long Debate of the matter, because he had not Directions therein from them, delayed to raise the Silver which was by the aforesaid Agreement to be paid for them [amounting to near Two thousand pound of our money.] Whereupon sending his Son to Rome, he made sale of his Estate which the Enemy had spared, and with the money discharged the Debt to Annibal, chusing rather to part with his private Fortune, than bring a scandal on the Publick-Faith of his Country, which he had engaged. Annibal lay encamped under the Walls of Gerion, a City which he had taken and burnt, all but a few Houles reserved for Granaries to lay his Corn in; and to replenish them therewith, sent abroad two thirds of his Forces to bring in all the Grain they could find in the Neighboring Countries; with the rest he remained in Person, and kept them almost always in Arms, both for securing his Camp, and to be in readiness to relieve those that were abroad, if they should happen to be attack'd.

XXIV. The Roman Army was then in the Territories of Larinum, Commanded by Minucius General of the Cavalry, the Dictator being gone to Rome as aforesaid: But the Camp which he left on an high Hill and place of safety, was now carried down into the Plain, and according to the temper of the present chief Commander, it was agitated in the Council of War, either to set upon those Detachments of the Enemy Foraging the Country, or else to storm their Camp now left but with an inconsiderable Guard. Nor was Annibal insensible, that together with the Commander, the whole conduct of the War was chang'd, and that now they would act with more fury than discretion; therefore, though the Enemy were advanced nearer him, he continued still (which a Man would scarce believe) to send out one third part of his Army to gather in Harvest, and kept the other two at the Camp, which he also removed nearer to the Romans, almost two miles from Gerion, and Posted himself on a small Hill in view of the Enemy, to let them perceive that he was ready to rescue and defend his Men that were getting in the Corn, if they were Charged. There he spyed another Hill nearer unto, and standing as it were over the Roman Camp; for the gaining whereof (since if he should have attempted it in the day, the Enemy would undoubtedly prevent him, and seize it first themselves, as being next it) he sent out in the Night a party of Numidians, who posted themselves thereon; but the next day, the Romans making nothing of so small a number, drove them thence, and removed thither their Tents; so as then there was but a very small distance between one Camp and the other, and that too almost taken up by the Romans, who out of a back Port dispatch'd their Cavalry and Light-arm'd Foot to fall upon the Enemy that were at Harvest-work, and as they were scattered through the Fields, cut off many, and put the rest to flight: Nor durst Annibal issue out to encounter the Enemy in the open Field, having scarce enough with him to defend his Works if assaulted; so that now, whilst part of his Army was absent, he was forced to imitate the Conduct of Fabius, by sitting still as it were, and keeping the Enemy at staves-end, and retreating fairly to his former Camp, under the Walls of Gerion. Some Authors write, that they fought a pitched Battel, wherein at the first Charge the Punics were routed even to their Camp; but thence, falling out with greater violence, repulsed the Romans, and had defeated them, but they were re-inforced by the seasonable coming in of Numerius Decimus a Samnite: A Person both for his Quality, Interest and Wealth, the most considerable, not only in Bovianum where he dwelt, but indeed throughout all Samnium, who by the Dictators order was marching at the Head of Eight thousand Foot and Two hundred Horse to the Roman Camp; and when he first appeared, both Parties flattered themselves with hopes of fresh assistance, but by and by the noise went, That it was Fabius returning from Rome: whereupon Annibal fearing to be enclosed, began to retreat, and was hard pursued by the Romans, who also that day with the Samnites help, storm'd and took two fortified Boroughs or Castles: There were slain Six thousand of the Enemy, and very near Five thousand of the Romans; but though there were no greater disproportion in the loss, the rumor ran to Rome of a mighty Victory which was encreased by the vain-boasting Letters of the General of the Horse, to the same purpose.

XXV. Upon which Intelligence, the maner of managing the War was frequently debated both in the Senate, and before the People in the Common-Hall: All the City being overjoy'd at the News, only the Dictator alone declared, That he knew not how to credit either Common Fame, or the Letters themselves: And suppose all that they talk'd of were true, yet for his part he was always more afraid under the smiles, than frowns of Fortune. Whereupon

M. Me-

M. Metilius, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, made the following Harangue. "This above all (quoth he) is not to be suffer'd, That the Dictator should not only, when he is present in the Camp, oppose and hinder all gallant Enterprizes against the Enemy, but reproach and disgrace those brave Actions which are atchieved now he is absent; That he should thus spin out the War on purpose to continue himself the longer in his Office, and be the only Man to govern all, both at home in the City, and abroad in the Field; since one of the Consuls was slain, the other is pack'd out of the way far enough from Italy, on pretence of pursuing the Carthaginian Fleet; and as for the two Prætors, he has employ'd them in Sicily and Sardinia, though there was at this time no need of their presence in either of those Provinces. M. Minucius, General of the Cavalry, he has all this while kept as it were a Prisoner, scarce letting him see the Enemy, much less suffering him to engage them. Thus verily not only Sammium (the possession whereof was as freely abandon'd to the Punicks, as if it had lain on the other side the River Iberus in Spain) but all Campania, Calenum, and the Falernian Territories, are suffered to be miserably wasted with Fire and Sword, whilst the Dictator lay quietly at Caslinum, and with the Legions of the People of Rome defended his own petty Farm and private Possessions; when both the Army and General of the Horse were zealous to have fought the Enemy, they were prohibited, and confined, as it were, not to budge out of their Entrenchments, and their Arms taken from them, as if they had been Captive Enemies: But no sooner were their hands at liberty by the Dictators absence, but like Men delivered from a Siege, they bravely fall out upon the Enemy, and routed and put them to flight. All which considered, if the Commons of Rome had the same mettle which they had in days of old, I would not scruple to prefer a Bill for depriving Q. Fabius of his Office: but at present I shall only propound a more moderate course, That the General of the Horse be made equal with the Dictator in Authority, yet so, as that notwithstanding Fabius be not sent to the Army until he shall first have ordain'd another Consul in the room of C. Flaminius.

The Dictator forbore to come into any of these Assemblies of the People, as being a Man not vers'd in making Speeches, and far from aiming at Popularity; nor was he, even in the Senate, heard without sufficient prejudice, when he either extoll'd the strength and policy of the Enemy, or related the Overthrows that for two years past had been received by the rashness and ignorance of their own Commanders, and told them, That the Master of the Horse ought to be call'd to an account for presuming to fight contrary to his express Orders; adding, That if he might have the supreme Command, and his Counsels obeyed, he doubted not but in a little time to convince Men, That a wise General ought not much to regard Fortune, but to be altogether ruled by Reason and sound Judgment: And that for his own part, he should always esteem it a greater Honor to have, in so calamitous a Juncture, preserved the Army without any loss or disgrace, than if he had slain many thousands of the Enemy. But finding them deaf to all these Discourses, having Created M. Attilius Regulus Consul; that he might not so much as by his presence seem to stickle in the Question concerning his own Government, the day before the matter was to be determined by the Peoples suffrages, he departed in the Evening towards the Army. Next Morning, when the Commons were assembled, Men seem'd rather secretly in their hearts to envy the Dictator, and favor the General of the Horse, than willing to be seen openly to set forward and perswade a Business which was no less without precedent than against Reason, and therefore, though the Bill were exceedingly well liked of, yet there wanted some Person of Note to give it Credit and Authority: At length one stept up publicly to promote it, viz. C. Terentius Varro, who the Year before had been Prætor, a person not only of a mean but sordid Extraction; for his Father, 'tis said, was a Butcher, and kept a Stall, and train'd up this Son of his in the same servile Occupation.

XXVI. This Varro being a young Man, and having a pretty Estate left by his Father, scrap'd together by the aforesaid Trade, it rais'd his mind to hopes of a more liberal Fortune; and that he might live like a Gentleman, he became a kind of Solicitor, or Splitter of Causes, got him a Gown, and haunted the Publick Assemblies and Courts of Judicature, where by Declaiming for vile Persons and worse Causes, and bespattering the good name of honest Citizens and Men of Repute, he soon became the Oracle of the Rabble, and mounted himself into Preferment: Having been Chamberlain of the City, and born both Ædileships, as well that of the Chair as that of the Commons; and at length gone through the Office of Prætor, he now began to aspire to the Consulship, and in order thereunto, did craftily endeavor to insinuate himself into Popular favor by means of that ill-conceit which they generally had of the Dictator, and so was the only man in Vogue with the Mob; for every Body, friends and foes, as well those at Rome as the Army (except it were only the Dictator himself) concluded the passing that Bill, would redound to his disgrace and reproach: But Fabius, with the same gravity and even temper of mind as he had received the Clamors of his Enemies bawling against him to the Crowd, entertain'd this Injustice of the Commons; and having on his Journey received Letters, importing the Decree of the Senate, for dividing his Authority equally with the General of the Cavalry, being satisfied, That though they had parted his Power, they could not diminish his skill and sufficiency in Conduct, nor communicate any share thereof to the other, returned to his Army with a Soul not to be conquered either by the Ingratitude of his own Citizens, or the Power of the Enemy.

But Minucius, who before was grown almost intolerable, what with his petty successes, and the favor of the Populace, began now to hector and rant beyond all bounds of modesty, boasting no less that he conquered Fabius, than that he had worsted Annibal; "That very Fabius who in a time of distress (says he) was sought out as the only fit match for Annibal, is now by an Ordinance of the People (a thing never before heard of in any Chronicle) equaliz'd with my self, the greater with the lesser, the Dictator with the Master of the Horse, and this too in that City where Generals of the Horse were wont to dread and tremble at the Dictators Rods and Axes; so illustrious is my Valor and Success become in all Mens eyes: I will therefore henceforwards follow the auspicious conduct of my own Fortune, if the Dictator shall still persist in his wonted sloth and cowardize, already condemn'd by the Verdict both of Gods and Men. Accordingly the first day that he and Fabius met together, he told him, That in the first place it would be necessary they should agree after what manner they should exercise this equal Authority and Command; For his part he thought it best, That every other day, or after what longer Interval should be concluded on, each of them should alternately one after the other, have the full, whole and sole Command of all the Forces; That if any occasion of Fighting were presented, there might be one ready equal not only in Counsel, but also in numbers and strength to engage the Enemy. This did not at all please Fabius, as fore-seeing that whatever his rash Colleague should have the dispose of, would certainly be at the arbitrament of Fortune: Therefore he reply'd, That he was indeed to impart unto him an equal Government and Command, but not wholly to depart from, or at any time exclude himself from the same: That he should never be willing to fail in managing such part of Affairs as was still intrusted with him, according to the maxims of Prudence, and therefore would not divide days or times with him, but the Armies; and since he was not permitted to save all, would endeavor to preserve as much as he could by those wary Counsels which he had hitherto practis'd, and found no cause to repent of. Thus he prevailed, that they divided the Legions between them as Consuls are wont to do: The first Legion and the fourth happened to Minucius's Lot, the second and third to Fabius; after the same manner they shared by equal numbers the Horse and Auxiliary Forces of the Allies. Moreover, Minucius would needs have them separated in several distinct Camps.

As Annibal by Renegades and his own Spies had continual notice of all that pass'd in the Enemies Army, so upon this Intelligence he hugg'd himself, as conceiving a two-fold occasion of Joy; for first, he doubted not but he should deal well enough with the lavish temerity of Minucius, and fit him in his own kind: And as for the politick Fabius, he was now deprived of half his strength. There happened to be an Hill between the Carthaginian and Minucius's Camp, and there was no doubt but he that could gain it first would have a notable advantage of the Ground; yet was not Annibal so desirous only to seize it without resistance (though that were well worth while) as thereby to draw on Minucius to a Battel, who he knew would be forward enough to encounter him. The Plain that lay betwixt that and Minucius, at first sight seem'd altogether unfit for stratagems, so far from being Woody, that there was not a Bush or a Bramble growing on it; but indeed it was naturally framed for an Ambuscade, the rather because in so naked and open a Valley no such matter could be expected, yet there were in certain nooks and by-places, several hollow Rocks or Caves under ground, some of which would receive Two hundred Armed men apiece. In these Coverts he in the Night plants Five thousand Horse and Foot, as many as each hole would contain and hide out of sight; and left any of them starting out unadvisedly, or the glittering of their Armor should in so open a Plain discover the trick, as soon as 'twas light he sent out a small Party to seize the aforesaid Hill, and thereby diverted the Enemies eyes another way. The Romans no sooner saw them, but contemning such a small sorry company, every one was eager to be at them, and chase them thence; and their General Minucius was as hot as the fiercest to call them to their Arms to regain the place, with no little vanity braving and threatening the Enemy. First, he sent out his Light-harnes'd men to skirmish; then his Horse in a close Body; at last seeing continual Reliefs sent to the Enemy, he marches forth with all his Legions in Battel array. Annibal too, as from time to time he saw his Men distressed, and one Conflict growing upon another, dispatching forth continually Parties of Horse and Foot, had brought the Main-body of his Army into the Field, so that now they tugg'd for it on either side with all the Forces they had. The Romans Forlorn-hope of Light-armed Men that endeavored to get up the Hill where the Enemy was Posted, being beat back and thrust down, affrighted and disorder'd the Horse that followed them, and fled for refuge to the Standards of the Infantry, who alone, when all the rest were in confusion, stood undaunted; and had the Fight been fair and upon equal terms, were like enough to have made their party good against the Enemy, so much had their late success encouraged them; but when on a sudden the Ambush started forth round about them, they caused such a tumult and terror by Charging them all at once on both Flanks, and Rear, that they had neither hearts to fight, nor hopes to escape by flying.

XXIX.

Then it was when Fabius hearing first their out-cries of fear, and presently seeing from afar off their Battel disordered; I thought even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, has misfortune overtaken inconsiderate rashness; The man that would needs be equaliz'd in Command with Fabius, sees now that Annibal is his Superior both in Valor and Fortune: But there will be a fitter time to chide and be angry in; at present hasten out with your Standards, and let us at once wrest the Victory out of the hands of the Enemy, and a confession from the mouths of our Fellow-Citizens of their Error. There were by this time abundance slain, and the rest looking about which way they might most safely run, when Fabius's Army shew'd it self on a sudden, as sent down from Heaven to their succor, causing such an alteration in the Scene of the Battel, that before he could come within reach of Dart, or near enough to strike one stroke, he not only stopt his Fellow-Citizens from their tumultuous flight, but abated the fury of the Enemy. Those that before were scattered, began to rally from all parts to the intire Body, and many that in heaps had taken their heels, face about, and wheeling to the Right or Left, whilst some retire a little in good order, others advance; so that now both those that had been routed, and those that stood firm, became reduced into one orderly Battel, and began to Charge the Enemy: But Annibal immediately sound-ed a Retreat, and openly acknowledged, That as he had defeated Minucius, so Fabius had been too hard for him. The greater part of the day being spent in these vicissitudes of Fortune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minucius assembling his Soldiers, spake to them after this manner: "I have often heard, Fellow Soldiers! that he is the ablest Man that does of himself know what is best to do: and in the next place, he that hearkens to good counsel from others: But he that has neither the Wit to advise himself, nor the modesty to be guided by those that are Wiser, is of a deplorable temper and good for nothing: Since therefore we have not had the happiness to deserve to be numbered in the first Rank, let us not neglect the second; but whilst we are learning to Command, resolve to obey those that are more prudent than our selves; let us forthwith go and join Camp with Fabius, and when we have brought our Standards up to his Pavilion, and when you shall hear me call him Father (which both the late benefit we have received from him, and the Majesty of his Virtue well deserves) do you all salute those his Soldiers, by whose Arms and Hands you were just now preserved, by the name of your Patrons, so shall this day yield us, if nothing else, yet at least, the glory of having had grateful Hearts, though none of the most prudent Heads.

XXX.

This said, he gave orders to pack up Bag and Baggage, and away they March in good order towards the Dictators Tent, to his great wonder, and the astonishment of all that were with him: When they had stuck down their Ensigns before his Tribunal, the General of the Horse advancing a little before the rest, salutes Fabius, calling him Father; and presently all his Army congratulate their Fellow-Soldiers that were under him, as their Patrons: After their shout was over, Minucius thus continued his Discourse, "To my Parents, Most Honored Dictator! (to whom as much as my Tongue can express, I have just now equalld you in Title) I owe only my Life, but to you both the preservation of that Life of mine, and of the Lives of all these that were lately under my separate Command; That Act of the Commons with which I was rather exposed, than honor'd, I myself do first of all repeal and disclaim, and may it be prosperous to you and me, and both our Armies, as well the Conservators as the Preserved; I do again submit my self to your Command and auspicious Conduct, and restore you these, these your Ensigns and Legions, intreating, that pardoning my past Follies, you will please to continue me in the same Quality of General of the Horse, and all these, every one in his former rank and condition. Then did they lovingly shake hands, and the Soldiers dismiss'd from the Assembly, began to Treat and Carels each other, as well those that were Strangers, as those who before were acquainted with one another, and so that became a joyful day, but even now was so sad and like to prove fatal. When the rumor of this accident arrived at Rome, and was confirm'd by the Letters not only of the Commanders, but of the common Soldiers too unto their Relations, every one did praise and applaud Maximus up to the Skies; nor was his glory less with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who then at length began to perceive, That they had to deal with Romans, and were indeed waging a War in Italy; for so much had they for the last two years despised both the Roman Leaders and their Soldiers, that they could hardly believe they were engaged against the same Nation, of whose Conduct and Courage they had heard such terrible Stories from their Fathers. Annibal himself, as he was retreating out of the Field, is reported to have said: At last that Cloud which hover'd so long over our heads on the Mount-tops, is broke down upon us in a Storm.

Whilst

Whilst Italy was the Scene of these Actions, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Consul, with a Fleet of One hundred and twenty Ships, sail'd round the Coasts of Sardinia and Corfica, and having received Hostages of both Isles, steer'd his Course for Africk; but before he made any descent upon the Continent, plundered the Island Meninx, and wasted it with Fire and Sword, and had served Cercina the same sauce, but that its Inver [or One thousand eight hundred seventy and five pounds sterling] paid down upon the Nail. Then he brought up his Fleet to the African shore, landed his Forces, who presently both Soldiers and Sea-men fell to Forraging the Country, as disorderly, as if they had been rifling some Island that had scarce any People in it; by which rashness they fell into Ambuscades, as they were stragling abroad and ignorant of the Coast, being enclosed by vast numbers; and after a great slaughter made of them, the rest were shamefully put to flight and beat back to their Ships, having lost a thousand Men, and amongst them Sempronius Blasius the Quæstor; whereupon the Fleet in all hast and consternation put off from the Shore, which was all full of the Enemy, and stood away for Sicily: When they arriv'd at Lilybaeum, the Navy was committed to the charge of T. Otacilius the Prætor, to be convey'd home to Rome by P. Sura his Lieutenant. The Consul himself crossing Sicily by Land, hastned over the Narrow Sea into Italy, for both he and his Colleague M. Atilius, were summon'd by Letters from Fabius, to receive from his hands the charge of the Army, the term of his six months supreme Government being almost expired. All Historians almost relate, that these Exploits against Annibal were perform'd by Fabius as Dictator: And Caecilius affirms further, that he was at first created Dictator by the People; but both he and the rest do not consider, that the power of creating a Dictator was solely in the only surviving Consul Cn. Servilius, who was then remote in France his peculiar Province; and the City terrified with a late overthrow, not being able to wait so long till he should return, were forc'd to this Expedient, That the People should chuse one in the room or stead of a Dictator: But by reason of the signal Services by him performed, and his deserved Glory and Renown, and his Posterity augmenting the Title on his Statue, it easily happened, that instead of Pro-Dictator, he was generally stiled Dictator.

The two new Consuls, M. Atilius, and Geminus Servilius, having received the Forces; the former, those that were under Fabius whilst he acted separately; and the latter, those that had been under Minucius, settled and fortified their Winter-Quarters very early, for 'twas then but Autumn: They managing the War with the greatest Concord imaginable between themselves, and following the same politick Course as Fabius had done before them. When Annibal sent out Parties to fetch in Corn, they met with them opportunely in several places, falling on their Rear and picking up stragglers; but still would not run the hazard of a general Battel, which the Enemy by all kind of Arts, sought to provoke and draw them unto: For being in a strange Country, and not able to get in Provisions, were so put to it for Necessaries, that Annibal, but for shame lest his Retreat should be counted a running away, would even then have gone back again into Gallia, finding it impossible for his Forces to subsist in those parts, if the succeeding Consuls should manage the War after the same method. Whilst by reason of the Winter the War was at a stand near Gerion, Ambassadors arrived at Rome from Naples, who being admitted to Audience, presented the Senate with forty massy Boles or Goblets all of beaten Gold, of a very great weight, and one of them made a Speech to this effect: That they were not insensible that the Roman Exchequer must needs be much exhausted by this War; and since the same is waged as well for and on the behalf of the Cities and Territories of their Allies, as for the City of Rome, the Metropolis and Bulwark of all Italy, and for the Sovereign Empire of this part of the World, The People of Naples thought it but just and reasonable to assist them with what Gold their Ancestors had left them either for Ornament, or to relieve them in a time of necessity, and if they could think of any other thing wherein they might be serviceable, they would frankly offer it with the same zealous affections; That they should take it as a favor, if their Lordships and the People of Rome, would please to esteem whatever the Neopolitans did possess, as their own; and in particular, if they would vouchsafe to accept this small Present, infinitely more considerable, in respect of the good Will and hearty Intentions of those who make it, than in regard of the thing it self. The Senate returned thanks to the Ambassadors for this munificent offer and loving care of their Affairs, but would accept only one Bole, and that too of the least weight of them all.

About the same time a Carthaginian Spy was taken at Rome, that had resided there for two years space unsuspected, both his hands were cut off, and so he was dismissed; also Five and twenty Slaves were Crucified for a Conspiracy contrived in the Campius Martius, their companion that discovered them had his Freedom given him, and Twenty thousand pieces of Bras money (about 60 l. 2 s. 6 d. sterling) for a Reward. Ambassadors were dispatch'd to Philip King of Macedonia, to demand Demetrius Pharius to be delivered up to them, who being vanquish'd in the Field, had fled to him for shelter: And others sent to the Ligurians to expostulate with them for having assisted the Carthaginians with Men and Money; and also to take notice, when they were so near, how the Boii and People of Milvain stood affected, feated, and in what posture they were. A third Ambassay was address'd as far as Sclavonia, to King Pineus, to demand the Tribute, the day of payment being past; or if he desired longer time, then to take new Hostages of him for security. Thus provident were the Romans, that notwithstanding that dreadful War which lay so near and heavily upon their shoulders, yet no one Affair, how remote soever, was neglected. Likewise in point of Religion, being conscious, That the Temple which L. Manlius the Prator had two years before, when the Soldiers were in a Mutiny in Gallia, Vowed to the Goddess Concord, was not as yet put out to Work-men to be built; therefore Amilius the City Prator, created Cn. Pupius and Cæso Quintius Flaminius, Duumvirs to take care of that Affair, who ordered the Temple to be built upon the Capitol Hill. The same Prator, by the Senators Order, wrote to the Consuls, That if they thought fit, one of them should repair to Rome for creating new Consuls, and that he would appoint a Common-Hall to be held on such a day as they should appoint. Who returned Answer, That they could not without hazard and prejudice to the Commonwealth, depart from the Army, lying so near a dangerous Enemy; and therefore thought it would be better to hold the Elections by an Inter-regent, than to recal either of them from the War. But the Senate was rather of Opinion, To have a Dictator chosen by one of the Consuls only for holding that Court, and accordingly L. Veturius Philo was nominated, who made Pomponius Matro Master of the Horse. But these being not duly Created, were commanded at a Fortnights end to give over their Places, and so it came to an Inter-regency.

XXXIV. The Consuls were continued in their Command over the Army for a Year longer. The Senators named for Inter-regents, first, Cn. Claudius Cento, the son of Appius, and after him P. Cornelius Asina, in whose time the Assemblies for Election were held, with much debate and struggling between the Nobles and the Commons: The vulgar People endeavoring to advance unto the Consulship C. Terentius Varro, a Man of their own condition, and who had mightily insinuated into their favor by opposing himself and contesting with great Personages, and by other popular practices; as particularly by abasing the Power of Fabius and the Majesty of the Dictatorship, for indeed he had nothing else to recommend him, but an envious malicious mind, always industrious to bring others into disgrace. The Nobles opposed this Choice with all the Interest they could make, lest it should become a Custom for Men to hope to raise themselves to be their Equals, merely by quarrelling with and aspersing them. Q. Bæbius Herennius, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, and a Relation of Varro's, clamored not only against the Senate, but blam'd the Augurs too, because they did not suffer the late Dictator to go on with the Elections; and by drawing them into hatred, sought to advance the Interest of his Kinsman, telling the People, *That as Annibal was first brought into Italy by the means of the Nobility, who for many years had desired nothing more than War, so the same Persons, now he is come, use all Artifices to prolong and spin out the same, which might else have been ended long ago. For when 'twas apparent that the compleat Power of the four Legions all together, were a sufficient match for the Enemy, by the success that Minucius had whilst Fabius was absent; a Contrivance was set on foot, That two Legions only should engage them, who being first exposed as it were to be hewn in pieces, must afterwards (forsooth) be rescued when they are half slain: and what was all this for? That Fabius might be stiled Father and Patron, even he that first hindered the Romans from vanquishing the Enemy, before he saved them from being vanquish'd. The Consuls afterwards followed those Arts of Fabius, and drill'd out the War, when they might easily have finish'd it with Victory: A Confederacy, no doubt, this is amongst all the Noblemen, nor can we ever hope to see a good end put to the War, until you shall chuse for a Consul a mere Commoner indeed, that is to say, some new man that has nothing to boast of his Ancestors, nor is yet tainted with these Patrician Arts: For those who of Commoners are made Noble, are all alike, of the same Cabal, and driving on the same Design; and ever since they themselves are grown great with the Patricians, do no less than they, disdain the Commonalty. For who sees not, that in seeking to have an Inter-regency, their only reach and design was, that the Election might be wholly in the power and management of the Senators? This was it which the Consuls aim'd at in staying both with the Army, and when a Dictator was chosen against their Wills to hold the Elections, they intrigu'd with the Augurs to set him aside, upon frivolous pretences of his not being duly Created, and wanting some of the lucky Presages; but let them enjoy their Inter-regency: 'Tis certain, one of the Consulships does of right belong to the Commons of Rome, and certainly the People in their free Election will rather confer that Dignity on a Person that resolves to vanquish the Enemy, and put a speedy end to the War, than upon such as only endeavor to perpetuate their own power of domineering.*

XXXV. The Commons were so enflamed with these Harangues, that though there were three Competitors of the ancient Nobility, P. Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Volso, and M. Æmilius Lepidus, and two Commoners that by their own, or their Ancestors bearing of Honorable Offices were become Noble; viz. C. Atilius Serranus, and Q. Ailius Pætus, of whom one was Pontiff, the other an Augur, yet C. Terentius was chosen Consul, and alone by himself, that so he might have the power of holding the Assembly wherein the People were to chuse another to be his Colleague. Then the Nobility perceiving, that none of their Candidates could prevail, put forward L. Æmilius Paulus, who had formerly been Consul with M. Livius, and when he was condemn'd, narrowly escap'd, a man of all others most mischievously bent against the Commons, him, I say, they urged to stand for the other Consulship, though though he refused a long time, and alledged many Reasons against it; but at last he was prevailed with, and the next Court-day all the rest of the Candidates that had opposed Varro, having quitted their Pretensions, he was chosen, not so much to be a Colleague and Assistant to the said Varro, as to be a fit match to thwart and cross him. After which they proceeded to the choice of Prators, and Elected Manius Pomponius Matro, and P. Furius Philus, the first by Lot was to have Jurisdiction over Free-men, and the other between Free-men and Foreigners: Two other Prators were added, M. Claudius Marcellus to be sent into Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus into the Cisalpine Gallia: All these were Created in their absence, and except Terentius the Consul, there was not one of them but had born the same Office before, several stout and able Men being pass'd by, because in such a difficult time it was not thought fit to prefer any Man to an Office in which he was unexperienced.

The Armies also were augmented, but to what proportion either of Horse or Foot, I XXXVI. cannot certainly affirm, Authors do so much vary in their Accounts, both of the number and kind of the new-raisd Forces. Some say there was a supply of Ten thousand Soldiers listed; others, that were four new Legions added, and so eight Legions of Romans in all employed. But the number as well of Horse as Foot in each Legion, was likewise increased, 1000 Foot and 100 Horse being added, so that every Legion consisted of 5000 Foot and 300 Horse. And that the Allies and Confederate Nations should find as many Foot, and double the number of Horse as were Enroll'd of Romans. Some Historians write, That at the Battel at Canna, the Roman Camp was Eighty seven thousand and two hundred strong; but in this all agree, that there were greater Preparations made, and things carried on with more heat and vigor, because the Dictator had put them in good hopes that the Enemy might at once be subdued. Before the new Levyed Troops advanc'd from Rome, the Decemvirs were commanded to repair to and inspect the Sybilline Books, because Peoples minds were terrified with several Prodigies of late; for it was reported, That both at Rome on the Aventine Hill, and also at a Town called Aricia, it had rain'd Stones much about the same time; and that in Sabinum, out of a certain Fountain, issued hot Waters intermingled with abundance of Blood, which was taken to be a sign of some mighty Slaughter, and did the more affright People, because the same had happened divers times one after another. And in the Street called Fornicata in Rome, several Persons were struck dead with Lightning, which ill Portents were all expiated according to the Prescriptions of the aforesaid Books. Agents from the City Pæstum in Lucania, brought to Rome a Present of several Golden Boles, whom, as to those of Naples, the Senate returned their Thanks, but would not receive any of their Gold.

At this time arriv'd at Ostia a Fleet from King Hiero, with great store of Provisions: The XXXVII. Syracusan Ambassadors, being introduced into the Senate-House, declared, "That their Master, King Hiero, as soon as he received the sad Tidings of the death of the Consul C. Flaminius and the defeat of his Army, was so much concern'd, that no misfortune of his own, or calamity happening to his Kingdom, could have afflicted him more sensibly; "Therefore though he well knows such is the magnanimity of the People of Rome, as to be "more admirable under the most threatening shocks of adverse Fortune, than in their Prosperity, yet he had taken care to send them all such things as good Friends are wont to furnish "their Allies with, in time of War, and did heartily request their Lordships acceptance "thereof: And in the first place, for luck-sake, and as an Omen of Success, they had brought "the Image of Victory in Gold, weighing 320 pounds, which they desired them to receive, "and hold and enjoy as their own for ever. Moreover, they had transported with them, "Three hundred thousand Modii of Wheat, and Two hundred thousand Modii of Barley [a "Modius is said to contain almost half a Bushel of our Measure] to the end they might "not be in straits for Provision; And that they were ready to bring in as much more "as they should have occasion for, to any Port which they should appoint. As for Foot- "men heavily Arm'd, and Cavalry, he knew the People of Rome were not wont to employ "any but either Natural Romans, or at least of some of the Latine Nations; but having seen "in their Camp some Light-harnes'd men that were Foreigners, he had sent them a Thou- "sand Archers and Slingers, a competent Force to mate the Baleareans, Moors, and other "Nations, that us'd such kind of Weapons as did Execution at a distance. To which Presents they also added this Advice, "That the Prator that should happen to have the "charge of Sicily, would sail with the Fleet over into Africk, to find the Enemy work at "home, that they might feel the smart of War in their own Bowels, and be the less able to "send Recruits to Annibal. The Senate return'd this Answer, That King Hiero had done the part of a right good Man and a most excellent Ally, who ever since he entred into Amity with the People of Rome, had kept the same constant tenor of Fidelity and Friendship, and never fail'd but at all times and places had assisted and advanced the State of Rome with all bounteous Munificence, which good will of his, the People of Rome took in very kind part, and most thankfully, as they had reason. As for Gold, some other Cities had offered them considerable Quantities, but accepting only their kindness, they had declined to receive it: However, the Image of Victory, and the good Omen thereof, they did gladly accept, and resolv'd to place that Goddess in the Capitol, the Temple of Almighty Jupiter, that being Enshrind in the chiefest Fortrefs of their City, she might always remain propitious, and firmly constant to the People of Rome. The Slingers and Archers, together with the Corn, were delivered to the Consuls, 25 Gallies, of five ranks of Oars on a side, were added to the Fleet which were with T. Otacilius the Pro-Prætor at Sicily, to whom leave was given to waft over into Africk, if he should think it expedient for the Commonwealth so to do.

XXXVIII. The Levies being finish'd, the Consuls waited a few days till the Associate Forces came up; the Soldiers had an Oath administred to them by their Colonels, That they should appear at the Consuls Command, and not depart without their leave, which had never before been practised; for until this time, there was nothing required but the general Military Oath, and when the Horse or Foot were form'd into their respective Troops or Companies, then indeed they were wont of their own accord to engage one to another, That they would never part from each other for fear or flight, nor step out of their Ranks, unless it were on one of these three occasions; viz. To fetch some Weapon; To smite an Enemy; or to save a Fellow-Citizen. Which voluntary Covenant was now imposed by the Officers as a Solemn Oath, and the Soldiers enforc'd to take it: Before the Army advanc'd from Rome, the Consul Varro made divers hot and hectoring Orations to the People, telling them, That the War was invited and brought into Italy by the Noble-men, and was like to continue long enough in the Bowels of the Commonwealth, if they should employ more such Generals as Fabius was; but for his part, he was resolv'd as soon as he could get sight of the Enemy, on the very same day to fight them, and doubted not to rout them too, and make an end of the business at once. His Colleague Paulus made but one Speech, and that was the day before they march'd out of Town, which though not very acceptable to the People at present, proved much more true in the end; yet did not he use any bitter Reflections on Wars, but only said, That he could not but wonder how any Commander before he was acquainted either with his own Army or the Enemies, or knew the situation of the Places, or nature of the Country, whilst he was yet in the City in his Gown, could so certainly know what was to be done in the Field? or be able to foretel punctually the very day when he would fight the Enemy? For his own part he was of Opinion, That the circumstances of things ought to administer apt Counsels to Men, rather than that Men could govern things at their pleasure by their Resolutions, and therefore he would not flatter himself or them with any such rude and immature conceits, which might possibly prove only pleasant Dreams. He only wish'd, That Enterprizes cautiously and prudently undertaken, might prosperously succeed; for rashness, besides that 'tis always foolish, had hitherto been also unfortunate. 'Twas plain, he was of his own accord inclinable to prefer safe, before heady Courses, and that he might persevere in that mind, Q. Fabius, just as he was marching out, is reported to have talk'd to him, as follows.

XXXIX. "If either, O L. Æmilius! you had a Colleague of your own temper (which I rather wish) or if you your self were of the same humor with your Colleague, my Discourse would be altogether superfluous; for as being both good and wise Consuls, you would without my speaking, act all things faithfully for the good of the Common-wealth; and if both bad and head-strong, you would neither hearken to my words, nor regard my advice: But now considering both what your Partner is, and how worthy and discreet a Person you your self are, I shall only make my Address to you; Though yet, methinks already, I foresee your being both a wise Man, and a good Citizen, is like little to avail us, as long as the Conduct of publick Affairs halts on the other side, for ill Counsels will have as much sway and authority as good: And you are mistaken, My Friend Paulus! if you expect not to be as much pestred with C. Terentius your Fellow-Consul, as with Annibal your Enemy. Nay, I know not but the former may prove the more troublesome Adversary of the two, for the other you are only to engage in the Field, but with him you must contend at all times, and every where: Besides, you have your Horse and Foot to fight Annibal and his Forces, but General Varro shall attack you with your own Soldiers. I desire not to put you in mind of C. Flaminius, lest it should be an ill Omen; but certain it is, that even he did not begin his wild Freaks till he was Consul, till he was in his Province and at the Head of his Army: But this Man was mad even before he put in for the Consulship, and all the while he was bandying for it; and since he is got to be Consul, before ever he has seen either the Camp or the Enemy, continues to talk like one besides himself: Now he that already amongst the peaceable Gown-men swaggers thus, and speaks of nothing but Blood and Wounds, Fire and Sword: What extravagant work (think you) will he make in the Army amongst the hot-blooded Youths, where there is no more but a Word and a Blow, and ill Directions are immediatly followed with worse Execution? But if this Gentleman shall (as he says he will) presently venture a Battel, either I understand nothing of the Art Military, nor the manner of the present War, nor the nature of this Enemy, or else we shall have some other place more renowned for our overthrow than the Trafjmenan Lake. This is not a time to boast my self, nor is it my custom, who have rather ran into an Excess by contemning Glory, than by seeking it: But this I must needs say, and so it will prove in the end, That the only way to deal with Annibal, is, that which I took; nor is the same only taught by the Event, which is the Master of Fools, but even by Reason it self, which has been and will still be the same, as long as the same Circumstances remain. The War on our part is manag'd at home in our own Country, all Quarters round about full of our own Men or our Allies, ready to assist us with Arms, Men, Horses and Provisions, having already already in our distress given us sufficient proof of their Fidelity: Time betters us, and every day renders us more prudent and resolute. On the other side, Annibal is in a Foreign Land, an Enemies Country, all things adverse to him, far from his own Country, having Peace or Security no where either by Sea or Land, no Cities to Befriend him, no Walls that will entertain him, wherever he Marches he sees nothing that he can call his own, and lives merely by Plunder from hand to mouth; he has now scarce a third part of that Army which pass'd the Iberus, more being destroy'd by Hunger than the Sword, nor has he Victuals for those few that are yet left alive. Can you doubt therefore, but we may easily Conquer him by sitting still, who every day grows weaker and weaker? and who has neither Victuals, nor Recruits, nor Money? How long was he fain to fight for Gerion, a poor little Borough in Apulia, as if it had been for the Walls of Carthage it self? Nor will I magnifie my own Conduct to you: Do but consider how Cn. Servilius and Attilius, the two last Consuls strangely baffled him. This, O Paulus! is the only way of Safety, which our own People alone do make difficult and unpracticable, for you shall have your own Soldiers and the Enemy both of a mind; and Varro the Roman Consul will desire the very same thing that Annibal the Punic General aims at. These two Captains you alone must resist, and resist you shall and overcome them too, if you shall but stand firm enough against the noise of Fame and rumors of the People: If neither the vain Applauses given to your Colleague, nor false reports blown abroad to your own disgrace, shall at all move you. Truth, they say, is too often oppress'd, but can never be extinguish'd; he only enjoys solid Glory, that despises it; let them call you a Coward for being cautious, slow instead of confederate, and an ill Soldier instead of an experienced Captain: I had rather a wife Enemy should fear you, than foolish Citizens applaud you; 'tis certain, if you venture boldly on all things, Annibal shall contemn you, but when once he finds you will undertake nothing rashly, he shall dread you. Nor do I advise you to lie idle, and act nothing at all, but that in all your Actions you should let Reason be your Guide, and not Fortune, and to keep things always in your own compass and at your dispose. Be continually upon your Guard, and neither neglect any advantage that presents it self, nor give any to the Enemy; take time and leisure, and you shall find all things plain and certain, but haste makes wast, and rashness is improvident and blind.

The Consul answered very heavily, as confessing what Fabius had said was true, rather than easie to be performed: "For if (quoth he) the General of the Cavalry were so violent, and not to be restrained by you, who were Dictator and his supreme Commander: What course can I take, or what Authority am I like to have with my seditious, quarrellous, and head-strong Colleague? For my own part, in my former Consulship I narrowly escap'd a scouring, and was well sing'd with those Flames of popular Fury where-with my Partner was consumed. I wish all things may go well; however, if it shall fall out otherwise, I am resolv'd rather to expose my Head to the Enemies Weapons, than to the Votes of angry and testy Citizens. Paulus had no sooner express'd himself thus, but he began his March, being waited upon out of Town by the Principal Senators: The Plebeian Consul was also attended by a Train of the Commons, making a great shew with their Numbers, though not much to be regarded for their Quality. When they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new-raisd Forces were intermingled with the old, they divided the whole Army into two Bodies, and ordered the business so, That that Body which chiefly consisted of raw Soldiers, and was the least in number, should lie next to Annibal, whilst the greater part and main Strength continued in their old Leaguer: Then they dismiss'd M. Attilius the last Years Consul (who desired to be excused by reason of his Age) that he might return to Rome; and gave Cn. Servilius the Charge and Command of one Roman Legion, and Two thousand Horse and Foot of the Allies in the lesser Camp. Annibal, though he perceiv'd the Enemy so reinforced, and half as strong again as before, yet was glad at the coming of these new Consuls. For not only was no possibility of getting more: For after the Country found themselves plagued with his continual Incurfions, they carried all their Corn into Cities and Walled Towns, so that (as was known afterwards) he had not Bread enough left for ten days, and the Spaniards for want of Victuals were ready to desert him, and only waited for a fit opportunity.

As the Consul Varro was naturally rash and over-hasty, so Fortune administred apt Fewel to put him into a greater Flame; for in a tumultuary Skirmish with a Party of Annibals Forragers (began rather by a casual Rancounter of the Soldiers, than by any confederate Counsel before-hand, or directions from the Generals) the Carthaginians happened to be worsted, there being a matter of Seventeen hundred of them kill'd, and not above One hundred of the Romans and their Allies. But as the Victors were with full speed pursuing pursuing the Chace, the Consul Paulus who had the Command that day (for they took it by turns) restrained them, for fear lest they should fall into some Ambuscade; which Varro took in great indignation, and bawl'd out wherever he came against his Colleague, That he had wilfully let the Enemy escape out of his hands, and if he had not thus given over the Pursuit, the War might have been ended at once. Annibal did not lay this loss much to heart, but rather made full reckoning that he should thereby, as with a Bait, draw on the Fool-hardy Consul and his new-raisd Soldiers; for he knew all that pass'd in their Camp as certainly as in his own, viz. That the Generals were of disagreeing Tempers, always jarring and thwarting one another, and that their Army consisted two parts in three of raw untrain'd Soldiers: Therefore supposing he had now a fit time and place for putting some Stratagem in execution; the next night he marches away all his Men, carrying nothing with them but their Arms out of his Camp, leaving the same full of all things, as well private Goods and Furniture, as publick Ammunition and Provisions, and behind the next Mountains privately plants his Foot, ready drawn up in good order, on the left hand, and his Horse on the right, and his Carriages in the middle; that whilst the Enemy should be busie in rifling the abandon'd Tents, and encumbered with Pillage, he might fall upon them and cut them to pieces. He also left abundance of Fires burning in his Camp, to make them believe, that he had a mind to amuse the Consuls with a false shew of his continuing there, and so get the further off before they pursued him, as he cheated Fabius the other Year with the like policy.

XLII. As soon as 'twas day, the Romans seeing the Enemies Out-guards drawn off, and afterwards upon a nearer approach perceiving nothing but an unwonted silence and solitude, wondred much what the meaning on't might be; but after they certainly discovered that the Camp was abandoned, old running there was to the Consuls Pavilions with the news, That the Enemy was run away in so much hast and disorder, that they had left all their Tents standing, and that their flight might not be perceived, left abundance of light-fires all over their Camp. The Soldiers began to bawl out and desire, That the Ensigns might presently advance, that they might pursue the Enemy and rife their Camp. And indeed, one of the Consuls was no less eager than the common Soldiers; but Paulus told them, and frequently repeated it, That they must look before they leap'd, and proceed cautiously for fear of some trick: And at last, seeing he could not stop the mutiny, nor otherwise appease his Partner the Ring-leader thereof, he sent out M. Statilius a Captain, with a Troop of Lucan Horse to discover how matters stood; who advancing up to the Ports, commanding the rest to stay without the Works, himself with two Troopers entred within the Rampire, and having taken a careful view, brings back word, That undoubtedly it was a Design, for the Fires were only left in that part of the Camp next the Romans; The Tents stood open, and all things of value exposed; besides in several places they saw many carelessly scattered as a Bait to train them on in hopes of a Booty. But all this which was related to check their minds from the over-greedy and dangerous desire of Pillage, did but the more enflame them to be at it, so that the Soldiers set up a general Cry, That if the Signal were not given, they would go on without their Officers: Nor need they want a Leader, for Varro forthwith sounded a March, and as he was just going out at the Ports, Paulus (who made no such hast) finding that the Auspices were not favorable, caus'd notice thereof to be given him; and though Varro could scarce be held back, yet the remembrance of the late Misfortunes of Flaminius, and the overthrow of Claudius the Consul at Sea in the first Punic War, caus'd some awe of Religion in his mind; but indeed, it was the Gods themselves who that day deferred for a time, rather than quite remov'd the fore Judgment that was impending on the Romans; for when the Consul commanded the Ensigns to be carried back into the Camp, and the Soldiers were so set upon Plunder, that they refused to obey; just upon the nick of the Mutiny, two Servants that waited, the one upon a Formian, the other on a Silicim Cavalier, and had last Year been taken Prisoners amongst the Forragers by some Numidian Horse, having made their escape, return'd to their Masters, and being brought before the Consuls, assured them, That Annibal's whole Army lay in Ambush behind the Hills: This seasonable Intelligence caus'd the Consuls to be obeyed, when one of them by his Ambition in seeking, and ill compliance with Popular humors in managing his Office, had quite lost that Majesty and Reverence that belong'd to it.

XLIII. Annibal perceiving that the Romans, though they at first began to stir and make a tumult, yet did not proceed to come out according to his expectation, concluding that his Plot was discovered, returned again into his Camp, where he was not able to remain many days for want of Provisions; and not only his Soldiers (being a mixture of several Nations) began to entertain new designs in their Heads, but he himself was almost at his Wits end: For first they grumbled, and after with open mouth call'd for their Arrears, and complain'd of the scarcity of their Allowance of Victuals, and at last grew afraid of being starv'd in good earnest; so that the Report went, That most of the Mercenary Troops, especially those of the the Spanish Nation, were upon the point of deserting and going over to the Enemy, Annibal is said to have had sometimes thoughts of flying away with his Horse into Gallia, and leave his Infantry to shift for themselves. His Affairs being in this untoward posture, he resolv'd to dislodge and march into the warmer Region of Apulia, where the Harvest was more forward; as also, that being farther off from the Enemy, such of his Men as were fickle and inconstant, might not be able so easily to run away to them. He march'd off therefore in the Night, making Fires as before, and some few Tents left for a shew, that the fear of a like Stratagem as before, might keep the Romans from pursuing. But after the before-mentioned Lucanus Statilius had diligently search'd all places beyond their Camp, and on the other side of the Mountains, and brought advice, that he had a sight of their Rear at a great distance, a Council of War was next day held by the Romans, and the matter debated, whether or no they should follow and urge him to a Battel?

The two Consuls were still of the same different Opinions as always they had been, but almost all the rest of the Officers concurred with Varro, and none but Servilius that was Consul last year, join'd with Paulus; so by the majority of Votes away they went, blinded by Destiny, to render the little obscure Town Cannæ illustrious to all Posterity for the Romans over-throw. Near that Village Annibal had pitch'd his Camp, having the Southernly Wind call'd Fulturnus, at his back, which in the Fields, parch'd with drought, is wont to raise vast Clouds of dust: This was not only very convenient for his Men as they lay intrench'd, but like to prove of good advantage to them when they should be drawn up in Battalia, for having the Wind behind to cool them, they should attack the Enemy, who must needs be almost blinded with the dust driven full in their faces so abundantly. The Consuls sending out Scouts before, diligently to discover the Passages, pursued the Carthaginians until they came to Cannæ, where having a sight of the Enemy, they intrench'd themselves in two distinct Camps, about the same distance from each other as they lay at Gerion: The River Aufidus ran near each Parties Camp, and gave both opportunities to supply themselves with Water from thence, but not without skirmishing with each other. But the Romans that were posted in the lesser Camp, beyond the Aufidus, could fetch Water with more freedom, because the Enemy kept no Guards on the farther Bank of the River.

Annibal having now got a place of advantage for his Cavalry to engage in, as being an open Champion Country, and knowing his chief strength and hopes to consist in that part of his Forces, offers the Consuls Battel, draws up his Army to upbraid them, and sends some of his Numidian Troops to skirmish with and provoke them. This occasion'd the Roman Camp to be again fill'd with the murmurs of the Common Soldiers, and discord between the two Consuls; Paulus objecting to Varro the fatal rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius, and Varro declaiming as fast at the Conduct of Fabius, as commended by none but dull and cowardly Captains; the latter, call'd Gods and Men to witness, that it was none of his fault that Annibal was suffered to demean himself as if he were Sovereign Lord of Italy, or had taken possession thereof for his own use for ever, but the same was wholly to be attributed to his Colleague who tyed up his hands, and suffered not the Soldiers to take their Arms, though their spirits were up, and they desired nothing so much as a Battel: On the other side Paulus protested, That if any disaster should happen to the Roman Legions by their being exposed, or rather betrayed to the hazards of a doubtful Battel, he would never be guilty of the blame of the Advice, though he was ready to take his share (whatever it should be) in the event; and only wish'd, That those who were now so nimble and forward with their Tongues, might in the Fight prove as brisk with their Hands.

Whilst thus they spent time in scolding rather than consulting, Annibal, who had stood a great part of the day in Battalia, retreated with most of his Troops into his Camp, but sent over a Party of his Numidians cross the River, to fall upon such as went for Water from the Romans lesser Camp; whom (being but a disorderly Rabble) they presently put to flight, with the noise and shout they made as soon as they gain'd the opposite Bank, and pursued them up to the Out-guards, and thence ventured further, even almost to the very Ports: This the Romans took in mighty dudgeon, to see themselves thus affronted by a raskally crew of Moors in their very Camp; and the only reason why they did not presently cross the River, and fight the Enemy, was because Paulus happened that day to have the Sovereign Command. But that Power being next day devolved to Varro, he without consulting his Colleague, displayed the Signal, and in Battel-array pass'd the River, Paulus following him; for though he could not approve the Enterprize, yet he was bound to assist him in it. Beyond the River they join'd with the Forces of the smaller Camp, and drew up in this order: On the right Wing (which was next the River) were placed the Roman Horse, and next to them a Body of Foot; on the Extremity of the left Wing, the Associate Cavalry, and within a Body of Foot, but the Main-Battel consisted of Roman Legions intermixed with Archers; and of the rest of the Light-harnes'd Troops was compos'd the Van-guard: The Consuls took charge of the Wings, Terentius of the left, Emilius of the right, and Cn. Servilius of the Main-Body.

Annibal

- XLVI. Annibal, as soon as 'twas day-light, sending before his Slingers, and others lightly-armed, pass'd the River, and as his Forces came over, rang'd them in order: The French and Spanish Horse in the left Wing, near the Bank of the River over against the Roman Cavalry; the Numidians had the right Wing, and the Main-Body was fortified with Foot so placed, as the Africans were on each side, and the French and Spaniards between them in the middle: You would have fancied the Africans, for the most part, to have been a Roman Army, they were so generally Arm'd with what they had taken, either at Trebia, or at Thrasymenus: The French and Spanish had Targets much alike, but their Swords were very different; those of the French very long and without points; the Spaniards (used to push and make Passes at their Enemies, rather than hack and slash them with down-right strokes) had shorter ones, better to be wielded, and with sharp points. Those Nations above the rest were terrible, as well by the greatness of their Stature and bulk of Body, as for their strange habit; the French all naked above the Navel; the Spaniards very gay, in pure white Jackets embroidered with Purple. The number of all his Forces that day in the Field, is said to be Forty thousand Foot, and Ten thousand Horse: The left Wing was led by Asdrubal, the right by Maharbal, and in the Main-Battel was Annibal himself with his Brother Mago. The Sun shone very indifferently on both their Flanks, whether they drew up so on purpose, or by chance; the Romans fronted the South, and the Carthaginians towards the North: But the South-East Wind, which the Inhabitants of those parts call Vulturnus, rising very high, drove mighty heaps of dust full in the Romans faces, and almost choak'd and blinded them.
- XLVII. After the shout set up on both sides, the Auxiliaries began to skirmish with their Darts and light Weapons, then the left Wing of French and Spanish Horse, charg'd the Roman Cavalry in the right, but not after the usual method of Horse-Service; for here they were forc'd to confront one another strait forwards, having no room for wheeling about, being shut up on the one side by the River, and on the other by the Battalions of Foot; so that standing all thick together, as soon as their Horses began to be disordered, the Riders grappled together, and each Man laying hold on his opposite, pull'd him down, and so for the most part fought on foot; yet was this Conflict rather sharp for a spurt, than of long continuance, for the Roman Cavalry were beat back and fled: Then began the Foot to engage, the French and Spaniards with equal strength and courage for a good while kept their Ranks, but after several vigorous Efforts, the Romans being as thick in the Front as in the Main-Body, broke into that pointed Squadron of the Enemy, which was thinner rang'd, and swelling out at some distance from their main Battel, and thereby the less able to resist their Impression; and having once made them give ground, followed their Blows so close, that all at once with the same violence they pierc'd through them, as they fled headlong, until they got into the midst of their Main-Body, and thence without resistance came up with their African Reserves, who having drawn in their Wings on both sides, the Gauls and Spaniards stood to it for a while stoutly, somewhat advanc'd before the rest; but they too being so far beat back, as to range even with the rest of the Front, after some further enforcement, shrunk away, leaving a Lane in the middle, into which the Romans unwarily pressing after them, the Africans charg'd them on the Flanks, and spreading out their Wings encompass'd them on the Rear. Henceforwards the Romans having in vain perform'd this first Encounter, were forc'd to give over the Chase of the French and Spaniards, and renew the Fight with the Africans, upon a double disadvantage, as being both surrounded, and to deal with a fresh Enemy, when they themselves were already almost tired out.
- XLVIII. In the mean time there was hot Service in the Romans left Wing, where their Associate Troops oppos'd the Numidian Horse, yet it began but faintly at first, and was manag'd with Punic Treachery; for near upon Five hundred Numidians, having besides the rest of their Arms and Javelins, got short Skeins hidden under their Harness, came riding full speed from their Army as Deserters, with their Bucklers at their backs, and all on a sudden dismounting, cast both their Bucklers and Javelins at their Enemies Feet, whereupon the Romans opening to the right and left, received them into their Main-Body, conducted them up to their Reserves, and ordered them to abide in the Rear; where they continued quiet until such time as they saw them fiercely engaged in all parts, and that every Mans eye and mind was intent and altogether taken up therewith, then snatching up Bucklers from amongst the heaps of the dead, they fell upon the Romans behind, and wounding their backs, and cutting their ham-strings, committed great slaughter, but raised a far greater Terror and Tumult; whilst thus the Romans in some places were frighted and fled, and in others fought stoutly, though with little hopes, Asdrubal who commanded that Wing, detach'd the Numidians from the main Battel where they did little Service, to pursue such as fled, and seeing the Africans almost weary'd out, rather with Killing than Fighting, he reinforc'd them with the French and Spaniards.
- XLIX. In the other Wing Paulus, though grievously wounded with a Stone out of a Sling at the very first On-set, yet several times Charged Annibal, keeping his Men together, and in divers places rally'd them when they began to flinch, and renewed the Fight, the Roman Cavalry all the while protecting him, but at last they were forc'd to alight, because the Consul by reason of his Wound, was no longer able to sit his Horse. And Annibal, when one told him that the Consul had ordered his Troopers to dismount, is reported to have replied, I am better pleased with that, than if I had them all in Chains. Indeed these Horsemen, though they fought after they were on Foot, under such Circumstances as 'twas no longer to be doubted but the Enemy would have the Victory, yet they chose rather to die upon the Spot, than retreat an Inch; whereupon the Enemy enraged at them for retarding their Victory, cut to pieces those whom they could not make give ground: And at last some few seeing themselves utterly over-come, and wearied both with toil and wounds, gave place to that Torrent which they could not withstand, and so were dispers'd; such as could, mounting again their Horses to assist their Flight. Cn. Lentulus, a Colonel, as he was getting away on Horse-back, chanc'd to spy the Consul all over Bloody, sitting upon a Stone: Ab, Æmilius! (quoth he) Thou art the only Person guiltless of this days over-throw, and therefore the Gods ought to regard and preserve thee; Here, take this Horse, whilst you have yet some strength left, I am able to mount you upon his back, and will attend and protect you, make not this Battel yet more disastrous by the death of a Consul, without which there is matter enough for Mourning and Lamentation: To which the Consul answered, I thank thee, Cn. Cornelius! and may the Gods bless thy generous Valor; But do not waste that little time thou hast to escape the Enemy, vainly in commiserating me: Be gone! and for Publick Matters advise the Senate to fortifie the City of Rome, and raise what Guards they can, before the Victorious Enemy comes up and surprizes it; and privately acquaint Q. Fabius, that L. Æmilius did whilst he lived, observe his Directions, and remembers them now he is dying: Suffer me here to expire amidst the heaps of my slaughtered Soldiers, that I may neither be again my self accused for my unfortunate Consulship, nor yet survive to accuse my Colleague, and protect my own Innocence by another Mans Crime. As the Consul uttered these words, first a multitude of his own Men in the Rout, and then the Enemy in the Pursuit, ran over him, and not knowing who he was, dispatch'd him, almost covered with Darts; but Lentulus in the hurry, by the help of his Horse made shift to escape. The Romans now every where fled for their Lives, Seven thousand got into their lesser Camp, Ten thousand into the greater, and Two thousand into the Town Cannæ, but they were presently environed by Cartago and a Party of Horse, and it being an unwall'd Village, all either kill'd or made Prisoners: The other Consul, whether by chance, or on purpose I know not, was in none of these Parties, but with about fifty Horse fled to Venusia. In this Battel 'tis said there were slain of the Romans Forty thousand Foot, and Two thousand and seven hundred Horse, and near about as many of the Allies of the Romans; amongst whom were one of the Consuls, two Quæstors, L. Atilius, and Furius Bibaculus, one and twenty Colonels, divers that had been Consuls, Prætors and Ædiles, particularly Cn. Servilius, and C. Minucius, who the last year had been General of the Horse, and some time before Consul; moreover, Four-score Persons that either were Senators, or had born such Offices as they were capable of being chosen into the Senate, who serv'd in the Legions as Volunteers: The Prisoners taken, are reported to have been about 3000 Foot and 300 Horse.

Thus was the Battel at Cannæ no less famous for the Romans defeat, than that at the River Allia: For though this prov'd not so fatal in the event, because the Enemy did not make hast enough to improve his Victory, yet here the slaughter was greater, and the flight more dishonorable. For as their running away at Allia betrayed the City, so it saved the Army, whereas at Cannæ there were not above fifty followed the Consul that fled; and as for the other Consul that was slain, almost his whole Army took them to their heels. The multitude in the two Camps being without any Commanders in chief, and scarce half arm'd, those that were in the bigger Camp sent messengers to the others, That whilst the Enemy wearied both with the Fight, and with frolicking afterwards for their Victory, took their repose and slept soundly, they should come over to them, and so in a joint Body march away for Canusium. This advice some did altogether disdain: For why (quoth they) do they send for us, and not come hitber themselves, since so we had as soon be joy'd? But here's the business, they see all the Passage betwixt is full of the Enemy, and they would willingly expose other mens Bodies to the danger rather than their own. Others would not budge, not so much for any dislike of the motion, as for that their hearts failed them to attempt it. Whereupon P. Sempronius Tuditanus, a Colonel, thus rounded them up: "What then? Will you chuse rather to be taken by an Enemy, whose Cruelty nothing can equal but his Covetousness? Will you suffer your selves to be sold at so much an head, and hear them when they enquire the price, ask whether you are a Roman Citizen, or a Latine Allie? That so the proud Victor may encrease his Glory by your Misery and Reproach? Certainly none of you will endure this, if at least you are Fellow-Citizens with the brave Æmilius, and so many other gallant and most valiant Men, whose Bodies lie round about him, who rather resolv'd to die in the Bed of Honor, than live with Infamy. Let us therefore forthwith, before 'tis light, and more numerous Troops block up our Passage, break through those few who in disorder make a noise before our Portals; a good Heart and a good Sword will make way though they were never so thick, with a pointed Battalion, like a wedge, we'll pierce through the midst of these stragglers, as easily as if none were to oppose us. Come along then with me as many of you as are willing, to save either your selves or the Commonwealth. With these words, he draws his Sword, and casting those that were willing to accompany him into such a Wedge-like Figure, march'd through the Enemy; and when the Numidians charg'd them on the right Flank, shifted their Targets to that Arm, and so 600 of them got to the greater Camp, and joyning the others there, went safe to Canisium. This was done by the Vanquish'd on a present heat of Courage, which their natural Wit or good Fortune prompted them to, rather than upon any serious Consultation amongst themselves, or Command from others.

LI. Whilst most of Annibals great Officers flock'd about him, congratulating his Victory, and perswaded him after so great a Fight, to spend the rest of the day and the night following, in refreshing himself and his weary Soldiers: Maharbal, General of the Horse was of Opinion, not to make the least delay: Nay rather, quoth he, that you may know the consequence of this Battel, resolve within these five days to sup in the Capitol; Do you follow as fast as you can, I will immediately advance with the Horse, and be upon them, before ever they shall know we are coming. Annibal told him, He commended his Spirit and good Will, That what he said was very specious and inviting, but of too great moment to be so suddenly resolv'd, and therefore he would take time to consider on't: Nay then, says Maharbal, I see the Gods do not confer all their Gifts upon one Man; you, Annibal, know how to gain a Victory, but not how to use and improve it: That one days delay, 'tis believed, sav'd the City of Rome and its Empire. Next morning, as soon as 'twas light, they applyed themselves to take the pillage of the Field, and to view that mighty slaughter, a doleful sight even to the Enemy themselves who made it; so many thousand Romans there lay Foot and Horse all hickled-pickled together, as chance, or fighting, or flight had joyn'd them; some were seen crawling up all bloody amongst the heaps of Carcasses, the frosty morning causing their Wounds to smart with exquisite pain, and these the Enemy knock'd o'th' head; some they found yet alive, but cut shorter by the Thighs or Haunches, who offered their bare Necks and Throats, begging to be put out of their pain; divers had their Heads pretty deep in the ground, having made those holes, and run their faces therein, on purpose to suffocate themselves: But above all the rest remarkable, was the sight of a Numidian, with his Nose and Ears pitcously torn and mangled, but yet alive, lying under a dead Roman, who it seems when he was no longer able to hold his Weapon in his hand, had in a rage torn his Enemy with his Teeth, and so continued till he expired.

LII. Having spent a great part of the Day in gathering the Pillage, Annibal advanced to attack the lesser Camp, and in the first place diverted that Arm of the River that flank'd them, and so cut them off from any Water: But those within being all wearied out with toil, and watching, and wounds, submitted to a surrender sooner than he could hope for, upon Articles, To part with their Arms and Horses, and for every Roman to pay Three hundred pieces of that sort of Money as had the Picture of a Chariot and four Horses on it; for each of the Allies 200, and for Servants an hundred per head: which money being paid, they should be released, and suffered to go whither they list in single Apparel. Then they were taken into the Enemies Camp, and kept in custody, but Citizens and Allies by themselves apart, and not one amongst another. In the mean time, out of the greater Camp, of such as had strength and courage enough, there were a matter of 4000 Foot and 200 Horse, some in a Body, and others stragling through the Fields, which was safe enough, gone away to Canisium; and the rest that were left behind being either wounded Men, or Cowards, yielded up themselves on the same terms as those of the other Camp had done. Here was got a mighty booty, and all of it divided amongst the Soldiers, except the Horses and Men, and some Silver, which for the most part was about their Horses harness, for being in the Field they had not much Table-plate with them. Then Annibal ordered the Bodies of his own Men to be gathered together and buried, which, 'tis said, were in number 8000, and the stoutest Soldiers he had. Some Authors say, the Roman Consul was also fought out and buried. The Romans that fled to Canisium, were by the Inhabitants only admitted within their Walls to have lodging: But a certain Lady of Apulia, named Busa, a Person of an eminent Birth and great Estate, relieved them very bountifully, with Victuals, and Cloaths, and Money in their Pockets: For which Munificence, the Senate after the War was ended, conferr'd signal Honors on her.

LIII. Amongst these Relicks of the Army there were four Colonels, Fabius Maximus of the first Legion (whose Father but the Year before was Dictator;) of the second Legion, L. Publius Bibulus, and P. Cornelius Scipio; and of the third Legion, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, who lately was Aedile; but by general consent, the chief Command was conferred upon P. Scipio (being yet but a very young Man) and Appius Claudius: Who being in Consult with some few others how to manage their main Affairs, P. Furius Philus, whose Father had been Consul, came and told them, That in vain they consulted together, and hoped to buoy up the sinking State, whose Case was already desperate, and given over as lost; For several young Noblemen, of whom L. Cæcilius Metellus was chief, were just now contriving to get Ships and put out to Sea, and utterly abandoning Italy to the pleasure of the Conquerors, seek shelter for themselves with with some Forrein Prince. This ill news, as it was in it self a matter of great Consequence, so falling out as it did upon the nick of other Disasters, so unlook'd for, did with its Novelty, like some Wonder, astonish those that heard it, and most present were for calling a General Council of War about it: But young Scipio (whom the Destinies even then design'd should be the fatal General that must period this War) told them, There was no time nor room for advice in such an Extremity, but the mischief was immediately to be suppress'd and prevented by some resolute and daring Action; therefore (quoth he) as many of you as wish the preservation of the Commonwealth, arm your selves and come along with me: No where have we more dangerous Enemies encamp'd, than where such Designments are hatching. Away he goes with a few following him, directly to Metellus's Lodging, and finding there the Cabal of Youngsters, according to the Intelligence he had receiv'd, he drew his Sword, and brandishing it over their Heads as they sat: I swear before you all (says he) and I swear it willingly and from my heart, That neither I my self will forsake my Country and the Commonwealth, nor suffer any other Roman Citizen to abandon her; If I fail herein wittingly or willingly, then do thou, O mighty Jupiter! confound me, my House and Family, and bring me and all that I have to destruction and a most shameful end: And you, Metellus! I require to swear after me as I have done, and all the rest of you to take the same Oath; for whoever shall refuse, let him be assur'd 'tis against him I have drawn this Sword. Terrified no less than if it had been the Conqueror Annibal himself, they all took the Oath, and yielded themselves up to Scipio's Conduct.

Whilst these things were doing at Canisium, about 4000 Horse and Foot who were dispersed over the Country in the Rout, were rallied together, and came up to the Consul at Venusia, whom the Inhabitants received very courteously, and having Quartered them from House to House, bestowed upon the Horse to every one a Vest and Tunick, and 25 Quadrigates [or pieces of money with Chariots and four Horses engraven on them, the whole sum amounts to about 15 s. 7 d. ob. a Man] and to the Foot ten such pieces, and what Arms they wanted; and in all other respects publick and private, treated them most Hospitably, as if they had strove that it should not be said, All the People of Venusia were out-done by the kind Offices of one single Gentlewoman of Canisium. But indeed by this time the Multitude at the later place were grown very burthensom to Madam Busa, for they were now near Ten thousand in number: Therefore as soon as Appius and Scipio understood that the other Consul was safe, they sent an Exprels to acquaint him what Forces, Horse and Foot, they had with them, and to know his pleasure, Whether they should continue there, or march to him at Venusia? Varro thought best to go himself with what strength he had to Canisium; so as now they made a pretty good shew of a Consular Army, and seemed able to defend themselves, if not by force of Arms in the Field, yet at least by the strength of the Walls within the Town. But at Rome the news went currant, That not so much as any remnant of Citizens and Allies was left, but that both the Consuls, with their two Armies, were all put to the Sword, and hew'n to pieces to the last Man. Never was there known, whilst the City was yet safe, so much terror and tumult within the Walls of Rome. I will therefore, even at first, sink under so great a Burthen, and say nothing at all, rather than undertake to set forth that, which after I have used all the words I can, will be represented far short of Truth. After the Consul Flaminius and his Army destroy'd but last year at Trasymenus, this was not only a new wound added to that, before it was heal'd, but a Defeat that was as bad as many Overthrows altogether, for every body said, That with the two Consuls, two whole Consular Armies were cut off; That there was no longer any such thing in the World as a Roman Camp, a Roman General, or a Roman Soldier; That Annibal was already Lord of Apulia, of Samnium, and as good as all Italy: Nor was there, certainly, any other Nation under Heaven, but would have fainted, and suffered themselves to have been utterly over-whelm'd and crush'd with the weight of so mighty a Disaster. Shall I compare hereunto the Defeat with the Carthaginians received at Sea, near the Isle Agates, wherewith their Spirits were so broken, that at once they were content to part both with Sicily and Sardinia, and also to make themselves Subjects and Tributaries to the Romans? Or their other Overthrow afterwards in Africk, which utterly broke the back of this very Annibal, and made him confess himself vanquish'd? Neither of them are in any respect comparable to this, save only that they were born and supported with less Courage and Resolution.

P. Furius and M. Pomponius the Prætors, summon'd the Senate to sit in the Hostilian Court, and consult for the safeguard of the City; for they could not doubt, but the Enemy having defeated their Armies, would advance to assault Rome, the only work that was behind to compleat the War. But as the Fathers were much to seek what Remedies to apply to Calamities so great, and yet not known to the full, so their Debates were disturb'd with the loud Out-cries of the Women, who almost in every House fill'd the Air with Lamentations, and promiscuously mourn'd for the Quick as well as the Dead, it not yet being certainly known who was slain: Whereupon Fabius advis'd, That Parties of Light-Horse should be sent out both on the Appian and Latine Road, to enquire of such as they met that came from the Fight, and were straggling home, if any of them could give a true account of the Consuls and Armies misfortune; and if the Immortal Gods had in compassion suffered any of the Roman name to survive, where those Forces were? Whither Annibal march'd next after his Victory? What Preparations he makes?

What he is doing at present? and what he probably designs for the future? That in this Affair the nimblest and most active Young Men should be employed, and in the mean time, the Senators (because there were few inferior Magistrates in Towns, or at least the People would not so much reverence their Authority) should themselves in Person appease this Hurly-burly and fearful tumult in the City, by debarring the Dames, and all sorts of Women, from coming abroad into the streets, but every one to keep in their own House, by restraining the mournful Exclamations of whole Families, and making silence through the Town; To take order that all Posts and Messengers of News should to rights be brought before the Prætors, without prattling to the Rabble by the way, and that every body should patiently at home wait for such Tidings as particularly concern'd them; Likewise to set Guards at the Gates to keep all Persons from going out of the City, and make all Men see, That they can have no hopes to preserve themselves, but in defending the City and its Walls: And when by these means the Hurry was over, then might the Fathers sitly be called again together, and take further Measures for the Publick Safety.

LVI. This Advice being generally approved, and the Magistrates having cleared the Forum of the multitude that were thronging together, the Senators divided themselves into several parts of the City to still the Uproars. Then at last arriv'd Letters from Terentius the Consul, giving an account, That L. Æmilius the Consul was slain, and the greatest part of the Army; That himself was at Canusium, rallying those that escaped this mighty Over-throw, as scattered Planks after a Ship-wreck; That the Forces he had got with him were about Ten thousand strong, but disordered, and of several Regiments and Bands intermixt; That Annibal still continued at Cannæ, busie in taxing what Ransoms the Prisoners shall pay, and intent upon the rest of the Pillage; and neither measuring his late Victory with that Grandeur of Mind usual to Conquerors, nor making that advantage of it which might be expected from so great a Commander. Then the private Losses were communicated to every Family, and the City was filled with such an universal Mourning and Lamentation, that the Anniversary Festival of the Goddess Ceres could not be kept, because it was not lawful for any Mourners to celebrate the same, and there was not a Matron in the City but was then bewailing the death of some Relation or other: Left therefore other Sacred Rites, publick and private, should be neglected on the same account, the Senate made an Order, That all Persons should give over their Mourning at the end of Thirty days. But no sooner were the Senators met again in the Council-House, after they had qualified the confusions in the City, but other bad News arriv'd, by Letters out of Sicily from T. Otacilius the Pro-Prætor, acquainting them, That a Fleet of Carthaginians were wasting the Territories of their good Friend, King Hiero, whom he was willing to have assisted at his request, but had intelligence, that there lay another Navy ready fitted and Man'd at the Isles Ægates, which as soon as they should find the Roman Forces drawn to defend the Syracusans, would presently fall upon Lilybæum, and other parts of the Roman Dominions: And therefore there was an absolute necessity to equip another Fleet if they would aid the King their Ally, and secure Sicily.

LVII. The Letters both of the Consul and of the Pro-Prætor being read, it was Resolv'd, That M. Claudius, Admiral of the Fleet that lay in the Harbor at Ostia, should be sent to the Army, [and withal, Letters to the Consul, that delivering the charge of the Forces to the Prætor, He should come with as much Expedition as the publick Safety would permit, to Rome. Besides these sad Calamities abroad, People were frighted with several Prodigies; and amongst the rest, because that year there were Two Vestal Nuns, Opimia and Floronia, convicted of Whoredom; of whom, one was according to the Custom buried alive at the Gate Collina, the other made away her self. L. Cantilius (Secretary to the Pontiffs, whom now they call Petty-Pontiffs) the Man that committed Incest with Floronia, was so severely scourged by the Arch-Pontiff in the Common-Hall, that he died under the blows. This Villany happening amongst so many other Disasters, as usually it happens, was look'd upon as a Prodigy, and the Decemvirs were commanded to resort to their Books. And moreover, Q. Fabius Pictor was sent as far as Delphos to inquire of the Oracle, With what Prayers and Supplications they might pacifie the Gods? and what would be the end of all these Miseries? In the mean time, by directions from the Sybilline Books some extraordinary Sacrifices were made; and amongst the rest Two Couples, a French-man and a French-woman, a Grecian-man and a Greek-woman were buried alive, in the Beast-market, in a place all vaulted in with Stone, and which had before been defiled with Humane Victims, though the same were not common in the Religious Ceremonies of the Romans. The Gods being thus, as they thought, sufficiently appeased, M. Claudius Marcellus sends Fifteen hundred Soldiers levied for the Service of the Navy of Ostia, to Rome, as a Guard for the City; and having sent before the Legion that belong'd to the Armado (which was the Third) under the Command of Teanus Sidicinus a Colonel, and committed the Fleet to P. Furius his Colleague, he himself, a few days after taking long Journies, hastned to Canusium. By authority of the Senate, M. Junius was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius Master of the Horse, who in their Levy muster'd all the Youth above seventeen Years of age, and some that were not so much, and thereby raised four Legions, and a Thousand Horse: Likewise they sent to their Allies of the Latine Nations, to raise Forces according to the Form of their respective Leagues, ordering, that Armor, Weapons, and all Habiliments of War should be provided; and the better to furnish furnish them, caused the old Armor and Spoils of their Enemies to be taken down from the Temples, Galleries, and Publick places where they hung up as Trophies. Moreover, necessity and want of Free-men enforced them to a new fashion of levying Soldiers, for they publickly Arm'd 8000 lusty young Bond-men, buying their Freedoms, and having first demanded of each, If he were willing to serve in the Wars? For they thought it better to take up Soldiers thus, than to redeem their own Men that had suffered themselves to be taken Prisoners, though they might have Ransom'd them at a cheaper rate, than they bought these Slaves.

For Annibal, after this so fortunate Field fought at Cannæ, acting rather as one that had completed a Conquest, than mindful of carrying on the War, having first selected from amongst the Prisoners those that were of the Allies, with very kind words, as he had done before at Trebia and Thrasymenus, released them gratis; and calling also the Romans before him (which formerly he had never done) he spake to them fairly enough, telling them, That in this War with the Romans he aim'd not at their destruction, but the Quarrel was only for Glory and Empire; That as his Ancestors were forc'd heretofore to truckle to the Roman Valor, so he was now endeavoring to make them again in their turn submit to his Courage and Fortune; therefore would admit them to redeem those whose luck it was to become his Prisoners, at the rate of 500 Quadrigates an Head for Horsemen, 300 for Foot, and 100 for Servants. Now though the Horse-mens ransom was somewhat enhanc'd above what they agreed for, when they surrendered themselves, yet they gladly received any Conditions of Liberty: And therefore thought fit to chuse from amongst themselves, ten Persons to go to Rome and move the Senate for the Money; nor did he insist on any other Security for their return, than their own Oaths: with them was sent Carthalo a Carthaginian Noble-man, who if he found the Romans inclinable to Peace, had Instructions to propose Terms. When these Agents were set forwards, and got a little way out of the Camp, one of them, a Person far from the natural plain-hearted Generosity of a true Roman, pretending to have forgot somewhat, returns back again to the Camp (thereby to evade his Oath) and before Night overtook his Companions; when Intelligence arriv'd that they were coming towards Rome, an Officer was dispatch'd to meet Carthalo, and charge him in the Dictators name, To be gone before Night at his peril out of the Roman Confines.

The Senate having vouchsafed these Agents of the Prisoners Audience, M. Junius the chief of them spake to this effect: "Venerable Fathers! There is none of us ignorant, That never any City or State is wont to have less value for their Subjects, when taken Prisoners, or at less charge for them, than ours: But unless we are too partial to our selves in our own Case, we think we may avow, That never any fell into an Enemies hands, who could more justly lay claim to your compassionate Regards, than we, who yielded not up our Arms safely in the Field for fear, but when we had resolutely stood well near till Night over heaps of dead Bodies, we retreated to our Camp, and all the rest of that Day and the Night following, weary as we were with Toil, and weakned with Wounds, we defended our Rampire: Next Day, being besieged by the Victorious Enemy, and cut off from all Water, and without any hope or possibility of breaking through those multitudes so thick and close ranged round about us, we could not think it any Crime or Reproach, after Fifty thousand of our Army cut to pieces, for some few Roman Soldiers to survive the Battel at Cannæ; and therefore then, and not before, we Capitulated to be Ransom'd upon payment of so much money, and so delivered up our Arms which were no longer able to defend or help us. We had heard, that even our Ancestors long ago thought it no dishonor to redeem themselves from the Gauls with their Gold. And our Fathers, though most averse to terms of Peace, yet made no scruple to send Ambassadors to Tarentum to redeem Prisoners; although in truth those two Battels, both that at Allia with the Gauls, and the other at Heraclea with Pyrrhus, were not so notable for the numbers kill'd, as ignominious for the Soldiers fears and shameful running away. But the Plains of Cannæ are yet covered over with heaps of Roman Bodies; nor had we escap'd the fury of that day, but that the Enemies Swords were blunted, and their strength so spent, that they could kill no more. Some too there are of our Men that fled not at all in Battel, but being left to guard the Camp, when that was yielded, fell into the Enemies Power. I can assure you, I envy not any Citizens or Fellow Soldiers good Fortune and better present condition; nor would I, by degrading another, seem to magnifie my self, but sure those who for the most part having flung away their Arms, fled out of the Field, and never stopt till they were got either to Venusia or Canusium, cannot (unless good Footmanship be regarded) justly prefer themselves before us, nor glory that they stand the Commonwealth in better stead than we; but you make use of them as good Men and valiant Soldiers, and such too shall you find us; nay, so much the more ready to serve our Country, since 'tis by your bounty we are restored thereunto. You make Musters of all Ages and Conditions, Eight thousand Bondmen, I hear, are to be put into Arms, our number is not less, nor will our Redemption cost more, than to buy them; with whom to compare our selves, were to put an Affront upon the Roman Name.

Moreover, Conscrip Fathers! there is another thing to be regarded in this Debate, and that is, if you should be inclinable to deal severely with us (which I hope none of us have deserv'd deserv'd at your hands) that you would be pleas'd to consider what a kind of Enemy it is in whose hands you will leave us: Not such an one as Pyrrhus, who entertain'd his Prisoners as if they had been his Guests; but a barbarous Carthaginian, in whom 'tis hard to say, whether Covetousness or Cruelty does most predominate: Could you but see the Chains, the nasty filthiness and sad usage of your Citizens, I am confident that rueful Spectacle would move you no less, than if on the other part you should behold your Legions lie slaughtered in the Fields of Cannæ: However, you may near hand view the perplexed looks and tears of our Relations standing in the Lobby and waiting for your answer; and since they are thus solicitous, and in such an agonous suspense for us and those that are absent: What strange agitations do you think those poor hearts themselves endure, whose proper concern it is, and whose lives and liberties depend solely on the hinge of your Vote? And in good Faith, if Annibal himself would contrary to his Nature, be merciful and kind to us, we shall not esteem Life any favor, after you shall have adjudged us unworthy of Redemption. Prisoners heretofore return'd to Rome, dismiss'd by King Pyrrhus without any Ransom, but they return'd with Ambassadors, principal Persons of this City, sent to redeem them: And shall I return unto my Country again (if Annibal would let me) a Citizen reckoned by our own Senate not worth 300 pence? Every Man, My Lords! has his peculiar fanfie, and for my own part, though I know my Life and Liberty is in jeopardy, yet the danger of my Honor affects me more than either, lest we should be thought condemned and rejected by you: For the World will never believe, that you will lose so many thousand Citizens to save your Purse and spare so much Money.

LX.

When he ended his Speech, immediately the Multitude who were got together in the Common-Hall, set up a lamentable Cry, holding up their Hands towards the Council-house, and begging the Fathers, To let them have their Children, their Brethren, and their Kinsfolks again. The very Women also for fear and necessity, thrust themselves amongst this Crowd of Men, and encreased the Out-cry. After they were all put out, and the Place cleared, the Senate fell to Debate the matter, and great variance there was in their Opinion: Some were for ransoming them at the publick Charge; others oppos'd that, and insisted That the City ought not to bear the expences of their Redemption, but it should be left free for every one to deliver himself at his own cost; and in case any had not money at present to lay down, the Chamber of the City should lend it him, upon security given either Personal by sufficient Sureties, or by a Mortgage of his Lands for repayment. But when T. Manlius Torquatus (a Man of the old strict Severity, and as most People thought too too rigid in this Point) was demanded his Opinion, he spake (tis reported) as follows.

"If these Agents had only made it their request, That those that are in the Enemies hands might be redeemed, and had not reflected upon others, I should in very few words have delivered my Judgment: For what had I more to do, but advise you, that you would maintain the wholesome Custom you have received in such cases from your Ancestors, and assert the same by an Example sone cessary for your Service in War? But now since they have not only justified, but in a manner boasted of their yielding themselves up to the Enemy, and think they ought to be prefer'd, not only before those that were taken in the Field, but those too who march'd safe to Venusia and Canusium, and even before C. Terentius the Consul himself; I will not suffer you, Conscript Fathers! to be thus led away in the dark, but truly state every thing as it pass'd there; and I wish what I am about to say before you, were to be delivered at Canusium in the head of the Army, the best witness of every mans Cowardize or Valour; or at least that P. Sempronius alone were present there, whom if these Fellows would have followed when he offered to be their Leader, they had at this day been Soldiers in the Roman Camp, not Captives at the devotion of their Enemies. For whilst the Enemy was weary with fighting, and making merry for their Victory, and most of them retir'd into their Tents, they had the night before them, to save themselves at their pleasure; or however being seven thousand strong, they were able to have broke through the Enemy, had they been never so thick: But this they would neither attempt of themselves, nor follow another when he urg'd them to it. All night long almost P. Sempronius Tuditanus ceased not to exhort and importune them, whilst yet there were but few of the Enemy about their Camp, whilst all things were hush and quiet, and might favour'd their retreat, to lay hold of these opportunities and follow his conduct, not doubting but before day-light they might reach unto places of security, and arrive safely at some Cities of their Allies: As in our Grandfires days Colonel Decius did in Sammium; or as of late when I was a young Man, in the former Punic War, Calpurnius Flamma said to the three hundred Volunteers, whom he led to gain a little Hill situate in the very midst of the Enemies, Let us dye bravely my fellow Soldiers, and by our death set at liberty the Roman Legions, who are now circumvented and besieged. Had Sempronius said thus to you, who could judg you to be either Men or Romans, if none of you had accompanied him? But the truth is he pointed you a way not only to Glory, but to Safety too; offered himself to lead you to your Parents, to your Wives, to your Children. You that had not the Courage to save your selves, what would you have done if it had been necessary you should have dyed for your Country? Fifty thousand of your fellow-Citizens and Allies lay round about you slain that day; if so many examples of gallantry could not raise you to a generous disdain disdain of being Captives, nothing in the World can ever move you? If so great a slaughter could not make you despise your Lives, no Arguments will ever prevail with you to hazard them. Desire home o'th' Gods name, and long after your Native Country whilst you are free and safe; nay, desire if you please to be in your Country, whilst it is your Country; but your desires now come too late, having disfranchis'd your selves, lost your former state and right of Citizens, and are now become Carthaginian Bond-slaves: Would you have us purchase you with money to the same condition which you forfeited by your own default and cowardize? You would not hearken to P. Sempronius your Fellow-Citizen, when he bid you take Arms and follow him, but you could listen to Annibal presently afterwards, when he commanded you to betray your Camp, and basely surrender up your Arms and your Persons. But why blame I only their faint-heartedness and fears, when I may justly charge them with wilful wickedness and actual Villany? For they not only refused to follow Sempronius, when he advis'd them to what was both their Interest and their Duty, but endeavored all they could to stop and detain him, and others amongst them, had not the brave Men with their Swords in their hands set the Cowards further off. Thus Sempronius was forc'd to make his way through a vile heap of his own Country-men, before he broke through the Battalions of the Enemy: And shall our Country desire such Citizens, by whose means, if the rest had been as base as they, she would not this day have had one Citizen left of all that were in the Battel of Cannæ? But by good luck, amongst 7000 Armed-men, there happened to be 600 that had the Courage to break through, and came safe with their Freedom and their Arms, home to their Country, notwithstanding there were 40000 of the Enemy to resist them; judge you then how easie and safe the Passage might have been for a Body of almost two Legions, and so should you, Conscript Fathers! have had now at Canusium an Army of stout and Faithful men, Twenty thousand strong. But now, in what respect can these People be good and faithful Citizens (for sure themselves have not the face to pretend to the Title of stout and valiant) I cannot imagine, unless we shall think them so, who would have hindred the rest from forcing their way, even when they were at the point to open a passage, and since, do both envy at their safety and honor obtain'd by Valor, being conscious that their own fear and cowardize was the occasion of their present servitude? Whilst they had an opportunity to get away in the silent Night, they chose rather lurking in their Tents, to wait for the approach of Day and their Enemies: But perhaps, though they had not the Courage to break through the Enemy, they had the hearts stoutly to maintain their Camp, and being beleaguerr'd several days and nights, defended their Works with their Arms, and themselves with their Works; and at last, having ventured all hazards and suffered all extremities, wanting the necessary supports of Life, pin'd with hunger, and so feeble, that they could wield their Weapons no longer, were overcome rather by Humane Necessities, than the Arms of their Enemies: No, forsooth, there was nothing of all this in the case, but the Enemy coming before their Rampire the very next Morning at Sun-rising, within two after, without making any defence, or standing out one Brush, they tamely yielded up both their Arms and their Persons. This you see was their good Service for two days together; when they should have maintain'd their ground in the Field, they sneak'd into the Camp; and when they should have made good their Camp, they surrendred it; good for nothing, either abroad in the Battel, or at home in their Entrenchments: Shall we consent to ransom such fellows, as when they ought to have sallied out of their Camp, delay'd and staid in it; when they should have continued there and defended their Tents with their Arms, parted both with the Camp and their Arms and themselves? Nay verily, 'tis my opinion, Worthy Senators! that these no more deserve to be Ransomed, than those do to be delivered up to Annibal, who cut their way through the midst of the Enemy, and most valiantly restor'd themselves to their Country.

After this Speech of Manlius, though most of the Senators were related to some of the Prisoners, yet besides the custom of the City, from all Antiquity, little indulgent to those that suffered themselves to be taken Prisoners, the Ransom it self, which amounted to a considerable sum, had no small influence upon them, as being loth to exhaust the Exchequer, (having lately disburs'd a great deal in buying up Bond-slaves, and arming them for the Wars) and especially unwilling to furnish Annibal with so much money, the main thing which (as the report went) he stood in need of. But when this their sad Resolve was made publick, viz. That no Prisoners should be Ransom'd, there was a new fit of Weeping and Lamentation amongst the People, for the loss of so many Citizens, and with abundance of Tears and Complaints, they followed the Agents to the Gates; of whom one, (he that thought by his sham-return into Annibals Camp, he had discharg'd his Oath) went privately home and staid at his own House; but no sooner was that known, and the Senate made acquainted with it, but they unanimously Decreed, That he should be apprehended, and under a Guard sent back to Annibal.

There goes another report touching these Prisoners, That ten of them came at first, and the Senate being divided, Whether or no they should be admitted into the City? It was carry'd in the Affirmative, but with a Proviso, That they should not be admitted to Audience, and that there- thereupon staying longer than was expected, Three more followed them, viz. L. Scribonius, and C. Calpurnius, and L. Manlius; and that then a Relation of Scribonius that was one of the Tribunes of the Commons, moved the matter in the Senate, which not being granted, the three last returned to Annibal, but the former ten staid behind, because after they had been onwards some part of their Journey, they had gone back again under pretence of getting a List of the Prisoners names, and so had discharg'd themselves of their Oath. And that there was great debate in the Senate about delivering them up, but at last it was carryed in the Negative by some few Voices: However, that those Persons were so branded by the next Censors, that some of them presently made away themselves, and the rest were so ashamed and hated, that all their Lives after they durst never appear in publick, nor scarce stir out of their own doors: Touching which we may rather admire how Authors come thus to differ, than how from amongst them to establish the Truth.

That this loss at Cannæ was much greater than any others that happen'd before, may from hence be gathered, because those of the Romans Allies, who till that very time had continued firm to their Interest, then began to fall off, meerly despairing of their Condition; for soon after, all these Nations revolted to the Carthaginians; the Attellans, the Calatines, the Hirpines, part of the Apulians, all the Samnites except the Pentrians; the Bruttians and the Lucanians, together with the Surrentines, and almost all the Greeks; the Tarentines, Metapontines, Crotonians, Locrians, and all the Gauls on that side the Alps: Yet could not all these Losses, all these Defections of their Allies prevail so far, as to cause the Romans so much as to make mention of a Peace, either before the Consuls arrival, or after he was come and renew'd the Memory of the Over-throw, by giving an account of the Particulars. But on the contrary, the City carryed such a Greatness of mind, That at the same time when he return'd from so great a Defeat of which he had been the principal Cause, the People of all Ranks went out in Multitudes to meet and welcome him home; And by the Senate Thanks were return'd him, for that he had not despair'd of the Commonwealth, whereas had he been a General amongst the Carthaginians, he must certainly have undergone the greatest of Punishments.

DECADE III. BOOK III.

The E P I T O M E.

1, 3, &c. The Campanians revolt to Annibal. 11, 12. Mago sent to Carthage to carry Intelligence of the Victory at Cannæ, pours the Gold-Rings taken off the Fingers of the Roman Gentlemen slain there, out upon the Floor in the Lobby of their Senate-House, which are said to have been above half a Bushel. 12, 13. Upon these tidings, Hanno (one of their chief Noblemen) advis'd the Carthaginian Senate to make Peace with the Romans, but could not prevail, the Barchine Faction so strenuously opposed it. 16. Cl. Marcellus the Praetor has good success in a sally he made upon Annibal out of the City Nola. 18. Annibal's Army by taking up Winter-Quarters at Capua, are strangely debauch'd and enfeebled, both in their Bodies and Spirits. 19. Castrinum besieg'd by the Punicks is so straitned for Provisions, that they pull off Leather from their Targets and eat it, as also dice, and are sustain'd a while by Nuts sent them down the River Vulturnus by the Romans. 23. The Senate of Rome is fill'd up with a new choice of a hundred ninety seven persons out of the Equestrian Order. 24. L. Postumius the Praetor is cut off, together with his Army, by the Gauls. 26, &c. The two Scipio's in Spain over-come Asdrubal, and become Masters of that whole Realm. 31. The Soldiers that escap'd at Cannæ, are sent away into Sicily, not to depart thence till the war be finish'd. 33. A League made between Philip King of Macedon and Annibal. 35. Sempronius Gracchus the Consul, destroys the Campanians. 40, &c. This Book likewise contains the successes of T. Manlius the Praetor, in Sardinia, by whom the General Asdrubal himself is taken, and also those other great Commanders Mago and Hanno. 45, &c. Cl. Marcellus the Praetor, in a pitched Field near Nola, defeats Annibal's Army, and was the first that put the Romans in hopes of better success, after so many losses and disasters.

A Annibal after the Battel at Cannæ, and the taking and ransacking both the Roman Camps, hastned out of Apulia into Samnium, being invited to come into the Hirpines Country by one Statius, who promised to deliver the City Compsa into his hands. This Statius was of that Town, and a Gentleman of good quality, but kept under by the Faction of the Mopsians, a Family by the favour of the Romans very potent; but after the noise of the Victory at Cannæ, and a report of the advance of Annibal that way industriously spread by Statius, all those Mopsians of their own accord left the City, which without any resistance surrendered to the Carthaginians, and receiv'd a Garrison. Annibal leaving there all his plunder and Baggage, divides his Army, sending one part under Mago to receive into protection all the Cities of those parts that would voluntarily desert the Romans, or otherwise to subdue them by force; whilst with the rest of the Forces, he himself march'd through Campania, towards the lower Sea, designing to attack Naples, that he might have the conveniency of a Sea Port. As soon as he entred the Neapolitan Confines, he dispos'd some of his Numidians in Ambush as cunningly as he could (and thereabouts the ways for the most part are hollow and full of blind holes and corners) others he order'd to drive away the Cattel out of the Fields, and ride braving with them by the Gates of the City, upon whom, because they were but few, and seem'd out of Order too, a Party of Horse making a Sally out of the City, were by their retreating on purpose decoy'd into the Emboscade, and there hem'd in, nor had one of them escap'd but that being near the Sea, some filher-Boats happen'd to be within sight of the shore, on which those that could swim got aboard; but several young Noblemen were slain, and amongst the rest Hegeas that commanded that Squadron, charging too far upon those that seem'd to fly, was cut off. However when Annibal came to view the Walls of the Town, how strong and impregnable they were, he was discouraged from sitting down before it.

From thence he turn'd his march towards Capua, a City grown luxurious with a long prosperity and indulgence of Fortune, but amongst all corruptions that there reigned, it was most of all infected with the licentiousness of the Commons, who beyond all measure abused their Liberty; Pacuvius Calavius, a man of noble descent, and popular in his Carriage, but by ill Courses grown Rich, had both the Senate and the Commons very much at his Devotion. He happen'd to be their Chief Magistrate that year, the Romans were over-thrown at Thrasymenus, and having some inkling that the Commons who a long time had mortally hated the Senate, might, if Annibal came that way, attempt such a desperate Villany, as to murder all the Senators, and surrender the City to the Carthaginians, though he were an ill man, yet he was not so profligately wicked, but he rather desired to domineer over the Commonwealth in being, than utterly to subvert it, and knowing no State could subsist, if once depriv'd of publick Council, he bethinks himself of a course whereby he might both preserve the Senate, and oblige them as well to the Commons as himself. Assembling therefore one day the Senate together; after a solemn Preface, protesting, That in no case he could approve of any design of revolting from the Romans (unless it were upon necessity), as having himself Children by the Daughter of Appius Claudius, and his own Daughter married to Livius at Rome; but he told them, there was a thing in agitation of greater importance and far more dreadful consequence than that; For the Commons had a design, not only by way of Revolt and Rebellion, to rid the City of the Senate's Authority, but even to Massacre the Senators, and so to yield up to Annibal and the Carthaginians, the City void of all Governours and Magistracy; That he knew how to free them from this imminent danger, if they would trust him with the management of it, and forget former jars and differences which had happen'd between them and himself, concerning publick affairs. All of them present consenting for nicer fear to what he propounded, I will (says he) shut you up here in the Council Chamber, and by seeming to approve and be a Confederate in those Councils which I should not otherwise be able to oppose, I will work a way for your safety, and for performance hereof, I will give you any security that you your selves shall demand. Thus having pass'd his solemn Promise to be true to them, away he goes, shuts up the Senate-House, and sets a Guard in the Lobby, and all the Avenues, charging them to let no body pass in or out without his Order.

III. Then he calls all the people together to the Town-Hall, and makes this Speech to them. That which so often you have wish'd for (Fellow Citizens of Capua!) even an opportunity to punish and revenge your selves of your naughty and accursed Senate, is now fairly presented, and may with equal ease and safety be perform'd; for you need not in a tumultuous way, assault their several Houses; which by reason of the strong Guards they keep of their Clients and Bond-slaves, was not to be done without great hazard, but you may set upon them altogether in the Council-Chamber, where they are fast shut up, alone, and without Armour, Friends, or dependants to rescue them. Yet shall you do nothing rashly, but I will bring every one of them severally before you to receive your impartial Doom, that each according to his desert, may be punish'd; However in the first place, you must not so far indulge your just resentments, as to suffer a present heat or desire of revenge to betray your future safety. For (as I conceive) it is only these wicked Senators, whose persons and ill practices you hate; not that you mean wholly to abolish and live without a Senate; For either you must have a King (which I know you abhor to think of) or else that, which is the only Council of a Free City, a Senate; Therefore we have two things before us, To Cassier the old Senate, and furnish our selves with a new one. In order thereto, I will cause the several Senators to be cited, and demand your Sentence upon them, and what you Decree shall be done; but before any be Executed, you shall first chuse some good substantial person of Wisdom and Courage, worthy to succeed in his place.

Then down he sits, and Orders the Senators names to be drawn by Lot, and the man that it first fell upon, to be brought thither from the Council Chamber; As soon as his name was mentioned, every one cryed out, That he was a wicked Wretch, and a Villain, and well deserv'd to be hang'd; Then says Pacuvius, Well, Gentlemen, I see what your Judgement is of him; Let him turn out like a base Fellow as he is, and now go on to chuse a good, just and worthy Senator in his room. At first they were all hush'd, and silent, for want of a better man to supply his place, by and by some bold Fellow of the Crowd, laying aside modesty, names one that he had a fancy for, but then presently the Clamour was louder against him than the other, some crying out, they did not know him, others laid vile Crimes to his Charge, another said he was a Beggar, or else they objected his base descent, or scandalous sordid employment; and when a second or third was named, the more impetuous they were, and muster'd up against every one a thousand Exceptions: so that 'twas plain the people were weary of the Senator in being, but wanted a better to put in his place. For to what purpose was it to put up the same men again whom they had already nominated, unless to hear them reproach'd afresh? and if they went on to others, still they appear'd more base and unfit than such as first occur'd to their thoughts; so that at last the people began to whisper one to another, Better trust a Knave we know, than a Knave we do not know, and desired that the old Senators might be set at liberty.

IV. By this Policy Pacuvius having saved the Senators Lives, oblig'd them to himself much more than to the Commons, and without Arms govern'd all things at his pleasure, none controuling him. Thence-forwards the Senators forgetting their Dignity, began to court and Complement the Rabble, to invite and treat them sumptuously at their Houses, to Espouse their Quarrels, were always ready to stand by them, and appoint Judges favourable to that party that was most in credit with the Mob; so even in the Senate it self all things were transacted just as if it were an Assembly of the Populace. That City had always been too much given to Luxury, as well by the natural disposition of the Inhabitants, as by that over-flowing plenty of delights, and the alluring enticements of all delicacies that either Sea or Land could afford: but now, such was the obsequious fawning of the Grandees, such the insolence and licentious living of the vulgar, that they grew wanton beyond all measure, and set no bounds either to their outrageous Lusts, or extravagant Expences. Besides their contempt of their own Laws, Magistrates, and Senate, after the overthrow at Cannæ they began to despise the Romans Government, which before they had in some kind of reverence; and that which kept them from a present revolt, was that by antient Inter-marriages several of their best Families were Allied to the Romans, and especially because when they serv'd the Romans in their Wars, three hundred Horsemen of the noblest Birth in all Campania, had been drawn out and sent to reside in several Garisons of Sicily.

V. Those Gentlemens Parents and Relations with much ado obtain'd, that Embassadors should should be sent to the Roman Consul, who found him (before he march'd to Cannusium) at Venusia, accompanied with but a few Souldiers, and those scarce half-arm'd, in a condition that would most of all have moved pity in the Breasts of well-affect'd Allies, but to those that were unfaithful and proud, (as these Campanians,) apt to render him contemptible; and indeed the Consul made himself and the state of his affairs to be the more despised, by discovering too much his distress, and laying it too open: For when the Embassadors acquainted him, That the Senate and people of Capua, were extremely sorry, that any disaster had happen'd to the Romans, and offer'd to supply him with all things necessary for War; he replyed at this rate, You have, O Campanians! rather observ'd the common phrase and civilities us'd amongst Allies, when you bid us require of you what Warlike assistances we stand in need of, than spoken home to the present state of our affairs; For what after this defeat at Cannæ, have we left? Or how can we, as if we had something of our own, desire our Confederates to supply what we are wanting in? Shall we request Foot of you? Where is our Horse? Shall we tell you we lack money? as if that were all? No, No, Fortune hath dealt so severely, that she hath left us no Fund, nothing that can be made up or supplied by others; Our Legions of Infantry, our Cavalry, our Arms, our Standards, our Horses and our Men, our money and our provisions; All are lost either in the Field, or in those two Camps which next day the Enemy made themselves Masters of. Your business therefore, O Campanians! is not so much to assist us, as for us and your selves to undertake the War with the Carthaginians; Be pleas'd to remember, when your trembling Ancestors heretofore were beat into and coop'd up within your Walls, and dreaded not only the Samnites but the Sidicins too, we took them into protection, and bravely defended them at Satricula, and for your sakes engag'd our selves in a War with the Samnites, which lasted with various success for an hundred years; Add to this, that when you submitted your selves to our Government, we concluded an indifferent and equal League with you, allow'd you your own ancient Laws, and at last bestow'd upon many of you (that which before this disaster at Cannæ, was always counted no small Honour and Priviledge) the Freedom of our City, and to participate in all rights and immunities equally with our selves. Therefore in all reason you ought to esteem the late loss as much your own as ours; and count it the common Country to us both, which you are to defend. You have not to do with the Samnite or the Etrurian, so as that the Empire taken from us, should still remain in Italy; but 'tis the Carthaginian that is your Enemy, drawing with him a barbarous Train of Souldiers from the Worlds end, from as far as the Streights of the Ocean, and the Pillars of Hercules, nay some of them not born in Africk it self, but come no body knows from whence, void of all sense of Law or Justice, and almost incapable of humane Speech. This brutish rabble, wild and cruel both by nature and custom, their General hath rendred yet more savage, by making Bridges and Cawseys of dead Carcasses, and teaching them (which I abhor to mention) to feed on Mans flesh. What mortal born in so civil a Country as Italy, can possibly endure to see and have for his Lord, these Monsters, fed with such execrable diet? and run as far as Africk and Carthage for Laws and Justice, and suffer Italy to be a Province truckling under the Tyranny of Numidians and Moors? How glorious and honourable will it be O worthy Campanians! for you, by your fidelity and prowess to buoy up, and recover the Roman Empire prostrated by this overthrow! You can, I believe, in Campania, levy thirty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse: you have money enough, and enough provision; If your Faith be but equal to your Fortune, neither shall Annibal have any cause to boast his Victory, nor will the Romans much feel their loss.

VI. The Consul having with this Speech dismiss'd the Embassadors, as they were going home, one of them, Vibius Virius by name, thus discours'd his Companions; The lucky hour (says he) is come, wherein the Campanians may not only regain their Lands which the Romans have heretofore unjustly taken from them, but may moreover secure to themselves, and enjoy the Empire of all Italy; For they may now make a League with Annibal on what terms they themselves please; nor is it to be doubted but Annibal when he has finish'd the War, will go home to Africk, so shall the command of Italy be left to the Campanians. The rest all subscrib'd to Virius's notions, and accordingly they gave in a report of their Embassy, That in all mens judgment the Roman state was utterly desunt, and lost beyond any possibility of recovery. Whereupon presently the rabble, and the greatest part of the Senate, were for a Revolt, but by the authority of some persons of age and gravity, the business was stopt for a few days; however at last most Voices carried it, That the same Embassadors that had been with the Roman Consul, should be sent to Annibal. In some Annals I find, that before they went, or were fully resolv'd to revolt, Embassadors were sent to Rome, requiring, That if the Romans expected their assistance, they should admit a Campanian to be always one of their Consuls, which the Romans took in such indignation, that they forthwith commanded them out of the Senate-House; sent a Licor to carry them out of the City, and charge them at their peril not to remain that night within the Roman Territories; but because this demand jumps too near with that of the Latines long before, and since Cælius and other Writers have (not without reason) pass'd it over and said nothing thereof, I dare not recommend it for a truth.

VII. 'Tis certain their Embassadors went to Annibal, and concluded a Peace with him on the Conditions following: That no Carthaginian General or Magistrate should have jurisdiction over over any Campanian Citizen; nor should any Campanian be compell'd to take Arms, or serve any Office without his consent. That Capua should enjoy its old Laws and Magistrates; that Annibal should bestow on them three hundred of the Roman Prisoners, such as they should chuse, to the end they might exchange them for the three hundred Campanian Horse that were in the Romans Service in Sicily. These were the terms agreed on, but the Campanians beyond their Agreement committed several Outrages, particularly, the rabble seiz'd upon the Captains of several associate Troops, and other Roman Citizens, residing there either in some military employment, or concern'd in other private affairs of their own, and under pretence of securing them, clapt them into the Hot-Houses, where with the heat and noxious vapours they were stifled to death in an inhumane manner. To prevent both this Cruelty, and their making any Overtures at all to Annibal, one Decius Magius used his utmost endeavours, a man that well deserv'd the highest Authority, and would have had it too, if he had liv'd amongst people of judgment and discretion; but when notwithstanding all his Remonstrances, he heard a Garison was to be sent thither from Annibal, he laid before them the insolent Tyranny of Pyrrhus, and the wretched condition of the Tarentines, as Precedents sufficient to give them warning; He ceased not to cry out aloud in all places and Companies. First, That they should not admit any such Garison within their Walls; and afterwards when they had received them, was as urgent to have them turn'd out again, or rather (he told them) if they would by a brave and memorable exploit, atone for the baseness of revolting from their most ancient Allies and Kinsfolks, they should fall upon these Carthaginian Troops, and cut every man of them off, and so restore themselves to the Romans protection. These Discourses of his being related to Annibal (for they were not spoken in higger-mugger) he first summon'd Magius to appear before him in the Camp; but when he stoutly denied to go, alledging that even by their late Articles it was expressly capitulated, That Annibal should have no jurisdiction over any Citizen of Capua, the Punick was so enrag'd, that he commanded him to be seiz'd and dragg'd unto him in Chains; but upon cooler thoughts, left by offering such violence a tumult should arise, and in heat of blood some mischief happen, he resolv'd to be present in person, and sending notice to Marius Blossius the Prætor of Capua, that he would be there next day, sets forwards from his Camp with a small guard; Marius having assembled the people made Proclamation, that they should be all ready with their Wives and Children in a full body, and solemn Order, to meet Annibal upon the way, and welcome him to their City; which was not only obediently, but zealously perform'd by them all, both for the fancy the common people always love to be busy, and especially for the desire they had to see that famous Warriour of whom they had heard so much; only Marius for his part would not stir a foot to meet him, nor on the other side would he keep himself private, left he might seem to be afraid, or conscious of guilt, but with his Son and a few of his Friends and Dependents, walkt up and down the Market place as unconcern'd; whilst the whole Town was in an hurry to entertain and gaze at this strange Guest; Annibal as soon as he came into the City, desired the Senate might forthwith be Assembled, but the principal Capuans beseeching his Excellency, not to trouble himself that day with any serious affairs, but that as by his presence he had made it an Holy Day, so he would be pleased to celebrate it as such, and partake with them in their universal Joys; he was prevail'd with, contrary to his natural hasty temper, to defer it, because he would not at his first coming seem to deny them any thing; and accordingly spent most of that day in viewing the City.

VIII.

He and his whole Train were entertain'd and lodged by the Manii Celeres, and at the House of Stenius Pacuvius, two of the most eminent Families both for Nobility and Riches in the City. Pacuvius Calavius whom we mentioned of late, (being the chief of that Faction which brought over the people to the Carthaginian Interest) going to the Generals Quarters, carried with him his Son, a young Gentleman, whom he was forc'd almost by violence to pluck away from Decius's Company, for he was always of his Party, and most stily oppos'd the League with Annibal, nor could the inclinations of the whole City running the other way, or the reverence he had for his Father, alter his resolutions therein. The Father by begging pardon for this youth rather than by excusing him, endeavour'd to reconcile him to Annibal's favour, and with his intreaties and tears prevail'd so far, that he order'd him to be invited together with his Father to Supper, at which he admitted none but they, and his Landlord, that gave the Entertainment, and one Jubellius Jaurea, a man renowned for his services in War. They began their Banquet by Day-light, and were treated not after the niggardly Punick mode, or with the strict diet of a Camp, but as magnificently regal'd as could be expected in a City and a Family long inur'd to the choicest varieties of dainty Dishes, and abundance of voluptuous superfluity. Only Perolla Pacuvius's Son, alone was melancholly, and could not be prevail'd with to be brisk and jocund; though the Masters of the Feast, and sometimes Annibal himself invited him to be merry; and when his Father inquir'd the cause of these strange dumps and trouble of mind, he excus'd it, by alledging he was not well; but about Sun-set Calavius going out of the room where they sup'd, his Son followed him, and when they were come to a place of privacy (a Garden it was on the backside of the House) I have (says he) a contrivance in my head, whereby we may not only obtain the Romans Pardon for our offence in revolting to Annibal, but the

the same will render us Campanians in greater honour and favour with them than ever we were. The Father with Admiration demanding what this contrivance might be? the young man flinging back his Gown, shows him a Sword by his side; This (quoth he) is it; I will seal and ratify our League with the Romans with Annibals Blood; But I was willing to let you know it first, that if you had rather be absent whilst the brave act is doing, you may take your opportunity.

The old man, as if he had already been present at the Tragedy, was almost out of his Wits; For Heavens sake, my Son! and by all those sacred Tyes that oblige Children to their Parents, I beg and conjure you, That you will not, before your Fathers Eyes, do or suffer such an execrable piece of Villany, and violate all Law Divine and Humane. There have not many hours pass'd since we swore by all the Gods, and join'd our right hands with solemn Promises of Faith and Amity, and was all this for nothing else, but that as soon as we had eaten together, and talk'd a while, we should presently arm our selves against him? Dost thou but now rise from that hospitable Board, where thy self wast the third man of all Capua invited by Annibal, and wilt thou now stain and pollute that Board with his Blood? Was I thy Father able but now to reconcile Annibal to my Son, and shall I not be able to reconcile my Son to Annibal? But if thou dost indeed think nothing Holy, and hast no regard to Faith, Religion, or Piety, then boldly go on in thy horrid design, if it will not involve us in inevitable destruction, as well as shameful wickedness. What? wilt thou alone set upon Annibal? what must the multitude of his Guards do the mean while? so many brave Officers, and so many Servants as constantly attend him? Are not all their Eyes, all their hands employ'd to secure him from danger? Dost thou think they will all be blind, or stupified at the time of this frantick Enterprize of thine? Those fierce looks of Annibal, which Armed Legions tremble at, and the whole people of Rome cannot stand before, canst thou alone undaunted encounter? If other assistance fail, canst thou endure to wound me thy Father, when I shall interpose my Body for the safeguard of his? yet stab me thou must, and shalt to the heart, before thou shalt be able to reach him; and through my Breast must aim at Annibal's? Suffer thy self to be deterr'd now from such an abominable undertaking, rather than be destroyed in attempting it; And let my intreaties prevail with Thee, which once to day prevail'd for Thee. At these words perceiving his Son to weep, he embrac'd and kiss'd him, and left not off his importunities, till he made him lay away his Sword, and promise to desist. Whereupon the young man burst out into these Expressions, I will for once be content to pay to my natural Father that Piety which I owe to my Country; but must, Sir! bewail your condition, who lie under the guilt of having thrice betray'd her, once when you caus'd our revolt from the Romans; Again, when you were the chief Promoter of the League with Annibal, and now in the third place, by being the only obstacle and hindrance that Capua is not restored to the Romans, and her ancient Liberties. Here, my dear Country! take this Sword of mine, with which I had resolv'd to defend thee, and cut off thy most mortal Enemy; take it, I say, since my own Father hath wrested it out of my hands; with which words, he flung the Sword over the Garden Wall into the open street, and to prevent suspicion, returned to the Banquet.

The next day a full Senate was call'd in the presence of Annibal; The beginning of his Speech was very kind and coaxing, Giving the Campanians thanks for preferring his Friendship, before their Alliance with the people of Rome, and amongst other magnificent promises, assur'd them, That Capua ere long should be the Metropolis of all Italy, whereunto the Romans themselves, as well as other Nations, should resort for Law and Justice. But withal told them, he understood there was a certain person amongst them, that had no share in the League made with the Carthaginians, and who neither was a true Citizen of Capua, nor ought so to be accounted; This was one Magius Decius by name, whom he did demand to be delivered up into his hands, and that in his presence the Senate would pass Judgment upon him. To this they all consented, though the greater part knew well enough the Gentleman was far from deserving any such Calamity, and withal perceiv'd that this Invasion of their Liberties in the beginning threatned no less than a total subversion of them in the end. The chief Magistrate went out of the Council Chamber, and sat in the Temple, where they were wont to hold their Courts of Judicature; and Decius Magius being apprehended, and brought before him, was Ordered to Answer for himself, but he persisting in his former stoutness of spirit, Told them he was not bound so to do by the Articles of the League, whereupon he was clapt in Irons, and an Officer commanded to convey him to Annibal's Camp; All the way as he was led, whilst he was open-fac'd, he went preaching to the multitude, and crying out, Now, O Capuans! you have I hope that liberty that you so much long'd for. In the open Market-place, at Noon-day before you all, I, a person inferiour to none in Capua, am dragg'd along in Chains to be unjustly put to death; What greater outrage could have been committed, if Capua had been storm'd by an Enemy? Go out in pomp to meet Annibal, adorn your City, and Register this day of his Entrance as an Holy Day, that in the end you may behold this goodly triumph over one of your own Citizens. The people seeming to be moved with such his Exclamations, he was order'd to be muffled, and halstned out of the Gates; being brought to the Camp, he was immediately put on board a Ship bound for Carthage, left by any tumult happening at Capua upon so unusual a proceeding, the Senate should repent themselves of delivering up such a principal Member, and send to desire his Release; by denying of which Annibal must offend offend his new Allies, and by granting it, have always an Enemy at Capua ready to stir them up against his Interest; The Ship that was to transport him happen'd to be driven by streſs of weather into Cyrena, a Port-Town at that time under the Kings of Egypt, and Magius getting ashore, fled for Sanctuary to the Statue of King Ptolemy, and thereupon was carried by certain Officers to that Prince at Alexandria. To whom having related how he was put in Chains by Annibal against all right, and contrary to his own League, the King caused his Shackles to be knockt off, and gave him leave to return to Capua, or go to Rome, which he pleased; But he reckoning Capua not safe, and that at Rome in such a Juncture he should be lookt upon rather as a Fugitive than a Friend, declared, he would spend the rest of his days no where more willingly than in his Majesty's Territories, who had given him his Life and Liberty.

XI. During these Occurrents, Q. Fabius Pictor comes back to Rome from Delphos; and read the Answer of the Oracle out of a writing which he brought, containing the names of the Gods they were to address themselves unto, and in what manner; concluding thus. If these things, O Romans, you shall do, then shall your affairs succeed better and more fortunately, and your Commonwealth shall thrive according to your desires, and the people of Rome shall be Victorious over their Enemies; but remember when all things go well on your side, and that your State is preserved, That ye send to Pythian Apollo a Present answerable to your Successes, and honour him with part of the spoils and booty, and keep your selves from lasciviousness. After he had repeated this translated out of Greek Verse; he added, That so soon as he departed from the Oracle; he sacrificed to all those Gods with Wine and Frankincense, and that being commanded by the Priest, that as he approached the Oracle, having on a Laurel Crown, and in the same had sacrificed, so he should go on board with it, and not leave it off till he arriv'd at Rome; all which with the highest diligence and devotion he had performed accordingly, and deposited the Crown on the Altar of Apollo in Rome. And the Senate decreed, That all those Sacrifices and supplications enjoyn'd, should with care and speed be celebrated. Whilst these things were a doing in Italy, Mago the Son of Amilcar arriv'd at Carthage, sent as an Express to give an account of the Victory at Cannæ, yet not directly from his Brother out of the Field, but staid some dayes by the way to receive the submissions of several Cities of the Bruttii revolting from the Romans. This Gentleman being brought to his Audience, set forth at large the Achievements of his Brother Annibal in Italy. That he had given Battel to six Generals, whereof four were Consuls, the other two a Dictator, and a General of the Horse; That he had engag'd in pitched Fields with six intire Consular Armies, and slain above two hundred thousand of the Enemy, taken above fifty thousand. That of four Consuls he had cut off two, and of the other two, one was wounded, and the other having lost his whole Army, forc'd to fly with not above fifty men to accompany him. That the General of the Cavalry, created with full Consular Authority, was routed and put to flight, and the Dictator (forsooth) that never durst hazard the Fortune of a Battel, was now counted the only worthy General. That the Bruttii, the Apulians, and part of the Samnites and Lucanians, were already revolted to the Carthaginians; And Capua the head City, not only of Campania, but (since the Roman State thus brought down at Cannæ) of all Italy, had freely set open their Gates to Annibal; For all which great and signal Victories, he desired (as was most due) That there should a Thanksgiving day be kept, with Sacrifices to the Immortal Gods.

XII. Then to confirm their Belief of these joyful news, he caused the golden Rings taken from those of the Enemy that were slain, to be pour'd down upon the Floor in the Lobby before the Senate-House; which made so great an heap, that some Authors say, they fill'd three and an half of those measures call'd Modii [in all almost two Bushels of our measure.] But the common report and most probable is, That it was but one Modius-full; After which, to shew the greatness of the overthrow, he acquainted them, That none of the Romans but Knights and persons of Quality were allow'd to wear that Ornament. The drift and conclusion of his Speech was this, That the greater their hopes were of putting in a short time a period to the War, the more vigorous they ought to be in supplying Annibal with all necessaries, considering that he mannaged a War far from home, in the midst of the Enemies Country; That abundance of Corn and Money was necessarily spent, and as so many Battels had utterly destroy'd the Enemies Armies, so they could not but have diminish'd the Conquerors Forces; Therefore new Recruits must be sent over, and money to pay off the Souldiers Arrears, with store of Provisions for those brave Souldiers, who had so well deserv'd of the Carthaginian Nation. All being overjoy'd at this news, Himilco a Senator of the Barchine Faction, supposing he had now a fit opportunity to rally and upbraid Hanno the chief of those that oppos'd them. How now Hanno? (quoth he) do you still repent of undertaking this War against the Romans? Now bid us surrender up Annibal into their hands; oppose the returning of thanks to the Gods for all these prosperous successes; Let us hear a Roman Senator now Harangue it in the Council of Carthage: Then stood up Hanno, saying, I intended, my Lords! to have been silent to day, left in this common Follity, I should say any thing that might not be so pleasing as I could wish; but since a Senator hath been pleas'd to Catechize me, and demands directly, whether I still mislike our undertaking this War with the Romans? If I should say nothing, I may be censur'd either as proud or culpable; forgetful of other mens Liberty, or not enough remembering my own. I will therefore Answer Himilco, and frankly tell him, That I have not yet left off to dislike this War; nor shall cease to blame our Invincible General, until I see the same ended upon some equal and tolerable Conditions; For nothing can satisfy my longing after the old Peace, but the making of a new one. Those particulars which Mago but now recounted so magnificently, as they are at present most joyful to Himilco, and the rest of Annibal's Favourites, so they may prove welcome to me, in this respect, That success in War, if we make a right use of our Fortune, will be a means to procure us an easy and honourable Peace. For if we overslip this Juncture, wherein we seem able to give, rather than prove vain in the end. But let us consider of what kind it is even at present, and how grounded; The sum and substance of Annibals Message is this. I have routed the Enemy and destroy'd their Armies. Therefore send me more Forces. What could he demand more, if he had been overthrow'n? I have taken two Camps of the Enemies, full (we must think) of Victuals and all good things; allow me therefore speedily Provisions, Corn and Money; what could he have desired else, if he had been plunder'd and turn'd out of his own Camp? But that I may not wonder alone at these strange Conclusions (since now I have answer'd Himilco, I may sure be free to ask a question or two) I would desire either Himilco, or Mago, to satisfy us in the following particulars, since you say that in the Battel at Cannæ the Roman Empire was wholly ruin'd beyond resource, and that all Italy is upon the Revolt; I demand first, whether any one Nation of the Latine People be come over to us? And in the next place, whether any one person of all the five and thirty Tribes of Romans is fled to Annibal?

Mago answering in the Negative to both these Interrogatories, the other continued, Then I perceive there yet remain a multitude of Enemies; but now I would fain know in what heart they are, and whether or no they yet keep up their spirits and their hopes! Mago saying he could give no account of that: There is nothing (quoth Hanno) more easie to be known: Have the Romans yet sent any Embassadors to Annibal to intreat for Peace? or are you certainly inform'd that at Rome they talk of Peace? When that too was denyed, Nay then (says Hanno) by this account we have still as fresh and intire a War as we had that very day that Annibal first set foot in Italy; there are many of us yet alive that remember how various the success was in the former War; nothing could be more prosperous or in a better condition, both at Land and Sea, than our affairs before C. Lucatius and Aulus Postumius came to be Consuls; and yet before they were out of their Consulship, we were vanquish'd and utterly overthrow'n at the Island Ægates. And if (may the Gods divert the Omen) any change of fortune should now also happen, can you hope for a Peace when we are worsted, when no man so much as offers or seeks after it now we are all Conquerors? For my part if my opinion were ask'd, touching a Peace, either upon Terms to be tendered to the Enemy, or proposed by them, I know well what to say, but as for these demands which Mago makes on Annibals behalf, my judgment is, That there is no occasion to send such supplies to those that already are Conquerors; and if they do but abuse us with an empty noise of Victory, much less ought we to send them. But this Speech of Hanno's did not much sway with the Senate, for his known animosity against the Barchine Family made his Authority in this matter of little weight, and besides, their minds were so taken up with the present Joy, that they could not endure to hear any thing that might lessen that satisfaction, and did fully perswade themselves, that the War would soon be at an end, if they did but now strain a little to help it forward. Therefore with great consent, there pass'd an Act of the Senate, That forty thousand Numidians should be sent Annibal for recruits, and forty Elephants, and many Talents of Silver; Also a Dictator was dispatcht away with Mago, into Spain, to raise twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse to reinforce the Armies that were there and in Italy.

But these things though briskly voted, were yet (as oft it happens when people are in prosperity) but slowly accomplished. Whereas on the other side, neither the Romans natural diligence, nor present Fortune, would permit them to make any delays; For as the Consul was not wanting in any affairs that he was concern'd in, so the Dictator, as soon as he had dispatcht the necessary Ceremonies of Religion, and obtain'd the peoples order for his advance; besides the two City Legions, which in the beginning of the year had been levied by the Consuls, and the Bondslaves that were before mustered, and some Regiments gather'd out of the Picenes and Gauls Country; For a further help at a dead lift, considering that in cases of Extremity, courses may be lawful, or at least excusable, which at other times are not to be allow'd, he descended so far as to make Proclamation, That all Prisoners for Capital Crimes, or in Execution for Debt, who would list themselves Souldiers, should be discharged and freed from their Creditors; and of such he Armed six thousand, with the spoils of the Gauls, which were carry'd about for shew in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, and so march'd from Rome five and twenty thousand strong. Annibal having possess'd himself with hopes, sometimes with fears, but all in vain, leads his Army into the Territories of Nola, designing not at first to go roughly to work with them, because he was in some hopes they might voluntarily comply; but if they answer'd not his expectations in some reasonable time, resolv'd to put them to all the Extremities they could either suffer or fear. The Senate of that City, and especially the principal of them, continued firm to their Alliance with the Romans, but the Commons (as their manner is) greedy of alterations, were all for Annibal, alledging their fears of having the Country plunder'd, and the Calamities of a Siege; nor were there wanting some people of Quality to push them on to a Revolt. Whereupon the Senate, fearing they might not be able to resist the popular Torrent, if they should openly thwart their inclinations, by temporizing and seeming to comply, gain'd their point, and prevented the mischief; pretending that they approved of a Revolt to Annibal, but were not yet agreed on what terms they should enter into this new Alliance. So having gain'd time, they send Post an Express, to Marcellus Claudius the Roman Prætor, who lay then with his Army at Casilinum, acquainting him, in what danger the State of Nola stood, That Annibal was already master of the Country, and would quickly be so of the Town, if they were not assisted; That the Senate were already driven to this shift to promise the Commons to revolt whenever they would have them, or else they had in Rebellion before this time. Marcellus praising the Senates prudence and fidelity, desires them to spin out time by the same Artifice, until he could come up, and in the interim to conceal this correspondence, and seem to have no hopes of assistance from the Romans. And himself with all Expedition march'd from Casilinum to Calatia, and thence having pass'd the River Vulturnus, through the Territories of Saticula and Trebia, came by Suessula over the Mountains to Nola.

XV. Before he got thither, Annibal was gone out of that Country, towards the Sea near Naples, for his teeth water'd at that fine Sea-Port Town, to which Ships at any time might safely arrive from Africk; but finding that City under a Roman Governour (which was M. Junius Syllanus, call'd in, by the Inhabitants themselves) not being able to get into either Naples or Nola, he went to Nuceria. Having lain before that Town a good while, and endeavour'd in vain to take it by force, or get it surrendred by trinkling sometimes with the people, and sometimes with the Nobles, meer Famine at last oblig'd them to yield to him, upon condition to march clear away in single Garments, leaving their Arms behind them. And (as he always would seem kind to all Italians, but the Romans) he offer'd them good pay and preferments, if they would take up Arms under him; But not a man would stay, but got away, some to their Friends, and others at a venture as their minds stood, to divers Cities of Campania, but most to Nola and Naples. Amongst the rest almost thirty Senators, and those too generally of the first rank, came to Capua; but being not admitted there, (because they had shut their Gates against Annibal;) they took up their Residence at Cumes. The spoil of Nuceria was given to the Souldiers, and then the City burnt. Marcellus in the mean time held Nola, confiding no less in the good will of the chief Inhabitants, than in the strength of his own Garison; but was in jealousy of the Commons, and above all the rest there was one L. Bantius, who having before been in the Conspiracy, and consequently fearing the Roman Prætor, was always contriving either to betray the Town, or else to run away to the Enemy; A stout young man he was, and one of the bravest Cavaliers of all the Romans Confederates, who being found half dead amongst the heaps of the slain, at Cannæ, Annibal not only took care to have his wounds cured, but also sent him home with very bountiful gifts, in gratitude for which favours, he was willing to yield up Nola into his hands; and the Prætor having an Eye upon him, plainly perceiv'd that his head was at work by all means to compass that alteration. Now there were but two ways to deal with him, either to cut him off by rigour, or win him by Courtsey, and he thought it a better course to gain unto himself so brave and valiant a Friend, than only to deprive the Enemy of him, Therefore sending for him, he thus kindly accosts him; I cannot but judge that you have many amongst your Fellow Citizens that envy you, since no one man of your Town hath all this while given me an account of your Character, and those gallant military Exploits you have done, but 'tis not possible any mans merit, that serves under the Romans, should long lye obscure or unrewarded; several that were your Fellow Souldiers have of late inform'd me what a stout Gentleman you are; how often and how bravely you have hazarded your Life for the honour and safety of the people of Rome; and particularly how in the Battel of Cannæ, you gave not over fighting, till having scarce any blood left, you were beat down by the heaps of Men, Horses and Arms tumbling upon you; Therefore I applaud and wish all success to your valour, which from me shall never want either Honour or Reward; and the oftner you visit me, you shall find it shall be the more for your dignity and profit; and withal, besides these fair promises, gave him an excellent Horse, and ordered the Treasurer to tell him out five hundred Bigats of Silver [between fifteen and sixteen pound sterling] and likewise commanded the Lictors to admit him to his presence, without any waiting, whenever he came to speak with him.

XVI. These Civilities of Marcellus did so charm the mind of this haughty young Gentleman, that thence forwards of all their Associates, no one did more strenuously or faithfully promote the Roman Interest. Annibal having again removed his Camp from Nuceria to Nola, Marcellus upon their approach withdrew his Army into the Town, not that he was afraid to keep the Field, but to prevent any opportunity of betraying the City, seeing too many of the Inhabitants inclinable thereunto. After this they began on both sides to arrange their Forces and face each other; the Romans under the Walls of Nola, the Carthaginians before their own Entrenchments; thus there happen'd several Skirmishes between the City and the Camp, with various success; For the Generals neither hindred small parties that were eager to fight, nor yet would give the signal for a general Battel; whilst thus the two Armies were continually upon their Guard, Marcellus was advertiz'd by the chief Nobles of Nola, That there were secret correspondencies held by night between some of the inferior Townsmen and the Carthaginians, who had agreed, That when the Romans were march'd out of the Gates, they should seize their Baggage and Carriages, and shut the Gates upon them, and secure the Walls; that being Masters both of their Goods, and of the City, they would let in the Carthaginians instead of the Romans. Upon this advice, Marcellus (having thank'd the Senators that gave it) resolv'd before any mutiny should happen in the City, to hazard the Fortune of a Battel. At the three Gates that fronted the Enemy, he drew up his Army in three distinct Bodies, giving order that the Carriages should follow, and the Lackies, Snapfack Boys, and weak or sick Souldiers to carry Palizado's for the Rampire. At the middle Gate he placed the choicest of the Roman Legions and Horse, at the other two, the new-raiz'd men, and those lightly arm'd, together with the Auxiliary Horse. The Townsmen were commanded not to come near the Walls or Gates, and sufficient Guards appointed to the Carriages and Baggage to prevent any surprize; thus prepared, they stood within the Gates. Annibal who stood in Battalia most part of the day (as he had done several dayes before) wondred greatly at first, that neither the Roman Army came out, nor any one in Arms appeared on the Walls, but at last concluding his correspondence was discovered, and that for meer fear, they were thus still and quiet, sends back part of his Forces into their Camp, with order to bring out all the Artillery necessary for the storming the Town, not doubting, but if he assaulted them briskly, the people within would quickly raise some tumult. But, anon, when his Souldiers were all in a hurry, every man about his charge, in the Front, and he was just advancing to storm the Walls, on a sudden, one of the Gates flew open, Marcellus founds a charge, his men set up a shout, and first the Foot, and after them the Horse, issue, and charge the Enemy with all the violence imaginable; By that time they had sufficiently terrified and disorder'd their main Body; P. Valerius Flaccus, and C. Aurelius, two Lieutenant Generals, issued forth at the other two Gates, upon their Flanks and Wings; The Snapfack-Boys, Attendants and other multitude set to Guard the Baggage, shouted and hallow'd as fast as the best of them, so that whereas the Carthaginians before despised them, especially for the smallness of their numbers, they now fancied them to be a mighty Army; I dare not indeed affirm, what some Authors write, That of the Enemy there were two thousand three hundred slain, and but one man lost on the Romans side; but be the Victory greater or less, it was an excellent piece of service at this Juncture; and I think I may say of the greatest consequence of any thing acted in all that War; For at that time of day, it was a more difficult matter for the Romans (that had been of late so often baffled) not to be overcome by Annibal, than afterwards to overcome him.

Armies

Annibal seeing no hopes of making himself Master of Nola, retreated to Acerra; Marcellus in the mean time causing the Gates of Nola to be shut, and Guards set that none should pass forth, sat judicially in the Market place to examine those that had held private Conference with the Enemy, of whom above seventy being found guilty, were Beheaded, their Goods sold, and the Money delivered to the Senate; then marching away with his Army, above Suessula, he Encamp'd himself. The Punick endeavour'd first to draw the Acerrans to a voluntary Surrender, but finding them obstinate, begins to besiege and storm the Town, whose Inhabitants had more Stomach than Courage, and therefore despairing to defend themselves, as soon as they saw a Circumvallation was making before their Walls, before the Line was finish'd, in the dead of the night, stole away as well as they could by the Guards, and fled (every one as his Wits guided, or his fear carry'd him) into such Cities of Campania as continued firm to the Romans; Annibal after he had plunder'd and burnt Acerra, having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and Legions were come up towards Casilinum, fearing lest being so near they should have some design upon Capua, leads his Army to Casilinum. There were then in that Town, five hundred Prænestines with a few Romans and Latines, which the news of the defeat at Cannæ had brought thither; For the levy at Præneste not being finish'd by the day appointed, they setting out late from home, being come to Casilinum, join'd with certain Romans, and others of the Allies, and set forwards from thence in a pretty handsome Body, but the noise of the overthrow at Cannæ, turn'd them back again to Casilinum, where having spent some days, suspecting and being no less suspected of the Campanians (for they were mutually counter-plotting upon each other) hearing at last for certain, that Capua was revolted, and had entertain'd Annibal; they one night massacred the Townsmen, and seiz'd on that part of the City which stood on this side Vulturnus (for that River ran through and divided it) where they still kept Garison, being reinforc'd with a Company of Perusines, consisting of four hundred and sixty men, driven to Casilinum by the same sad tidings that brought the Prænestines thither; and as they seem'd now to defend that place (considering the Walls were of so small a space, and that they were flankt on one side by the River) so for the proportion of Corn, (whereof they had but little) they were indeed too many.

Annibal being come pretty near, sent a Party of Getulians, under the Conduct of one Ialca, with Orders first, if he could come to a Parley, to perswade them with fair words to open their Gates and receive a Garifon, but if they continued obdurate, to attack them briskly, and try if in any part he could storm the Town. When they came up to the Walls, this Barbarian Captain finding nothing but stillness and solitude, concluded they had abandon'd it for fear; and set his men to break open the Gates, and force the Locks and Bars; but on a sudden the Gates flew open, and two compleat Companies drawn up within, sally out with a mighty shout, and cut to pieces abundance of the Enemy. The first, being thus repuls'd, Maharbal was sent with a greater force, yet neither could he endure the charge of these Companies sallying out upon him. At last Annibal Encamping just before the Walls, prepares with all his Forces and utmost strength to assault this little City and petty Garifon, and whilst he pressed hard upon them, investing it round with his Souldiers, he lost a great many men, and especially such as were most active and forwards; once upon a sally planting his Elephants between them and home, he had like to have intercepted them, and forc'd them to run for their lives into the City, not a few (considering their small number) being left dead behind them, and more had been cut off, if the approach of night had not favour'd them. The next day the Assaults were all sharp set to give a fresh and hot charge, and the more to enflame them, a golden Coronet was propos'd to whatever should first scale the Wall; and the General himself upbraided them, that they who storm'd Saguntum should stand so long trifling about a paltry Borough situate too upon a Plain; and at the same time put them all in general, and each man by himself in mind of the gallant service they had done at Canna, Thrasymenus and Trebia; then began they to play their Engines, and undermine; nor omitted any thing that could be attempted either by Force or Art. The Defendants raised Mounts within to oppose their Fabricks without, and prevented their Mines with Countermines and cross Trenches, so as both above ground and beneath they frustrated all their designs, till at last Annibal for very shame gave over the Enterprize; And having fortified his standing Camp, and left a competent Guard to defend it (because he would not seem wholly to quit the Siege) withdrew into Capua for his Winter Quarters. There he kept his Army most part of the Winter, in close Houses and warm Beds, who always before had been enur'd to all the hardships that men could endure, and not acquainted with good keeping, much less with the delights of the World. Thus those very men that had triumph over the horrors of the Alps, and were not to be broken by any Extremity, were spoil'd and undone by too good usage, and excess of pleasures; to which they so much the more greedily abandon'd themselves, as they were unaccustomed thereunto. Sleep and drunkenness, and delicate Fare, and Wenching, the Stews and the Hot Houses, Ease and Idleness, which every day grew more pleasant and habitual, had so weakened their Bodies and debauch'd their minds, that henceforwards they subsisted rather by the reputation of their past Victories, than any present strength or manhood; Inasmuch that those well skill'd in affairs of War, reckon this Wintering at Capua to be no less an over sight in Annibal, than his not marching to rights to Rome from the Battel of Canna; For that delay did only seem to defer, but this error destroy'd the hopes of Victory for ever. Most certain it is, he march'd out of Capua, as it were with a new Army, for they had nothing of their old Discipline, or hardy Courage; For not only they parted thence, intangled or encumber'd with Harlots, but when they came to lie abroad in the Field, and to endure hard marches and other military toils, their Bodies and Spirits faint'd, just as if they had been raw fresh-water Souldiers: so that all that Summer, abundance of them fled from their Colours, and the chief place of resort where they lurk'd and shelter'd themselves, was Capua.

XIX. The Winter being pretty well over, Annibal again took the Field, and return'd to Caslinum, where though there had not been much Battery, yet the Blockade continuing, had reduced the Townsmen and Garifon to the extremity of want. Marcellus with all his heart would have relieved them, but he was hindred, both by the overflow of the River Vultur-nus, and the intreaties of the people of Nola and Acerra, fearing to be over-run by the Capuans, if once the Roman Garifons were withdrawn. As for T. Sempronius Gracchus, who at that time commanded in chief the Roman Army in those parts, the Dictator being gone to Rome to repeat the Auspices, had given express Orders, not to attempt any thing in his absence, so that though he lay Encamp'd near Caslinum, yet he could not stir a foot to help them; and yet there came to him daily such tidings as might have provok'd the greatest patience in the World; for 'twas certain, that some not able to endure the Famine any longer, had flung themselves down headlong; and others expos'd their naked Breasts upon the Walls as Buts for the Darts and Arrows of the Enemy. Sadly griev'd was Gracchus at this news: fight the Enemy he durst not, because that was contrary to the Dictators Commands; without fighting he saw he could not send them in any Provisions openly; nor had he any hopes to do it privately; at last having got what meal he could out of the adjacent Country, therewith he fills several Barrels, and got an opportunity to advise them in the Town to take them up as they should come swimming down the River, which the night following they received and equally divided among them. The next night, and the third, they used the same stratagem, for being put into the water in the night, and coming down before day, they escaped the Enemies Centinels. But afterwards by continual Rains, the River swelling higher than ordinary, some of these Vessels were driven by the Current, cross the Channel, and lodg'd on the Bankside amongst the Officers, near the Enemies Guard, where with Annibal being made acquainted, he caus'd a more strict watch to be kept, that nothing sent down the River might escape them. After this there were great store of Nuts poured into the water from the Roman Camp, which floating along unperceiv'd in the middle of the stream, were taken up by those of the Town in Wicker-Baskets. In fine, they were reduc'd to such extremity, as to take the Thongs and Leather from their Shields and Bucklers, and making them soft in scalding Water, try'd to eat them; Nay, they fed on Mice and all other Vermin and Carrion, nor was there a Weed or Root they could come at on the Banks and Terraces under the Wall, but they devoured it, and when the Enemy had turn'd up with a Plow all the Green sod at the foot of the Counterscarp, they cast Turnip-Seed upon the Mould, which made Annibal cry out, What a Devil must we be before Caslinum until those Rapes are grown and ripe? And then, he that before would never hear of any Composition, consented to a Parley for ransom all that were Freemen in the Town. It being agreed, they should pay seven Ounces of gold a Head; and so security being given for performance of Articles, they surrendred, and were kept Prisoners till the gold was paid, and then, sent with a Safe-Conduct to Cumes, for that's more credible than the report that they were cut off by his Cavalry, sent after them on the way thither. Most of them were Prænestines, and of five hundred and seventy there in Garifon, on half well near were destroy'd, either by the Sword or Famine: the rest return'd safe to Prænestes with their Commander Manicius (one who formerly had been a Scrivener) in memorial of whom a Statue was erected in the Market place of Prænestes, arm'd at all points, in a long Robe, and his Head cover'd; and three other Figures with this Inscription engraven on a Brass plate. That they were vow'd by Manicius for the Souldiers that were under him in the Garifon at Caslinum. And the same Inscription was under three other Images set up in the Temple of Fortune.

The Town of Caslinum was restor'd to the Campanians, strengthned with a Garifon of seven hundred men out of Annibal's Army, lest when he was gone, the Romans should attack it; The Senate of Rome bestow'd on these Prænestine Souldiers double pay, and five years vacancy from serving in any War, they also offer'd to make them free Burgesses of Rome, but they declined it, and chose rather to live in their own Country; what was done for the Perusians is not so plainly recorded, it not appearing by any Monuments of their own, or Records of the Romans. At this time the Petellines, who alone of all the Bruttii stood fast to the Romans, were attack'd, not only by the Carthaginians, who were Masters of most of the Country round them, but also by the rest of the Bruttii, because they would not join with them; In this distress the Petellines sent to the Romans for a Garifon; whose intreaties and tears (for when they were bid defend themselves as well as they could, they flung themselves down at the Door of the Senate, and wept abundantly) did very much move the compassion both of the Senators and Commons, yet being again consulted about it, and having survey'd all the strength of the Empire, they were at last forc'd to confess, that it lay not in their power at present to assist and defend their Allies so remote, but wish'd them to go home, and since they had continued their fidelity to the utmost, henceforth they gave leave for them to use any Expedients as might be most for their own preservation. This Answer being reported by the Embassadors to the Petellines, their Senate was so surpris'd, that most of them were for deserting the City, and shifting every one for himself; others seeing they were abandon'd by their own Allies, were for siding with the rest of the Bruttii, and by their mediation to be reconcil'd to Annibal: but at last that Party prevail'd who were for resolving upon nothing rashly. So the business being adjourn'd, at the next Assembly, the fright being somewhat over, the chief Noblemen carry'd it, That all their people should bring in their Goods out of the Country, and the City be fortified.

About this time Letters came to Rome, both out of Sicily and Sardinia; Those from Ota-cilius the Pro-Prætor of Sicily were first read in the Senate, purporting, That L. Furius the Prætor was come back to Lilybæum from Africk with the Fleet, dangerously wounded and like to die; That neither the Souldiers nor Seamen had their pay, nor their allowance of Provisions at the times appointed, therefore he earnestly entreated that the same might be sent with all Expedition, and wishal, if their Lordships thought fit, to dispatch one of the new elected Prætors to succeed him in his Government; Much to the same effect, as for Money and Corn, did A. Cornelius Mammula the Pro-Prætor of Sicily, write; And a short Answer was return'd to them both, That there was none to send; but they must provide for their Armies and Fleets as well as they could. Whereupon Oracilius sending to King Hiero (the Romans only help at a dead lift) procur'd from him money enough to pay off his Souldiers Arrears, and also six Months Provisions. And the associate Cities furnish'd Cornelius in Sardinia very bountifully. At Rome they were in such want of money, that they were forc'd at the instance of Minucius Tribune of the Commons, to create three Bankers who were call'd Triumviri Mensarii, viz. L. Aemilius, who had been Consul and Censor, and M. Atilius Regulus who had twice been Consul, and L. Scribonius Libo who at that that time was one of the Tribunes of the Commons.

Commons. The two Atilii, M. and C. were also Created Duumviri, and Consecrated the Temple of Concord, which L. Manlius the Prætor had vow'd. Three Pontiffs were also made, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, in the room of P. Scævinius late deceased, and of L. Æmilius Paulus, and Q. Ælius Patrus, both slain at Canna.

XXII. The Fathers having with all the industry, and as much prudence as was possible, supplied what was wanting abroad, to repair the Breaches which ill fortune had made in their State, had at last respect to themselves, the solitude and thinness of their own House, and the small number of those left to manage publick Councils, for there had been no new Election of Senators since the Cenforship of L. Æmilius and C. Flaminius, in which five Years time, a great number of them, what with private Casualties, and especially by the publick Losses in so many Battels, had been taken off. M. Æmilius the Prætor, in the absence of the Dictator (for since the loss of Cæcilium he was gone to the Army) did, upon the request of them all, propose this matter, and Sp. Carvilius having in a long speech, bewail'd not only the penury of the City in general, but also the small number that was left of those Citizens out of whom Senators were wont to be chosen, told them, That he thought it advisable both for filling up the Body of the Senate, and to oblige the Latine Nation in a stricter bond of unity, two Senators of each Latine State (if the House should so think fit) be naturaliz'd, and then taken into the Senate in the room of those deceased. This motion was generally as ill resented as the Latines demand to the same purpose heretofore, and there being throughout the whole House a great muttering and indignation, Manlius starts up, There is yet (quoth he) one man left yet alive of that Family, and his Lineage who formerly swore in the Capitol, That whatsoever Latine he saw sitting in the Roman Senate he would kill him with his own hand. Q. Fabius Maximus added, That there never was so unseasonable a motion made between those Walls, for the affections of their Allies being already wavering, and their Faith so uncertain and doubtful, the very mention of such a matter were enough to alienate them quite; Therefore by all means he desired this rash Speech of one inconsiderate person, might become extinct by the silence of them all. For if ever there were utter'd in that Council any thing which 'twas fit to keep conceal'd, this very business above all others ought to be buried in oblivion, and reputed as never spoken at all. So that project was dash'd, and they resolv'd, that a Dictator should be chosen to supply the Vacancies in the Senate, one that had been Cenfor, and the eldest of those that had born that Office; and that C. Terentius the Consul should be sent for to nominate such Dictator, who being come to Rome by long Journeys out of Apulia (where he left a sufficient Guard) the night following did by virtue of an Act of the Senate, create M. Fabius Buteo, Dictator for six Months, but without any General of the Horse.

XXIII. This Gentleman ascending up to the Rostra (or place of publick Audience) with all his Licitors about him, declar'd to the people. That he could neither allow of two Dictators at a time (a thing without Precedent) nor of himself being a Dictator without a General of the Horse, nor yet that the authority and intire power of the Censors should under any varied Title, be put twice into the same mans hands; or that a Dictator unless Created to manage the Wars, should have six months Government allotted him. Therefore he would moderate all these Extravagancies which chance, or time, or necessity had introduc'd. Not that he would turn any one out of the Senate that C. Flaminius and L. Æmilius the Censors had elected to that dignity, he only would cause their names to be call'd over, that it might not lie in any one mans power to judge of and arbitrate at his pleasure touching the reputation and manners of a Senator; and in substituting new Senators in the room of those deceased, he would take such a course, that all the World should see one rank or degree only had the precedence, not that this or that man was prefer'd before another. Thus after the names of the old Senators were recited, he made up the Vacancies; First with those that after the time of the Censors, L. Æmilius and C. Flaminius, had officiated any Curule Magistracy, and were not yet chosen into the Senate, in course as each had born his Office; next he chose such as had been Ædiles, Tribunes, Prætors, or Quæstors; and last, of such as had not yet obtain'd those great Offices, but yet had done signal services for the Commonwealth, as those who had Trophies hanging up in their Houses taken from the Enemy, or had been rewarded with a Civic Garland for saving the Life of a Citizen. Thus there being one hundred and seventy persons chosen into the Senate with the good liking of all ranks, the Dictator immediately threw up his Office, discharg'd his Licitors, and came down from the Rostra as a private man; mixing himself amongst the croud that attended their private affairs, lingering out the time on purpose because he would not have the multitude accompany him out of the Forum; but yet they were so zealously affectionated to him, that they would notwithstanding attend his leisure and waited upon him home. The Consul the next night returned towards the Army, without taking leave of the Senate, for fear he should be detained still in Town for holding the Elections.

XXIV. On the morrow, the Senate upon a motion made by M. Pomponius the Prætor, wrote to the Dictator, That if it might consist with the publick safety, he would come to Town to chase new Consuls, and that the Master of the Horse, and the Prætor M. Marcellus, should come along with him, that from their own mouths the Fathers might understand in what condition the Commonwealth was, and take measures suitable to the circumstances of affairs. Accordingly they all appear'd, appear'd, leaving their Lieutenants to take charge of the Forces. The Dictator spoke little relating to himself, and that very modestly, referring the greatest part of the honour of what had been done, to his Master of the Horse T. Sempronius Gracchus. He appointed the Election-Days, where L. Posthumus in his absence (being then Governour of Gallia) was created the third time Consul; together with T. Sempronius Gracchus, then Master of the Horse; The Prætors were M. Valerius Leuvinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Mucius Sævola; The Dictator having settled the Magistrates, return'd to his Winter Quarters at Theamum, leaving behind him his General of the Horse, to the end that being shortly to enter upon his Consulship, he might advise with the Senate what Forlignce arrives of a new disaster (Fortune seeming that year to pride her self in heaping up one Calamity on the neck of another; viz. That L. Posthumus the Consul Elect, was slain, and his Army defeated in Gallia. The manner thus; There was a vast Forrest (the Gauls call'd it Litana) through which he was to march, the Trees whereof on the right and left hand of the pass, the Gauls had more than half saw'd through, near the Root on the inside, so that though they stood upright, with a little shog they would fall down. Posthumus had only two Legions of Romans, but had levied so many of the associates near the upper Sea as made him five and twenty thousand strong; The Gauls lay lurking about the edges of this Forrest, and when he with his Army was got into the narrow way, threw down the Trees that stood next, which toppling down one another on either side, fell upon the Romans, and knockt o'th' head both Horse and Men, that scarce ten escap'd. For as most of them were struck stark dead, either with the Bodies of the Trees, or with the broken Boughs and Branches, so the rest, affrighted with this unexpected accident, were being taken alive, who making towards a Bridge that the Enemy had before posses'd themselves of, were there intercepted, amongst whom the Consul Posthumus resolving not to be made a Prisoner, was slain. Whose Armour and Head (after they had cut it off) the Boii carried in triumph to one of their most eminent Temples, and having cleansed the skull (according to their mode) gilded it with gold, which serv'd them both for a Chalice in their solemn Sacrifices, and an ordinary drinking Cup for their chief Priest and his Assistants; nor was the booty of less importance to the Gauls than their Victory; for though the Horse were generally kill'd by the fall of the Timber, yet the rest of the Goods and baggage (nothing being carried off was found all along scatter'd on the ground amongst the dead in the same order as they march'd.

These sad tidings having put the City into such consternation, that for several dayes together all Shops were shut up, and no more stirring about streets than if it had been perpetually night, the Senate order'd, the Ædiles to walk about and cause the Shops to be open'd, and remove this show of publick grief. Then T. Sempronius having assembled the Senate purposely on this occasion, comforted the Fathers as well as he could, and desired, That as they were not dismay'd or cast down at the mighty loss at Canna, so they would not now suffer their spirits to shrink for lesser Calamities; That if (as he hop'd) they had but good success against Annibal and his Carthaginians, the War with the Gauls might without any danger or inconvenience be laid aside at present, and deferr'd to a better opportunity; The revenge of this treacherous trick remaining still in the power of the Gods and People of Rome, to take it when they thought fit; but the main business now before them was to consult and take measures for managing the War against Annibal their grand Enemy; in order to which, he himself in the first place gave their Lordships an Account what Foot and Horse there were in the Dictators Army, either of natural Romans, or Auxiliaries from their Allies; Then Marcellus stated the Forces under his Command; and the numbers of those in Apulia with C. Terentius the Consul, were also given in by such as were well acquainted therewith; after which they proceeded to Debate, whether two Consular Armies well appointed, would be sufficient for carrying on so great a War? Thus for the present they let the Gauls alone, though their fingers itcht to be at them, in revenge of the late defeat; the Dictators Army was assign'd to the Consul; and those in Marcellus's Army that escap'd at Canna, were sent into Sicily to remain in service there as long as the War should continue in Italy; and thither likewise were drawn out of the Dictators Army such as were able to do the least service, without assigning them any certain time of abiding there, otherwise than as the Law, at the end of their ten years service should discharge them. The two City Legions were decreed to the Consul that should be chosen in the room of L. Posthumus, who 'twas Order'd should be Elect'd as soon as ever the lucky Auspices would permit. Likewise two Legions with all Expedition were to be brought out of Sicily, out of which the said Consul that was to command the City-Legions, might take what recruits he thought fit. The Command of the Consul C. Terentius was continued over the Army for another year; nor were any of the Forces he had with him for the Guard of Apulia, to be withdrawn from thence.

XXV. Whilst these Preparations were making in Italy, the War went on briskly in Spain, and hitherto to the advantage of the Romans; the two Scipio's having divided the Forces between tween them, Cneus being General at Land, and Publius Admiral at Sea. Asdrubal the Punick General mistrusting he was not able to deal with either of them, kept off at a great distance, and in places of security, and after much intreaty and long sollicitation had four thousand Foot and five hundred Horse sent from Annibal to reinforce him; with which new help, having gather'd new hopes, he advanc'd somewhat nearer, and began to Equip out a Fleet for the defence of the Coasts: but whilst he was in the heat of that work, all was spoil'd by the revolt of most of his Sea-Commanders, who having been sharply treated and reproacht for running from their Ships on the River Iberus, and suffering them to be taken by the Enemy, could never after endure Asdrubal, nor much valued in their hearts the Carthaginian Interest. These Renegades caused an Insurrection amongst the Carpesians, and by their means, several Cities revolted, and one was taken by storm. Asdrubal therefore being forc'd to divert his War from the Romans, and endeavour to subdue these Mutineers, marcht with a stout Army into those parts, to fall upon Galbus the General of the Carpesians, who lay Encamp'd with a strong Army under the Walls of the late taken City; and sending before, some of his light-arm'd men to draw on the Enemy to a Battel, sent part of his Foot to Forage the Country, and take up what Straglers they could meet with. Thus at one and the same time there was a Skirmish before the Camp, and in the Fields, where they were either slain or put to flight, but having by running several ways from all parts recovered again their Camp, their fears were dispell'd, and on a sudden they grew so courageous as not only to defend their own Works, but also to attack the Enemy; so out they sallied in a Body, leaping and Skipping as their manner was, and with their confidence daunted the Enemy, who but just before challeng'd them into the Field; therefore both Asdrubal himself retired with his Forces to an Hill of good height, and situate for his advantage, having a River between him and the Enemy, and caus'd his Forlorn Hope and Horse that were scouring the Fields, to retreat thither also for their better security, and not thinking fit to trust either to the Hill or River, fortified his Camp with a Rampire: in this interchangeable fear on both sides, there pass'd some Skirmishes, but neither the Numidian Horse were so good as the Spanish, nor were the Moorish Archers able to deal with the Carpesian Targeteers, who for agility were their equals, and in courage and strength of body their Superiours. At last, seeing they could neither provoke Asdrubal to a Battel, with all their braving him just under his Camp, nor yet could easily storm his Works, they went and took the City Asena, where Asdrubal at his first coming upon their Frontiers had laid up his stores of Corn and other Provisions; and thenceforwards grew so insolent that they would be under no Command either in the Field or the Camp, which disorders Asdrubal perceiving to be occasion'd (as usually it happens) by their late success, having encouraged his men to fall upon them as they were roving about without their Colours, and in no Order; descending from the Hill, he marches in Battalia towards their Camp. Of whose approach notice being given by some Messengers running in hast from the Sentinels and Out guards, they cry'd out, To Arms, To Arms! and as every one could get ready without Command or Ensigns, they hurried confusedly to oppose him, and some were already engaged whilst others were but coming up in heaps, and some not yet got out of their Camp. At first their boldness rendred them formidable, but the Carthaginians being rang'd close and thick together, the others soon found they were too few to deal with them, and therefore began to look about for the rest of their Fellows, and being every where worsted cast themselves in a Ring, and made as good a defence as they could, but being then thrust up so close, had not room enough to wield their Arms, and so being environ'd by the Enemy, were for a good part of the day cut to pieces by degrees; only a small Party broke through by dint of Sword and escap'd to the Woods and Mountains; with the same fright they abandon'd their Camp; and next day the whole Nation made their submission to the Carthaginians, but did not long continue quiet; for within a while after, Asdrubal receiv'd Orders from Carthage to march away with all Expedition into Italy; which being nois'd through Spain, turn'd in a manner all their hearts to the Romans, whereupon Asdrubal dispatcht an Express to Carthage with Letters to acquaint them how prejudicial the bare report of his going was to their affairs. That if he should set forwards and go out of those parts before he could be pass'd the Iberus, the Romans would be Masters of all Spain; For besides that he had no sufficient Guard nor Commander to leave behind in his stead; the Roman Generals there were such, that it would be hard to make head against them with equal Forces. Therefore if they had any regard of Spain, it would be requisite to send some body to succeed him with a strong Army, who would find his hands full enough of business, let things succeed never so prosperously.

XXVIII. These Letters at first startled the Senate, yet because all their aim was at Italy, they would not reverse their orders touching Asdrubal's march thither, only sent Himilco with a compleat Army, and a Navy newly augmented, to hold Spain in Obedience, and defend it by Sea and Land. Who having cross'd the Sea, landed his Men, and fortified them in a Camp, drew his Ships also on Shore, and cast up Works to secure them, and then with a select party of Horse made what hast he could possibly through Nations, some professed Enemies, and others wavering in their inclinations, and did not stop or stay at any place, but but always upon his Guard, until he came to Asdrubal; to whom having communicated the Senates command, and from him received an account of the present state of Affairs, and how the War in Spain was to be manag'd, with like expedition return'd back to his Camp, the celerity of his march being his only security; for he was always gone from a place before the People could agree get together to surprize him. Before Asdrubal began his march, he levied what Money he could in all the Cities and States in his Jurisdiction; for well he knew that Annibal was forc'd to pay for his passage through certain Countries, and that the assistance he had from the Gauls was hired, and if he had undertaken that Journey empty-handed, his Money, away he marches towards Iberus. Upon intelligence of these resolutions of the Carthaginians and Asdrubal's march, both the Roman Generals, laying aside all other Affairs, prepared to join all their Forces together, and go meet and oppose him; for since Annibal himself was so formidable an Enemy, that all Italy could scarce make head against him, they concluded if Asdrubal and the Spanish Army should once join him, there would presently be an end of the Roman Empire; intent on these considerations they draw their Forces towards the Iberus, and having pass'd the River, call'd a Council of War to debate, whether they should encamp themselves and wait the coming up of the Enemy to fight them, or by falling upon some of the Carthaginians Allies, retard their march? And the latter being resolv'd on, down they sat before Ibera, a City not far from the River, and the richest at that time in those parts. Whereof Asdrubal having notice (to help his Friends by diverting the Romans) went and besieg'd a City that had lately submitted to the Romans, whereupon they rais'd their Siege, and advanc'd to engage Asdrubal himself.

For some Days both Armies lay but at five Miles distance, not without some skirmishes, and at last on one and the same day, as if it had been by agreement, each Party put forth the signal of Battel, and with all the Forces they could make, came into the Field. The Romans drew up in three Battalions, part of the Foot before the Standards as a Van guard, the rest behind the Standards as a Rereguard, and the Horse on both Wings. Asdrubal plac'd his Spaniards in the Main Battel, on the right Wing his Carthaginians, and his Moors on the Left; and as for his Auxiliary Horse, the Numidians he clapt before the Carthaginian Foot to Guard them, and dispos'd of the rest of the African Troops about the Skirts and edges of the several Battalions. Nor were all the Numidians posted in the Right Wing, but only those, who after the manner of Vaulters, led two Horses a piece, and used oft-times in the hottest of the conflict to leap armed as they were, from their wearied Horse, upon the fresh one, so nimble they were themselves, and so tractable their Horses, standing thus in Battalia, the Generals of each side, having equal hopes of success, for no great difference there was, either in numbers or kinds of the Souldiers, but in their Courage and Resolution, there was abundance of odds; for the Romans, though they fought far from their Country, yet were easily perswaded by their Officers, That it was for no less a prize than Italy, and the City of Rome it self, that they were that day to contend, therefore as if all their hopes of ever seeing their Country again depended on this one Battel, they had fix'd their minds either to conquer or die. Nothing so resolute were the Souldiers of the other side, being for the most part Spaniards, willing rather to be overcome at home, than with Victory to be drawn into Italy: therefore at the very first push almost, before there was a Dart thrown; their main Battel retreated, and being then so much the more fiercely press'd upon by the Romans, plainly ran away; however in both Wings the service was hot enough, the Carthaginians on the one side, and the Africans on the other, charg'd the Romans briskly, and had them in a manner enclosed, but the Roman Army being rallied altogether in the middle of them, was strong enough to keep off both Wings; for facing several ways they maintain'd the fight in two places at once, but both in one and the other (having before routed the Enemies main body) were superiour in numbers as well as Courage; a power of men were kill'd that day, and if the Spaniards had not fled so fast before the Battle was well begun, there had very few of the whole Army escap'd. The Horse were not at all engag'd to speak of, for as soon as the Numidians saw their main Battel shrink, they presently fled as fast as they could, driving the Elephants before them, and left the Flanks naked; Asdrubal himself maintain'd the Fight till he plainly saw all was lost, and then accompanied with a very few, got away out of the midst of the slaughter; his Camp the Romans took and plunder'd; and if any people of Spain stood Neuters before, the success of this day turn'd the Scale, and brought them over to the Romans, and so far was Asdrubal from pursuing his march to Italy, that he had no hopes to continue long with safety in Spain. The two Scipio's sending Intelligence of this action to Rome, the whole City was overjoy'd, not so much for the Victory it self, though very considerable, but because Asdrubal was prevented from coming into Italy.

Whilst this was doing in Spain, Petelia a City of the Bruttii, after several months Siege, was taken by Himilco, one of Annibal's Captains; yet it cost him dear, many of his men being kill'd or wounded, nor was it his Force abroad so much as Famine within, that subdued the Town; for having eaten up all their Provisions of Corn, and flesh, of what Creatures soever, they liv'd at last upon Shoemakers-Leather, Weeds, Roots, the Inward Barks Barks of Trees, tops of Briars and Brambles, and the like; nor did they submit as long as they were able to stand on their Legs, or wield their Swords. After the taking of this Town, the same Party of Carthaginians marcht to Consentia, which made nothing so brave a Defence, but surrendred in few days. About the same time an Army of the Bruttii sat down before Croton, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, heretofore rich and potent; but now so weakened by several losses and disasters, that there were not in it twenty thousand Souls of all sorts, so that for want of men to defend it, the Enemy easily got possession of the City, but some that fled to the Castle held out still. The Locrians also by the treachery of some of their Grandees, revolted to the Bruttii and Carthaginians; and only the Rhegines of all that Country continued true to the Romans, and had the good luck to preserve all along their own liberty; nay this deserting humour like an infection spread into Sicily, nor was the Family of King Hiero free from the Contagion; for his eldest Son Gelo, contemning both the old Age of his Father, and also (after the defeat at Canna) the Friendship of the Romans turned unto the Carthaginians, and had no doubt made a great alteration in Sicily, had he not been taken off by Death, so very opportunely, just in the nick, when he was arming the multitude, and soliciting the Allies to Rebellion, that his own Father did not escape some Censures as if he had hastned his end. These were the remarkable Actions that happen'd in Italy, Afric, Sicily, and Spain that year; towards the end of which, Q. Fabius Maximus, desired leave of the Senate to dedicate that Temple which he had vow'd to Venus Erycina when he was Dictator; Accordingly it was decreed, that T. Sempronius the Consul Elect, as soon as he came into his Office, should move the people to create Duumvirs for that affair. In honour of Emilius Lepidus lately deceased, who had twice been both Consul and Augur, his three Sons Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, exhibited certain Funeral Games, and caused two and twenty couple of Fencers to play at sharps for three dayes space, in the publick Market place. The Ædiles of the Chair, C. Latorius, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Consul Elect (who during his Ædileship had been General of the Horse) celebrated for three dayes together the Roman Games, and the like was done for the Commons, by M. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. At the end of the third year of the Punick War, Tib. Sempronius the Consul entred upon his Magistracy on the fifteenth of March. The Prætors were Q. Fulvius Flaccus for the City, and M. Valerius Lavinius for the Foreigners; Ap. Claudius Pulcher for Sicily, and Q. Mucius Scaevola for Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by the people continued in his Command as Vice-Consul, as being the only General that since the loss at Canna, had fought the Enemy with success.

XXXI. The first day the Senate met in the Capitol, it was resolv'd, That a double Tax should this year be levied, the first to be immediately collected for paying all Arrears to the Souldiers, except those that were at Canna. Then concerning the Armies it was ordered, That the Consul Sempronius should appoint a day for the two City Legions to Rendezvous at Cales; That six Legions should be conducted to the Camp of Claudius above Suessula, and the Legions that were at present there (being for the most part the Cannian Army) should be carried over into Sicily by Ap. Claudius the Prætor; and those that were now in Sicily brought home to Rome. To the Army appointed to Muster at Cales, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent, and commanded to lead the Detachment of the City Legions from thence, to the Camp of Claudius, and lastly, to receive the charge of the old Army, and conduct it into Sicily. T. Metilius Croto was dispatcht by Ap. Claudius. People silently expected when the Consul should appoint the Elections for chusing him a Partner, and when they saw Marcellus (whom they pitcht upon for that place in reward of his great services whilst he was Prætor) to be sent out of the way, as it were on purpose, they began to mutter and grumble aloud, which the Consul perceiving, told the Senate, That it was for the good of the publick both that M. Claudius should go into Campania to exchange the Armies, and that the Elections should not be held till he had dispatcht that affair, to the end they might have such a Consul as the present Juncture needed, and as themselves did most desire. So there was no more talk of the Elections till he return'd; but in the mean time, the Duumvirs were Created, Q. Fabius Maximus for dedicating the Temple of Venus Erycina, and T. Otacilius for that to the Goddess Mens, both those Fabricks being in the Capitol, only divided with a small Canal, or Water-stream. A propofal was made to the people, that the three hundred Campanian Horse who had faithfully serv'd out their ten years time of Warfare in Sicily, might be admitted Free Denisons of Rome; and also be declared Free of Cumes, from the time before the Campanians revolted from the Romans; the chief ground of which motion was, because those Gentlemen alledged, that they did not know to what place they did rightfully belong, having abandon'd their old native Country, and not being incorporate into that whereto they had retired. Marcellus being come back from the Army, is with great applause chosen Consul in the room of L. Postumius, and presently assumes the Office. But it happening to thunder at his first entrance upon that charge, the Augurs were consulted about it, who reported, That he was not rightfully Created; and the Senators buzz'd it abroad, That this being the first time that ever two Commoners were chosen Consuls together, the Gods were displeas'd. Whereupon he flung up his Office, and in his stead was chosen Fabius Maximus the third time. That

That year the Sea seem'd to be all on fire; at Suessula a Cow brought forth a Colt; certain Statues in the Temple of Juno Sospita in Lanuvium, sweat blood, and near the same place it rain'd stones; for which shewer there were Sacrifices offer'd for nine dayes together, and the other Prodigious carefully expiated.

The Consuls divided the Armies between them, Fabius took charge of the Forces that were under M. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius Commanded the Volunteers, and five and twenty thousand of the associate Troops; M. Valerius the Prætor had those Legions that came out of Sicily, M. Claudius as Pro-Consul was sent to the Army that lay to guard Nola above Suessula. The other Prætors went to their respective Charges Sicily and Sardinia; The Consuls made an Order, that whenever the Senators met, they and all others that had right to speak in that Court, should assemble at the Gate Capena. And the Prætors held their Tribunals at the publick Filhpool, and all that had any Suits at Law repaired thither all this year for Justice. In the mean time Mago, Annibals Brother, was setting out from Carthage for Italy with twelve hundred Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, twenty Elephants, and a thousand Talents of Silver, with a Guard of sixty long Ships; but just as he was ready to depart, advice came of their Forces being defeated in Spain, and that almost all the people of that Country were join'd with the Romans. Hereupon some were for having Mago wave his Voyage into Italy, and go with the Fleet and Forces aforesaid for Spain; especially because there were some hopes of recovering Sardinia, a private Message being sent from the principal persons of that Island, and especially Hampsicorus, a man that both for riches and power excell'd all the rest, That the Romans had but very few Forces there; That Cornelius the old Governour was upon his departure, and a new one expected, That the Sardinians were generally weary of the Romans Government which they had so long endured, and who had last year used them very harshly by imposing a very heavy Tribute, and forcing them to pay a most unjust Contribution of Corn, so that in fine they were ripe for a Rebellion, and only wanted somebody to head them. The Carthaginians with this different Intelligence being at the same time partly troubled and partly encouraged, send Mago with his Navy and Forces into Spain, and chose one Asdrubal furnam'd the Bald, to go General into Sardinia, and allow him near upon as great a strength as Mago. And now the Roman Consuls having dispatcht what they had to do in the City, began to take the Field: T. Sempronius met his Army at Suessula on the day appointed; but before Q. Fabius advanc'd from the City, he with the Senates consent, set out a Proclamation; That all Corn should before the first of June be convey'd out of the Country into some fortified Town; and whoever should not do so, he would not only lay waste their Fields, but sell their Servants, and burn their Houses and Villages. The Prætors themselves created for civil Jurisdiction and deciding of Law-Controversies, were not now exempted from Military Service; for Valerius was sent into Apulia, to receive the Army from Terentius, and when the Legions were arriv'd out of Sicily, to use them chiefly for the Guard of that Country, and send away the old Forces that before belong'd to Terentius, under the Command of some of his Lieutenant Generals; he had also the charge of twenty five Ships, that with them he might secure the Sea-Coasts between Brundisium and Tarentum; the like number of Ships was allotted to Q. Fulvius the City Prætor to guard the shore near the Town. C. Terentius the Pro-Consul, was enjoin'd to raise Souldiers in the Picene Territories, and therewith guard the same; and T. Otacilius Crassus after he had dedicated the Temple of the Goddess Mens in the Capitol, was dispatcht into Sicily as Admiral of the Navy there.

The Eyes of all Princes and States were fix'd upon this mighty War between the two most potent Nations of the World; and amongst the rest Philip King of Macedon, was so much the more concern'd as being nearer to Italy, and only parted with the Ionian Sea. Upon the first intelligence that Annibal was got over the Alps, as he was well enough pleas'd that the Romans and Carthaginians should worry one another in War; so he could not well tell to which of the two he should wish success, but when he heard that the Carthaginians had in three several Battels got the Victory, he resolving to follow fortune, and join with the strongest side, sent Embassadors to Annibal, who avoiding the Ports of Brundisium and Tarentum, because there the Romans had guards of Ships, landed at the Temple of Juno Lacinia, and thence passing through Apulia towards Capua, chanc'd to light upon part of the Roman out-guards, and were brought before M. Valerius Levinus the Prætor, who lay encamped by Nucerina. Where Zenophanes the chief of the Embassadors, readily, and without blushing affirm'd, That he was sent from King Philip to treat about and conclude a League and Alliance with the People of Rome, and had Commission to repair to the Consuls as well as the Senate. After so many defections of old Friends, Valerius was not a little pleas'd at this overture from so great a Prince, and courteously entertain'd the Enemy in the disguise of a Friend; allowing them Guides, and acquainting them what passes were held both by the Romans and the Carthaginians. So Zenophanes having pass'd the Roman Guards into Campania, went thence to rights to Annibal, and concluded an Alliance with him on the Terms following. That King Philip with the greatest Fleet he could Equip (and he was thought able to set out two hundred Sail) should pass over to Italy, and spoil all the Sea-Coasts, and to his power promote the War both by Sea and Land. That upon the conclusion of the War, all Italy and the City Rome should be enjoy'd by the Carthaginians, together with all the Pillage and Booty. But in lieu thereof, after Italy was thus reduc'd, they should transport their Forces into Greece, and wage War with such Princes as it should be found convenient, and that all those Cities on the main Continent or Islands bordering on Macedonia, should be annex'd to the Dominions of King Philip.

XXXIV. To this purport was the League between the Punick General, and these Macedonians; with whom, to see the same Articles ratified by the King, he sent back three Embassadors, Gisco, Bostar, and Mago; and all together they came to the aforesaid Temple of Juno Lacinia, where a Vessel lay privately at Anchor to receive them; but no sooner were they put out to Sea, but the Roman Navy that lay to guard the shore of Calabria discover'd them, and Fulvius made out certain Corcyreans to fetch them in; at first the Macedonians endeavour'd to fly, but finding themselves over-reacht in sailing, yielded and were brought up to the Admiral, who demanding who they were? whence they came? and whither bound? Xenophanes who had sped so well by making a Lye before, made no great scruple of Conscience to frame another now, and told him, That being sent from King Philip to the Romans, he came to M. Valerius because to him only he could pass in safety, but could not get through Campania, that Region being so much beset by the Enemy. But afterwards upon light of some in Carthaginian Habit, they were suspected to be Annibals Agents, which was more confirm'd by their Speech when they were Examined; Then their Attendants being questioned apart, and threatned, discover'd the whole intrigue, and Annibals Letters were taken containing the substance of the terms agreed upon between him and the King of Macedonia; whereupon it was thought fit to fend the Embassadors and their Train to Rome, or to the Consuls where-ever they should happen to be; To which purpose five of the nimblest Gallies were selected under the Conduct of L. Valerius Antias, commanding him to put the Embassadors in several Vessels, and not suffer them to have any Communication one with the other. About the same time, A. Cornelius Mammula departing from his Province of Sardinia, gave an account at Rome of the condition of that Island, That all the Inhabitants were inclinable to Sedition, and that Q. Mucius his Successor, on his first Arrival, what with his passage by Sea, and the ill Air of the Country, was fallen into a sickness, not so dangerous as tedious, and therefore for a long time would not be able to manage the War; That the Army there, though sufficient to keep the place whilst it remain'd in Peace, would be too weak, if once they broke out into an open Rebellion, which seem'd to be threatned; Upon which the Senate decreed, That Q. Fulvius Flaccus should levy five thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, and with all Expedition transport them into Sardinia, under such Commander as he should think fit, until such time as Mucius should recover his health. The person pitch'd upon was T. Manlius Torquatus, who had twice been both Consul and Censor, and in his Consulship, had subdued these very Sardinians. Near the same time a Fleet from Carthage, Admiral the Bald, Admiral, bound for Sardinia, happen'd to be cast by a Tempest on the Balearean Isles, whereby their tackling was not only destroy'd, but their Hulks so much damag'd, that they were forc'd to hale their Ships on shore, and spent a great deal of time in refitting them.

XXXV. The War in Italy since the Battel at Cannæ, was slow and languishing, the strength of the one party being broken, and the spirits of the other effeminat'd; therefore in this dead Vacation, the Campanians of their own heads began to contrive how to reduce the State of Cumæ to their Obedience, first soliciting them to a revolt from the Romans, and when they saw that would not take, thought to catch them by a stratagem. All the Campanians were wont every year to solemnize a certain set Feast and Sacrifice at a place call'd Hanne; now they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Senate of Capua would resort thither, requesting the Senate of Cumæ to meet there also, to take measures for their common safety, and enter into a League Offensive and Defensive, withal signifying, That they intended to have a Guard of Armed men there, to prevent any surprize or danger, either from the Romans or Carthaginians; The Cumans though they suspected some Treachery, yet seem'd very well pleas'd at the Proposal, thereby the better to colour their own design. The Roman Consul T. Sempronius, having took a view of his Forces at Sinuessa, where he appointed their Rendezvous, passing the River Volturnus, Encamp'd near Liternum, where whilst they lay without Action with the Enemy, he daily Exercis'd his Men, that the raw Souldiers (for such for the most part were the Volunteers and Bondmen that had been list'd) might learn to know their Ranks and their Postures, but the main thing the General aim'd at in these Trainings, was to bring them to Love, and agree with one another, and therefore Order'd the Lieutenant Generals and Colonels, That they should not by upbraiding any man with his past Condition, occasion discord in the Army, but that the old Souldiers should descend and be content to be equaliz'd with the young beginners, and these that were Freeborn not think it any disgrace to be Comrades with the Volunteers that had been Slaves, but rather that all should count those to be well descended and noble enough, whoever they be, whom the people of Rome hath intrusted with their Arms and their Ensigns, since the same necessity which had forced them so to do, ought to oblige them to make the best on't now 'twas done. Nor were these good Documents more diligently preach'd by the Commanders, than practis'd by the Souldiers; so that in short time they were all so united in their Affections, that they seem'd altogether to have forgot what each mans degree or condition was before he entred into the service, and now lookt upon themselves all as Brothers. Whilst Gracchus was thus busy in disciplining his Army, Messengers from the Cumans acquaint him, what a kind of overture was made to them the other day from the Capuans, and what Answer they had return'd. That three dayes hence the Feast was to be, and that not only all the Capuan Senate was to be there but their Army too. Gracchus Orders the Cumans to convey all that they had abroad in the Fields into the City, and to stay within their Walls; on the Evening before the Feast marches to Cumæ, from which Hanne was but three miles distant, whither the Campanians, according to appointment, flockt in great multitudes, and not far from thence Marcus Alfius the Chief Magistrate at that time of Capua, lay closely Encamp'd with fourteen thousand men; but more busy in preparing the Sacrifices, and contriving the intended surprize of the Cumans, than intent upon fortifying his Camp, or any other military action; for three days space this Festival Sacrifice continued at Hanne, celebrated always in the Evening, and ending before Midnight, which therefore Gracchus thought the best time to surprize them, and having set a Guard at the Gates that none should give them notice, the Souldiers being order'd to refresh themselves, and sleep from Noon till four a Clock, that they might as soon as it grew dark be ready to repair to their Colours a little before the first Watch, causes them to advance, and with a silent march came to Home in the middle of the Night, seiz'd the Capuans Camp, entring at all the Ports at once, being negligently Guarded, Cutting to pieces many as they lay asleep, and others unarm'd as they came from the Sacrifice; In all there were slain that night above two thousand, together with their General Marcius Alfius, and four and thirty Colours taken.

Gracchus having without losing full an hundred men, made himself Master of the Enemies Camp, hastned back to Cumæ, for fear of Annibal, who lay above Capua at Tifata; nor did his foresight deceive him, for as soon as the news of this defeat came to Capua, Annibal considering that this Army of the Romans consisted most of raw Souldiers and Bondslaves, concluded he should find them at Hanne, insolently over-joy'd with their success, and busy in spoiling the dead, and loading themselves with Pillage, and therefore with a flying Army came in all haste on this side Capua, and such of that City as he met flying, he sent home with a Guard, and if they were wounded, in Waggons; but when he came to Cumæ, he found the Enemy gone, and nothing but marks of the slaughter and dead Bodies of his Allies lying all about upon the ground. Some advis'd him immediately to go on from thence to assault Cumæ, which Annibal was willing enough to do, as being desirous since he could not gain Naples, to make himself Master of Cumæ, being a Sea-Port Town as well as the other, yet because his Souldiers came out in such an hurry, that they brought nothing with them but their Arms, he thought it best at present to retreat to his Camp at Tifata; but the next day overcome with the intreaties of the Campanians, taking with him all necessary preparations for carrying on a Siege, he return'd towards Cumæ, and having plunder'd all the adjacent Country, Encamps within a mile of that City; where Gracchus still continued, more for shame that he might not seem to abandon his Allies in their necessity, who craved protection, and depended on his Aid, than for any confidence he had in his own Army as able to withstand the whole Force of Annibal; especially since so it happen'd, that Fabius the other Consul who lay at Cales, could not transport his Army over the River Volturnus, being buis'd first with going to Rome to repeat the Auspices, and afterwards troubled with several Prodigious reported one after another, which when he went about to expiate, the Soothsayers declared was not like easily to be accomplish'd.

These occasions hindring Fabius from coming up to his relief, Sempronius continued Besieg'd; and by this time several Engines of Battery were rais'd against him; one mighty wooden Tower being erected against the Town, he ran up another to oppose it somewhat higher, using the Wall which of it self was a good height, for its Platform or Foundation, having strengthened it with strong Posts and Piles of Timber to bear up the said Frame. From whence at first they defended the Town with Stones, and lancing of Darts at the Assaultants, but at length seeing the other Turret brought up close to the Wall, they flung Fire and abundance of combustible matter thereon, which forc'd those that were in it to shift for their Lives, and at the same time the Besieged fallied out at two several Gates, routed the Enemies Guards, and beat them into their Camp; so as that day Annibal was more like one Besieg'd himself, than laying Siege unto others; There were fifteen hundred Carthaginians slain, and sixty wanting but one taken Prisoners, as they were carelessly standing under the Walls and upon the Out-guards, suspecting nothing less than a Sally out of the Town. Before the Enemy could recollect themselves, Gracchus founded a Retreat, and secured his men within the Walls. The next day Annibal supposing the Consul flusht with this success might be drawn to venture a pitcht Field, drew up his Army in Battalia, between his Camp and the City, but when he saw no stirring from the usual Guards, and that the Enemy was not for rash attempts, he retreated without having effected any thing, back to his old Post at Tifata. The same day the Siege was rais'd from before Cumæ, T. Sempronius Surnamed The Long, overcome Hanno the Carthaginian before Grumentum in Lucania, kill'd above two thousand, and took one and forty Colours, and lost but two hundred and eighty of his own men; Hanno being thus beat out of the Lucans Country, retired unto the Bruttians. M. Valerius the Prætor retook by force of Arms three Towns of the Hirpini that had revolted from the Romans, and Beheaded Vercellius and Sicilius the Authors of that Defection; above a thousand Prisoners he sold for Slaves, gave the rest of the plunder to the Souldiers, and brought his Army back to Cumes.

XXXVIII By this time the five Ships that had on Board the Embassadors of Macedonia, and of Annibal taken Prisoners, as was before mentioned, being got about from the Adriatick to the Tuscan Sea, almost round the whole Coast of Italy, as they sail'd by Cumes, Gracchus not knowing whether they were Friends or Enemies, sent out part of his Fleet to meet them, and when they had Hal'd and knew one another, understanding the Consul was at Cumes, they put into that Port, and gave both the Prisoners and their Letters into his hands, who having read their Papers, sent them sealed up to Rome by an Express by Land, but Order'd the Embassadors to be carried by Sea, who arriv'd there almost as soon as the Post, and upon their Examination confirm'd the truth of that which their Writings purposed. The Senate was not a little startled to think of being plung'd into a Macedonian War, when they were scarce able to weather out that with the Carthaginians, yet so far were they from despairing, that immediately they began to consult how they should first invade the Enemy at home, and so divert them from coming into Italy. And to that purpose, having secured the Embassadors in Chains, and sold their Attendants for Slaves, they decreed that twenty Ships ready fitted up should be added to these five and twenty that Valerius had, which, with the five Ships that brought in the Ambassadors, making in all a Navy of fifty Sail, loosed from Ostia, and arrived at Tarentum; where Q. Fulvius was appointed Admiral, and having taken on Board those Souldiers which lay there under the Command of L. Apustius, Varro's Lieutenant General, was with that Fleet and those Forces, order'd not only to Cruise up and down for the security of Italy, but to inquire what posture the Macedonians were in? and if they found them preparing for War, then to give immediate notice to M. Valerius, who in that case was to leave his Army to the Command of Apustius, and go in person to the Fleet, and by making a descent into Macedonia, hold Philip in play at home; to maintain this Navy, and carry on the Macedonian War, that money was employed, which before was to have been repaid to King Hiero, who also of his own generosity furnish'd them with two hundred thousand Modii of Wheat, and one hundred thousand of Barly.

XXXIX. Whilst these preparations were making, one of those Ships that had been taken and sent to Rome, made her escape, and got home to King Philip, by which he understood that his Embassadors and Letters were taken; but being still ignorant what terms they had made with Annibal, dispatches another Embassy, viz. Heracilius Surnam'd Scotius, Crito Berrans, and Sofitheus Magnes, who got thither and return'd in safety, but in the mean time the Summer was spent, and so the King could do nothing this Year, of so great importance was the taking of that small Bark where the Embassadors were, that it diverted for the present an imminent War. Fabius having at length expiated the before-mentioned Prodigies, pass'd the River Vulturius, and thence forwards, the two Consuls act in Conjunction, and retake Comulteria, and Trebula, and Saticula, Cities that had revolted to Annibal, whose Garrisons and abundance of Campanians were there made Prisoners. At Nola the Senate was for the Romans (as in the year before) but the Commons for Annibal, and Cabals held for cutting off their principal Citizens, and surrendring the Town to him; to prevent which, Fabius drew his Forces between Capua and Annibal (who lay Encamp'd at Tifata) and fortified himself on Mount Vesuvius where Claudius lay before, and sent M. Marcellus the Pro-Consul, with what Forces he had, to keep Garrison at Nola.

XL. In Sardinia, T. Manlius apply'd himself to manage publick Affairs which had been neglected ever since Q. Mucius the Prætor had been taken very ill; for after he had drawn the Gallies on shore, and arm'd all the Mariners for Land Service, and receiv'd the Army into his charge from the Prætor, he having then in all two and twenty thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, march'd with them into the Enemies Country, and Encamp'd not far from the place where Hampscoras's Army lay, but he himself at that time was gone amongst the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to muster their youth for recruiting his Forces, and his Son Hofstus was then left Commander in Chief, who being a rash young man, inconsiderately ventur'd upon a Battel, and was routed, three thousand of his men kill'd, and near three hundred taken alive, the rest of the Army fled scatter'd through the Fields, and at last gather'd up towards a City named Cornus, the Metropolis of that Region, whither 'twas reported their General was fled before them. This Victory had put an end to the War in Sardinia, had not the Punick Fleet under Asdrubal, which the Tempest drove upon the Balearean Islands, now arriv'd seasonably to buoy up the Islanders to fresh Rebellion; upon the news of their Arrival, Manlius betook himself to Caraleis, whereby Hampscora had an opportunity of joining with Asdrubal, who having landed his Souldiers, and sent back his Fleet to Carthage, march'd under the Guidance of Hampscora, to Forage the Territories of those that continued in obedience to the Romans, and was like to have come up as far as Caraleis, if Manlius going out with his Army against him, had not restrain'd their their extravagant plundering. First they Encamp'd near each other, then Picqueerings and some small Skirmishes followed, at last they drew into the Field and fought a pitched Battel for four hours together. As for the Sardinians they signified little, being always used to be beaten, but the Carthaginians stood to't stoutly, but at last seeing the Sardinians all about them either lie dead, or running away, they also gave ground, and the Romans wheeling about that Wing which had routed the Sardinians, hem'd them in, and then it was rather a slaughter than a fight; twelve thousand of the Enemy were kill'd, and of Sardinians and Punicks together, three thousand and six hundred taken, with seven and twenty Colours.

That which most signaliz'd the Victory, was the taking of General Asdrubal, and Mago and Hanno, two Noblemen of Carthage; Mago was of the Barchine Family, and near related to Annibal, Hanno the person that stirr'd up the Sardinians to Rebellion, and the undoubted Author of that War; nor was the Field less famous for the loss of the Sardinian Generals, for both Hampscora's Son Hofstus was kill'd upon the spot, and Hampscora himself flying with a few Horse, hearing (after all the rest of the sad Tydings) of the Death of his Son, in the Night, that no body might prevent him, made away himself. The rest took shelter as they had done formerly, in the City Cornus, but Manlius investing it with his Victorious Army, soon made himself Master thereof; after which other Towns that had join'd with Hampscora and the Carthaginians, sent Hostages, and surrendered themselves; upon whom Manlius set a Fine of so much money for his Souldiers pay, and so much Corn, according to every ones ability and offence, and then return'd with his Army to Caraleis, and from thence to Rome, giving the Senate an account that Sardinia was wholly subdued, and delivering the money rais'd, to the Quæstors, the Corn to the Ædiles, and the Prisoners to Fulvius the Prætor. Much about this time the other Prætor T. Otacilius sailing from Lilybeum into Africk, and having wasted the Carthaginian Territories, upon news of Asdrubals being gone from the Balearean Isles, hastned back for Sardinia, and by the way met with the Enemies Fleet going home; of whom (after a slight Engagement) he took seven, with all the Seamen thereunto belonging, and the rest for fear were scatter'd as if it had been a Tempest all over the Sea. Now also Bomilcar with certain Bands of Souldiers for recruits, and forty Elephants, and good store of Provisions, arriv'd at Locris from Carthage; App. Claudius had a mind to surprize him, and in Order thereunto, making a speedy march to Messina, under pretence of visiting the Province, puts over to Locris with the Tide, but Bomilcar was gone before into the Bruttians Country to Hanno, and the Inhabitants of Locris shut their Gates against the Romans, so that Claudius after all his preparation and toil, return'd to Messina without having effected any thing. This Summer Marcellus from his Garrison at Nola, made frequent incursions upon the Hirpini and Candine Samnites, and made such havoc there with Fire and Sword, as renew'd the remembrance of the Samnites old losses and devastations.

Whereupon they sent Embassadors to Annibal, who thus accosted him. We have been Enemies, May it please your Excellency! to the people of Rome; first by our selves as long as our own Arms and Forces were able to defend us; and when we found those too weak, we join'd with King Pyrrhus, and being by him abandon'd, were forc'd to submit to a Peace on pure necessity, wherein we have continued almost fifty years, until your coming into Italy; whose valour and success were not more prevalent with us, than your singular humanity and kindness, in restoring our people when taken Prisoners, and altogether hath rendred us so firm to your Interest, that we believ'd, as long as you were safe, and our Friend, we needed not to stand in dread of the people of Rome, no, nor of the Gods themselves (were it lawful so to speak) though they had been never so angry against us; yet most certain it is, That whilst you are not only safe and victorious, but present too, and almost near enough to hear the Cries of our Wives and Children, and see our Houses all on a flame; we have this Summer been so lamentably harass'd as if it had been Marcellus, and not our Friend the mighty Annibal, that won that glorious Victory at Cannæ; and the Romans already boast, that you are only good at the first push, and ever after, like a Bee that hath spent its sting, grow dull and drowsy, and can do no more Execution. For well nigh an hundred years have we waged War with these Romans, without the aid of any Foreign Commander or Army, except only two years time, when Pyrrhus rather reforc'd himself with our Souldiers, than defended us with his: We shall not therefore boast our successes, how we vanquish two Consuls and two Consular Armies, and made them pass under the ignominious yoke; nor any thing else that happen'd to us joyful or honourable, but even our greatest disasters and calamities in those dayes, we can repeat with less indignation, than the miseries which at present we suffer. Then famous Dictators with their Generals of Horse, two Consuls with their compleat Armies and Banners displaid entred our Territories, and when they sent out to Forage our Fields, 'twas in strong Parties not without their Scouts before, to discover dangers, and good reserves to assist them on any occasion, but now we are exposed as a prey to one only Garrison, and that but a small one, left for the Guard of Nola; now they do not come in Regimental Order, or form of War, to destroy us, but like Thieves and Robbers they over-run all our Borders as boldly and negligently, as if they were wandering in their own Roman Territories; and the reason of such their confidence is because your Excellency does not protect us, and our lusty youth, which if they were at home would secure us, are drawn out into your Service;

Service; But we must be altogether ignorant of you and your Army, if we should not be fully persuaded, that you, who we know have routed and cut to pieces so many Roman Armies, are easily able to suppress these vagrant Pilferers who straggle about without their Colours, whither soever the vain hope of booty draws them; they themselves would soon become a prey to a Party of your Numidians; and thereby at once you might secure us with a Garrison, and destroy that of the Enemies at Nola, in case you judge not us (whom you have thought worthy to be your Confederates) since we have cast our selves under your protection, unworthy to be defended.

XLIII. Hereto Annibal made Answer. That the Hirpines and Samnites were too quick, and huddled up things altogether, which ought to have preceeded each other; for at one and the same time they shew their grievances, and desire a Guard, and complain of being left undefended and neglected; but they should first have remonstrated their damage or danger, then requested a Guard, and when that was denied, and not before, they would have had grounds to say they had in vain implored his assistance. However he promised them, that though he would not draw his Enemies into their Countries, merely because he would not be burthensome to his Allies, yet he would march into the next Quarters belonging to the Romans Confederates, and by plundering them both enrich his own men, and with the terror of his advance set their Enemies far enough from them. And as to the Roman War in general, as the Battel of Thrasymenus was more noble than that of Trebia, and the Field of Cannæ more memorable than that of Thrasymenus, so he doubted not but to obscure the Renown of Cannæ, by a yet greater and more glorious Victory. With which Answer, and honourable rewards he dismiss'd the Embassadors. Leaving a Garrison at Tifata, he advanc'd with the rest of the Army towards Nola, and in his march, Hanno with the Recruits sent from Carthage, and the Elephants, join'd him, having pass'd through the Brutian Country. But after he had pitcht his Tents not far from Nola, upon Enquiry, he found all things much different from what the Embassadors had related; for Marcellus was so prudent, that he had left nothing to Fortune, nor by rash Conduct gave the least advantage to the Enemy; He never us'd to send abroad Parties to Forage, but Scouts were before them, and good Reserves to secure their Retreat, and indeed had manag'd all his Affairs as cautiously as if Annibal were actually present; but now he had notice he was indeed approaching, he kept all his Forces close within the Walls, and ordered the Senators of Nola to walk up and down upon the Works, and observe the Enemies motion. Hanno coming up very close to view the Town, call'd to two of them, Herennius Bassus, and Hierius Petrus, and invited them to a Parley; and they (with leave from Marcellus) going forth, spoke to them by an Interpreter, Magnifying the Valour and Fortune of Annibal, and undervaluing the majesty of the people of Rome, as being now in its Wane, and declining equally with their strength; but if both sides were in those respects still equal, as heretofore they had been, yet any that had felt how grievous the Roman Government was to their Allies, and on the contrary, how kind and indulgent Annibal had been even to all the Prisoners he took of the Latine Nations, must needs desire and prefer the Carthaginians Friendship, before that of the Romans. That if both Consuls with their Armies were at Nola, they would be no more a match for Annibal, than they were at Cannæ; and how vain was it then to think, that one Prætor, with but a few raw Souldiers, could secure them? That it would more concern them, than Annibal, whether the Town were his by Surrender or by Storm; for his it would certainly be as well as Capua and Nuceria, but what odds there was between the Fortune of the former and latter of those places, they, who lay almost in the middle between them both, could not be ignorant: That he not for Omens-sake, mention the consequences, if they were subdued by assault; but this he could promise them, that if they would yield up the Town and Garrison, no other should prescribe the terms of the League between them and Annibal but themselves.

XLIV. To this Herennius Bassus answer'd, That there had now for many years been an Alliance and firm Friendship between the people of Rome and the Nolans, of which neither of them to this very day had any cause to repent; and that for their own part, if they had been inclinable to change sides, and make their Faith follow the measures of Fortune, yet the same was now too late; for had they intended to yield to Annibal, it should have been before they had call'd in a Roman Garrison; with whom now they communicated all Councils, and lookt upon them to have as much interest in the City as themselves, and therefore resolv'd to run all hazards with those who were come thither for their protection. This Conference dasht Annibals hopes of gaining Nola by Treachery, therefore encompassed it round with his Forces, that he might at once storm it in all parts. But Marcellus having drawn up his Forces within the Gate, when he saw they came up near the Wall, sallies out with a mighty shout. At the first Charge some of the Enemy were beat back and cut off, but afterwards drawing together from all parts, a most fierce Fight began with equal Forces, and undoubtedly it might have prov'd memorable at the first rate, had not a violent storm of rain parted them; so that after a short bout, serving only to whet their Courage on both sides, they were forced to retreat, the Romans into the City, and the Punicks to their Camp; of the latter there were not above thirty slain, and most of them at the first irruption. The Romans lost not a man. The rain continuing all that night, and part of the next day, kept them, though eager on both sides to decide the matter within their Works. On the day following Annibal sent part of his Forces to Forage the adjacent Country belonging to the Town; which as soon as Marcellus understood, understood, he drew out of the City, and offer'd Battel, nor did Annibal refuse it; There was about a Mile between the City and the Camp, on which they fought, for all the Country round about Nola consists of open Champain Ground. The shout set up by both sides, caused the nearest of these Troops that were sent a plundering, to return and share in the Battel; The Nolans offer'd themselves to augment the Roman Army, but Marcellus applauding their forwardness, order'd them to remain for a Reserve, and carry off the wounded men, but forbear Engaging, unless he gave them a Signal.

The Fight was doubtful, the Generals Encouraging their men, as much as 'twas possible; XLV. and the Souldiers came on as resolutely; Marcellus bids his Troops Charge home the Enemy, the very same Enemy whom they worsted but the other day, and but a while ago made run at Cumes, and who he himself, though then General of another Army, had last year beaten from before this City Nola, that at present, part of them were absent a plundering in the Country, and for those that were here, they were effeminated by Campanian Luxury, having been rioting a whole Winter together with Wine and Wenches, and all kind of Debauchery; That their former strength and vigour was gone, those stout able Bodies and courageous minds decay'd, with which they pass'd the Pyrenean Hills, and overcame the steep Cliffs of the Alps; These are but the Reliques, the outward Images of those brave Fellows, so degenerate, so enfeebled, that they can scarce support their Arms, or with fainting Limbs wield their Weapons; That Capua had been no less fatal to Annibal than Cannæ to the Romans; There his Warlike Courage was smother'd, there his Military Discipline lost; there the glory of his past actions buried, and all his hopes blasted for the future. Whilst Marcellus to raise his own mens Courage, upbraided thus the Enemy, Annibal himself reproach'd them with yet more bitter reflections; I acknowledge (says he) the same Arms, and the same Standards which I saw and had with me at Trebia, at Thrasymenus, and last of all at Cannæ, but I must avow that I brought not the same Souldiers out of Capua, that I carried in to Winter there. What? Do you now make a great business on't to Encounter a Roman Lieutenant, and hardly sustain the Charge of one Legion and petty Squadron, when two whole Consular Armies were never wont to stand before you? Can you with any patience endure, that Marcellus with a few raw new-raisd Forces, and Nolan Auxiliaries, should thus a second time brave and challenge us to a Battel? Where is that Souldier of mine, who unhors'd the Consul Flaminius, and cut off his Head? Where's that brave Fellow that nail'd their other Consul L. Paulus to the ground at Cannæ? Are your Swords blunted? Or are your strong Nerves cramp'd, and your right hands benum'd or Palsy struck? Or what other Prodigy hath befalln you? You, that though much inferior in numbers, have always been wont to cut to pieces multitudes, will you now you are much the more numerous, suffer your selves to be baffled by a few? You bound'd and talk'd high, how you would storm the Walls of Rome it self, if any would but lead you on; see now a lesser piece of service before you; here would I first make trial of your strength and Courage; Go on, make your selves Masters of this Nola, a Town situate in an open Plain, defended neither by Sea nor River; and when you have loaded your selves with the spoils of that opulent City, I will from thence lead you whither soever you please, or else follow you.

But neither his Reproaches nor his Encouragements could raise their Spirits, for being XLVI. every where beat back, and giving ground, and the Romans therewith the more animated, as well as with the Exhortations of their General, and the shouts of their Friends the Nolans, the Carthaginians in fine betook them to their Heels, and were beat into their Camp. Which the Roman Souldiers would fain have presently attack'd, but Marcellus thought it more fit to found a Retreat, and brought them back to Nola, where they were receiv'd with great Joy, and the Congratulations even of the Commons, who before were more inclinable to the Carthaginians. There were slain that day above five thousand of the Enemy, six hundred taken, with nineteen Standards, and two Elephants, besides four that were kill'd in the Fight. The Romans lost not full a thousand men. The next day was spent (as it were by consent) in burying their dead; Marcellus caused all the spoils of the Enemy to be burnt in a mighty Pile as a Sacrifice to Vulcan; The day following one thousand two hundred seventy and two Horse, part Numidians and part Spaniards (upon some disgust I believe, or in hopes of better pay) deserted Annibal and fled to Marcellus; and did the Romans very faithful and stout service afterwards in that War, and after the same was over, had for their reward large quantities of Lands in their own respective Countries given them. Annibal having sent back Hanno amongst the Bruttii, marches with his own Forces to take up Winter-Quarters in Apulia, and Encamp'd near Arpi. Of which Q. Fabius having advice, caused Provisions to be carried from Nola and Naples to the Camp above Suessula, and having strengthened the Works, and left a sufficient Force to defend it all Winter, he himself, with the gros of his Army, advanc'd nearer Capua, and wasted all the Territories thereunto belonging with Fire and Sword, so much, that the Capuans, though with no great Confidence of their strength, were enforc'd to come out of the City, and Encamp before it in the open Plain; They were in all six thousand strong, but the Foot not considerable for service, their Cavalry was better, and therefore they endeavour'd to provoke the Enemy to Horse-Skirmishes.

Amongst many noble Campanians that serv'd on Horseback, there was one Cerrinus Tubellius, Surnam'd Taurus, a very stout man, so that when he serv'd in the Roman Army, there XLVII. was was never a Cavalier counted his match but Claudius Asellus. This Gallant therefore having a good while rode picqueering and surveying the Enemies Troops, at last having made silence, inquired where Claudius Asellus was? For (quoth he) since he was wont to contend with me in words which was the best man, let him now come out and decide it with his Arms; and either give the spoils of Honour if he be vanquish'd, or bear them away if he prove Victor? This being told Asellus, he only staid to ask the Consuls leave to go out to fight this Challenger; which being granted, he presently Arms and Mounts, and being advanc'd up to the Enemies Out-guards, calls upon Taurea by name, and bids him come forth when he durst to the Encounter. To be Spectators of this Combate, the Romans were come out of their Camp in great numbers, and the Capuans fill'd both the Rampire and the Wall of the City. After the Champions had interchang'd a few daring Speeches to set off the Action, they clapt Spurs to their Horses, directing at each other the deadly points of their Spears; but having open ground enough, they avoided each other, and seem'd like to protract the Combate a good while without giving or receiving any wound. Whereupon the Capuan told the Roman, This would be but a trial of Skill between their Horses, which was the most nimble and best manag'd; not a decision which of the Riders was the stoutest and most valiant, unless they rode off that plain ground into the hollow way that was hard by, where having no liberty to shuffle or evade, they must of necessity come to handy grips and close together. He had scarce so soon utter'd the words, but Claudius turn'd his Horse head, and rode into the narrow way, but Taurea fiercer with his Tongue than his hands, cry'd out, Of all things in the World, I care not to meddle with an Ass (alluding to his Antagonists name) in a Ditch, and so rode away, which saying thence forwards became a by-word amongst Country people; Claudius having rid a pretty while up and down the hollow Lane without meeting his Enemy, comes back into the Plain, and loading his Adversary with a thousand Reproaches for his Cowardize, return'd victorious with great Joy and Congratulation to the Camp. Some Annals add to this Horse-Combat a strange Circumstance, and indeed wonderful if true (as by the common opinion it is counted no less) viz. That Claudius pursuing after Taurea when he fled to the City, entred with him at one Gate standing open, and rode out clear at another, unhurt; to the great astonishment of the Enemy.

XLVIII. After this the Camps were quiet, and the Consul remov'd somewhat further off the Town, that the Capuans might have liberty to sow their Fields, nor did he spoil their Corn, till it was grown up in the Blade fit for his Horse; and then he cut it down and carried it away to the Camp at Suessula; he gave Order to M. Claudius the Pro-Consul, that retaining at Nola a Garrison sufficient to secure the place, he should dismiss the rest of his Forces, and send them home to Rome, that they might no longer be a burthen to their Allies, and a Charge to the Commonwealth. T. Gracchus having drawn the Legions that were at Cumes unto Luceria in Apulia, dispatcht them from thence for Brundisium, under the Conduct of M. Valerius the Prætor, commanding him to secure the Salentine Coast, and provide all things necessary against Philip and the Macedonian War. Towards the end of this Summer, arriv'd Letters from the two Scipio's, giving an account what great and fortunate Exploits they had perform'd in Spain, But that their Souldiers Arrears were very great, and Cloths and Corn, and indeed all things wanting both for the Army and the Fleet; as for their pay, if the Exchequer were low, they would find some course to raise it from the Spaniards, but the other necessities must be sent from Rome, for otherwise they would neither support the Army, nor retain the Province in Obedience. These Letters read, there was not one of the Senators but acknowledg'd, that both what they wrote was true, and that they desired no more than was fit and reasonable; but then again they considered, what great Forces they already had to maintain both at Land and Sea, and how a new Fleet must presently be fitted out, if the Macedonian War went on; That as for Sicily and Sardinia, which before the War brought in considerable Taxes to the Treasury, they were now scarce able to maintain those Souldiers that 'twas necessary to keep there in Garrison; That therefore the only way they had at present to supply the publick Charge, was by the Tribute laid upon their own Citizens and Subjects; but as the number of those that were to pay the same, was extreemly diminish'd by the late mighty slaughters at Thrasymenus and Cannæ, so those few that were left, if burthen'd by too many Exactions and payments, would perish and be undone another way; so that if the Commonwealth could not be supported by Credit, and borrowing of money, she was not like to bear up by her own Revenue; The Result was, That Fabius the Prætor should Assemble all the people together, and remonstrate to them the publick necessities, and earnestly press all such as were grown rich by farming the City-Revenues, that they would for a while lend part of their Estates to the publick from whence they had rais'd them, and furnish the Spanish Army with necessities out of their private Pockets, upon condition to be repaid as soon as there was Cash in the Exchequer, before any other publick Creditors. The Prætor accordingly stated the matter in the Common-Hall, and also appointed a day when he would sit to receive Proposals and Subscriptions for Cloths and Corn for the Spanish Souldiers, and other necessities for the Fleet.

XLIX. When the day came, three Societies, of nineteen persons a piece, presented themselves as Undertakers, if they might be granted these two requests; The first, That for three years next there might be no other Farmers of the publick Revenues but themselves; The other, That whatsoever they shipped, if taken by the Enemy, or cast away by storm, the Commonwealth should bear the loss and allow for it; both which being condescended unto, they undertook the Affair, and thus were the common concerns administred by the private moneys of particular Citizens, such were the manners of that Age, and so great the affection of all ranks of men to their Country; what they generously undertook, they faithfully provided, nor was any thing wanting, more than if the Exchequer had been as full as ever it was. When these supplies arriv'd in Spain, the Town of Illiturgum, because it had revolted to the Romans, was beleaguerr'd by Asdrubal, and Mago, and Amilcar the Son of Bomilcar; but between their three Camps the two Scipio's forc'd a passage, not without a stout opposition and great slaughter, and reliev'd the City with Corn which they much wanted, bidding the Townsmen defend their own Walls with the same Courage as they should see the Romans on their behalf attacke the Enemy; who accordingly prepared chiefly to assault that Leaguer where Asdrubal commanded, but the other two Carthaginian Generals perceiving their drift, drew thither likewise; and so altogether sallied out of their Works to Battel. They were in all sixty thousand strong, and the Romans not above sixteen thousand. Yet the latter obtain'd so clear a Victory, that they slew more of the Enemy than themselves were in number, took above three thousand men, and near a thousand Horses, together with fifty nine Standards, and kill'd five Elephants in the Fight. The same day they made themselves Masters of all the three Camps. The Siege of Illiturgi being thus rais'd, the Punic Armies march'd to Assault the Town Incibi, having recruited their Companies out of that Province (as being a Nation of all others most eager of War, where there is good pay or hopes of Pilage, and at that time abounding with lusty young men.) There a second Field was fought, with like Fortune as before on either side; For of the Carthaginians there were slain above thirteen thousand, more than three thousand taken Prisoners, with forty two Colours and nine Elephants. Then almost all the several Nations of Spain revolted to the Romans; and the Actions perform'd that Summer in Spain were far more great and glorious than those in Italy.

The E P I T O M E.

4, 5, &c. Hieronymus King of the Syracusians (whose Grandfather Hiero had been a special Friend to the Romans) revolts to the Carthaginians, and for his Pride and Cruelty is murder'd by his own Subjects. 14, &c. T. Sempronius the Pro-Consul fights Hanno and the Carthaginians, and overcomes them, chiefly by the good service of the Bundmen, whom thereupon he Enfranchis'd. 33, &c. Claudius Marcellus besieges Syracuse in Sicily, that Island being almost wholly revolted to the Carthaginians. 40. War Proclaim'd against the King of Macedonia, who being in a Battel by night near Apollonia, routed and put to flight, returns into his own Country, half his Army having lost their Arms, and Valerius the Prætor is sent to prosecute that War. 41, &c. The Actions of the two Scipio's in Spain against the Carthaginians related. 48. Syphax King of the Numidians is taken into Alliance with the Romans, but being overcome by Massaniila King of the Massylians (who took part with the Carthaginians) he pass'd over into Spain to the Scipio's, with considerable Forces, landing amongst the Maurusi, over against Cadiz, where the narrow Sea parts Africk and Spain. 49. A League is also made with the Celtiberians, and the Romans send to them for Auxiliaries, the first Mercenary Forces that ever appeared in a Roman Camp.

H Anno being return'd out of Campania to the Bruttii, and making use of them for his Assistants and Guides, attempts the Grecian Colonies in those parts, who continued the more firm to their Alliance with the Romans, because they saw the Bruttii (whom they both hated and feared) had already taken part with the Carthaginians. He began with Rhegium, where he spent several days to little purpose. In the mean time the Inhabitants of Locri, were getting in their Corn, Fewel, and all other necessities out of the Fields into their City, that there might be nothing left abroad to supply the Enemy; Thus daily more and more going out on that occasion, there were at last no more left within than were employ'd in repairing the Walls and Gates, and carrying Darts and all sorts of Artillery to be stor'd up in the Towers and Bullwarks. Whereupon Amilcar sent forth a Party of Horse against that mixt multitude of all Ranks and Ages, which were ranging about the Country for the most part unarm'd, but gave express Orders not to hurt any person, but only stop them from flying back to the City; he himself for the present Encamp'd on an high Ground, whence he could view the City and all the Country round about, and thence Commanded a Regiment of the Bruttii to go near the Walls, and call out some of the principal Inhabitants to a Parley, and by promising them Annibal's Friendship, perswade them to surrender the City. At first they would give no Credit to any thing the Bruttii said, but when they discover'd the Punick Army on the Hills, and understood by some few that got back, that all the rest of the multitude abroad, were in the Enemies power; then overcome with fear, they promis'd to consult their people about the overture; who being presently Assembled, the Rabble were all desirous of a Change and a new Alliance, those who had Relations abroad intercepted, had their minds bias'd as much as if they had given Hostages, some few that silently were for a constant maintaining their Fidelity, durst rather wish, than publicly plead for it, so as they all agreed in outward appearance to yield up the place to the Carthaginians, having first privately Embarqu'd L. Atilius the Captain of the Garrison, and what Roman Souldiers he had, on Vessels that lay in the Haven, to the end they might be transported to Rhegium. Then they admitted Amilcar and his Forces into the Town, upon Condition That there should presently be a League concluded on terms indifferent for both Parties. But that promise was not very well perform'd, because Amilcar charg'd them with having fraudulently dismiss'd and suffer'd the Romans to escape; which the Locrians endeavour'd to excuse, by alledging that they ran away, and they could not help it. And a Party of Horse was sent to pursue them, if by chance either the Tide might cause any of the Vessels to stay in the Current of the Streight, or drive them on shore; but though they did not overtake them, yet they had sight of other Ships crossing from Messina to Rhegium, being Roman Forces sent by Claudius the Prætor to secure that City with a Garrison; whereupon the Enemy presently withdrew from before Rhegium.

II. The Ternis allow'd the Locrians by Annibal's Command were these, That they should live under their own Laws and Customs, That the City should be free for the Carthaginians to come into, but the Locrians should have the Command of the Port; and on either side they should mutually assist each other both in Peace and War. So the Carthaginians retired from the Streights, the Bruttians being much discontented, that they had left untouched Rhegium and Locri, both which Cities they design'd to have had the plunder of. Therefore soon after they by themselves arm fifteen thousand of their own men, and march to assault Croton, which was also a City inhabited by Greeks, and a Sea-Port, imagining they should not a little encrease their wealth and power by being Masters of a well-fortified City, so conveniently situate on the Sea-side. But still they were pinch'd with a shrewd Dilemma, if they did not invite the Carthaginians to join with them in this Expedition, it might be counted an affront and breach of the social League between them; If they did, and they should again act the part rather of Arbitrators of Peace, than Assistants in the War, then they should fight against the Liberty of the Crotonians, as they had done against the Locrians to no purpose, and get nothing for their pains; Therefore the best expedient they thought was to send Agents to Annibal, and obtain his promise, that Croton when taken, should belong to the Bruttii. But Annibal told them, That those present on the place could best advise of that matter, and referr'd them to Hanno, who never would give them any positive Answer, for neither were they willing that so noble and rich a City should be plunder'd, and on the other side thought that the Crotonians when attack'd by the Bruttians, seeing that the Carthaginians neither approv'd nor assisted the same, might so much the sooner of their own accord, revolt to them and desire the Punick assistance. Nor were the people of Croton all of a mind, for one and the same Disease had infected almost all the Cities of Italy, and set the Nobles and the Commons at variance, the Senate favouring the Romans, and the Populace the Carthaginians. This dissension within the City, the Bruttians were made acquainted with by a Renegade; That Aristomachus was the head of the popular Faction, and a great stickler for yielding the City to Annibal; That the City being so very vast, and the Walls in several places ruinous, the Guards and Watches of the Senators, and those of the Commons were set at the respective breaches many times a great distance from each other; and wherever the Commoners were upon duty, they might enter without resistance. Upon this Intelligence, and with the guidance of this Fugitive, the Bruttii environ'd the City round about, and being let in by the Commons, at the first assault became Masters of the whole City, except the Castle, which the Nobles held in their own hands, and had well-stor'd it with all Provisions for a refuge for themselves in any such surprize; Aristomachus fled thither as well as the rest, as having been the Adviser to surrender the Town to the Carthaginians, not to the Bruttians.

III. The Wall of this City Croton, before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy, contain'd twelve Miles in compass, but after the desolation made by that War, scarce one half part of it was inhabited; the River that formerly ran through the middle of the Town, flow'd now at a great distance from any of the Streets, and the Castle stood far from any Houses. Six Miles from this City was a noble Temple, more famous than the City it self, dedicated to Juno Lacinia, frequented with great Devotion by all the neighbouring Nations; There was a sacred Grove enclosed with a thick under-Wood and lofty Fir-Trees, in the midst of it were gallant delicate Pastures, wherein were fed Beasts consecrated to the Goddess of all forts without any Keeper, for as they went out to feed each kind by themselves, so at night they came home every one to his Stall or Pinfold, secure from any harm, either by the way-layings of wild Beasts, or being stoln by men, great encrease therefore and profit was made by

by these Cattel, inſomuch that out of that Income, a ſolid Pillar of gold was made and conſecrated, and the Temple renowned for its riches as well as its ſanctity. And (as generally to ſuch notable places are aſcrib'd ſome Miracles or other) the ſtory goes, That in the very Threshold of this Temple there was an Altar, the aſhes on which, no Wind, though ever ſo high or boiſterous, could blow away, or ſo much as ſtir. As for the Caſtle of Croton, on the one ſide it ſtands on the Sea, on the other it looks towards the Fields, in old time defended only by the natural advantages of its ſituation, afterwards fortified with a Wall on that part where Dionyſius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gain'd the Cliffs behind, ſurpriz'd and took it; This Fortreſs (ſtrong enough as they thought to ſecure them) was held by the Nobles as aforeſaid, beſieg'd not only by the Bruttians, but their own people too. Who at laſt finding the ſame impregnable againſt their Forces, were forc'd by neceſſity to deſire Hanno's aſſiſtance; but he endeavouring to draw them to a ſurrender upon Terms, offers them a Colony of the Bruttii to be planted amongſt them, and ſo fill up their City again to its antient frequency of Inhabitants, to which not a man would in the leaſt hearken, except it were only Ariſtomachus, all the reſt affirming, That they would ſooner die, than being mixt with the Bruttians, degenerate into Foreign Rites, Manners and Laws, and in time into a ſtrange barbarous Language. Ariſtomachus alone, ſeeing he could neither prevail with them to ſurrender, nor yet had any opportunity to betray the Caſtle, as he had done the City, fled away to Hanno. Soon after this, Embaſſadours from Locri by Hanno's permiſſion, came up to the Caſtle, and were admitted in, who perſwaded the Gentlemen there to transport themſelves to Locri, rather than hazard the laſt Extremities; to which purpoſe, if they pleas'd to accept it, they had already obtained for them Annibals paſs, by Embaſſadours ſent to him on that very Errand. So all the perſons of note of Croton quitted that place, went on Board and ſail'd to Locri. In Apulia the Romans could not be quiet for Annibal, though it were in the depth of Winter; Sempronius the Conſul Quarter'd at Luceria, Annibal near Arpi; between them happen'd frequent Skirmiſhes, as each party ſpy'd an opportunity, or could find an advantage; but generally the Romans had the better on't, and daily were rendered more wary and ſafer from Surprizes and Ambuſcades.

The Death of King Hiero, and that Kingdom falling into the hands of his Grandſon Hieronimus, had quite turn'd the Scale as to the Romans Inter'eſt in Sicily. This new King was but a Youth, ſcarce like to uſe his own Liberty with moderation, much leſs to govern the whole Realm with diſcretion; His Guardians and Friends were glad of ſuch an opportunity to attain their own ends by complying with his humours, and precipitating him into all kind of Vices, which Hiero foreſeeing, would ('tis ſaid) in his old Age, have left the Syracuſans a Free State, left by being under the Government of a Child, that Realm rais'd and ſo well ſtrengthened by Policy and Vertue, ſhould ſuddenly come to ruine by Folly and Extravagance. But his Daughters with all their Inter'eſt diſſwaded him from this Courſe, conceiving that though the Lad had the Title of King, yet the Dominion and ſway of all Affairs would be in the hands of themſelves and their Huſbands, Andronodorus and Zoippus, for they were left his prime Tutors. Nor was it an eaſy matter for one that was now ninety years of Age, and continually beſieg'd by theſe Womens Flatteries and Importunities to keep his mind ſo free as to abandon the Conſideration of his proper Family, meerly in regard to the publick State; however he appointed him no leſs than fifteen Tutors, whom he intreated as he lay a dying, That they would religiously obſerve that Fidelity and ſtrict Alliance with the Romans which he had maintain'd full fifty years; and that they would always adviſe their young Prince to iſſiſt in his ſteps, and that Diſcipline under which he had been Educated. With theſe commands he ſpent his laſt breath, the Tutors take upon their truſt, publiſh the Will, and ſhew the young King (who was then not full fifteen) in the general Aſſembly of the people; where ſome few that were diſpoſed on purpoſe amongſt the Crowd to make a ſhew of Joy, applauded the Will with ſhouts and clamours, but the reſt as having loſt their Father, ſtood ſilent for grief, and dreaded what the conſequences might prove to the Orphan Kingdom; The old Kings Funeral was rendered more ſolemn and ſtately by the love and good will of his Subjects, than any care or charge of his Deſcendents and Relations. Soon after Andronodorus diſplaces the reſt of the Tutors, alledging the King was no longer a Child, but of an Age capable to take upon him the Governace of the Kingdom, and ſo by renouncing that Tutorſhip which he had in common with divers others; got the power of them all into his own hands.

The truth is, Let a King have been never ſo good and moderate, he would not eaſily have had the favour of the Syracuſans, ſucceeding Hiero, whom they ſo extreamly lov'd and honour'd; but Hieronimus, as if he deſign'd on purpoſe by his Vices to make his Grandfather deſirable, at the very fiſt began to ſhow how ſad a change they were to expect. For thoſe who for ſo many years never ſaw Hiero, or his Son Gelo, either in habit of Apparel, or in any other Ornaments, Train or Port, different from the reſt of the Citizens, beheld him now in Purple Robes, a Royal Crown on his Head, and a Guard of Armed Penſioners attending him, and ſometimes riding out from his Court in a Chariot drawn with four white Steeds, after the mode of Dionyſius the Tyrant. This proud habit and ſtately Equipage, was accompanied with ſuitable qualities and conditions. He contemn'd and ſlighted all men; scorn'd to give Audience to humble Suppliants, or hearken to any sound Counsel, but sent them away that made their Addressees, with reproachful Language and ill Names. Difficult of access, not only to Strangers, but even his Tutors durst not come at him. The delights and Lusts he addicted himself to were new and strange, his Cruelty outrageous and inhumane; whereby he became so terrible that some of his Guardians made away themselves, others fled out of the Country for fear of his outrages. There were but three of them that were familiarly admitted to Court; Andronodorus and Zoippus (Hiero's Sons-in-Law) and one Thrafo, nor were these so much consulted about any other affairs, as touching the Roman Alliance; for the two first being altogether for the Carthaginians, the latter as hot for the Romans, the King took a delight many times to hear them wrangle and squabble on that subject, and knew not very well which side to incline to; But it happen'd, that a Conspiracy against the Life of the King was discovered by one Calo, a young man much about the Kings Age, his Play-Fellow and intimate with him from his Childhood; but he could nominate no more of the Conspirators than Theodotus, by whom he himself was made privy to the Treason, and solicited to be a Complice therein. Theodotus being apprehended, and committed to Andronodorus to be put to the Question, presently confess'd himself Guilty, but would not reveal the rest concern'd; at last being torn and mangled with all kind of Tortures intollerable, beyond humane patience, pretending he could no longer endure the pains, but would make an ingenuous Confession, he turns the Crime from the Guilty upon the Innocent, and falsely declares, That Thrafo was the Contriver of the Plot, and that they durst not have attempted so grand an Enterprize, if they had not been encouraged by his power and interest at Court who put them upon't. He also impeached some others of the Kings menial Servants, as their names came into his head during his Tortures, and whose Lives he imagined might be best spared, and their Deaths least lamented. His naming of Thrafo was the greatest Argument with the King to credit the story, who was therefore immediately seiz'd and Executed, as were also all the rest accused, though equally innocent; As for the real Conspirators, not one of them, though their Confederate was so long under Torture, either absconded, or offer'd to run away, such confidence had they in his Vertue and Fidelity, and such a wonderful resolution and strength had he to conceal them.

VI. Thrafo who was the only means hitherto of the Syracusians holding to their Alliance with the Romans, being thus dispatcht out of the way, presently the face of Affairs tended openly to a Revolt, Embassadors being not only sent to Annibal, but two Agents received and entertained that came from him, viz. Hippocrates and Epicides, both descended from Syracuse by their Grandfather who was banisht thence, but born at Carthage, and Punicus by their Mothers side, who also brought with them a young Carthaginian Nobleman, whose name was Annibal; by whose Negotiation a League was clapt up between the Great Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracuse, and for continuing a good correspondence between them, Annibal was content his said Agents should continue at the Syracusian Court. Appius Claudius the Prætor, who had then the Government of Sicily, being advertiz'd of these Overtures, immediately dispatcht Embassadors to Hieronimus, who acquainting him, That they came to renew that ancient Society and Friendship which they had with the King his Grandfather; were not heard without making sport at them, and askt in an upbraiding kind of Joque by Hieronimus, What luck they had at the Battel of Cannæ? for Annibals Embassadors related incredible stories, and he would fain know the truth, that he might take his measures accordingly. The Romans only answer'd, That when he had learnt to give a serious Audience to Embassadors, they would come to him again, and so having rather admonisht than requested him, not rashly to violate the League, they departed. Hieronimus sends Embassadors to Carthage to confirm the Treaty made with Annibal; Wherein it was capitulated, That as soon as he had driven the Romans out of Sicily (which would presently be done, if they would but send some Forces and a Fleet) the River Himera, which divides the Island very near into equal parts, should limit both the Carthaginian and Syracusians Dominion. But afterwards being puffed up with some peoples flatteries who told him 'twas fit he should remember that he was not only the Grandchild of King Hiero, but of King Pyrrhus too, by the Mothers side, he sent another Embassy declaring, That he thought it but reasonable, That they should quit the whole Island of Sicily, and leave it to him; and that the Empire of Italy only, belonged properly to the Carthaginians to acquire and conquer, he having already a right to all Sicily. Which Levity and vain-glorious humour they did neither wonder at in an unbridled young man, nor would they at present stand to dispute it with him, so long as they could on any terms alienate him utterly from the Romans.

VII. But all these Courtes were but Precipices hastning his destruction; for having sent before Hippocrates and Epicides with two thousand men to sollicite those Cities to a Revolt wherein the Romans had Garrisons, he himself in person entred the Country of the Leontines, with all the rest of his Army consisting of about fifteen thousand Foot and Horse; the before-mentioned Conspirators (who chanc'd to be all then in Arms under him) possess'd themselves of an empty House, adjoining to a narrow Lane, through which the King used to go down to the Market place and publick Hall of the City. Where whilst the rest stood ready arm'd waiting his coming, one of them whose name was Dinomeni, because he waited immediately mediately on the Kings Person, had his Cue given him, that when his Master came near the Gate, he should on some pretence stop the rest of his Attendants in that narrow passage, which was done accordingly, by holding up his Foot, and fiddling about his Shoe as if he would untie it, being too strait, whereby, keeping back the Croud, the King was stabb'd, and receiv'd several wounds before any body could come to his Rescue; but upon the Outcry and Tumult, they fell upon Dinomeni, who then openly appear'd to stop them, however with two slight wounds he escap'd their hands; and the Guards seeing the King lie dead, betook themselves to their heels, the Assassins went some of them into the Town-Hall, gladly received by the Rabble as Authors of their Liberty, and others hastned to Syracuse, to prevent Andronodorus and others of the Kings Favourites from taking any measures to punish them. But before this, whilst Affairs there stood in a doubtful posture, App. Claudius perceiving a War at hand, had advertiz'd the Senate of Rome, That Sicily was join'd with the Carthaginians, and used all the diligence he could to bring his Forces to the Frontiers to obviate their designs. Towards the end of the year Q. Fabius, by Authority from the Senate, fortified and placed a Garrison at Puteoli, a Mart-Town that began much to be frequented since these Wars. From whence being to come for Rome to chuse Consuls, he Ordered the Elections to be held the very next day after his Arrival, and was so intent thereupon, that he came from his Journey directly into Mars's Field, before he went into the City. Where the youngest Century of the Anien Tribe, happening by Lot, to have the Prerogative of giving their Suffrages first, they nominated T. Otacilius and M. Emilius Regillus for Consuls; Then Q. Fabius commanding silence, made the following Oration.

VIII. If we had either Peace in Italy, or War with such an Enemy, as failures of negligence or error might be of no great importance, or easily retriev'd, I should think, that whoever offer'd to delay or oppose the favours and free affections of this solemn Assembly, in conferring Offices and Honours upon whom you please, were justly to be blam'd as intrenching upon your Liberties and Freedom of Choice. But since in this War, and with this Enemy, never any General of ours took one false step in his Conduct, but it cost us some vast overthrow, and prov'd almost fatal to our Common-wealth: It is absolutely necessary that you should come hither to Elect Consuls, with no less care and caution, than you would use, if you were now just marching into the Field to Engage the Enemy, and every one lay his hand upon his heart and say to himself, I am this day to nominate a Consul that may be a match for General Annibal. This year, before Capua, when Jubellius Taurea, the bravest Cavalier of that City, defied the Romans and challeng'd to fight Man to Man, Asellus Claudius the stoutest Horseman amongst the Romans was chosen to Encounter him; Heretofore against a Gaul that offer'd Combat upon the Bridge over Anio, our Ancestors sent out Manlius a resolute Champion of equal Courage and strength; For the same reason many years after, upon such another occasion, the like trust was reposed in M. Valerius, and he had leave to fight with another braving Gaul; Therefore since we desire to have Footmen and Horsemen, superiour or at least equal to any the Enemy can boast of, and are so wary to match them even in single Rancounters, much more ought we to seek out a Commander in Chief no way inferiour to the Enemies General, since thereon the safety of the whole Army, nay of the whole Commonwealth depends. And even when we have chosen the ablest Leader we can, he will still be under great disadvantages, for as soon as he is Elected, and that too but for one years space, he must deal with an old and perpetual General, bound up by no limits of time, or formalities of Laws and superiour Orders, but free to manage all things to the utmost advantage, as opportunities shall occur. Whereas whilst we are preparing and disposing of things, and have scarce begun to put our well-laid designs in Execution, the year is wheel'd about, our Commissions expired, and our Armies fall under new Conduct. But since I have said enough to admonish you what kind of men you ought to create Consuls, it remains that I speak briefly of those Gentlemen on whom the Prerogative Century have bestow'd their favour. As for Emilius Regillus he is already the Flamen or High Priest to Quirinus, whom we can neither spare from his sacred Ministry, nor yet keep him at home to follow us, without neglecting either the service of the Gods, or the due care of the War. I confess Otacilius married my Sisters Daughter, and hath Children by her, but you have merited better, both at my Ancestors hands and mine, than that I should prefer my private Relations, before the regards I have to the publick utility; Any common Sailer or Passenger can steer in fair weather, but when a blustering Tempest is up, and the Ship toss'd, and every moment ready to be swallow'd by the raging Sea, a skilful hand is requir'd at Helm. We sail not now in a Calm, but have been already almost cast away, and on the very brink of destruction by several unlucky storms, and therefore are concern'd to take the greatest care and caution imaginable, whom we employ to be our Steersman. In a matter of less importance we have made trial O T. Otacilius! of your knowledge and diligence, nor have you yet given us any such proof thereof, as should encourage us to entrust greater affairs to your management: The Fleet whereof you were this year Admiral, we fitted out for three purposes. That it should waite the Sea Coasts of Africk, secure our own Italian shores, and especially to prevent any supplies of Men, Money, or Provisions being sent from Carthage to Annibal. Now with all my heart, create T. Otacilius if he perform'd all these particulars, or even any one of them, for the Commonwealth. But if whilst you were Admiral, all things pass'd to Annibal as free and secure as if we had had never a Ship out at Sea; If the Coasts of Italy have this year been much more infested with Depredations than those those of Africk, why of all men living should we make choice of you as the only General to cope with Annibal? Nay rather, if you were already Consul, we should judge it necessary forthwith to appoint a Dictator, according to the usage of our Ancestors. Nor ought you to resent it ill, that in the whole City of Rome there is some one person esteem'd an abler Warriour than you. The truth is, 'tis no particular mans Interest more than yours, not to overload your shoulders with a burthen under which you needs must sink. I therefore repeat my advice, and earnestly intreat you, my Fellow Citizens! That you would in Electing Consuls this day, exercise that Judgment and careful Providence, as if you were standing arm'd in Battalia, and were there to chuse two Generals, under whose Conduct you were presently to venture your Lives; for 'tis to them our Children must take the Oath of Obedience, 'tis at their Edict they must Rendezvous, and to their Care and Prudence are our Armies entrusted, and all we have in the World; The Lake Thrasymenus, and the Plains before Cannæ, are sad Examples to remember, I wish they may be as useful precedents to teach us to avoid the like for the future. Come, Cryer, call the Prerogative Tribe to a new Scrutiny.

IX. T. Otacilius bawling out very fiercely, That Fabius's only drift was to continue himself in the Consulship, and growing troublesome to the Assembly by his Clamours, the Consul commanded his Lictors to seize him; and because he himself came directly out of the Country into the Field, gave Order that the Axes should be openly born before him in the Field as well as the Rods, to shew his Authority; In the mean time the Prerogative Century gave new Suffrages, and chose Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third, wherein the rest of the Centuries agreed with them without any hesitation; One Prætor was also continued Q. Fulvius Flaccus, the three others new created, viz. T. Otacilius Crassus the second time, Q. Fabius the Consul's Son who was then Curule Ædile, and P. Cornelius Lentulus. The Election of Prætors being over, the Senate pass'd a Decree, That the City Province should belong to Q. Fulvius without putting it to the Lot, and that whilst the Consuls were abroad in the Wars, he should have the principal charge of the City; This Year happen'd great Rains, and abundance of Snow, destroying many Houses, Cattel and Men. In the fifth year of the Punick War, Q. Fabius Maximus entering upon the Consulship the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third, rais'd the minds of the City to an unusual expectation, there not having been such a famous couple of Consuls for divers years past; but those that were ancient, compar'd them with Maximus Rullus, and P. Decius against the Gallick War; Or as afterwards Papirius and Cæcilius were declared Consuls against the conjoin'd Arms of the Samnites, Brutians, Lucans and Tarentines. Marcellus was created now in his absence, being with the Army, but Fabius present, and himself holding the Election; but the present Juncture, necessity of the War, and extream danger of the Commonwealth, suffer'd none to cavil at this precedent, nor to censure Fabius of Ambition, or desire of Command, but rather applauded the greatness of his mind, who seeing there was a necessity of having the ablest Commander Rome could yield, and knowing himself to be the person, could so nobly slight the envy which he himself might contract, and undervalue it, in comparison of the service he hop'd to do for the publick.

X. The same day the Consuls entered upon their Office, they assembled the Senate in the Capitol, and the first thing they pass'd was a Decree, That the Consuls should either cast Lots, or agree between themselves which of them should stay to hold the Assemblies for chusing of Censors before he went to the Army. Then all that were employ'd abroad with any Forces were continued in their respective Commands, and Order'd to remain in their several Provinces, Ti. Gracchus at Luceria, where he was with the Army of Volunteer Slaves; C. Terentius Varro in the Picene Country, and Manius Pomponius in the Cisalpine Gaul; That of the last years Prætors, Q. Mucius in the Character of Pro-Prætor, should govern Sardinia; M. Valerius preside over Brundisium, and the adjacent Sea Coast, to observe the Motions of King Philip of Macedon; The Province of Sicily was decreed to P. Cornelius Lentulus the Prætor, and T. Otacilius to be Admiral of the same Fleet as he had last year, against the Carthaginians. This Year many Prodigies were talkt of, and as simple superstitious people grew more apt to credit them, there were daily more and more reported, As that at Lanuvium Ravens had built Nests within the Chappel of Juno Sospita; That in Apulia a green Palm-Tree was on a light fire of its own accord; At Mantua a Pool or Lake, fed by the overflowing of the River Min-cius, appear'd all Blood. That at Cales it rain'd Chalk, and Blood at Rome in the Beast-market. That in the street call'd Iltricus a Spring under ground broke forth with so much violence, that as if it had been the Torrent of a great River, it carried away several Pipes and Hogheads that were in the place. That the roof of the Capitol, the Temple of Vulcan in Mars's Field, a Nut-Tree in the Sabines Country, the high street, the Wall, and a Gate at Gabii were all blasted with Lightning and Fire from Heaven: And by and by other strange wonders were buzz'd abroad, as that the Spear of Mars at Preneste moved it self of its own accord; That a Bullock spoke in Sicily, and a Child in its Mother Belly in the Marrucines Country was heard to Cry Io Triumphe! That at Spoleto a Woman was turn'd into a Man; At Hadria there appear'd an Altar in the Sky, and the shapes of men in white Garments round about it; And at Rome it self there was a swarm of Bees seen the second time in the Market-place; some people affirming, that they discovered armed Legions on the Hill Janiculum, put all the City into an Alarm, but when they came thither, there was no body to be seen but the usual Inhabitants. These Prodigies by directions from the Soothsayers were expiated with the greater Sacrifices, and solemn supplications were enjoin'd to be made to all the Gods that had Shrines at Rome.

XI. After all Complements perform'd that were requisite to appease and pacify the anger of the Gods, the Consuls consulted the Senate touching affairs of State, and the management of the War, and with what Forces, and where to be employed. The result was, That there should be in all eighteen Legions, whereof each Consul was to have two, the Provinces of Gaul, Sicily, and Sardinia were to be guarded with two more apiece. Q. Fabius the Prætor Lord Deputy of Apulia, was to have two for the security of that Province, and T. Gracchus to command two more at Luceria; That C. Terentius the Proconsul should have one Legion in the Picene Country, and M. Valerius another for the Navy about Brundisium, and the other two to remain at Rome for the Guard of the City. To compleat this number, six intire Legions were to be new rais'd, and the Consuls were order'd to muster them with all Expedition, and to get ready the Fleet, that with those Ships that lay on the Coasts of Calabria, there might this year be set forth in all a hundred and fifty Sail. The Levies being compleated, and the Navy Equip'd, Q. Fabius held the Election of Censors, and those Created were M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus. The rumour still encreasing that Sicily was in Rebellion, T. Otacilius was Order'd thither with the Fleet, and Seamen being wanting, the Consuls by a Decree of the Senate, publisht an Edict, That all such as in the time of the Censorship of L. Æmilius and C. Flaminius, were themselves or their Fathers rated to be worth fifty thousand Ases or upwards to an hundred thousand, or who afterwards was grown to that Estate, should find one Mariner and six months pay. Those that were worth above a hundred thousand Ases unto three hundred thousand, three Mariners and a years pay; Whoever were valued in the Censors Book between three hundred thousand and a Million, five Mariners; those above a Million, seven; and every Senator eight Seamen and a years wages; By this Proclamation Seamen were supplied, arm'd and every way provided for by their Masters, and so were put on Board, having thirty days Victuals prepared before hand. This was the first time the Roman Navy was man'd at the charge of particular persons.

These preparations greater than usual, startled the Neighbour Nations, especially the people of Capua, lest the Romans should begin that years Campaign, with the Siege of that City; Therefore they sent Agents to Annibal, requesting, That he would advance nearer to Capua, for new Forces were rais'd at Rome to attacke that place, the Romans being much more enrag'd at their Revolt, than at the defection of any other people. And forasmuch as this Message was delivered in such fear, Annibal thought it necessary to use all Expedition, lest the Romans should get thither before him, therefore dislodg'd from Arpi, and Encamp'd at his old Quarters at Tifata above Capua, where leaving the Numidians and Spaniards both to Guard their own Camp and that City, he went down with the rest of his Army to the Lake Avernis, on pretence of a solemn Sacrifice he had vowed to celebrate there, but in truth to tamper with and sollicite the Town of Puteoli and the Garrison there to Revolt to him. Maximus upon advice that Annibal was gone from Arpi back into Campania, rode day and night till he came to his Army, and order'd Ti. Gracchus to advance with the Forces under his Command from Luceria to Beneventum, and that Q. Fabius the Prætor (who was the Consul's Son) should succeed him at Luceria. Two Prætors were at once dispatcht into Sicily, P. Cornelius to Command the Army, and Otacilius as Admiral at Sea; All others hastned to their several Charges, and those that were continued in Commands, kept the same Provinces as last year.

XIII. Whilst Annibal was at the Avern Lake, five young Noblemen came to him from Tarentum, who had been formerly his Prisoners, some taken at Thrasymenus, others at Cannæ, and being releas'd with that usual Clemency wherewith he treated all the Romans Allies; they to requite his Civilities bring him word, That they had so influenc'd most of the youth of Tarentum, that they were much more for joining with him than with the Romans; and that they were sent on purpose to desire him to draw his Forces that way; That as soon as his Standards should appear, as soon as his Camp should be seen from the Walls of Tarentum, that City would immediately be surrendred into his hands; For the young Fry could do what they list with the Commons, and the Commons rul'd all at Tarentum. Annibal return'd them thanks and abundance of large Promises, and wisht them to go home, and promote and prepare this design, for in convenient time he would be with them; and so they were dismiss'd. He was mighty desirous to make himself Master of Tarentum, for he saw that it was not only a noble and rich City, but also situate on the Seaside, and a most convenient Port over against Macedonia, for his Confederate King Philip to land at. (if he came over into Italy) since the Romans were in possession of Brundisium. As soon as he had perform'd his Sacrifice, and during his stay there forrag'd all the Cumane Territories, as far as Cape Misenum, on a sudden he turn'd his Army upon Puteoli to surprize that Garrison; which consisting of six thousand men, and the place strong by Nature, and much improv'd by Art, after three days assault on all sides, in vain he quitted the same, and set his Army to plunder the Territories of Naples, more for madness and revenge, than out of any hopes to gain that City; upon his advance so near, the Commons of Nola, who had long been Enemies to the Romans, and at difference on that account with their own Senate, began to be very tumultuous, and sent Messengers to Annibal with Assurances that they would yield the Town, if he pleased to come to receive it: But Marcellus the Consul upon Advice from the Nobles of that City, prevented their design, for in one day he marched from Cales to Suessula, although part of the time was spent in ferrying over the River Fulturnus; and next night sent into Nola six thousand Foot and three hundred Horse for a Guard for the Senate; and as Marcellus used all celerity to secure Nola, to Annibal having already been twice deceived, linger'd out the time, not much crediting the Nolans promises.

XIV. About this time the Consul Fabius came before Capilinum where was a Punick Garrison; and to Beneventum, at one and the same time (as if they had been agreed) came Hanno out of the Bruttians Country with a strong Party of Foot and Horse on one side, and Ti. Gracchus from Luceria on the other side, who got first into the Town, and being advertiz'd that Hanno lay about three miles off on the River Calores, and plunder'd the Country, he issued out of the Gates on that side, and drew up within a mile of the Enemy, where he made a Speech to his Souldiers, who consisted chiefly of the Volunteer-Bondmen, who were willing rather to deserve their liberty by another years service silently, than to claim it with publick Clamours; yet when he parted from his Winter-Quarters, he perceived some of them murmured and complained to one another; What, shall we never serve in the Quality of Free-men? And he had wrote to the Senate, not so much what they desired, as what they deserved, assuring their Lordships, That they had performed good and faithful service all along to that very day, and wanted nothing but their freedom to pass for as good and lawful Souldiers as any in their Army; whereupon they left it to him to do as he should think best for the Commonwealth: Therefore before they went now to fight, he told them; That the happy moment they so long had wish'd for, the time of enjoying their liberty was now arriv'd. For next morning they should engage the Enemy in a pitch'd Battel in a free and open Field, where without any tricks or stratagems, the matter must be decided by pure Valour and the dint of Sword; That whoever should bring thence the Head of an Enemy, he would immediately make him free; and on the other side, whoever should fly or give ground, should, as a Bond-slave, be scourged. So that now every man had his Fortune in his own hands; and that they might be assured of their freedom, acquainted them that it was not only he himself that promised it them, but the Consul Marcellus and the whole Senate whom he had consulted therein. And so caused the Consuls Letter and Senates Order to be publickly read before them. Which they entertain'd with a mighty shout, and earnestly begg'd that he would presently give them leave to fall upon the Enemy; but Gracchus told them, next morning would be time enough, and so dismissed them, who all were exceeding joyful, especially those that hop'd on the morrow to earn their liberty, and spent the rest of that day in making ready their Arms.

XV. Next day as soon as the Trumpets began to sound, they first presented themselves before any of the rest of the Troops, at the Generals Pavilion, arm'd compleatly and ready to fight; at Sun-rising Gracchus drew up in Battalia; nor was the Enemy behind hand, but altogether as ready for the Encounter, they were seventeen thousand Foot, for the most part Bruttians and Lucanians, and twelve hundred Horse, of whom a very few were Italians, the rest almost all Numidians and Moors. The Fight was both sharp and tedious, for four long hours together none could say which had the better on't. Nor did any thing hinder the Romans more, than the Enemies Heads being made the price of their Liberty; for as any one stoutly slew an Enemy, he must first spend time in cutting off his Head, which was difficult to do in the crowd and tumult, and then their right hands being employ'd to hold the Heads, the most valiant were able to do no further service, and so the whole brunt lay upon the weakest and most timorous; so that the Marshals of the Field inform'd Gracchus, That none of his men now wounded a standing Enemy, but busied themselves in butchering the dead, and carried in their right hands mens Heads instead of Arms. He gave Orders, That they should all at once sling away the Heads, and press on upon the Enemy: That they had already given sufficient proofs of their Valour, and behaving themselves so gallantly, they need not doubt of their Liberty. Then was the Fight renew'd, and also the Horse charg'd the Enemy, whom the Numidians as stoutly receiv'd, and between them the Encounter was no less furious than amongst the Foot, and now again it was an even Lay to which the Victory would incline. The Generals on both sides heartned on their men. The Roman minding his Souldiers how oft these Bruttians and Lucanians had been subdued by their Ancestors, and the Carthaginian cryed out, They had to do only with a few Roman Bond-slaves and Varlets. And at last seeing things in an extremity, Gracchus declared, That not a man should hope for freedom, unless the Enemy were discomfited and put to flight.

XVI. That word set their Spirits all on fire, and as if it had transform'd them into other men, with a new shout they charg'd the Enemy so fiercely, that there was no standing before them: First, the Punick Van-Guard gave ground, then their Standards, and at last their main Body took their heels towards their Camp in such disorder and consternation, that they did not so much as face about at the Ports, nor endeavour to defend their Rampier; but the Romans following them pell-mell, continued the Fight even within the Enemies Works, where, as the Conflict was more troublesome for want of room, so the Slaughter was was more dreadful, the same being augmented by the Prisoners that were there before in custody, who snatching up Weapons in that tumult, fell upon the Rear of the Carthaginians, and stop't their flight, so that of all that great Army not full two thousand, and those for the most part Horse, escaped with their General, the rest being either slain, or taken, together with eight and thirty Colours. The Conquerors lost near two thousand men. All the Booty was given to the Souldiers, except the Prisoners, and such of the Cattel as the Owners should come in and claim within thirty days. Being return'd loaded with Plunder to the Camp, about four thousand of the Volunteer-Bondmen, (who did not fight so well as the rest, nor broke in so soon into the Enemies Camp) for fear of being punish'd, withdrew themselves to a little Hill hard by; but next day being sent for by the Colonels, repaired to the Camp, where Gracchus at the Head of the whole Army, made a Speech. And after he had rewarded such of the old Souldiers as had signalized themselves, with particular marks of Military Honour: As to the Bondmen he told them, That he had rather commend them altogether in general, both worthy and unworthy, than to sully the Glory of that day with punishing of any; and therefore wishing it might be for the good and prosperity of the Commonwealth and themselves, he did pronounce them all Free-men. At which word they shouted with mighty alacrity, and embraced and congratulated each other, and with hands lifted up to Heaven, begg'd for a thousand Blessings on the People of Rome, and especially to their Noble General Gracchus, who then continued his Speech thus: Till I had made you all equal in the Privilege of Freedom, I was unwilling to make any difference between you for any mans stoutness or misbehaviour; but now having discharg'd the Trust committed to me by the Commonwealth, that Valour and Cowardise may not seem to be altogether equalized, I will command a Catalogue of their Names to be brought in, who conscious of their own failure, did lately withdraw themselves, and calling them over one by one, will oblige them to take a Corporal Oath, That (unless in case of sickness) as long as they continue Souldiers, they shall not sit down as others do to eat or drink, but take their refecti'on standing on their feet; which punishment I am sure you will be content to undergo, when you consider what you have deserv'd, and that it was not possible I should more gently chastise your offence. Then he gave Order to truss up their Baggage and murch, and the Souldiers carrying or driving before them their Booties, return'd to Beneventum, joining and frolicking all the way, as if they had come from a Banquet or some great Festival, rather than from fighting a sharp and bloody Battel: The Inhabitants of Beneventum ran out in multitudes to meet and welcome them, and invited them to their Houses to give them Entertainment and Lodging; They had provided Collations for them in their Court-yards, and askt leave of Gracchus to treat his Souldiers, who granted it on condition, that they should all dine in the open street, which was done accordingly; the Volunteers having got Caps on or Fillets of Wool about their heads in token of Liberty, and whilst those that had behaved themselves courageously sat at their Victuals, the others, according to their Oaths, waited on them and eat their meat standing. So pleasant a sight, that Gracchus, after he came to Rome, caused the Representation thereof to be curiously drawn, and the Picture put up in the Temple of the Goddess Liberty, which his Father had built and dedicated in Mount Aventine, with the Monies levied for certain Fines, whilst he was in Office.

Whilst these Actions pass'd at Beneventum, Annibal having harass'd all the Territories of Naples, came before Nola. On advice of whose Advance, the Consul having sent for Pomponius the Proprietor with the Army that lay at Suessula, prepares to meet and fight him without delay. In the dead of the night he sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his Cavalry at a back Port, with Orders to fetch a compass and get behind the Enemy, and when he perceived them engaged, to fall upon their Rear; but whether by mistaking the way, or for want of time, I know not, he failed therein. And during his absence the two Armies encountred, wherein though the Romans had apparently the better, yet they miss'd of their main end, because the Horse came not up in time; nor durst Marcellus pursue the Enemy when they gave ground, but sound'd a Retreat to his men in the midst of their Victory; two thousand of the Enemy and upwards are reckon'd to have been slain that day, and of the Romans not four hundred. About Sun-set Nero came back, having wearied out his Horses and Men with marching all night and day, and not so much as seen the Enemy; to whom the Consul gave a sharp Reprimand, saying, 'Twas long of him and no body else that they had not that day been fully revenged on the Enemy for the loss at Cannæ. The next morning the Romans drew out again into the Field, but the Punicks tacitely yielding themselves beaten, kept within their Works, and the third day in the dead of the night, quitting all hopes of gaining Nola, an Enterprize that never had succeeded, marched away for Tarentum on better assurance of being let in there by Treachery.

At home at Rome the Civil Affairs were managed with no less Courage, than the Wars abroad in the Field. The Censors, by reason the Exchequer was empty, being at leisure from letting out and looking after publick Buildings, employed themselves to reform mens manners, and chastise those vices which in this time of War were grown up, as bodies languishing under Chronick distempers, are apt daily to breed new diseases. First, they cited those that after the Battel at Cannæ, would have abandoned the Commonwealth, and consulted to go out of Italy, the chief of whom L. Caelius Metellus happened now to be Questor, who with the rest being commanded to plead what they could for themselves, and able to alledge nothing material, they were Convicted, of having used words and discourses tending to sedition and the destruction of the Commonwealth. In the next place, those two subtle Expounders of discharging a solemn Oath, were summon'd, who when some of the Prisoners that had sworn to return to Annibal, went privately on a feigned Errand back to his Camp, had Voted them thereby to be released from the obligation of their Oath; both these and the others before-mention'd, as many as serv'd on the City Horfes, had their Horfes taken from them, were degraded, and condemn'd to forfeit their Votes, and serve without pay. Nor did the Censors Care extend only to reform and punish the Crimes of Senators, and those of the Equestrian Order; but caused a Roll to be brought in of all those young men, who without being sick, or other lawful Plea, had not for four years last past serv'd in the Army, of whom above two thousand were found guilty, removed out of their Tribe, and numbred amongst the Ararii, to which was added a severe Decree of the Senate, That all those whom the Censors had so branded, should serve on Foot, and be sent into Sicily to the reliques of the Army defeated at Cannæ, who were not to be discharg'd from service until the Enemy was beaten out of Italy. The Censors for want of Treasure forbearing to let out the repairs of the Temples, and providing Chariot Horfes for the State and other publick works, many persons that were wont to undertake the same by the great, made Addresses to them, desiring, That they would proceed therein as formerly when the Exchequer was full, declaring, that they would not expect a penny till the War was ended. Likewise the Masters of those Slaves whom T. Sempronius had Enfranchiz'd at Beneventum, acquainted the Senate, that they were sent to by the Triumvirs in the Office of Bankers call'd Mensarii, to receive the price of their Servants, but they were content to let it alone till the War was over. So great was the inclination of the Commons to supply the publick stock, that the moneys of Orphans, and afterwards of Widows began now to be brought into the Exchequer, as believing they could no where deposite it more safely than in the publick Faith and Security; and whatsoever was disburs'd to provide any thing the Orphans or Widows needed, an account was kept thereof in the Registry; Nay, this benevolence of private persons towards their Country, extended it self from the City as far as the Camp, where not an Horseman or Centurion would receive their pay, but branded them with the reproach of mercenary Fellows, that would take a penny during the present Exigency.

XIX. Q. Fabius the Consul lay before Casilinum, defended by a Garrison of two thousand Campanians, and seven hundred of Annibal's Souldiers. The Governour was Statius Metius, sent thither by Magius Atellanus, who that year was Medixtricus of Capua, (so they call'd their Chief Magistrate) and had promiscuously arm'd both Commons and Servants to fall upon the Romans Camp, whilst they were busy in attacking Casilinum. But Fabius had advice of all their designs, and therefore sent to his Colleague at Nola, That there was need of another Army to curb the Campanians whilst he assaulted Casilinum, and that he should come away, leaving Nola with a competent Garrison, or if he thought that not safe from Annibal, then he should send for T. Gracchus the Proconsul from Beneventum. Upon this Intelligence Marcellus left two thousand men to secure Nola, and with the rest of his Forces hastned to Casilinum, upon whose approach the Campanians withdrew and were quiet. Then began Casilinum to be assaulted by both Consuls, and abundance of Romans offering to scale the Walls, being wounded and beaten off without success; Fabius seeing it was a place in it self inconsiderable, and yet as difficult as any to be won, was for raising the Siege, and attempting some action of greater importance; but Marcellus perswaded him to continue it; alledging, That as there are many things which great Warriors ought not to begin, so being once undertaken, they were not lightly to be given over, because it might either way prove of mighty consequence as to their Fame and Reputation. So the Engines of Battery of all sorts being employ'd against the Walls, those Campanians that were in the Town made Overtures to Fabius for leave to march to Capua, and before many of them were got forth, Marcellus seiz'd the Gate they came out at, and then cut to pieces first all that were near the Gate, and afterwards making an irruption into the City, kill'd the Enemy as fast there; Fifty Campanians that got out first, flying to Fabius were by him sent with a Convoy to Capua; and Casilinum, whilst they were parlying and insisting upon terms was occasionally taken; The Prisoners both Campanians and those belonging to Annibal, were sent to Rome, and there shut up in Prison, the Inhabitants were divided amongst the Neighbouring Nations to be kept in Custody.

XX. At the same time that the Consuls with this success retired from Casilinum, Gracchus sent some new-raisd Troops out of the Lucanes Country, under the Command of one of their own Officers, to Forage in the Enemies Quarters, who being stragling negligently, and out of Order, Hanno fell upon them, and gave the Romans well nigh as great an overthrow there, as his own Party had receiv'd at Casilinum, and so retreated in an hurry into the Brutians Country, lest Gracchus should have pursued him. The Consul Marcellus went back to Nola whence he came; and Fabius advanc'd into Samnium both to Forage their Fields and reduce those Cities that had revolted; above all, the Samnites about Candium were grievously harraisd, harraisd, their Villages all burnt, their Lands all destroyed, and both Cattel and people carried away Captive; The Towns Completaria, Thelesia, Compsa, Mela, Fulula, and Orbitanium, all taken by storm, as also Blanda a City belonging to the Lucanians, and Acce a Town in Apulia. In these places were kill'd and taken Prisoners five and twenty thousand of the Enemy, and three hundred and seventy Deserters recovered, who being sent to Rome, were first publicly whipt, and then thrown down headlong from the Rock Tarpeia; These were the Achievements of Fabius in a few days space; but Marcellus was taken ill at Nola and disabled for action; The Prætor Fabius who Commanded about Luceria, took the Town call'd Accua by storm, and fortified a standing Camp at Ardonea. And in the mean time Annibal was come to Tarentum, making wonderful havock and devastation wherever he came; but within the Lands belonging to Tarentum, kept in his Souldiers from all plunder and violence, not out of good Nature, but only to wheedle with the Tarentines and insinuate into their Affections; but when he came before their Walls, there was no commotion within as he expected, and so he Encamp'd about a mile off; For indeed T. Valerius the Lieutenant General dispatcht from M. Valerius the Proprætor, was arriv'd there two days before Annibal appear'd, who having muster'd all the youth, and bestow'd them at the several Gates, and on the Walls where need was, being always night and day very vigilant, gave no opportunity either to the Enemy without, or the treacherous Inhabitants within, to effect any thing to the prejudice of the Garrison. So Annibal having spent several days before it in vain, seeing none that had been with him at the Lake Avernus, now appear, or any tidings from them, but finding plainly, that he had rashly follow'd vain Promises, remov'd from thence; but then too, left the Lands of Tarentum untouched, hoping that disssembled kindness might in time work upon them, though it had not yet prevail'd, and went to Salapia; where he stor'd up all sorts of Grain from Metapontum and Heraclia (for now Summer was pretty well over, and he lik'd that place for Winter Quarters.) Thence he sent abroad his Numidians and Moors to Forage the Country of Salentinum, and the bordering Forests of Apulia, whence they brought no great Booty, except it were Horfes, of which they got great numbers, and no less than four thousand were put out to the Troopers to be back'd and manag'd against the Spring.

The Romans, observing the prospect of a War not to be slighted, arising in Sicily, and that the murder of the late King, had rather given the Syracusians the advantage of better Generals, than any way alter'd either the Cause or their Inclinations, order'd M. Marcellus one of the Consuls to take charge of that Province. Upon the first noise of the Assassination of Hieronimus, the Souldiers made a Tumult at Leontinum, and bawld out fiercely, That they would Sacrifice the Blood of the Conspirators to the Ghost of the King. But hearing often the sweet sound of their Liberties restored, being in hopes a Largess would be bestow'd on them out of the Royal Treasury, and that they should have better Commanders, and withal amused with prodigious stories of the Tyrants lewd actions, and lewder Lusts, their minds were so far chang'd, that they let the Corpse of their King whom but now they seem'd so fond of, to lye unburied. Whilst others of the Conspirators staid behind to secure the Army, Theodotus and Sosis ride Post to Syracuse on the Kings Horfes, to surprize the Royalists before they should know any thing of the matter, but not only Fame (the swiftest thing in the World in such Cases) but a Currier one of the Kings Servants was got before them; whereupon Andronodorus had set Guards, both in the Isle, and the Castle, and all other advantageous Posts. Theodotus and Sosis in the Dusk of the Evening came riding into that Quarter of the City call'd Hexapylum, and exposing the Kings bloody Vest and his Crown, pass'd through the street Tycha, calling out to the people to take Arms, and for recovery of their Liberties, to Assemble in the Acradine. The Rabble, some ran out into the streets, others stood at their Doors, others looking out from the tops of their Houses and Windows, inquir'd what the matter was? The Town was full of Lights, Flambeaus and Clamour; Those that had Arms got together in open places, and those that wanted pull'd down the Weapons that were hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, taken from the Gauls and Illyrians, and bestow'd as a Present on King Hiero by the Romans, beseeching Jupiter, that he would willingly and propitiously afford his sacred Arms to those that were to use them only for their Country, for the Temples of the Gods and their own Liberties. This multitude join'd themselves with the Guards placed in the principal places of the City; and whereas in the Isles, Andronodorus had amongst other things secured the publick Granaries, a place enclosed round with four-square stone like a Fortrefs, those that were appointed to keep guard there, sent Messengers into the Acradine, that themselves and all the Corn there should be at the disposal of the Senate.

By break of day all the people arm'd and unarm'd, were Conven'd in the Acradine before the Altar of Concord, there situate, where one of the chief men of the City, named Polyenus, made a Speech to them free enough, and yet temper'd with a discreet moderation as follows, Those that have endur'd servitude and suffer'd indignities, 'tis no wonder if they rise up in fury against the Authors thereof as known Evils, but what the mischiefs are which attend civil discords, you can only know by hearsay from your Ancestors, having not hitherto been so unhappy as to have smarted under them your selves. I applaud your Courage in taking up Arms so valiantly, but shall more commend you, if you will not make use of them, till inforc'd thereunto by the last necessity. At present my Advice is, that we send to Andronodorus, requiring him to submit himself to the Senate and People, to open the Gates of the Isle and dismiss his Guards, and to let him know, that if under pretence of securing the Kingdom for another, he shall go about to usurp it for himself, we are resolv'd much more sharply to vindicate our Liberties against him, than against Hieronymus. Accordingly Messengers were sent, and then the Senate met, which as in Hiero's time it was the publick Council of the Kingdom, so from the time of his Death till that very day, it had scarce ever been convened or consulted with. Andronodorus was not a little startled both with the unanimous Consent of the People against him, and several parts of the City already seized, and especially because the most fortified part of the Isle and of greatest importance, was revolted; but when the Messengers called him forth, his Wife Demarata, the Daughter of Hiero, retaining still the Spirit of a Princess and the Ambition of a Woman, dissuaded him, putting him often in mind of that common Saying of Dionysius the Tyrant, That a man ought to be led leisurely on foot, and not gallop on Horse-back, when he is to quit his Dignity and be deposed from Power; That it was an easie matter for a man when he list, to relinquish the possession of a mighty Fortune, but to gain such a point was rare and difficult, therefore he would do well to require time to consider in a matter of such importance, and in the mean time might send for the Souldiers from Leontinum, to whom if he would but promise the late Kings Treasure, he might rule and order all things at his pleasure. These feminine Counsels Andronodorus did neither wholly slight, nor for the present follow, thinking it more easie to attain his Ends, if he gave place a while to the humours of the people; therefore he order'd the Messengers to carry back word, That he would entirely submit to the Senate and People. Accordingly next morning by break of day, he caused the Gates of the Isle to be flung open, and came into the Market-place of the Acradine, and getting up on the Altar of Concord, whence Polyneus the day before made his Speech, he began an Oration, wherein first he excused his not coming sooner, telling them, That he had hitherto kept the Gates shut, not that he meant ever to set up any Interest of his own different from that of the whole City, but when once Swords were drawn, he was apprehensive where they would hold their hands, or when put a stop to Execution and Slaughters? Whether they would be satisfied with the Death of the Tyrant, which was sufficient for regaining their Liberties, or might not in a wild fury knock all those o'th head that were any way related to him by Blood or Affinity, or enjoy'd any Office in the Court, whereby the innocent might lose their lives for another's Crimes. But since I now perceive, that those who have deliver'd their Country, are willing also to preserve its Liberty, and manage things by publick Council and Advice, I no longer doubted to yield up my person, and restore to my Country all that I had in Charge, since he that committed the same to me, is by his own folly and madness brought to destruction. Then turning to those that kill'd the late King, and calling unto Theodotus and Sosis by name, You have done (says he) a gallant Action and worthy to be recorded, but believe me, your Glory is yet but begun, not perfected, and there is yet mighty danger behind, unless by consulting the common Peace and Concord, you prevent the Commonwealth, now it has obtain'd its liberty, from falling into licentiousness and unruly insolence.

XXIII. With which words he laid the Keys both of the Gates and of the Kings Treasure at their feet; and so the multitude was for that day dismiss'd very joyful, and went with their Wives and Children in Procession to the Shrines of all their Gods. The next day they chose Prætors, of whom Andronodorus was the first Created, the rest for the most part were the Kings Murderers, and two of them, viz. Sopater and Dinomenes, though they were absent: Who being advertiz'd how matters pass'd at Syracuse, deliver'd what Treasure of the King's was at Leontinum to the Questors created for that purpose, to carry it back to Syracuse, as also that which in the Isle and in the Acradine was committed to their custody. That part of the Wall which divided the Isle from the rest of the City with too strong a Fortification, was order'd to be dismantled and thrown down by common Consent, and every thing was transacted suitable to those inclinations they had to maintain their liberty. Hippocrates and Epicides, upon news of the Kings Death, (which Hippocrates endeavour'd to conceal so far, that he kill'd the Messenger that brought the first tidings) being deserted by the Souldiers, return'd to Syracuse, thinking that for the present to be their safest course; where to prevent all suspicions of their seeking any occasion to raise disturbances, they first address'd themselves to the Prætors, and by their means had Audience of the whole Senate; To whom they remonstrated, That they were sent by Annibal to Hieronymus as his Friend and Ally, and had yielded Obedience unto him according to the Instructions and Orders receiv'd from their aforesaid Commander. That they now were desirous to return again to Annibal; but since their Journey was not like to be with safety to their persons, the Roman Forces being so frequent up and down all Sicily, they request'd they might be allow'd a Convoy as far as Locri in Italy, which small Courtessie Annibal would take very kindly, and be ready to reward the same with great thanks and favours whenever there should be an opportunity. Their Suit was easily obtain'd, for the Senate were very willing to be rid of several of the Kings Commanders, men skilful in Arms, but of desperate Fortunes, and withal extremely bold and ready to engage in any Villany; yet they did not hasten to put such their desires in execution so soon as they ought to have done: For these Embassadors delaying their departure, being them-

felves Martial young men, and very intimate with the Souldiery, sometimes to them, and sometimes amongst the Renegades (who for the most part were Roman Sea-men) and now and then to the Rabble and meanest sort of people, whisper'd lies and calumnies against the Senate and Noblemen, accusing them, That they secretly carried on a design, under colour of renewing the League to betray Syracuse into the hands of the Romans, that so their own Faction might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest.

By this means there flocked multitudes every day more than other to Syracuse, whose ears were tickled with these stories, and apt enough to give credit thereunto, and consequently gave not only Hippocrates and Epicides, but also Andronodorus too, good hopes of changing the Government, and effecting their several Designs. Andronodorus's Wife was perpetually baiting him, That now was the time to take upon him the Government whilst all things were in an hurry and kind of confusion by their new and yet unsettled Liberty, whilst the Souldiers were at hand to assist him, daily maintain'd and fed out of the Kings Exchequer, and whilst these Captains sent from Annibal were here, who by their acquaintance with the Souldiers, might not a little assist and promote his Interest. Overcome with her importunities, what had hitherto been concerted only between him and Themistius (that married Gelo's Daughter) he soon after unadvisedly communicated to one Aristo an Actor of Tragedies, whom he was wont to intrust with other Secrets. This Aristo was both well descended, and a man of a good Estate, nor did his Profession scandalize him, (for amongst the Greeks no such thing is matter of dishonour) who preferring his Duty to his Country before private Friendship, discovers the business to the Prætors; who finding by several good Evidences, that the matter was no forged Information, having consulted some of the most ancient Senators, by their Authority planted a Guard at the door, and as soon as Themistius and Andronodorus came into the Court, slew them; and when there began some uproar upon this Fact, which seem'd horrible to those that were ignorant of the Cause, they commanded silence, and brought forth the Discoverer into the open Court, where before them all he related in order the whole Conspiracy, That it took its rise from the Marriage of Harmonia, Gelo's Daughter, with Themistius. That divers Auxiliary Souldiers, both Africans and Spaniards, were prepared to murder the Prætors and other principal Citizens, whose Goods were promis'd as a reward to the Assassins. That there was a Band of mercenary Souldiers that had long been at the devotion of Andronodorus, appointed once more to seize the Isle, and so proceeded to set before their eyes all the whole Plot, by whom to be managed, what Forces to be employ'd, and all other Circumstances. On hearing of which the Senate was satisfied, That these men were no less justly put to death than Hieronymus: But abroad before the Senate-house door there was a mighty Clamour of the Multitude, not certainly knowing what the matter was; and though they twagger'd and threatened, yet at the sight of the dead Bodies of the Conspirators, when thrown out into the Lobby, they were affrighted and so hush'd, that in great silence they followed the whole Body of the Commons to the Common Hall, where Sopater by Order of the Senate and his Fellow-Prætors made a Speech unto them.

He began with Invectives against Andronodorus and Themistius, as if he had been accusing them at the Bar; and ripp'd up all their past life, charging them with all the Injustice, Oppressions, Impieties and Villanies that had been acted ever since the Decease of King Hiero: For alas! (quoth he) what did Hieronymus do of his own accord? Or indeed what could he do, being but yet a Child? It was his Officers, and these his Tutors that ruled all, and managed the Kingdom at their pleasure, but laid all the envy and the blame upon him; and therefore they well deserved to have perish'd either before Hieronymus, or at least together with him: But though themselves then well deserved to have been cut to pieces, yet nothing deterr'd with his punishment, they afterwards became more active to hatch and contrive new mischiefs, first openly, whilst Andronodorus shut up the Gates of the Island, and pretended to usurp the Kingdom, as if it were his Inheritance, and what he was intrusted with during the Princes Nonage, would have held in his own Right; but being deserted by those in the Isle, and besieged by the whole City, who had possession of the Acradine, seeing he could not get the Kingdom by open Force, endeavours to obtain it by Address and Treachery: Nor could he by any obligations of Honour or Advantage be diverted from this horrid Design, even although he was nominated a Prætor amongst the Restorers of our Liberties, at the same time when he plotting to subvert and betray them; but no wonder these men had such haughty Spirits and longed to be Kings, since they had married into the Royal Stock a couple of Princely Dames, one the Daughter of King Hiero, and the other of his Son Gelo, and own Sister to the late Tyrant. At this word the whole Multitude on every side set up an out-cry, That neither of them ought to live, nor one of the Kings Lineage be left on the face of the Earth. Behold! the right natural disposition of the Rabble, they either servilely truckle, or insolently domineer; and as for Liberty which is the mean between those extremes, they can neither endure to be without it with patience, nor enjoy it with discretion; and commonly there want not some who for private ends of their own, add fuel to such popular Combinations, and irritate people to blood and slaughter when they see them already too much set upon such disorders; As here the Prætors put it to the Vote, and it was carried almost sooner than it could be heard, That all that were of the Royal Family should be put to death. In pursuance of which, certain Officers were sent by the Prætors, who immediately dispatcht

Demarata

Demarata and Harmonia, Daughters of Hiero and Gelo, and Wives of Andronodorus and Themistius.

XXVI. There was another Daughter of Hiero, named Heraclea, the Wife of Zoippus, who having been sent as Embassadour by Hieronimus to King Ptolemy, chose to continue there in voluntary Exile; This Lady understanding that the Murtherers were coming to her, fled with two young Virgins her Daughters into a private Oratory to their Household Gods, with their hair about their Ears, and in wretched habit, the more to move compassion; To which, when they came within sight, she added the most affecting Entreaties that could be used; Beseeching them by the dear memory of her Father Hiero, and Brother Gelo, that she altogether innocent might not suffer for the hatred that Hieronymus had justly contracted; As for me (quoth she) I got nothing by his Reign, but the banishment of my Husband, and as during the life of Hieronymus my Fortune was not like my Sisters, so since his Death is not my Cause the same; If Andronodorus had succeeded in his designs, she was to have been a Queen, but I still a Subject and Servant with the rest. Should any one tell Zoippus that Hieronymus was slain, and Syracuse set free, there is no doubt but he would presently get on board to return into his Country, but how strangely do mens hopes deceive them! Little does he think, whilst his Country is set free, his own Wife and Children are in danger of their Lives; wherein do we hinder the common Liberty, or the Course of the Laws? What danger can any person imagine to himself from me living alone as a Widow, or from two poor Girls little better than Orphans? If it be said 'tis not for any harm they apprehend we can do them, but because all the late Kings Kindred are odious to the people, Let us then be banisht far enough from Syracuse and Sicily, and sent to Alexandria, I to my Husband, my Children to their Father. But finding them deaf to her Prayers, and averse to all compassion, that she might not spend time in vain (for already she saw some of them drawing their Swords) she gave over all Entreaties for her self, and only begg'd them to spare her Daughters, whose Age and Sex, even Enemies in the heat of War were wont to pity and forbear, and that whilst they were taking vengeance on Tyrants, they would not commit the greatest Tyranny in the World, and imitate those Cruelties which they pretended to punish. Whilst she was thus speaking they pull'd her out from the inner part of the Chappel and cut her Throat, and then fell upon the Girls besprinkled with their Mothers blood, who being out of their senses, what with grief, and what with fear, like people quite distracted, ran out of the Room, and if they could have got into the street had undoubtedly set all the City in an uproar; and though the House was not large, yet for a good while they shifted for themselves, and escaped the hands of so many armed men, until at last having received abundance of Wounds, and fill'd every place with Blood, they fainted and expired; which murther, though of it self very sad and pitteous to behold, was rendred yet more lamentable by an accident, for immediately came an Express from the Magistrates, whose minds on second thoughts were inclin'd to more merciful proceedings, to spare these Ladies and not kill them. But when the people found they had so precipitated the Execution, that there was no room for Repentance and milder thoughts, their pity turn'd into rage and fury, and the multitude began to murmur and mutter, and call for an Election of Prætors in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius (for they were both Prætors) which new choice was not like to be to the content of those already in being.

XXVII. At the day appointed for that purpose, it happen'd, that beyond all mens expectations, some body at the farther end of the Croud, nominated Epicides, and another by and by Hippocrates, and straight the Votes came thick and threefold for these two, so that it plainly appear'd they would carry it; For indeed it was a confused kind of Assembly, consisting not only of Citizens, but Souldiers and Fugitives mingled amongst them, who were all for an alteration; the Prætors at first seem'd to take no notice on't, and then would have adjourn'd the Choice to another day, but at last over-born with the consent and common cry of the people, were forc'd to declare the two Gentlemen beforenamed to be Prætors. Nor did they presently discover what they would be at, although they were vext, both that Agents were sent to App. Claudius to desire ten days Truce; and when that was granted, other Embassadours to treat about renewing the antient League. The said Claudius the Roman Admiral at that time lay at Murgantia, with a Fleet of an hundred Sail, waiting what the event might be of these new stirs in Sicily, upon their killing the Tyrant, and what measures they would take in this unwonted Liberty; and to gain time he had order'd their Embassadours to attend Marcellus the Consul, who was now coming into Sicily, who having heard the terms by them propos'd, hoping the matter in time might be brought to an accommodation, dispatcht Embassadours of his own to Syracuse to treat with the Prætors in person; but there they found all things in an hurly-burly, for upon the news of the Carthaginian Navy's being arriv'd in the Bay of Pachynus, Hippocrates and Epicides, confidently and without all fear, buzz'd into the Ears of the mercenary Souldiers and Renegades, that Syracuse was betray'd to the Romans, but when Appius brought his Ships to an Anchor in the mouth of the Haven, listning to know what heart the contrary Faction were in that favour'd the Romans, those vain but specious rumours were much more credited than before, inso much that at first the multitude ran down tumultuously to keep them off from Landing.

In

In this disturbance it was thought fit to summon the People to a general Assembly, where one being for one side, and another for the contrary, they were like to fall together by the ears amongst themselves, till Apollonides a Person of the first Quality, made a very wholesome and seasonable Speech to this purpose; That never was there any City so near beset with hopes of Safety, and fears of undoubted Ruine; whereas if they would but be all of a mind, and join either with the Romans or with the Carthaginians, no City could be more fortunate and secure; but if they continued thus distracted, some for one, some for another, the Wars between the Punicks and Romans would not be more fierce, than the feuds shortly between the Syracusians themselves, where within the same Walls each Party are like to have their Forces and their Arms and their distinct Leaders and Captains; Therefore the great business was to bring all to be of the same mind, and unanimously close with one of these potent Nations, for which of them it was best to accept of, was a consideration nothing so important, though yet he did conceive in making choice of Allies, it would be better to follow the Authority of Hiero than of Hieronymus, and safer to prefer a Friendship, which they had happily tryed for fifty years, before that which at present was unknown, and heretofore had proved unfaithful: That moreover it was a thing not a little to be regarded in this Debate, That they might with fair words so decline, making a Peace with the Carthaginians, that yet they need not presently be at Wars with them, whereas they must immediately conclude a Peace with the Romans, or make ready to fight them. This Speech carried with it the more authority, in that it seemed not at all to proceed from self-interest or Faction. Besides the Advice of the Prætors and Senate, the Martial men and chief Commanders were consulted with upon this Affair; and after it had been long bandied to and fro with great heats and earnestness, finding themselves not in a posture able to wage War with the Romans, they thought it best to make Peace with them, and sent Embassadours to ratifie the same.

Not many days after, the Leontines sent to desire a Garrison, which seemed a good opportunity to discharge Syracuse of her tumultuous Souldiery, and dispatch their factious Leaders thither out of the way; Hippocrates the Prætor was commanded to march thither with the Renegades, and so many of the mercenary Auxiliaries followed him, as made up four thousand men. This Expedition was very pleasing both to the Senders and those sent; for hereby the latter thought they should have the opportunity which they had long desired, to make some Insurrection, and the former reckon'd they had purged their City of a dangerous mass of ill humours: But, like Empericks, they had only given ease for the present to the sick body of the State, which soon after relapsed into a more dangerous distemper; for Hippocrates first began to make Inroads by stealth into the Borders of the Roman Province, and afterwards when Appius had sent a Garrison to secure his Allies, fell upon that Guard with all his Forces, and kill'd many of them. Of which Marcellus having Advice, presently dispatch'd Envoys to Syracuse to expostulate upon this violation of the League, and roundly to tell them, That there would never be wanting some occasions or other of quarrel, until Hippocrates and Epicides were not only remov'd from Syracuse, but banish'd Sicily. Epicides also fearing, lest if he staid, he might be question'd for his Brothers Crime; or that he might not be wanting for his own part in stirring up a new War, got away into the Leontines Country, and finding them forward enough against the Romans, blew the coals, and alienated their affections from the Syracusians, by suggesting, That they had capitulated in their League with the Romans, That all those Nations and People that had been under the Kings, should still remain under the Dominion of their State; so that they were not now content with their own liberty, but would needs be domineering over others; Therefore it was but fit to send them word that the Leontines thought it reasonable to enjoy their own freedoms, both in regard the Tyrant was cut off within their City, and that the first Cry for Liberty began there, and thence proceeded to Syracuse; Therefore that Clause ought to be expunged the League, or a Peace not at all to be accepted on such Conditions. The Mobile was easily perswaded, so that when Commissioners from Syracuse complain'd to them of the killing the Roman Guard, and also commanded Hippocrates and Epicides to be gone either to Locri, or where else they pleas'd, so they left Sicily: A stout Answer was return'd, That they neither gave the Syracusians Commission to treat with the Romans in their Names, nor did they think themselves oblig'd by Leagues of other peoples making. The Syracusians gave the Romans an Account hereof, and disown'd the Leontines to be their Subjects; therefore notwithstanding the League, the Romans might carve out their own satisfaction upon them, and they would assist them in the War, provided when they were reduc'd, they might be under their Government, according to the Articles of the Peace.

Marcellus advanc'd with his whole Army against the Leontines, sending also for Appius to fall upon them on the other side, and so enrag'd were the Souldiers for their Comrades being basely kill'd on the Guard whilst they were on Terms of Peace, that at the first Attack they made themselves Masters of the City. Hippocrates and Epicides seeing the Walls mounted and the Gates broke open, betook themselves with some few others to the Fort, and from thence in the night escap'd to Herbesus. The Syracusians who march'd out from home eight thousand strong, being come as far as the River Myla, met a Messenger who acquainted them, That the City was taken; but mixing several Lyes with that Truth, added, That Souldiers and Inhabitants were promiscuously put to the Sword, and he believ'd there was not one of any competent years left alive, That the City was plunder'd and the Estates of all the Rich men men given away. At this grievous News the Army made an Halt, and being much troubled, the Generals (who were Sofis and Dinomenes) call'd a Council of War to consider what was to be done: That which gave this false story some colour, was the Execution of Renegades, for there were scourged and beheaded near two thousand Engitives retaken in that City, but none either of the Inhabitants or Souldiers had any violence offer'd them after once the City was taken, but had all their Goods restored, except what were destroy'd in the first Assault; However upon this bare report the Syracusan Army loudly exclaiming, that their Fellow-Souldiers were betray'd to slaughter and destruction, could neither be induced to go forwards to the Leontines, nor stay there where they were, till more certain Intelligence should arrive. The Prætors seeing them ready to mutiny, yet hoping the fit would not hold long, if once the Ring-Leaders of their fury were remov'd, march'd the Army to Megara; Themselves with a small Party of Horse went to Herbessus, hoping to have surpriz'd that Town whilst they were yet in a Consternation, but missing their Expectations therein, resolv'd to attacke it by force, and therefore next day brought their whole Army towards it; Hippocrates and Epicides thought it not so much the safest, as the only way they had left at present to cast themselves upon the Souldiers, as being both their old Acquaintance, and now discontented on the news of the slaughter of their Comrades, so out they go to meet them, there happen'd to be six hundred Cretans in the Van, who had serv'd under Hieronymus, and being formerly taken amongst other Roman Auxiliaries at Thasymenus, were by Annibals kindness releas'd; Hippocrates and Epicides knowing them both by their Colours and Armour, held out Olive-Branches and other tokens of Suppliants, entreating them, to entertain and protect them, and not to betray them to the Syracusians, who would presently deliver them up to be butcher'd by the Romans; The Cretans with one accord cry'd out, That they should be of good cheer, for they should fare no worse than themselves.

XXXI. Whilst these Conferences pass'd, the Standards stood still, and thereby the Army behind was stop't in their march, but the Generals did not yet know the reason of it; by and by, it being reported that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and a bustle through the whole Army, plainly shewing that they were not unwelcome, the Prætors gallop'd up to the foremost Standards, crying out, What fashion's this? How dare these Cretans be so bold as to parley with Enemies, and entertain them without the Prætors leave? and withal commanded Hippocrates to be seiz'd and put in Chains; but at that word, there was such a Clamour begun, first by the Cretans, but taken from them and continued by others, that it plainly appear'd the Prætors themselves would be in danger, if they persisted therein, therefore in great perplexity, and scarce knowing what to do, they commanded the Standards to be turn'd and march back to Megara from whence they came, and thence dispatcht Messengers to Syracuse to signify in what terms they stood. Hippocrates finding the Souldiers given to suspitions, and apt to believe any thing, that he might the more enflame them, after he had sent out some to beset the road between them and Syracuse, pretended they had intercepted certain Letters, which he publicly read, being indeed forg'd by himself; in the terms following. The Prætors of Syracuse to their Friend Marcellus the Consul greeting, &c. You have done well, and pursuant to our Order, in sparing none of the Leontines. But all other mercenary Souldiers are equally dangerous to our state, nor will Syracuse ever enjoy a settled Peace, as long as we have any Foreign Auxiliaries either in our City or Army, therefore our advice and desire is that you would use your endeavours to get into your power those who are now Encamp'd with the Prætors at Megara, and by cutting them off compleat the freedom of Syracuse; Upon reading of this, there was such an Outcry, and every one catching up his Arms, that the Prætors were glad to ride away with all the speed they could to Syracuse, nor was the Mutiny appeas'd by their absence, but they had fallen upon the Syracusan Souldiers, and not left one of them alive, if Epicides and Hippocrates had not stop't the fury of the multitude, not so much out of their own merciful inclinations, or regard to common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves off from all hopes of return, and thereby might both oblige the Souldiers to be faithful to them, and keep them as Hostages, and besides gain the favour of all their Relations and Friends. The Experience they had, how easily the Rabble were to be turn'd any way, made them fear lest their heats should be abated, if the false news from Leontinum were not kept up, and therefore they suborn a Souldier of that Garrison, to go to Syracuse and second the story just as it was told at Myla, and to aver the same confidently upon his own knowledge, as being what he himself had seen, and thereby excite the people to further indignation.

XXXII. This stratagem prevail'd not only upon the common people, but being brought into Court he told his Tale with that assurance, that some persons of good Quality believ'd it, and said, 'Twas well the Avarice and Cruelty of the Romans was thus timely discovered amongst the Leontines; for had they got into Syracuse they would have committed the like outrages, or rather much worse, since there was a greater booty for their rapine; Therefore they resolv'd to shut up all the Gates, and stand upon their Guard; But neither did all their fears proceed from the same grounds, nor was their hatred bent against the same persons; The Souldiers of Fortune, and a great part of the Commons could not endure the very name of the Romans; but the Prætors and some few of the Nobles, thoughterrified with this false Intelligence, yet were were most intent to obviate a mischief more near and imminent; for by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before that Quarter of the City call'd Hexapylus, and within the Town the Kindred of those that were in the Army, began to hold Conferences about opening the Gates to them, and suffer their common Country to be defend'd with their joint Forces against the Romans; but just as the Wicket was open'd and they were ready to enter, the Prætors came thither, and first commanded and threatned, then endeavour'd by their Authority to terrify them, but seeing it was all in vain, at last laying aside the majesty of their places, they descend'd so far as to pray and beseech them, not to betray their Country to those who formerly were the Instruments and upholders of the late Tyrant, and now made it their business to seduce and debauch the Army; but so deaf was the Mobile to all remonstrances of reason, That they within were as violent to break open the Gates as those without, and so the whole Army, without any opposition, was admitted within the Hexapylus; whilst the Prætors with the principal youth fled for refuge into the Acradine; the mercenary Souldiers, Fugitives and what Forces of the late Kings, were left in Syracuse, join'd with this new few that in the tumult made their escape, nor did the Massacre cease till night put a period to it; next day all Bondslaves were made free, the Gaols broke open, and Prisoners and Malefactors set at large, and by this confus'd Rabble Hippocrates and Epicides were declared Prætors: Thus Syracuse after a short Glimpse of Liberty, precipitated it self into a worse slavery than before.

The Romans upon advice of these transactions, marcht presently towards Syracuse; To which City Appius had much about the same time sent Embassadors by Sea in a Galley of five Rows of Oars, but another smaller Galley that attended them, was no sooner entred the mouth of the Haven, but it was assaulted and taken, and the Embassadors themselves had much ado to escape; so that now not only the Civilities of Peace, but even the Laws of War were violated; The Roman Army Encamp'd at Olympium the Temple of Jupiter about a Mile and an half from the City; and from thence too, it was thought meet to send some Embassadors before they proceeded to Hostility, but to prevent their coming into the City, Hippocrates and Epicides went forth to meet them without the Gate; The Roman Agents told them, They came not to assault the Syracusians, but to assist and succour as well those, who having escap'd out of the midst of the slaughter, were repair'd to the Roman Camp for shelter; as the rest, who being yet kept under by fear, endure a thralldom more miserable than banishment, or even death it self; Nor could the Romans tamely suffer these Butcheries to be committed on their Allies; Therefore if those persons that had fled to them for Sanctuary, might with safety return to their Country, and the Murderers be delivered up to Justice, and the Syracusians Laws and Liberties restored, there would be no need of Arms; but otherwise they would prosecute with the highest severity all that should go about to hinder these just demands; Epicides replied, That if they had any Message to himself and his Brother, they should have given them such Answer as they thought fit, but in the mean time they were best be gone, and return again when the Government of Syracuse should be in their hands, to whom they were sent; And as for War, if the Romans were resolv'd to take that course they would find a vast difference between the subduing of Leontinum, and the Mastering of Syracuse. And so left the Embassadors, shutting the Gates against them. Thenceforwards the City Syracuse was beleaguerr'd and assaulted, both on the Landside at Hexapylus, and by Sea towards the Acradine, whose Walls are wash't with the Tide; and not doubting but as they storm'd Leontinum at the first approach, so this being a City so vast and scatteringly built, they should on one part or other, force their Entrance, they brought up all their Engines of Battery against the Walls.

Which fierce Attacque had probably succeeded had it not been for one man that was then in Syracuse; This was Archimedes an excellent Astronomer, but more famous for framing of wonderful Engines of War, whereby he easily frustrated all the tedious preparations of the Enemy; for on the Curteen of the Wall, which stood on several unequal Hills, in some places high and difficult of access, and elsewhere lower and easy to come at, he had planted Engines of all sorts, as for each was most proper and necessary. The Wall of the Acradine standing as aforesaid just by the Sea side, was batter'd from Marcellus's Gallies, and from the rest of his Ships the Archers, Slingers, and light-arm'd Darters, (whose Javelins were of that fashion, that they could not easily be lanc'd back again by such as were not us'd to them) plaid so thick and fast that scarce a man could appear upon the Wall but he was either kill'd or wounded; These Vessels lay at some distance that they might have convenient room to Dart their Weapons, but to every great Galley there were two smaller ones join'd, with their Oars within taken away, that they might close Larbord to Starbord, and so coupled together and row'd as one intire Vessel by the outermost Oars, they carried lofty Piles of Timber built with Bords several stories high, and divers other Fabricks to shock the Walls; against which Naval preparations Archimedes planted Counter-Engines of several sizes all along the Wall; From which he could hurl vast great stones at the Vessels that lay farthest off, and pelted those nearer hand with smaller but more frequent showres of such like Artillery; And at last that his people might incommode the Enemy without exposing themselves to danger, he caused Loop-holes to be made through the Wall, almost from the bottom to the top, out at which holes some shot Arrows, and others flung small Scorpions: As for the Gallies that came nearer, to get under the Wall, and consequently out of the reach of that kind of shot, he contrived a kind of a Crane to be planted aloft upon the Wall, having at the one end, that hung over the Sea, a sharp Drag or Grappling-hook of Iron like an hand or Crows bill fastned thereunto with a strong Chain, which would take hold of the Prow of a Galley, and then with an heavy Counterpoise of Lead at the other end, lift it up in the Air, so that the Vessel should stand as it were an-end on the Poop, and then letting the Machine go again with a mighty swing, it would dash it down into the Sea (to the unpeackable consternation of the Mariners) as if the Galley had fain from the top of the Wall, and though it descended not side-long, but should happen to come down with a direct Keel, yet 'twas sure to be fill'd with water and sunk. Thus their attempts by Sea were defeated, and now they turn'd their whole Force to attacque it by Land, but on that part too it was extraordinarily fortified with Machines of all sorts, provided for many years together by the care and charges of Hiero, but framed by the singular Art of Archimedes. Besides, the natural situation of the ground was a great help; the Rock on which the Wall was built, being in most places so steep, that not only the shot level'd out of an Engine, but any thing only tumbled down with its own very poise, came with great force upon the Enemy, who had difficult climbing up, and no certain foot-hold. At last a Council of War being call'd, finding all their attempts thus eluded by the Enemy, they resolv'd to desist from storming and battering, and only continue a Blockade upon the City both by Sea and Land, and so starve them out.

XXXV. In the mean time Marcellus went with part of the Forces to reduce those Cities, which during these disturbances had fain off to the Carthaginians. Pelorus and Herbesus surrendred of their own accord; Megara he took by storm, plunder'd and utterly destroy'd it for a terror to the rest, especially those of Syracuse. About the same time Himilco, who had long lain at the Cape Pachynus with a Fleet, landed twenty five thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants at Heraclea, which they call Minoa. Not that he had so many on Board before at Pachynus, but after Hippocrates had seiz'd Syracuse, he went to Carthage, where being seconded both with Messengers from Hippocrates and Letters from Annibal, affirming, That now was the only time to recover Sicily with the greatest Honour imaginable, and being himself present in person, no ill Orator to promote the business, he got them to transport these Forces in all speed to Sicily; soon after his Arrival he took Agrigentum, and the other Cities that took part with the Carthaginians, were so flusht with hopes of expelling the Romans out of the Island, that even the besieged Syracusians took heart, and thought they could defend the Town well enough with part of their Forces, and so divided themselves, Epicides to guard the City, and Hippocrates to join Himilco, and carry on the War against the Roman Consul; In order thereto one night he march'd out with ten thousand Foot and five hundred Horse, and pass'd unperceiv'd between the Roman Guards at places where no Sentinels were set, and encamp'd near the Town Acerre. Marcellus had march'd in great haste, hoping to have got to Agrigentum before the Enemy; but failing therein, was now coming back that way, not in the least dreaming to meet an Army of Syracusians, however for fear of Himilco and his Carthaginians (who were superiour to him in numbers) he march'd very warily and in good order to encounter any sudden accident.

XXXVI. This care and diligence against the Punicks turn'd to good account against these Syracusians: For coming upon them as they were pitching their Tents and out of Array and for the most part unarm'd, the Foot were hemm'd in and cut to pieces, the Horse after a small Skirmish fled with Hippocrates to Aere. This Defeat having somewhat restrain'd the Sicilians that before were all for revolting from the Romans, Marcellus return'd to Syracuse, and within few days Himilco having join'd Hippocrates, encamp'd about eight miles from thence upon the River Anatis. About the same time there arriv'd in the great Port of Syracuse Admiral Bomilcar with a Fleet of fifty five Sail from Carthage, and the Roman Navy consisting of thirty Sail, put on shore the first Legion at Panormus, so that now the War seem'd diverted from Italy, and both Nations intent only upon the gaining of Sicily. This Roman Legion Himilco doubted not but to intercept in their passage to Syracuse, but he mistook the way, marching high up in the Land, whilst they went along the shore, the Navy sailing by them all the way, and so came to Pachynus where App. Clandius met them with part of his Souldiers. Nor did the Carthaginian Fleet continue at Syracuse; for Bomilcar neither thought himself able to engage the Romans at Sea, nor could do his Friends any good, but rather impoverish them and waste their Provisions, therefore he hoisted Sail back again for Africk. And Himilco having dogg'd Marcellus as far as Syracuse, hoping to have met with some advantage to have fought him before he had join'd the rest of his Forces, finding no such opportunity, and that before Syracuse the Enemy was too strong both by their Works and their Numbers, that he might not vainly spend time in looking upon his besieged Friends whom he could not help, he march'd thence to see what places he could by his presence or Force, withdraw from the Roman Obedience, and first of all he was receiv'd at Marguntia, whose Inhabitants betray'd the Roman Garrison, there he got abundance of Provisions of all sorts stor'd up by the Romans.

This

This encourag'd other Towns to the like Revolt, and the Roman Garrisons were every where driven out by Force, or circumvented and cut off by Fraud. The City Enna situate on a Hill every way very steep, was not only impregnable by Nature, but secur'd by a strong Garrison under a Captain not easie to be wheedled, viz. L. Pinarus a sharp man, and one who confided more in his own caution, than the Sicilians fidelity, especially since he was now every day alarm'd with so many treacherous pranks play'd round about him. Therefore night and day he kept strict Guards and Watches, his Souldiers were always in Arms, nor durst any depart from his Post, which the chief Burghers perceiving, (who already had bargain'd with Himilco to betray the Garrison) they thought it best to play above board, and by open means effect their design; they therefore tell the Governour, That both the City and Castle ought to be in their own hands and disposal, since they entred into League with the Romans as Freemen, and yielded up themselves not as Slaves and Vassals to be kept under, per duress, and as it were in a prison; therefore they thought it but just and fit, that the Keys of the Gates should be restor'd unto them. Amongst good Allies there is no greater obligation than their own fidelity, and the People and Senate of Rome would no doubt have the greater kindness for them when they should see them continue firm and steadfast to their Friendship, not by constraint, but of their own free inclinations. The Governour answers, That he was placed there in Garrison by his General, and from him receiv'd both the Keys of the Gates and the Custody of the Castle, and held the same neither at his own disposal, nor at the pleasure of the Enneans, but of his who committed them unto him. That for a Captain to quit his Post, was amongst the Romans punish'd with certain death, wherein their Ancestors had been so strict, as even Parents had not spared their own Children when guilty therein. And seeing the Consul Marcellus was but hard by, they might if they pleas'd send to him about it, who only had the proper Right and Authority to gratifie them in this matter. They flatly told him, That they would not stand sending after Marcellus, but if fair words would not prevail, were resolv'd to take other measures to redeem their Liberties. Pinarus replied, If you think much to address your Messengers to the Consul, yet do me this favour as to call a Common Hall for my satisfaction, that I may know whether these Demands proceed only from some few mens humours, or be the sentiments of the whole body of the City. Which they granted, and appointed a general Assembly on the morrow.

Alloon as he parted from them, and was got into the Castle, he calls a Council of War, and thus harangues them; I believe, Fellow-Souldiers, you have heard in how miserable a manner the Roman Garrisons abroad are of late betray'd and destroy'd by these Sicilians; which Treachery you have hitherto avoided, first and principally through the goodness of the Gods, and in the next place by your own Valour and vigilance in standing night and day to your Arms; and I wish we might as well pass the time that is to come, without either suffering or acting any horrible violence. We must still exercise the same Caution as we have done hitherto, against their secret fraud, which because it has not yet succeeded, they now openly and publicly demand the Keys of the Gates, which we shall no sooner surrender, but the Carthaginians will be Masters of Enna, and we shall be more basely butcher'd than the Garrison at Murguntia. 'Twas not without difficulty that I obtained this one nights respite to consider on't, that I might advertize you of this imminent danger. To morrow morning they purpose to hold a solemn Assembly, where no doubt there will be Speeches to render me odious, and heat the people against you. To morrow is the day that the streets of Enna will be overflowed either with your blood or that of the Inhabitants. And as you shall certainly lose all you have, if they surprize you; so if you prevent them and strike first, you avoid all danger: That Party that first draw their Swords will be sure of the Victory. Therefore be all ready in your Arms, and watch for the signal; I will be amongst them in the Town-Hall, and spin out time with arguing and debating till all things are ripe, and when I give you such a sign with my Gown, then do you all round about me set up a shout and fall upon the Crowd, kill all you meet, and be sure let not one escape, from whom you may fear any harm either by fraud or force. And you, O Goddesses, Dame Ceres and your Daughter Proserpina, and all other superiour and Infernal Deities, that inhabit this City, these holy Lakes and consecrated Groves, vouchsafe to be so and not otherwise propitious to us and favour us in this Enterprize, as we enter into it enforced, and meerly to avoid being betray'd our selves, and not with any premeditated design to betray others. I would use more words to encourage you, Fellow-Souldiers, if you were to deal with men in Arms, but since they will be both unwarn'd and unarm'd, you may without any hazard kill them till you are weary: Nor need you fear any thing from Himilco and his Carthaginians, since your own Consul lies encamp'd so near to protect you. Then were they dismiss'd to refresh and rest themselves, that they might be ready for the Design.

The next day they were planted in several parts of the City, some to beset the chief streets, others to stop the ways and avenues, that the Townsmen might not escape; but most of them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were not at all suspected, because they were wont so to do. The Roman Captain was by the Magistrates presented to the People, to whom he alledg'd, That the matter lay not in his power, but was altogether at the pleasure of the Council, and used the same Arguments as he had done the day before. At first they began gently here and there to demand the Keys, one, by and by more, and at last all together with one Voice they commanded him to deliver them, and when he delay'd to do it, threatned him fiercely, and were just ready to proceed to the extremity of violence, when he gave the signal with his Gown according to agreement, upon which, the Souldiers who had a good while watcht for it, immediately set up a shout, and with their drawn Swords ran down upon the multitude that stood before them, others seize the passages and stop them from getting out. Thus the men of Enna, shut up as it were in a Pound, were cut to pieces, and lay tumbled one upon another, not only with the slaughter but also by endeavouring to fly, some running over others heads, and the sound falling upon the wounded, and the quick upon the dead, all in heaps one amongst the other. Then was there running to and fro every way, just as if the Town had been taken by storm, and nothing but murdering and flying away in all places, the Souldiers being no less furious in the Execution of this unarm'd multitude (whom they thought they had just provocation to slay) than if they had been engaged in the heat of a Battel. By this exploit whether we shall call it evil or necessary, the City Enna was retain'd in the Romans possession; and so far was Marcellus from disallowing the Act, that he bestow'd the Goods of the Inhabitants amongst the Souldiers, thinking by this Example to terrify the Sicilians from betraying any more Roman Garrisons. But it fell out quite contrary, for as the noise hereof was almost in one days time spread throughout all Sicily, as being a City not only situate near the middle of the Isle, but renowned for the strength of its situation, and also accounted as it were sacred, in reverence to Proserpina, who there in days of old had left the prints of her Divine Feet when she was stoln away and raviht by Pluto, so it being therefore generally thought that this detestable Massacre had polluted the Seat of the Gods, as well as the Habitations of men, even those of the Sicilians that stood Neuters before, now turn'd from the Romans and sided with the Carthaginians. After this Hippocrates retreated to Murgantia, and Hamilco to Agrigentum, having both before drawn their Forces towards Enna, upon the Invitation of those that should have betray'd it. Marcellus also drew back into the Leontines County, and having furnisht his Camp with Corn and other necessaries, and left there a competent Guard, return'd to the Siege of Syracuse, whence he dispatcht App. Claudius to Rome, he being one of the Candidates for the Consulship; and in his room made T. Quintus Crispinus Admiral of the Fleet, and Commander in Chief of the old Leaguer, whilst he himself built and fortified Winter-Quarters five miles from Hexapylus, at a place they call Leon. Thus went affairs of Sicily till the beginning of Winter.

XL. The same Summer the War which before was suspected broke out with King Philip; For M. Valerius the Prætor Admiral of the Fleet that lay at Brundisium for defence of the Coasts of Calabria, receiv'd intelligence by an Express from Oric, That Philip having first attempted the City Apollonia, and to that purpose tow'd up one hundred and twenty Gallies against the stream, finding that would take up too much time, marcht away privately by night to Oric, which being a City situate on a Plain, and nothing strong either in Walls, or Forces, or Arms, at the first onset he made himself Master thereof; and therefore the Inhabitants desir'd Valerius to assist them, and make head against this undoubted Enemy of the Romans, either by Land, or Forces at Sea, and to drive him away from them, who for no other reason were assaulted, but because they were near Neighbours to Italy, and lay in his way thither. M. Valerius, leaving the Guard of Brundisium to T. Valerius his Lieutenant, puts to Sea with a stout Fleet, those Souldiers that could not conveniently be bestow'd in the men of War, being put aboard some Merchant Ships of Burthen, and on the second day arriv'd at Oric, and easily recover'd that City from a small Garrison which Philip had left there. Thither repair'd to him Agents from Apollonia, shewing, How they were under a Siege because they would not revolt from the Romans, nor were they able much longer to bear up against the Macedonian Force, unless a Roman Garrison were sent them. Which he promised them, and in order thereunto dispatcht two thousand choice men to the mouth of the River that runs from thence, under the Command of Q. Nevius Crissa, a diligent man and excellent Souldier, who having Landed his men, and sent back his Ships to Oric, march'd at a great distance from the River, by a way not at all guarded by the Kings Forces, and so in the night got into the City without being perceiv'd; The next day he rested his men, and spent his own time in mustering the youth of the City, and surveying their Arms and the strength of the place; with which being well satisfied and encouraged, and withal inform'd by his Scouts how secure and negligent the Enemy was, he makes a Sally in the dead of the night, and with a still march entred the Enemies Camp, who lay so naked and horrible careless, that 'tis certain above a thousand of his men were got over their Rampier, before one of them took the Alarm, and if they had forborn falling upon them, they might have gone up to the Kings Tent before any notice taken; but the killing of some near the Ports awaken'd the Enemy, who were all in such a fright and consternation, that not a man took Arms to oppose them, nay the King himself as he started out of sleep, half naked, and in an habit scarce fit for a common Souldier, much less a Prince, fled to the River and got on board his Fleet; whither his people follow'd after him in heaps. There were well near three thousand in all taken and slain, but the greater number taken. The Camp was plundered, the Apollonians got all his Capults, Balists, and other Battering Engines, which they carried home to secure their own Walls whenever there should happen the like occasion; all the rest of the Booty fell to the share of the Roman Souldiers. As soon as news of this defeat came to to Oric, Valerius presently set Sail with his Fleet to the mouth of the River to prevent the Kings Escape by Sea; whereupon Philip distrustful his power on Sea as well as on shore to be too weak to cope with the Romans, sunk and burnt his Ships, and so march'd by Land to Macedonia, his Forces having lost all their Baggage and most part of their Arms; the Roman Navy continued all Winter with Valerius at Oric.

Variety of Action happen'd this year in Spain; for before the Romans could get over the River Iberus, Mago and Asdrubal had routed a mighty Host of Spaniards, so as all the further part of Spain had revolted, if P. Cornelius had not with great Expedition transported his Army, and seasonably come up to assure the minds of his wavering Allies. He first encamp'd at a place call'd High Castle, famous for the death of the great Amilcar. It was a place well fortified, and they had already stor'd up their Corn there; yet because it was in the midst of the Enemies Quarters, whose Cavalry had several times fallen upon the Roman Fort, and got off again clear. In which Incursions they had slain at least two thousand men, either loitering behind the rest, or carelessly straggling about the Country, it was thought fit to remove from thence into places more quiet and secure, and so encamped on Mount Vitoria; thither came Cn. Scipio with all his Forces, and also Asdrubal the Son of Gisco, (the third in renown and quality of all the Punic Generals) with a compleat Army; and both these sat down on the other side the River, over against the first mentioned Camp of the Romans. P. Scipio riding out with a few light Horse to take a view of the ground, the Enemy discover'd him, and in that open Champain Country had undoubtedly cut him off, but that he got to an Hill of advantage hard by, where he was encompass'd for some time, but by the coming up of his Brother with a Party to his Rescue, got off without much loss. Castulo a strong and noble City of Spain, and so strictly allied to the Carthaginians, that Anibal married his Wife from thence, did yet notwithstanding now quit their Party, and join with the Romans. The Carthaginians began to assault Illiturgis, where there lay a Roman Garrison, whom they hoped to master the sooner, because they understood they were already in great want of Provisions. Cn. Scipio to relieve his Confederates and his own Souldiers that were there, march'd with a Legion of Souldiers lightly arm'd, between the Enemies two Camps, skirmishing with them all the way not without great slaughter, and so entred the City, and the next day made a Sally no less fortunate: For in those two Conflicts he kill'd above twelve thousand of the Enemy, took more than ten thousand Prisoners with six and thirty Colours. Thus was the Siege of Illiturgis raised, and in the next place the Carthaginians laid Siege to Bigerra, which was also in Amity with the Romans; but Cn. Scipio advancing thither, they quitted the same without fighting.

After which the Punic Camp lying at Munda, the Romans followed hard at their heels, where they fought a pitch'd Battel for four hours space; but the Romans having much the better of the day, were on a sudden call'd off by a Retreat sounded, because Cn. Scipio was hurt in the Thigh with a barbed Javelin, and the Souldiers about him were in some disorder, fearing the wound was mortal. If that accident had not stopt them, 'tis certain they had that day taken the Enemies Camp; for they had already driven not only the Souldiers, but the Elephants too up to the French, and as they stood there as it were at Bay, no less than thirty nine Elephants were kill'd and wounded with Darts and Javelins. In this Battel likewise were kill'd by report twelve thousand, almost three thousand taken Prisoners, and fifty seven Colours won. The Enemy retreated from thence to the City Aurinx, and the Romans, to give them no breathing time after their late Overthrows, pursued hard after them. There again Scipio, though carried into the Field in an Horle-litter, fought them, and had the Victory clear, though not half so many of the Enemy kill'd as before, because there were not now so many left to fight. But being amongst a people naturally addicted to Wars, Mago sent forth by his Brother Asdrubal to make new Levies, soon recruited the Army, and then they had the heart to venture another Battel. As most of their men were thus new-raisd, and the rest such as had been so often cow'd before, so their success was according, eight thousand kill'd, not less than two thousand taken Prisoners, and fifty eight Colours, together with abundance of Gallick Spoils, Gold Rings, Chains and Bracelets, likewise two Princes of the Gauls, whose names were Menicapo and Civismaro, lost their lives in this Battel, eight Elephants taken and three kill'd. And now after all these successes in Spain, the Romans began to be aham'd, that they had suffer'd the City of Saguntum (the original Cause of the whole War) to remain now eight years in the Enemies hands; therefore having by Force beat out the Punic Garrison that was there, they recover'd the Town, and restor'd it to such of the Inhabitants as yet surviv'd the fury of the War: Also they reduc'd the Turdetanes who had revolted to the Carthaginians, and for Example sake, sold them for Slaves, and utterly destroy'd their City. These were the occurrences in Spain whilst Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Consuls.

At Rome no sooner were the new Tribunes of the Commons entred into their Office, but L. Metellus who was one of them, summon'd the Censors, P. Furius and M. Atilius, to answer before the People, for having the last year, when he was Treasurer, taken away his Horse of service allow'd by the State, degraded him of his Tribe, and depriv'd him of his Vote, for the Conspiracy he and others entred into at Canna about abandoning Italy: But the

the other nine Tribunes stop the prosecution, would not allow the Censors to be sued whilst they were in their Office, and so they were dismissed; soon after P. Furius died, by means whereof they could not complete the assessing and numbering of the people which they had began, and the other M. Atilius sung up his place. Q. Fabius Maximus the Consul held the Elections, and his Son of the same name, together with T. Sempronius Gracchus, the second time (both absent) were Created Consuls for the year ensuing. The Prætors were M. Atilius and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and M. Aemilius Lepidus, which three last were at the same time Ædiles of State, and that year exhibited first of all the solemn Stage-Plays, which continued for four days together. This Tuditanus the Ædile was he, who after the Defeat at Cannæ, when all the rest were astonished with fear, bravely broke through the midst of the Enemy. The Elections being finished Q. Fabius the Father sent for the Consuls Elect to Rome to take upon them their Office, and consult the Senate touching the War, and where each of them and the Prætors should act, and what Forces they should have to Command; Accordingly the Provinces and Armies were divided amongst them.

XLIV. The War with Annibal in all places was committed to the Consuls with one Army which Sempronius himself had already under his Command, and another that then belong'd to old Fabius, consisting of two Legions apiece. M. Aemilius the Prætor whose Lot it was to have Jurisdiction over the Foreigners, assign'd over that civil Charge to his Brother Atilius the City Prætor, that he might the better attend his Province of Luceria, where he was to have the Conduct of those two Legions that serv'd under the now Consul Q. Fabius when he was Prætor. To T. Sempronius the Prætor was appointed the Government of Ariminum; to Cn. Fulvius that of Suessula, each with two Legions, viz. the latter to have those of the City, and the former to receive those that had been under M. Pomponius; the Foreign Provinces were continued in the same hands. M. Claudius over so much of Sicily as had been under King Hiero, and Lentulus the Pro-Prætor over the rest, and T. Otacilius to remain Admiral without any new recruits; M. Valerius was to look after Greece and Macedonia with the same Legion and Fleet that he had; Q. Mucius with the old Army (who were two Legions) was to secure Sardinia, and G. Terentius the Country of Picenum, with that one Legion that had long been under his Conduct; also Order was given that there should be two more Legions rais'd in the City, and twenty thousand amongst the Allies. With these Generals and these Forces they provided for the defence of the Empire of Rome against the many several Wars which at once they were either already involved in, or shortly apprehended. The Consuls having levied two new City-Legions, and compleated the old ones, before they marcht into the Field, expiated those Prodigies that were reported; for not only part of the Wall and Gates of Rome, and the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia, were blasted with Lightning, but many vain illusions which people fancied they saw or heard, were believ'd for certain truths, as that there appeared the resemblance of divers Gallies in the River of Tarracina, where indeed there was none; That in the Temple of Jupiter Vicilinus which stands in the Territories of Compsa, there was heard the Clattering of Armour, and the River of Amitemus seem'd to be turn'd into Blood; satisfaction being made for these strange Tokens, and the Gods well-appeas'd according to the Orders of the Pontiffs, the Consuls began their march, Sempronius to Lucania, Fabius into Apulia; At Suessula Fabius the Father came to the Camp to be Lieutenant and assistant to his Son; who going out to meet him, the Lictors marching before him had such a reverence for the old man, that they did not as was usual stop him, but turn'd aside without saying any thing, and so eleven of them pass'd by him and let him ride on, but then the young man spoke to the Lictor that went next him to mind his duty, who presently cry'd out to the Father and bid him alight, who dismounting said, I did it, Son! to try whether you would not forget you were a Consul, and knew how to require the honour due to that high dignity.

XLV. As they lay there Encamp'd, Dafius Altimus a great and rich Citizen of Arpi, came secretly with three Servants in the Night, and offer'd the Consul, That if he might have a good reward for his pains, he would betray that City into his hands; which overture being debated in a Council of War, some were of opinion, That he ought to be severely scourg'd and then Executed as a Renegade and common Enemy, a Fellow true to no side, nor by any to be trusted, who after the Defeat at Cannæ, as if his Fidelity were to wait on Fortune, revolted to Annibal, and drew over the City Arpos with him, and now since the Roman Affairs, contrary to his hopes and wishes seem somewhat to revive; he comes to offer a new treachery to those whom he hath already betray'd; a deceitful Villain that is never of that side which he pretends to own, a Friend not to be trusted, and an Enemy contemptible and vain, and therefore ought to have the same reward as the Traitor of the Falerii, or that other of King Pyrrhus, and be made a third Example to all treacherous Runnagates. On the other side, old Fabius (the Consul's Father) said, That men should not forget to distinguish times and seasons, nor give their opinions of things or persons in the heat and confusions of a War, as they would do during a calm and open Peace; They should rather consider and endeavour how to keep all our Friends from falling off from us, than talk of making Examples of those that repent of their defection, and desire to return to their ancient Amity; But if we cannot help but some or other will always be revolting, and shall make it unlawful for any to return again to us, who sees not but in a little time we shall be without any Allies at all, and all the States of Italy will be associated with the Carthaginians; not that he thought fit to repose any trust in this Altimus, but rather to take a middle course with him, and treat him at present neither as a Friend, nor yet as an absolute Enemy, that is, to keep him as a Prisoner at large in some faithful City not far from the Camp during the War, and afterwards they would have leisure to determine, whether his former Revolt deserved punishment more than this his Return did pardon. This Advice was well approved of, so they bound Altimus and his Servants in Chains, and a great Summ of Gold which he brought with him, was order'd to be laid up and secured for him; he continued at Cales where Keepers walked with him abroad in the day time, and in the nights he was lock'd up. In the mean time, when he was first miss'd at home, and could not be heard of, all Arpos was in an hurly-burly for the loss of so principal a Man, and for fear of some mischief that might follow, sent an Account thereof to Annibal; who was not much displeased in his heart, both because he had a good while been suspicious of him as a Turn-Coach, and besides had by this means a fair occasion to seize his Estate, which was very great; yet that he might seem to act more out of resentments of Anger than Covetousness, he added a Gravity of Judicial proceedings to the most barbarous Cruelty in the world; for having apprehended his Wife and Children, he first strictly examined them touching his Flight, and also what Gold and Silver he had left behind him at home, and having fully discovered all particulars, he caused them to be burnt alive.

Fabius marching from Suessula, designed in the first place to besiege Arpos, and having encamped almost a mile off, and taken a view at a distance of the situation of the Town and its Walls; where he saw the Works were strongest, and therefore the least Guards, there he resolv'd to storm it. After he had prepared all things requisite for such an Enterprize, he chose out the bravest of all his Centurions and the stoutest Colonels for their Leaders, to whom he added 600 select Souldiers, (which was thought enow for the work) his Orders were, that in the night when the Trumpet sounded to the third Watch, they should carry their scaling Ladders to that place. The Gate there was low and narrow, the street little frequented, being the most desert part of the City, that those who first got up with their Ladders, should go along the Wall, and on the inside break open the said Gate, and when they were in possession of that part of the City, to wind a Horn as a Signal for the rest of the Forces to advance, and he would have all things in readiness to second them. All this was gallantly performed, and that which seem'd an impediment proved a great advantage to their design, I mean a violent showre that began at midnight, and caus'd the Guards and Watchmen to retire from their Posts into the Houses for shelter, and with the noise of the Rain dashing on the stones, hindred them from hearing the Gate broke open, and afterwards the more gentle droppings like Musick charmed many of them to sleep. After this Party was got in, they began to wind their Horns placed at fit distances to give notice from one to another to the Consul, who presently caus'd the Standards to advance, and a little before day entred the City at the Gate broke open, as aforesaid.

Then at last the Enemy took the Alarm, the showre being over, and day-light appearing, Annibal's Garrison in the Town consisted of almost five thousand men, and there were besides three thousand of the Burghers in Arms, whom the Carthaginians put in the Van for fear of Treachery, if they should have been behind them. They fought at first before it was full light and in narrow streets, and the Romans had not only secured the streets, but the Houses too that were next the Gate, that they might not be pelted and wounded from above. The Arpins and the Romans knew one another, and began to parley, the Romans asking them what they meant? What injury had the Romans done them? Or what mighty obligations had they to the Punicks, that they being natural Italians should wage War for a parcel of Strangers and Barbarians against their old Neighbours and Friends? and help to bring Italy into slavery, and make it Tributary to Africk? The Arpins excus'd themselves as being ignorant and innocent of these matters, betray'd and sold by some of their Grandees to the Carthaginians, and so over-reach'd and oppress'd by a few. Upon this beginning more and more of them began to confer together, and at last the Prætor of Arpos went up to the Consul, and having agreed and pass'd their promises one to another amongst the Standards and Forces drawn up ready to charge each other, the Arpins on a sudden turn'd o'th Romans side against the Carthaginians; likewise very near a thousand Spaniards came over to the Consul, making no other Terms than only this, That the Punick Garrison should march away with safety, and accordingly the Gates were open'd for them, and they went without any violence offer'd them to Annibal at Salapia. Thus was Arpos restor'd to the Romans without any loss, except of one old Traitor and new Fugitive. These Spaniards that came in were order'd to have double Provisions allow'd, and afterwards did brave and faithful Service. One of the Consuls being in Apulia, the other in Lucania, an hundred and twelve young Noblemen of Campania having got leave of the Magistrates of Capua to go forth to forrage the Enemies Country, came to-rights to the Roman Camp at Suessula, and told the Sentinels they would speak with the Prætor, for Cn. Fulvius was there Commander in Chief, who being made acquainted, order'd ten of them unarm'd to be brought before him; They only desired, that when Capua should be retaken, they might be restored to their Estates, which was promised, and so all of them taken into protection. The other Prætor Sempronius Judicanus took the Town Aternum, and in it above seven thousand people, and a pretty quantity of ready Money. At Rome happen'd a sad Fire, that continued two nights and one day, and laid all in ashes from the Salt-Market to the Gate called Carmenta, with the streets, Æquimelius and Jugarius, the Fire spreading it self even into the Temples of Fortune, and Mother Matuta, and Hope, without the Gate, and consumed all things sacred and profane.

XLVIII. In Spain the two Brothers, P. and Cn. Cornelius, having had great success, recovered many of their old Allies, and made not a few new ones, began to extend their hopes even into Africk; for understanding that Syphax, one of the Numidian Kings, was lately fallen out with the Carthaginians, they sent three Captains to make an Alliance with him, assuring him, That if he would persist in the War against them, he would do a very acceptable kindness to the Romans, who would in due time amply requite him for the same. The Barbarian was very glad of this Overture; and having talk'd with the Embassadors touching the Art of War, understood from the Discourses of those old Souldiers, how ignorant he was of many things in comparison of that more regular Discipline which they described. Therefore the first thing he requested was, That as they were good and faithful Friends, two of them would go back to their Generals, and the other remain with him to instruct his people in the Art Military. For the Numidians were hitherto altogether unacquainted with Foot-service, and useful only on Horse-back; their Forefathers having ever since they were a Nation managed their Wars that way, to which only they were accustomed from their youth; but their present Enemy was strong in Infantry, and he should never be able to match them, unless he had store of Foot-Souldiers, and though his Kingdom afforded men enow for that purpose, yet they had not the Art to arm and train them, but did all things rashly and in disorder as the multitude happen'd to come together. The Embassadors consented, upon Security given, that their Companion should presently be sent after them, if their Generals should not approve of his staying there. His name that stay'd with the King was Q. Statorius, and with the other two went back Numidian Embassadors to receive the Ratification of the League from the Roman Generals, who had Instructions to wheedle away all the Numidians they could that were in Annibal's Army or Garrisons. Statorius out of the multitude of young men wherewith that Country abounded, levied and muster'd Foot for the King, and exercising them after the Roman mode, cast them into Regiments and Bands, taught them to follow their proper Colours, and to keep in their Ranks and Files, and all other kinds of Military Discipline, so that in a little time the King confided as much in his Infantry as Cavalry, and in a pitch'd Battel on even hand defeated the Carthaginians: Nor were his Embassadors of small advantage to the Romans in Spain; for upon the News of their Arrival, abundance of the Numidians daily deserted the Enemy. Thus a firm League of Friendship was settled between the Romans and Syphax, which when the Carthaginians understood, presently they dispatch'd away Envoys to Gala, a Prince of the other part of Numidia, over the people called Massilians.

XLIX. This Gala had a Son named Masanissa, but seventeen years of Age, yet of such hopes as fairly promised that he would render his Kingdom much more large and powerful than he found it. To him these Envoys remonstrated, That since Syphax to render himself more powerful against the rest of the Kings of Africk, had Confederated with the Romans, it would be the interest of Gala to join as soon as he could with the Carthaginians, before Syphax went over into Spain, or the Romans invaded Africk; and as for Syphax he might now easily be subdued whilst he had yet gain'd nothing by the Roman League but a bare name of having such remote Friends. The Son being altogether for War, Gala was easily persuaded to send forth an Army, who, with the Carthaginian Auxiliaries defeated Syphax in a mighty Battel, wherein 'tis said there were thirty thousand slain. Syphax himself with a few Horse fled to the Maurusians, a sort of Numidians that border'd upon the Ocean over against Cadiz, and having by his great renown drawn many of the Barbarians to him, arm'd in a little time vast Forces, but before he could carry them over the streight into Spain: Masanissa came into those parts with his Victorious Army, and alone with his own Troops, and no help of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax Battel, to his great Honour. In Spain nothing memorable happen'd, save that the Roman Generals drew all the Celtiberians that were fit to bear Arms into their service for the same stipend that they had bargain'd for with the Carthaginians; and sent above three hundred Spanish Gentlemen into Italy to solicit their Countrymen that were under Annibal to desert him and serve the Romans. This only touching the Affairs of Spain. In this Year may be noted, That the Romans had never any Mercenaries in their Army till now they hired the aforesaid Celtiberians.

The Epitome.

2. P. Cornelius Scipio, afterwards surnamed Africanus, made Ædile, though under Age. 8. Annibal takes the City Tarentum (all but the Castle) by the Treachery of some young men of that City, who pretended to go out a Hunting. 12. The solemn Games in Honour of Apollo, were now first instituted upon occasion of certain Prophetical Verses of Marcus, wherein the Overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. 13. Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius the Consuls, fight Hanno the Carthaginian General with success. 16. T. Sempronius Gracchus the Proconsul, was by a Lucanian, at whose House he Quarter'd, train'd into an Ambuscade and slain by Mago. 19. Centenius Penula, who had served in the Wars but in quality of a Centurion, importuning the Senate to have the Conduct of an Army, assuring them, that if they would grant him that Honour, he would certainly beat Annibal out of Italy, obtains the Command of eight thousand men, and with them fights Annibal, but both himself and his Army are cut to pieces. 21. Cn. Fulvius the Prætor engaging with Annibal, lost the Field and sixteen thousand men, and himself escaped but with two hundred Horse. 22. The two Consuls, Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius, besiege Capua. 23. &c. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the Siege takes Syracuse, having most gallantly and prudently behaved himself in all that Service. In the Tumult at storming the City, Archimedes, lustre about Geometrical Figures which he had drawn in the dust, is by a common Souldier knockt o'th head. 32. &c. The two Scipio's, Publius and Cornelius, after so many brave Actions and great successes in Spain, come to a disastrous end, being kill'd with the loss of almost both their whole Armies in the eighth year after their going into Spain. 37. That Province had utterly been lost, had it not been for the Courage and Industry of L. Marcus a Roman Knight, who rallied together the scatter'd Reliques of the said Armies, and by his Conduct and Encouragement, routed the Enemy, drove them out of two several places where they were encamped, slew seven and thirty thousand of them, took eighteen hundred and thirty Prisoners, and a mighty Booty, wherupon he was called General Marcus.

W Hilst these things were a doing in Africk and Spain, Annibal had spent the Summer in the Tarentine Territories, in hopes of gaining that City by Treachery; during which time several obscure Towns of the Salutines revolted to him; but of the twelve Clans of the Bruttians, two of them called the Consentines and the Thurines return'd to their old Alliance with the Romans, and more had followed their Example, had it not been for L. Pomponius Vientanus, a Captain of the Allies; who having made some lucky Incursions into the Bruttians Country, would needs take upon him as a General, and having raised a tumultuary Army, fought with Hanno, and lost abundance of men, either killed or taken Prisoners, but they were for the most part a Rabble of Country Clowns and Bond-slaves, and the least loss of all was the Captain himself, being a Fellow that as he was the Cause of this Loss by his rashness, so he had been a Publican (or Farmer of the Publick Revenues) guilty of several Misdemeanours and ill Arts, whereby he had wrong'd both the State, and those private persons he happen'd to be concerned with. Sempronius the Consul lying in the Lucans Country, made divers small Skirmishes, but nothing memorable, and also took some small Towns belonging to those people. The long continuance of the War sometimes with success, and by and by with great disasters, had not only changed the Fortunes, but also the Minds of men, and the City was so strangely possess'd with Superstitions and Ceremonies, for the most part introduced from Foreign Countries, as if either its Inhabitants or its Gods were not the same as formerly: Nor were the ancient Roman Rites out of request only in private Devotions, but even in the streets, the Market place and Capitol it self; you should see multitudes of Women praying and sacrificing after quite different modes from those of their native Country. Abundance of old Priests and blind Wizards having inveigled peoples Consciences, whose number was the greater, by reason of so many flocking out of the Country, either for fear or poverty, not being able to till their Lands, or at least not to enjoy any benefit by the Crops; whereupon they resorted to the City, where finding it easie to advantage themselves by others Superstitions, they followed the trick of abusing their zealous Credulity, as if it had been a lawful occupation. At these Innovations, good men being grieved and scandalized, first sigh'd out their complaints in private, but at last it growing a publick Grievance, was brought before the Senate, who gave a severe Reprimand to the Ædiles and Capital Triumvirs, because they had not prohibited these disorders. But when they came to turn this Crowd of Devoto's out of the Forum, and sling away their Sacred Implements and Oblations which they had prepared, they went in danger of their lives from the Rabble; so that the mischief appearing too far gone to be suppress'd by inferiour Magistrates, the Senate left it to the care of M. Æmilius the City-Prætor to rid the Town of these Superstitions, who having in a general Assembly recited that Act of the Senate, set forth a Proclamation, That whoever had any Books of Divination or Prayers or Treatises of the Art of Sacrificing, should bring them all in to him before the first day of April; and that no person should presume to sacrifice in any place publick or sacred, with any new or outlandish Rites or Ceremonies.

This Year died several publick Priests, viz. L. Cornelius Lentulus the supream Pontiff, and C. Papirius Maffo, the Son of Caius of that name, an ordinary Pontiff, and P. Furius Philus an Augur, and C. Papirius Maffo the Son of Lucius, one of the Decemvirs for looking after the Holy Mysteries; In the room of Lentulus was chosen Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, and Cn. Servilius Cæpio in the stead of Papirius the Pontiff; The new Augur was L. Quintus Flaminius, and the Decemvir, another L. Cornelius Lentulus. The time of Electing Consuls coming on, because both the present Consuls were busy abroad in the War, and could not well be call'd home, C. Claudius Cento was nominated Dictator for that purpose, whose Master of the Horse Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was Created one of the Consuls, and Appius Claudius Pulcher (who was Governour of Sicily whilst he was Prætor) the other. Then Prætors were chosen, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Junius Silanus, and P. Cornelius Sulla. The Elections being concluded, the Dictator quitted his Office. The Ædile of State with M. Cornelius Cethegus, was P. Cornelius Scipio, afterwards surnam'd Africanus, whom, when he put in for that Office, the Tribunes of the Commons oppos'd him, alledging, That he ought not to be put in nomination, because he was not yet arrived to the Age * required by Law. To which he answer'd, If all the Quirites and people of Rome have a mind to make me Ædile, then I hope I am old enough. And indeed all the Tribes ran so fast to give their Votes in his favour, that the Tribunes presently ceased their endeavours of hindering him. The Largesse bestow'd by these Ædiles, was to exhibit the Roman Games (very magnificently for those times) and continued a day longer than ordinary; and also they gave to every street in the City a Congius (about a Wine Gallon) of Oyl. L. Villius Tapulus, and M. Fundanius Fundulus, accus'd several Matrons before the people of dishonest and incontinent living, of whom some were condemn'd and banish'd; The Plebeian Games were celebrated, and by reason thereof a great Feast in honour of Jupiter.

* By the Annal Law none were to be Ædiles but such as were at least 37 years of Age; As Prætors were to be 40. and Consuls 43. or upwards.

III.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time, and App. Claudius, enter upon their Consulship; and the Prætors chose their Provinces by Lot; P. Cornelius Sulla had both the Jurisdiction over Citizens and over Foreigners, which before were two mens Offices. To Cn. Fulvius Flaccus fell Apulia, to C. Claudius Nero, Suessula, and Marcus Junius Silanus happen'd to have the Government of Tuscany; both Consuls were appointed by an express Decree of the Senate to manage the War with Annibal, and to have under their Command two Legions apiece, which one of them should receive from Q. Fabius last years Consul, and the other from Fulvius Centumalus; As for the Prætors, F. Flaccus was to have the Conduct of the Forces that were at Luseria under Æmilius the late Prætor, and Nero Claudius those under C. Terentius in Picenum, each of them to levy what recruits they thought fit. To Marcus Junius were assign'd the City Legions of the former year. T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, had their Commands continued over their respective Armies and Provinces of Lucania and Gallia; The like to Publius Lentulus over the old Province of Sicily, and to M. Marcellus for Syracuse, and so much as had been the Dominion of Hiero; T. Otacilius remain'd Admiral; M. Valerius had charge of Greece, Q. Mutius Scaevola of Sardinia, and the two Cornelii of Spain; Besides the old Forces the Consuls were to raise two more City Legions, so that in all the Armies that year consisted of three and twenty Legions. The Consuls Leavies were much hindred by means of one M. Posthumius Pyrgensis, who was like to have caused a dangerous disturbance; He was a Publican by profession, and for many years for Covetousness and Cheating had not his Fellow in the whole City, except L. Pomponius Veientanus, taken Prisoner last year by Hanno in the Lucans Country as afore said. These two and some of their Confederates of the same Trade, because the State was to answer all Casualties of the Seas, as for any Provisions sent to the Armies, feigned abundance of Shipwracks, and those which they brought to account that were really cast away, were occasioned by their own Fraud and Knavery, not by any Accident; for their Course was to lade old Weather-beaten Vessels with a few Goods of little value, and when the same were sunk in the Sea, having Boats in readines to save the Mariners, they would falsely pretend and crave allowance for abundance of Goods of great value as lost thereby. This Fraud of theirs was discovered last year to M. Æmilius the Prætor, who acquainted the Senate therewith, but it was not then taken notice of or punish'd, because the Fathers at that Juncture were not willing to disoblige the Publicans, whom they then stood so much in need of; but when 'twas brought before the people, they were resolved severely to chastise this horrid Cheat: And the Carvillii, two Prætors of the Commons, justly moved with the indignity and scandalousness of the thing, lay a Fine of two hundred thousand Asses (about six hundred twenty five pounds sterling) upon his Head. And when the day came, that the same should be confirmed by the people, or else either increased or mitigated, the Assembly of the Commons was so full, that all the Court of the Capitol could scarce contain the multitude. The Defendant pleaded largely for himself, but his only hope seem'd to be, that a Kinsman of his, C. Servilius Casca, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, would interpose in his behalf, before the Tribes were called forth to give their Suffrages. The Witnesses being heard, the Tribunes commanded the Crowd to withdraw to a convenient distance, and the Lottery-Box was brought out to determine in which Tribe the Free Latines that were in Town should give their Votes; In the mean time the Publicans cans baited Casca, that he would dissolve the Court, and the people cry'd out as fast on the contrary to proceed; and as it fell out, Casca sat full in view, the formost man on the Tribunes Bench, and though he would fain have done his Relation a kindness, yet he knew not how for fear and shame to appear in such a dirty business, seeing no likelihood of assistance from him, the Publicans to make a disturbance, and hinder the proceedings, came in a forceable manner through the void space that was between the people and the Court, and thrust in rudely amongst them, till they got upon an high place, where they fell a quarrelling and brawling with the Tribunes on one side, and the people on the other, insomuch that they were like to go together by the Ears, whereupon Fulvius said to the Tribunes, 'Do not you see that your Authority is contemn'd? and that there is danger of a Riot and Mutiny, unless you presently adjourn the Assembly?'

Which being done, a Senate is call'd to whom the Consuls represent how the common Hall was disturb'd by the impudence and violence of the Publicans. That Court (quoth they) wherein the great M. Furius Camillus (on whose banishment ensued the ruine of the City) calmly suffer'd himself to be condemn'd by ungrateful Citizens; wherein before him, the Decemvirs (by whose Laws we live to this day) and many other persons of the first quality in all Ages, have submitted to the Judgment of the People; But now comes this Posthumius Pyrgensis, and by force does wrest from the Commons the Liberty of their Votes, hath subverted the Commons Judicature, affronted and contemn'd the Tribunes, came as in a Warlike manner against the people of Rome, seiz'd a place by violence to keep the Tribunes from coming to the Commons, or the Commons to their Tribunes, and hinder the Tribes from being call'd to their Suffrages; nor was there anything that prevented blows and murder but the patience of the Magistrates giving way for the present to the insolence and fury of these few seditious Mutineers, and suffering themselves and the people of Rome to be overcome so far, That seeing the Criminals went about with Force and Arms to hinder their proceedings, they dissolv'd the Court by their own Authority, that there might be no occasion given to those who sought nothing so much as some colour for a combustion. All good men resenting this as a very heinous offence, and the Senate having declared, That this violence and breach of the Peace tended to the hazard of the State, and would be a precedent of most pernicious consequence, if not severely punish'd, presently the two Carvillii, the Tribunes, laying aside the Debate about their Fine, Indict'd Posthumius of Treason, and commanded one of the principal Serjeants to attack him, and carry him to Gaol, unless he found very good Bail; he did accordingly give Sureties, but left them in the lurch, and appear'd not at the day; whereupon the Tribunes prefer'd a Bill to the people, who ratified the same, That if M. Posthumius should not surrender himself before the first day of May, and when he was call'd on that day, did not appear and answer, nor any lawful excuse be alledged for his absence, they adjudg'd him to be banish'd, his Estate to be forfeited and sold, and they did forbid him fire and water, or that he should lose the benefit of his Country for ever. After which all the rest concern'd in stirring up the Riot and Tumult, were capitally prosecuted and required to give Sureties; first only those that could not get Bail were Imprison'd, but afterwards those that offer'd pledges were notwithstanding secured; To avoid which danger divers went voluntarily into banishment; This was the upshot of these Publicans fraudulent dealings, and of their impudence in defending the same.

After this, the Assembly was held for Creation of an High Priest by M. Cornelius Cethegus a Pontiff lately Elect'd; Three Competitors there were who vy'd all their Interests for the place, viz. Q. Fulvius Flaccus the Consul, who had twice before been Consul and Cenfor; and T. Manlius Torquatus dignified also with two Consulships and a Censorship besides, and P. Licinius Crassus who as yet had not serv'd Ædile, yet this young man carried it from both the said antient and honourable Candidates; nor had there in a hundred and twenty years before been any one (except P. Cornelius Calussa) made supream Pontiff till after he had been Ædile of State. The Consuls finding much difficulty to compleat their Levies, because there were not able men enough to be found in the Town both to furnish out the two new Legions of Citizens that were order'd, and at the same time to recruit the old; The Senate Order'd them to cease their trouble, and commanded two Committees of Triumvirs should be Created, one for places within fifty miles of the City, the other beyond, whose business should be to survey all Villages, thorough Fares, Market-Towns and places of resort, and take notice what numbers there were of men of free condition, and such as they found able to bear Arms, though not of lawful Age, they were to press for Souldiers. Also that the Tribunes of the Commons, if they thought fit, should present a Bill to the People, That those who should Lift themselves under seventeen years of Age, should have as good pay as if they were above; In pursuance of which Decree the said Triumvirs made diligent Inquisition all over the Countreys for Free-born persons fit to serve the State, and so compleated the Levies. At the same time arriv'd Letters out of Sicily, which were read in the Senate, from M. Marcellus, containing the requests of the Souldiers that serv'd under P. Lentulus; This Army was the remnant of the overthrow at Canna, sent into Sicily as is before-mentioned, with Orders to be confin'd to that Island, and not return into Italy, whilst the Carthaginians continued there.

These having obtained leave of Lentulus, sent some of their Horsemen and Centurions of the best Quality, as also certain select Foot-Souldiers as Agitators, to M. Marcellus at his Winter-Quarters; where being admitted to Audience, one of them spake as follows: We had addressed our selves to you, Noble Marcellus, in Italy whilst you were Consul, immediately after that (though not unjust, certainly) sad and rigorous Decree was pass'd against us in the Senate, but that being order'd for this Province, all in confusion by the Death of the King, we well hoped we had been sent to be employed in a smart War both against the Sicilians and Punicks, where with our blood and wounds we might have satisfied and appeased the displeasure which the Fathers had conceived against us: As but in the last Age, those who were taken by Pyrrhus at Heraclea, made amends for their fault by their good service against the same Pyrrhus; yet are we still ignorant, O Conscript Fathers, wherein we have offended or deserved your displeasure? Suffer us so to speak as if they were all present; for methinks I see both the Consuls and the whole Senate, when I behold your face, O Marcellus, whom if we had had for our Consul at Cannæ, both the Fortune of the Commonwealth had been much better, and our own. Give us leave, we beseech you, before we sigh out our complaints for our present miserable condition, to clear our selves of the Crime which we are charged with; if it were neither by the special Vengeance of the Gods, nor by the Decrees of Destiny, (on whose Laws the unavoidable Course of Humane Affairs depends) but by some default, that we were at Cannæ overthrown: Then, I beseech you, by whose was it? the Souldiers, or the Generals? For my own part I remember I am a Souldier, and will never speak any thing but well of my General, of him especially to whom I know the Senate rendred thanks, because he despair'd not of the Commonwealth, and who every year, since his flight from Cannæ, has been continued in Command; as also we hear the Colonels that there escaped, do daily put in for, and obtain Honours and Offices, and even the Government of whole Provinces. And can you, my Lords of the Senate, so easily forgive those of your own Rank and their Children? and yet at the same time be so very severe against us poor Wretches of the Commonalty? Or was it no dishonour for the Consul and other Chief Commanders to fly when the Case was grown desperate? And were the wretched Souldiers sent into the Field on purpose, that come what would, they must needs die, and not offer to escape? At Allia almost the whole Army ran away; at the Streights of Caudium without so much as venturing a Battel, they surrendered their Arms to the Enemy (not to mention other shameful Defeats of our Armies) yet so far were those Armies from being branded with any mark of reproach, that the City of Rome it self was recovered by the Forces who had fled from Allia to Veii. And the Caudine Legions, though they return'd home without Arms, yet being arm'd and sent back, subdu'd the very same Enemy, and made them pass under the like shameful yoke, which before they had insultingly imposed on them: Nor need we these Examples; for indeed who can justly tax the Army before Cannæ either with Flight or Cowardise, where there were above fifty thousand men slain upon the spot? From whence the Consul retreated but with seventy Horse? Where none survived but such as the Enemy for meer weariness could not kill? When the Prisoners there taken were denied to be ransom'd, we were every where cry'd up and commended for reserving our selves against another day to serve our Country, for returning into Venusia to the Consul, and thereby keeping up still the shew of a competent Army. But now are we in a worse condition, than those who in our Forefathers days suffer'd themselves to be taken Prisoners; for they only had their Armour and Weapons changed for worse, and were put in a more dishonourable place both on a March and in the Camp, and even all this disgrace they could wipe off with one brave Service for their Country, or prosperous Battel, none of them was banish'd, none put out of hopes of being discharged from bearing Arms after he had served his full Term by Law appointed, and besides they were set to fight with some Enemy where they might once for all either put a period to their lives, or their dishonour. But we, against whom nothing can be objected (unless we be guilty in being a means that some few Roman Souldiers are yet alive after the slaughter at Cannæ) are not only sent like banish'd persons far from our Country and from Italy, but also from all Enemies, where we may grow old in Exile, where we have neither hope nor opportunity of cancelling our disgrace, no means to mitigate the resentments of our Fellow-Citizens against us, no, nor so much as any possibility left of dying with Honour; 'tis neither a period of our shame that we request, nor a reward of our Valour, all we desire is, that we may have leave to make proof of our Courage, and give some Specimen of our Mettle; 'tis toil and dangers we petition for, that we may shew our selves Men and Souldiers. There has all last year been War in Sicily sharply managed, some Cities the Punicks, some the Romans have taken by pure force; both Foot and Horse have been engaged in pitch'd Battels, Syracuse is attacked as well by Sea as Land, and we hear the shouts of those that are fighting, and the clattering of their Arms, and yet all the while are our selves kept idle and do nothing, as if we had neither hands nor weapons. The Legions of Bond-slaves under T. Sempronius have often already fought the Enemy with Banners display'd, and for their reward have obtained first their Liberty, and next their Freedom of the City: Let us too, if it be but in quality of Slaves redeem'd for these Wars, have leave to cope with the Enemy, as they have done, and endeavour by our manhood to regain our liberty as well as they: Will you be pleased to make an Experiment of our Courage by Sea or by Land, in a pitch'd Battel, in storming a Town, or entring a Breach? We challenge and sue for some Services of the greatest difficulty and danger, that we may the sooner make up whatever we were wanting in at Cannæ, seeing all the time we have lived since has but served to augment our disgrace.

VII. Saying this, they flung themselves down at Marcellus's feet, who told them, That he had neither Power of himself, nor Commission otherwise to relieve them, but he would represent their desires to the Senate, and readily do for them whatever the Fathers should order. These Letters being brought to the new Consuls, and by them communicated to the Senate: Their Lordships after some Debate thereupon, declar'd, That they saw no reason why the Affairs of the Commonwealth should be intrusted to those who deserted their Fellow-Souldiers fighting before Cannæ; however if M. Claudius the Proconsul should judge otherwise, they left it to him to do therein what he thought might stand with the safety of the State and his own Honour; provided that no one of them should be discharged from the Service, nor rewarded with any Military token of Honour for his Valour, nor suffer'd to come home as long as the Enemy continued within Italy. After this, by Authority of the Senate confirm'd by an Act of the Commons, the City-Prætor held a Common Hall, where there was a Committee of Five chosen to look after the repairing of the Walls and Forts; and two Committees of Triumvirs, the one to survey and inventory all Sacred things and Oblations; the other to rebuild the Temples of Fortune, and Dame Matuta within the Gate Carmentalis, as also that of the Goddess Spes without the Gate, which had all been demolish'd by the Fire last year. At this time happen'd great Tempests that did much harm. At Mount Alban it rain'd stones two days one after another; many places were blasted with Lightning, viz. two Chappels in the Capitol, the Rampier in the Camp at Suessula in several places, and two Sentinels struck dead, the Wall and some Towers at Cumes not only struck with Thunderbolts, but quite thrown down. At Reate a mighty Stone or Rock seen to fly in the Air; the Sun redder than ordinary, and almost like Blood. To expiate these Prodigies solemn Supplications were held one whole day, and the Consuls spent divers days in attending the Affairs of Religion, and during that time Sacrifices were offer'd for nine days together. Whereas Annibal had long been in hopes, and the Romans in doubt, of the Tarentines Revolt, there happen'd now an Accident abroad, which not a little accelerated the same. There was one Phileas a Tarentine that had long remain'd at Rome as a Lieger Embassadours, who being a bulie-headed man, and quite weary with lying so long at quiet, found means to get access to the Hostages, which his Country had given to the Romans for their fidelity; who were kept in an Apartment belonging to the Temple of Liberty, and the less strictly guarded, because 'twas neither their own nor their Cities interest that they should offer to escape; but this Embassadour with his frequent discourses inveigled them, and having brib'd two Sextons or Wardens of the said Temple, at the beginning of the Evening got them out of Custody, and so away both he and they fled secretly out of Town homewards. Next Morning early the News was all about Town, and Messengers dispatch'd to pursue them, who seized them on this side Tarracina, and brought them all back, and being led into the Common Hall, they were by the Votes of the People first scourged, and then thrown headlong from the Cliff of the Rock Tarpeia.

VIII. The severity of this punishment enraged two of the noblest Cities of the Grecians in Italy, as being not only generally toucht in Honour, but fill'd with particular resentments of Grief and Indignation, as every one was related by Blood or Friendship to those that were thus basely put to death; amongst the rest there were about thirteen Tarentine Noblemen, of whom Nico and Philemenus were the principal, that entred into a Conspiracy to revenge it; but before they entred into any Action, thought fit in the first place to have some Conference with Annibal, and under pretence of going out a Hunting a nights, go to him; when they were got near his Camp, the rest hid themselves in the Woods, Nico and Philemenus advanced to the Out-guards, offer'd themselves to be taken, and desired to be brought before Annibal, to whom they relate their design, the grounds thereof, and what progress they had made in it; He thanked them, and gave them large promises of reward, enjoining them, That the better to bubble the rest of their Country-men, and avoid suspicion of Correspondence, that when they came abroad to hunt, they should drive away some of the Carthaginians Cattel which were abroad at pasture, promising they should do it safely and without opposition. The Booty brought in by these young Gentlemen was much taken notice of, but when they had done so several times, their Courage in attempting it was the less wondred at, and nothing suspected. At another Meeting with Annibal they concluded, That the Inhabitants of Tarentum should remain free, enjoy their own Laws and Customs and all things belonging to them, and neither pay Tribute to the Punicks, nor receive a Garrison without their own consent, but the spoil of the Roman Garrison, whom they were to deliver up and betray, should belong to the Carthaginians. These Articles being concluded, Philemenus used much oftner to go out and come in a nights, and as he was known to be a great Hunter, so he had always his Hounds with him, and other Furniture for the Sport; and generally something that he brought home either caught by his Dogs, or got from the Enemy, being ready offered to his hands, he would bestow upon the Captain of the Guard or the Sentinels. He was believed to chuse to go out in the night for fear of being met with by the Enemy, and the thing was now grown so customary, that at any time of night, if he did but whistle, the Gate was presently open'd; therefore Annibal thought it high time to proceed to Execution: he was three days march off, where that it might not be wondred at that he lay so long at one place, he gave out that he was sick, and the Roman Garrison in Tarentum were now out of all apprehensions of danger from his staying there.

But after he resolv'd to go for Tarentum, chusing ten thousand Horse and Foot, such as were fittest for Expedition, both by the nimbleness of their Bodies and lightness of their Arms; about the fourth Watch of the Night, he began to advance; sending before about fourscore Numidian Horse to scour the Roads, and have their Eyes about them that no Countrymen should spy the Army on their march, or be able to give notice of it; therefore those they overtook they were to carry back, and those they met to kill, that the people might think they were a Gang of Thieves and Highway-men, rather than part of an Army. He himself made a long march, and Encamp'd next Night not above fifteen miles from Tarentum, and even there would not discover where his design lay, only calling his Souldiers together charg'd them, That not a man should straggle out of the Road, or quit his rank, That they should diligently wait for the words of Command, but attempt nothing without Orders, and in due time he would acquaint them what was to be done. About the same instant news came to Tarentum, That the Numidian Horse were abroad a plundering, and put the Countrymen far and near into great fright and consternation; yet upon this Intelligence the Roman Governour concern'd himself no further than to Order a Party of Horse to go at break of day next Morning to beat them back from Forraging, but as to any preparations for his Security, was altogether remiss, and took this Excursion of the Numidians as an Argument that Annibal with his Army was not dislodg'd but still continued at their old Leaguer. Annibal as soon as it was dark set forwards again, Philemenus went before and led them, loaded with his Hunting Game as he used to be, the rest of the Conspirators waited their time to execute their several Charges, as was before agreed amongst them; which was, that Philemenus carrying in his Venison at the Wicket, should get in a parcel of armed men, and Annibal on the other part should march up to the Gate call'd Temenis, which situate on the Landside was towards the East, a little within the Wall as it were in a nook; when Annibal approach'd pretty near that Gate, he gave a signal by a blaze of Fire, which was answer'd in like manner by Nico that Commanded a Forlorn Hope, and presently both extinguish'd again that the City might take no notice on't. Annibal march'd up silently towards the Gate, whilst Nico seizing the Watchmen unawares, and killing them as they lay half asleep, opens the Port, Annibal enters with the Foot, but Orders his Horse to stay without, that on open ground they might be ready where there should be most occasion. Philemenus by this time was come near the Wicket on the other side which he was wont to go in at, and raising the Watchman with his usual Whistle and Voice well known, bidding him make haste, for they had got such a prize as they could hardly stand under it; the Portal was flung open, two lusty Fellows carrying in a vast Wild Boar between them, himself follow'd with one of the Huntsmen lightly-arm'd, and whilst the Fellow was staring upon and admiring the greatness of the Beast, thrust him through with an Hunting Spear; presently thirty more armed get in, and cut to pieces the rest of the Watch, fling open the great Gate, and the whole Party enter with Banners display'd, and so being silently led to the Market place, join Annibal, who then dividing two thousand Gauls into three Squadrons sent them to secure several parts of the City, and the Tarentines and Africans to seize those streets that were most populous, with Orders to kill all the Romans they met, but spare the Inhabitants; and that the same might be observ'd, directed some of the Tarentines to go in the head of each Party, to bid each of their Townsmen they should see at a distance, be quiet, keep out of the way, and fear nothing.

- X. By this time all places were full of tumult and clamour, as is wont to be in a City taken, but what the matter was, no body certainly understood; The Tarentines suspected the Romans were going to plunder their City; the Romans imagin'd the Townsmen were up to cut their Throats by Treachery. The Governour awaken'd at the first hubbub, fled to the Haven, and thence in a Skiff to the Castle. That which added to the terrour was a Trumpet heard from the Theatre, for it was a Roman Trumpet provided by the Conspirators for this purpose, and being unskilfully sounded by a Grecian not at all used to such Instruments, it was doubtful whose side it was of, or what signal was thereby meant to be given: but when it grew somewhat light, and the Romans saw the Punick and Gallick Arms, there was no more doubting in the Case, and the Grecians seeing the Romans every where lie kill'd were satisfied the City was taken by Annibal. After 'twas grown perfect day, and those Romans that surviv'd were fled into the Castle, and the hurry was pretty well over; Annibal Commanded the Tarentines to assemble at the Common Hall without Weapons, which they did accordingly (except those that accompanied the Romans to the Castle resolv'd to run the same Fortune with them.) Annibal made a winning Speech to the Tarentines, putting them in mind how courteous he had been to their Citizens taken either at Thrasymenus or Cannæ, withal inveighing against the proud domineering humour and oppressions of the Romans; and then required them all to depart every one to his own dwelling, and write his name upon his door, and that those Houses which should not be so written upon he would forthwith give his Souldiers a signal to plunder; and if any should presume to write a name on any House wherein the Romans were Quarter'd (which were all empty Houses) he would punish them as Enemies. The Assembly being dismiss'd and the Houses by that token distinguish'd which were to be treated as Friends, and which as Enemies, the Signal was given and the Souldiers fell to plundering as fast as they could, and got some parcel of Pillage. Next

Next day he march'd to attack the Castle, but seeing it so advantageously situate, defended by the Sea, (which washes the greatest part of it as a Peninsula.) and with vast high and steep Rocks, and towards the City fortified with a gallant Wall and mighty Ditch, and that it was neither to be won by Scalado nor Battery, that he might not by securing the Tarentines, lose opportunities for greater affairs, nor yet leave them exposed to the Excursions of the Romans at their pleasure from the Castle, he appointed a Rampier to be raised between the City and the Castle, not without hopes, That the Romans to hinder the same would come out, and so he might have an opportunity to fight them, and if they rashly adventur'd too far, might by a notable slaughter so weaken the Garrison, that the Tarentines themselves might thenceforwards easily defend their City against them. His hopes prov'd propheticall, for no sooner was the work began, but out came the Romans falling full drive upon the Pioneers, and the Guard set for their defence retreated on purpose, that seeming success might encrease their confidence, and they might follow them in greater numbers and further; but upon a signal given, the Punicks start up on every side of them, being before planted for that purpose; nor were the Romans able to stand before them, and yet could not well run away, the straightness of the street, and the work begun, and materials provided for it, being in their way and hindering them, so that many tumbled headlong into the Trench, and more were kill'd flying than fighting. Thenceforwards the work went on without opposition. A very deep and large Trench, and a Rampier within it, and at a little distance behind that, he gave Order to build a Wall, so that even without a Garrison they might well enough keep off the Romans; however he left a small Garrison, not only to secure them, but help to build the Wall. Himself with the rest of his Forces march'd to the River Gelesus five miles off the City, and there Encamp'd. Whence after some time he return'd to view the Work, and finding that it went forward better than he look'd for, he began to entertain hopes that the Citadel also might be won by Assault; for though strong in other respects, yet it did not stand high, but upon plain even ground divided from the City only by a Wall and a Trench; now when 'twas assaulted with all sorts of Engines of Battery and undermining recruits happening to arrive from Metapont, so rais'd the Courage of the Besieg'd Romans, that in the night on a sudden they sallied unexpectedly and seiz'd the Enemies works, some they flung down and the rest they burnt, and so put an end to Annibal's attacking the Fort that way; and now all his hopes were to weary them out with a lingering Siege, but that too was unlikely, for those in the Castle had the Sea open, and on the contrary the City was by them cut off from any provisions by water, so that the Besiegers were like sooner to be reduc'd to want than the Besieged. Annibal having summon'd the principal Citizens of Tarentum, lays before them all the present difficulties, that he could see no way how to win the Castle by force, so strong and fortified as it was; nor had any hopes to reduce it by a Siege as long as they were Masters of the Sea; but if once there were Ships before them to hinder relief from being carried in, they would soon be obliged either to quit the place, or surrender both it and themselves. The Tarentines were all of the same opinion, and added, That he only that gave the Counsel was able to find means to execute it; For a few Carthaginian Ships sent for from Sicily would do the work, for as for their own they lay shut up in a little Creek, and considering the Enemy commands the mouth of the Haven, how was it possible they should get out into the open Sea? Yes, yes (replies Annibal) they shall get out well enough I'll warrant you, many things that in their own nature are cumbersome, and seem almost impossible, yet by policy are brought to pass, and dispatch'd with a sleight; your City is situate upon a plain Champian ground, the ways on every side even and broad enough, I will chuse the high street that leads from the Haven quite cross the City to the Sea, and carry the Ships upon Wains with no great trouble; Then shall the Sea be ours, and we will attack them on that side by water as well as on this by Land, and doubt not but in a little time we shall either take the Fort, or make them abandon it. This Discourse not only gave them hopes of effecting the business, but also set them in great admiration of Annibal's prudence and parts; so out of hand all the Wains and Carts that could be got, were brought together and coupled one with another, Cranes and other Engines employ'd to hoist up the Vessels out of the Dock, and the way all levell'd, that they might pass with less difficulty, Cartel for Draught, and Labourers were hired, and all hands at work so industriously, that within few dayes, the Fleet was brought about over Land, and well rigg'd and man'd came and rode at Anchor on the other side the Castle before the mouth of the Haven; In these terms stood Tarentum when Annibal left it, and went to his Winter Quarters. Authors do not altogether agree whether this revolt of Tarentum happen'd in this year, or the year before, but the most and those that lived nearest those times assign it to this year.

The Consuls and Prætors remain'd at Rome till the seven and twentieth of April, on Account of solemnizing the Latine Holy-Days, and then having performed the Religious Ceremonies on the Alban Hill, set forwards every one towards his Province. About this time a new fit of Religion invaded the peoples minds, occasion'd by certain Verses of one Marcianus. This Marcianus whilst he liv'd, was counted a notable Prophet, and when last year Inquisition was made after such Books by Decree of the Senate, this happen'd to fall into the hands of M. Atilius the City-Prætor who had charge of that affair; and he deliver'd it it to the new Prætor Sulla. There were two passages in this Marcian's Verses much taken notice of, of which one being not made publick till the Event was past, and found exactly verified, gave credit to the other which related to what was to come. In the first, the Romans Overthrow at Canne was predicted in these words,

You Romans sprang from Troy, forbear River of Canne to come near,
Lest a strange Foe enforce your rage
In Diomed's Field to engage.
But I forewarn, I know, in vain,
Your Blood shall dye that fatal Plain,
And thousand Carcasses of slain
From fruitful ground, shall floating be Along that stream to the vast Sea.
Your Men to Fish and Fowls and Beasts of prey, Believe this true; Jove dictates what I say.

Now all that had served in those Wars knew and remembered Diomed's Field and the River of Canne as perfectly as they did the Defeat it self. Then was the other Prophecy likewise read, the obscurer of the two, both as being yet to be fulfilled, (and future things are always most dark) as also because it was delivered in a more intricate Stile and perplexed Phrase, thus

If you Invaders would expel by War,
And 'scape the Plague-sore threatned from afar,
To great Apollo, Romans, I advise
That you vow annual Plays in solemn wise
From publick Stock part of the Charge defray,
The rest for him and his, let each man pay.
The Sovereign Prætor must these Games perform,
Who sits in Judgment, and does wrongs reform,
And let the Decemvirs take special heed
The Offerings do with Grecian Rites proceed.
If this be duly done, banish your fears,
Your State shall thenceforth thrive for many years,
Phœbus will save you, and your Foes subdue,
Who now do waste your Fields, and slaughter you.

The Senate took one days time to consider of the Explanation of this Prophecy, and next day pass'd an Act, That the Decemvirs should inspect the Sibylline Books touching Games to be instituted to the Honour of Apollo, and the manner of Celebrating the necessary Sacrifices: Who having viewed the same, and made Report, the Fathers Order'd, That solemn Games and Pastimes in Honour of Apollo should be Celebrated; and that when the same were held, twelve thousand Asses [37 l. 10 s. sterling] should be allow'd the Prætor towards the Expences thereof, and of two greater Beasts for Sacrifices. And by another Ordinance the Decemvirs were required in all their Sacrifices and Divine Service of that day to observe the Grecian Rites and Ceremonies, and to offer up these Beasts following, viz. an Ox and two white she-Goats, all having their Horns gilt with Gold, to Apollo, and to Madam Latona his Sister, a Cow with like gilded Horns. The Prætor, before he exhibited the Show in the great Circus, made Proclamation, That the people during those Solemnities should contribute money for an Offering to Apollo, every one according to his ability. This was the Original of these Apollinarian Games instituted for obtaining Victory, and not for recovering of Health, as most people imagine. When they were celebrated, the people stood to behold them crown'd with Garlands, the Matrons went in Procession; every bodies door was set open, and they feasted throughout the City in the open street, and an high Holyday it was observed with all kind of sacred Ceremonies suitable to the occasion.

XIII. In the mean time Annibal continued about Tarentum, and both the Consuls for the present quarter'd in Samnium, but 'tis thought had a design to invest Capua, the rather for that the same Calamity which usually attends long Sieges, did already pinch that City, viz. scarcity of Corn, because the Roman Troops had either hindred their season, or eat up their Crop. The Capuans therefore dispatch'd Messengers to Annibal, intreating, That before the Consuls advanced into their Territories, and all ways were beset by the Enemy, he would cause store of Corn to be convey'd to them out of the adjacent Countries. Accordingly Annibal gave Orders to Hanno to march from amongst the Bruttians into Campania, and supply Capua with Grain; Hanno, to avoid the Romans that lay in Samnium, march'd by the way of Beneventum, and encamp'd on an Ascent three miles from that City, whither he order'd Corn should be brought out of all the associate Cities thereabouts, in which it had been laid up last Harvest, and and sent out strong Parties to convoy the same. After which he sent an Express to Capua, appointing a certain day when they should come and receive their Corn, and against that time to provide all the Carts, Pack-horses, and Beasts of burden they could get together out of the Country. But the Capuans managed this important Affair with the same sloth and negligence as they were wont to use in all their other Concerns, and sent not above four hundred Carts and very few Beasts of Carriage besides; for which Hanno gave them a severe Reprimand, saying, He saw that even hunger it self which causes brute beasts to look out sharp, was not able to excite them to a due care and diligence for their own preservation. So another day was prefixt when they should come better provided for the rest of the Grain. But the people of Beneventum having notice of all these Transactions as they happen'd, sent with all speed ten Messengers to the Roman Consuls (who lay encamp'd near Bovianum) to advertize them thereof. Who after due consideration, resolv'd that one of them should advance presently into Campania, and accordingly Fulvius, who undertook that Charge, march'd by night to Beneventum, and put himself within the Walls of the Town; where he was inform'd by those that dwelt nigh, That Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to get in more Corn; And the Treasurer was left behind to deliver out to the Capuans the Corn appointed for them; of whom there was now come to the Camp about two thousand Carriages, with a rude disorderly multitude of people besides, but unarm'd; That they did all things in an hurry and afright; That the Camp was quite out of order, and all Military Discipline overthrown by this Rabble of so many Country-Clowns intermingled amongst them. All which being well assur'd of, the Consul gave notice to make ready against the next night nothing but their Ensigns and Arms, for they should attacke the Punic Camp. At the Relief of the fourth Watch, they march'd forth, leaving all their Baggage and Artillery at Beneventum, and coming up to the Camp a little before day, struck such a terrour into the Enemy, that had it been situate upon plain ground, it had undoubtedly been won at the very first Assault. But the height of the ground no way accessible, but up a very steep Ascent, together with their Works, secured them for the present. Allsoon as 'twas light an hot Skirmish began, and the Carthaginians not only defend their Rampier, but having the advantage of the ground, tumble the Assaultants headlong down the Hill.

But so obstinate was the Romans Courage, that it surmounted all difficulties, and in several places they were got up to the Banks and Trenches, but it not being without a great slaughter of his men and abundance wounded, the Consul acquainted the Field-Officers, That he thought it safer to retire for that day back to Beneventum, and on the morrow encamp before the Enemy, and so prevent both the Capuans from getting out, and Hanno from returning; which the easier to effect, he would send for his Colleague and his Army, and turn the whole brunt of the War this way: But these Counsels of the General the fury of the Souldiers disappointed; for when he caus'd a Retreat to be sounded, they set up a shout as in disdain of such a lazy Command, and put the Consul besides his measures. Next the Enemies Gate, there was a Regiment of the Peligni, whose Commander Vibius snatching up the Standard, flung it over the Enemies Rampier, cursing and devoting himself and all that Regiment to the Infernal Gods, if they suffer'd the Enemies to enjoy that Ensign, and therewith himself formost leaped after it into their Camp, whilst the Pelignians were following him, and already fought upon the Rampier; at another place Valerius Flaccus, a Colonel of the third Legion, upbraiding the Romans with Cowardise for suffering a Company of their Allies to go away with the Honour of storming the Enemies Camp, T. Pedantius, the Prime Centurion of that Squadron, took likewise an Ensign from him that carried it; Now presently (quoth he) shall this Ensign and this Centurion (meaning himself) be in the Enemies Camp, and those that would not have it to be taken, let them follow it. His own Band followed him first, clambering over the Rampier, and afterwards the whole Legion, which the Consul seeing, changed his resolution, and now was as earnest to encourage them to go on, as before he was for having them retreat, shewing them what extreme hazard a most valiant Regiment of their Allies, and a whole Legion of their Fellow-Citizens, were in, if not speedily seconded; therefore they all, every one for himself, strain'd to the utmost, and though showers of Darts and Javelins were darted at them, and the Enemy oppos'd both their Arms and their bodies to oppose their passage; yet they press'd on with undaunted resolution, and failed not to attempt every place, high or low, easie or difficult, till they had broke through and got in. In which Service great numbers were wounded, but even they that bled till they fainted, were ambitious of dying within the Enemies Trenches, so that the Camp was taken in a moment, as if it had been situate on plain ground, and nothing fortified. Thenceforwards 'twas not a Fight, but a Slaughter pell-mell throughout the Camp, above six thousand of the Enemy slain, and more than that number taken Prisoners, together with all the Capuans that came for Corn, and their Carts and Cattel; besides a very rich Booty, which Hanno had plunder'd from all the Romans Allies. The Works being dismantled, the victorious Romans return to Beneventum, and there both Consuls (for App. Claudius came thither within few days) sold and divided the Spoil, giving rewards to those who first mounted the Enemies Rampier, especially to Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedantius eldest Captain of the third Legion. Hanno being at Cominium Ceritum when he received Intelligence of the loss of his

Camp,

Camp, hastned thence with some few Forragers whom he had with him, into the Bruttians Country, more like one that fled in a Rout, than with an orderly Retreat.

XV. The Campanians upon advice of this utter overthrow, both of their Confederates and loss of their own people, sent Agents to inform Annibal, That the two Consuls lay at Beneventum, but one days march from Capua, so that the War was but a step from the very Walls and Gates of their City, and if he made not Expedition to relieve them, Capua would sooner fall into the Enemies hands than Arpos did; that certainly they hop'd he would not think the whole City of Tarentum, much less the Castle only, of such importance, that he should for the sake thereof suffer Capua, forsaken and undefended, to be exposed to the Romans, even that Capua which he was wont to compare with Carthage it self. Annibal promising that he would take their safety into his care, sends back with the Messengers two thousand Horse at present to prevent the plundering of the Country. The Romans in the mean time, amongst their other affairs, neglected not the preservation of the Castle of Tarentum, and the Garrison there beleaguere'd. The Prætor P. Cornelius, by the Senates Order, sent C. Servilius his Lieutenant General into Tuscany to buy up Corn, who with several Ships laden therewith, arriv'd at Tarentum, passing through all the Guards of the Enemy. Whose Arrival so heartned the Souldiers, that whereas before, being well near hopeles, the Enemy would often, by way of Parley, tempt them to desert the service, and come over to them, now on the contrary, they were as busy to induce the Townsmen to revolt to them. And indeed the Garrison was pretty strong, the Souldiers that Quarter'd at Metapont being brought to their assistance, and the Metapontines were no sooner rid of them, but they fell off to Annibal; as did also the Thurines who inhabited not far off on the same Sea-Coast, being instigated therunto, as well by the Example of the Metapontines to whom they were related, being all descended from Achaia, as out of spight and revenge against the Romans for having lately put to Death the Hostages, of whom some were of their City. Whose Friends and Kindred sent Letters to Hanno and Mago, who Quarter'd not far off in the Bruttians Country, That if they would but bring their Forces before the Walls, they would surrender the City into their hands. The Governor there was M. Atinius with a small Garrison, but 'twas thought he might be drawn rashly to hazard a Battel, not so much on confidence of his own Souldiers, who were but few, as relying upon the Thurine Youth, whom he had caused to be all Muster'd and Train'd to Arms against such an Exigency; The Punick Generals divided their Forces, and so came into the Thurines Country, Hanno with a Squadron of Foot advanc'd with Banners display'd directly towards the City; Mago staid with the Cavalry behind the Hills which lay between him and the Town, very convenient to conceal an Ambuscade. Atinius being inform'd by his Scouts, that there was only a Body of Foot and no Horse amongst them, draws out his Forces into the Field to fight them, being equally ignorant of the Treachery within, and the Enemies stratagem abroad; The Foot Skirmish was but faint and slow, for on one side only a few Romans in the Vanguard charg'd the Enemy, for the Thurines stood rather waiting the event, than willing to hazard themselves; and on the other side the Carthaginians did purpose by giving ground to drill the Romans so far, that the Horse from behind the Hills might conveniently fall upon their Rear; who when they saw a convenience with a great shout charg'd on full drive behind them, and the Thurines as soon as they saw them, betook themselves to their heels, being but a raw undisciplin'd rabble, and besides not hearty to the side they were engag'd in; The Romans though encompass'd and charg'd behind with the Cavalry and before with the Infantry, yet for some time maintain'd the Conflict, but at last being over-power'd, they too began to fly to the City, where the Conspirators being gather'd together in heaps, after by opening the Gates they had receiv'd in their own Townsmen, when they saw the Romans come running apace in disarray, cry'd out, The Carthaginians were at their heels, and intermixt with them, would seize the City, unless immediately the Gates were clapt to; so the Romans were shut out and expos'd to be cut to pieces by the Enemy; only Atinius and some few more got in; after this there was Debate for a while amongst the Townsmen themselves, some being for standing on their Guard and defending the place, others for a present yielding to the Conquerors, but in the end Fortune and design together prevail'd, and having brought Atinius and his Souldiers to the Haven, and put them on Board (more out of affection to his person for his civil and gentle Government, than out of respect to the Romans) they admitted the Carthaginians into the City. The Consuls march their Legions from Beneventum into Campania, not only to destroy their Granaries of Corn laid up for Winter, but to assault Capua it self, thinking they should illustrate their Consulship by the destruction of so rich a City, and besides wipe off that dishonour and scandal from the Roman Empire, in suffering a place so near, to continue now the third year in Rebellion, without chastizing them for their perfidiousness. But that Beneventum might not be without a Guard, nor expos'd to sudden accidents of War, if Annibal should come that way to relieve his Confederates (which they doubted not but he would endeavour.) That there might be a sufficient Body of Horse to oppose him, T. Gracchus was Commanded to march with the Cavalry and light-arm'd Foot, out of Lucania to Beneventum, deputing some other to command in Chief during his absence, and govern the Legions and standing Camp left there for the Lucans Defence.

But

But before Gracchus could remove out of Lucania, one day as he was sacrificing, a terrible Prodigy happen'd; for after the Sacrifice was perform'd, two Snakes creeping out of some private hole, got to the Entrails, and eat part of the Liver, and as soon as they were espied, scrabled away immediately out of sight; and when by the Aruspices Advice, a new Sacrifice was kill'd, and the Bowels more narrowly watcht, yet they came again, and so the third time, and having bitten a piece of the Liver, vanisht. And though the Sooth-sayers declar'd that this was an Ill omen to the General, and forewarn'd him to take heed of treacherous persons and private Conspiracies, yet the imminent danger could by no foresight be prevented. There was one Flavius a Lucan, the Head of that Party, which when some of their Countrymen revolted to Annibal, continued firm to the Romans, and being by them Created Prætor, had continued a year in that Office; but now of a sudden, the Romans himself, and draw the rest of the Lucans to the same defection, unless he ratified his Alliance with the Enemy with the Blood of the Roman General, who was also his Guest, and Quarter'd in his House; In order to which he found means to hold a private Conference with Mago, who then presidet over the Bruttians, and having receiv'd assurances, That if he would betray the Roman General, and deliver him into his hands, the Lucanians should be received into Friendship upon even Terms, and enjoy all their old Laws as before; He leads the Carthaginian to a place, to which he would bring Gracchus under colour of a Treaty of Peace with others, and advises Mago to plant Horse and Foot there in Ambuscade, there being room enough to hide as many as he pleas'd. The place being thoroughly view'd and search'd, a day was agreed upon for putting the design in Execution. Then comes Flavius to the Roman General, tells him; That he had begun an Enterprize of great consequence, but to compleat it, should need his Excellencies helping hand; That he had prevail'd with all the Prætors and Governours of the several Nations, who in that general conturbation of Italy, had revolted to Annibal, to abandon his Interest, and return to their old Friendship with the Romans, seeing the Roman State and power which by the blow at Cannæ seem'd to be at the lowest ebb, had of late began to flourish again, and every day grew more strong and formidable; whereas Annibal's dwindled away, and was like to come to nothing. That there was no reason, they should apprehend the Romans would prove implacable for their former offence, since there was not on the face of the Earth a Nation better-natur'd, more ready to be reconcil'd, and pass by Injuries; for how oft (to go no further for Examples) have they forgiven the open Rebellions of your own Forefathers; These Arguments (says he) I have used to them, but they were desirous to have the same confirm'd from Gracchus's own mouth, and that he would be pleas'd to ratify the Agreement with them in person with his own right hand, than which they desired no better pledge. That he had assign'd them a place for this congress, not far from the Roman Camp, but out of sight, where the Treaty might be dispatcht in very few words, which would reduce all the several Nations of the Lucans to the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus not in the least suspecting any Treachery either in his Discourse, or the matter it self propos'd, both the one and the other being highly probable, and proceeding from an old try'd friend as he thought, suffers himself, only attended with his Lictors and one Troop of Horse, to be plunged headlong by the Villany of his Host into the prepared Snarcs of the Enemy; who on a sudden start out upon them, and to put him out of doubt that it was not accident but design, Flavius joins himself to their Party, who let fly Arrows, Darts and Javelyns against Gracchus and his Troop on every side; whereupon Gracchus alights, and commands the rest to do so too, exhorting them. That they would by their valour render honourable the only course which fortune had left; for what can we few circumvented here by a multitude in a Valley, encompass'd with Woods and Hills, expect but certain Death? This only is left to our choice whether in a stupid amazement we shall cheaply part with our Lives, and like Beasts suffer our Throats to be cut without opposition and revenge; or whether turning wholly our timorous expectations of death into a gallant fury, we shall acquit our selves like men, and bathing our hands in the blood of our Enemies, fall dead upon heaps of their Bodies lying gasping under us; But especially aim all of you at the heart of that Traiterous Renegado Lucanian; whoever shall send his Soul to the Devil before he is kill'd himself, shall certainly have his own death attended both with Comfort and Honour; Saying this he wrapt his Robe of State about his left Arm (for they had not so much as brought their Shields along with them) and charg'd with admirable Gallantry upon the Enemy. The Fight was much fiercer on their part than could be expected from such an handful of men; but as the Romans being naked without their Armour were the more liable to the Enemies Darts, so they were under the disadvantage of receiving them from the higher ground, whereby they were soon pierc'd through and destroy'd. Gracchus surviving now as it were alone, and his Guard dead at his Feet, the Punicks endeavour to take him alive, but he discovering his Lucan Host amongst them, flew in through the thickest of them, with such fury, that they could not spare his Life, without many of them losing their own. He was no sooner dead, but Mago sent his Corpse to Annibal, and order'd the same together with the Rods (Ensigns of his Magistracy) taken with him, to be presented before the Generals Tribunal; This is the most certain Relation of the end of Gracchus, and that he lost his Life in Lucania about the Plains which are call'd, The old Downs.

Not

XVII. Not but there are some report it otherwise, viz. That going out of the Camp with his Liſtors and three Servants to waſh himſelf in the River Calore, a Party of the Enemies lurking amongſt the Willows that grew on the Banks, ſeiz'd him naked and unarm'd, and that having nothing to defend himſelf with but the ſtones which the River afforded, he was ſlain. Others ſay, That by advice of the Arufpices he went half a mile from the Camp, into a void ſolitary place, to expiate the aforeſaid Prodigies, and there was accidentally ſurpriz'd by two Troops of Numidian Horſe. Such different ſtories there go both of the place and manner of this Illuſtrious Hero's death; nay, his Funeral is not agreed upon; ſome ſay he was buried in the Roman Camp by his own men; others (which is the moſt received Tradition) aſſert that Annibal cauſed at the entrance of his Camp a ſtately Funeral Pile to be rais'd whiſt the whole Army in compleat Armour perform'd Military Exerciſes, that the Spaniards uſed their Martial Dances, and each Nation according to their mode paid Honours to his Obſequies both by the motion of their Arms and their Bodies, and particularly that Annibal himſelf was no ways, either in words or deeds, wanting to expreſs his high Eſteem for his Memory. This they deliver who make Lucania the Scene of his Tragedy; but if you credit thoſe that ſay he was kill'd at the River Calore, the Enemy got nothing but his Head, which being carried to Annibal, he ſent it preſently to Carthago, who cauſed it to be return'd to C. Cornelius the Quæſtor, and that he celebrated his Funeral Rites in the Roman Camp, the Inhabitants of Beneventum joining with the Army therein.

XVIII. The Conſuls having entred the Fields of Capua, as they were careleſſy foraging, a ſudden Sally of the Citizens and Mago's Horſe put them into a fright; ſo that in an hurry they were glad to recal their wandring Souldiers to their Colours, and having ſcarce well drawn them up in Battalia, were routed and loſt above fifteen hundred men. This ſet the Enemy Cock-a-hoop, being a Nation naturally proud, and now they daily challenge the Romans with Bravado's and Skirmiſhes, but one Engagement raſhly and unadviſedly entred upon, had made the Conſuls more intent to avoid the like for the future. And a certain occurrence happen'd which both animated them, and daunted the Enemy, a ſmall accident I would call it, but that in War there is nothing ſo ſmall or light, but ſometimes it happens to be of great moment in the conſequence. There was one Badius a Campanian, heretofore an intimate Friend to T. Quintius Crispinus, and their familiarity increaſed; for that being ſick at Rome, he was very liberally entertain'd Gueſt-wife by Crispinus before the Revolt of Capua, and courteouſly taken care of till he was cured. This Badius coming up to the outward Guard before the Port of the Camp, deſir'd Crispinus to be call'd out, who imagining it was for ſome kind and familiar Conference, as not having forgot their private friendship, though engaged on oppoſite ſides by National Feuds, went forwards ſomewhat before the reſt of his Fellows to meet him; but no ſooner were they within ſight of each other, but Badius cries out, I challenge thee O Crispinus to fight, let us mount our Horſes, and try it out between us two, which is the ſtoutest man at Arms; Crispinus answer'd, That neither of them both need want Enemies againſt whom they might experiment their prowess; but for his own part he was ſo far from entring into a Duel with him, that if he had unluckily encounter'd him in a pitch'd Field, he ſhould have declin'd him, leſt he ſhould ſtain his hand with the blood and ſlaughter of his Gueſt and Friend. This made the Capuan more insolently upbraid him with Effeminacy and Cowardiſe, and all thoſe reproaches which himſelf better deſerv'd, telling him, That he call'd his Enemy his Gueſt, and pretended to ſpare him on that account, when the true reaſon was, becauſe he was not able to cope with him. But leſt he ſhould think that private obligations were not cancell'd by the publick Breach of Friendſhip between their Countries, he deſired all the World to take notice, That Badius a Capuan did there publickly in the preſence of the two Armies, renounce all Hoſpitality with Crispinus a Roman; That he would have no friendſhip, no ſociety, no rights of Hoſpitality with one that was come in hoſtile manner to invade his native Country, and violate all things ſacred and profane, publick and private therein; therefore if he were a man, he ſhould prepare for the Combate. Crispinus was loth to chaſtize his folly, but at laſt his Comrades of the ſame Troop prevail'd with him not to ſuffer the Capuan to inſult thus with impunity; ſo having ask'd and obtained the Conſuls leave, he arm'd himſelf, mounted, and ſummon'd Badius out by name to make good his Challenge; nor did he delay to answer him, and fiercely they charged each other, Crispinus with his Lance pierc'd Badius (above his Shield) through the ſhoulder, and therewith diſmounted him, and as he lay tumbled on the ground, leap'd off his own Horſe to diſpatch him. But before he could come at him, Badius got upon his feet, and leaving his Horſe and Target behind, ran away to his own Party; Crispinus carrying back his Enemies Horſe and Arms, ſufficient Trophies of Victory, was with great Applauſe and Congratulations of the Souldiers preſented to the Conſuls, who highly commended his Valour, and honourably rewarded him.

XIX. Annibal having diſlodged out of the Territories of Beneventum, and advanced near Capua, within three days after he came thither, drew up in Battalia, not doubting, ſince the Capuans of themſelves in his abſence, had lately fought the Romans with ſucceſs, but they would be much leſs able to ſtand before him and his Army, to whom Victory was almoſt become habitual. And indeed when the Conflict was begun, the Roman Battalions of Infantry were were hard put to't, eſpecially by the Incuſions of the Horſe who pelted them mightily with their Darts and Javelins, until Order was given to bring up their own Cavalry to encounter thoſe of the Enemy, who being ſmartly engaged one againſt the other, it happen'd that the Troops of Sempronius Gracchus lately ſlain, were deſcried at a diſtance, under the Conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Quæſtor, which put both Parties in ſuch fear that they were freſh Forces advancing againſt them, that at once they founded a Retreat on either ſide, as if it had been by mutual conſent, and making a drawn Game on't, retired to their ſeveral Camps; yet the Romans loſt the moſt men by reaſon of the firſt furious Charge of the Horſe upon them. Next Night the Conſuls to divert Annibal from Capua divided their Armies, and march'd ſeveral ways; Fulvius into the Territories of Cumes, and Claudius into Lucania, which Annibal on the Morning having notice of, was at firſt in a Quandary which of them he ſhould follow, but at laſt reſolv'd to march after the latter, who having led the Enemy about as far as he pleaſed, on a ſudden return'd another way to Capua. But in the mean time Annibal had a new occaſion offer'd him of ſucceſs in thoſe parts; There was one M. Centenius ſirnam'd Penula, one of the Chief Centurions of the Forces call'd Pilani, and eminent, as well for Stature and ſtrength of Body, as for Courage and Gallantry of mind, who having ſerv'd out his ten years time preſcrib'd by Law, in the Wars, was by P. Cornelius Sulla the Prætor introduced into the Senate-Houſe, where he requeſted the Fathers, That they would be pleaſed to allow him the Command but of five thouſand men, with whom he did not doubt but within a few days to do eminent ſervice. For as he was well acquainted both with the Enemy and all thoſe parts where the War is manag'd, ſo he no leſs underſtood by what Arts and Stratagems both our Generals and Armies to this day had been over-reach'd and trepan'd, and would turn thoſe very Policies upon the Enemy to their deſtruction. I know not whether he were more conceitedly fooliſh in promiſing this, or their Lordſhips more raſhly indiſcreet in crediting him, as if to be a ſtout Souldier, and a judicious Commander were the ſame thing, and one required no more brains than the other; but ſo it was, that inſtead of five, they committed eight thouſand men to his Conduct, one half Romans, the reſt Auxiliaries; and he himſelf in his march in the Country, levied a good many Volunteers, ſo that he came into Lucania near ſixteen thouſand ſtrong, where Annibal having followed Claudius to no purpoſe, was at that time Quarter'd; A man with half an Eye might have foreſeen the ſucceſs which ſhould overcome Annibal or a Centurion? one Army old experienc'd Souldiers, the other all raw and new rais'd, and a great part of them both undisciplin'd and ſcarce half arm'd? yet as ſoon as they got ſight of each other, neither ſide avoiding the Combate, they both drew up in Battalia, and though there was ſuch mighty odds, the Romans maintain'd the Fight for above two hours, and did not ſlinch as long as their General was alive to encourage them, but when he (conſidering the former reputation he had gain'd, and aſham'd to ſurvive the preſent defeat) hurling himſelf amongſt the thickeſt of the Enemy, was ſlain, immediately all his Army was routed, but ſo beſet were all the paſſages with Horſe, that there was ſcarce any flying away, inſomuch that of all that multitude ſcarce a thouſand eſcaped, the reſt ſome one by one means, and ſome by another, were all deſtroyed.

Capua in the interim is vigorously attack'd by the Conſuls, and all neceſſaries provided for carrying on the Siege. Corn was convey'd to Casilinum, and there laid up in ſtore; at the mouth of the River Fulturnus, where now the City ſtands, the Caſtle which Fabius Maximus built, was ſtrongly Garrison'd, to Command both the Sea and the River. And into theſe two Fortreſſes, both ſtanding on the Sea ſide, as well the Corn lately ſent from Sicily, as what Mucius the Prætor had bought up in Etruria, was tranſported from Oſtia, that the Leaguer might not want proviſion all the Winter. Upon the late loſs ſuſtain'd in Lucania, the Army of Volunteers who as long as Gracchus liv'd, had done moſt faithful ſervice, as if they had been diſbanded by their Generals Death, ran from their Colours, and diſperſed themſelves. Annibal had Capua ſtill in his thoughts, and was not willing to abandon his Associates that were in ſo much danger, but from the ſucceſs he had had over one Roman Captains raſhneſs, he was encouraged to be dealing with another, and fought occaſion to ruine both the General and his Army. For ſome Apulians brought him word, That Cn. Fulvius the Prætor, when he came firſt into thoſe parts, and attack'd the revolted Cities, was very diligent in his buſineſs, but afterwards, what with too much ſucceſs elevating him, and too much plunder debauching his Souldiers, both they and he were fallen into ſo much negligence and licentiouſneſs, that there remained no good Government or Discipline amongſt them.

Hereupon Annibal, who often before, as well as but the other day, had experience how inſignificant any Army was under an unſkilful Commander, remov'd his Forces into Apulia. The Roman Legions and the Prætor Fulvius lay encamp'd near Herdonia; and upon advice of the Enemies approach, they were all ready without any Orders to run out to fight them; nor did any conſideration ſo much retain them, as an undoubted hope, that they might do it at their own pleaſure whenever they liſt. Annibal having notice what a buſſe was in their Camp, and that moſt of the Souldiers were mad for the Signal of Battel, concluded he had an opportunity to do their buſineſs; and therefore the night following plants three thouſand light-arm'd Souldiers in ſome Villages adjacent, and amongſt the Woods and Thickets Thickets thereabouts, who at a certain Watch-word were all to start out of their Coverts; and also dispatch'd Mago with almost two thousand Horse to beset all the ways, by which he thought they would endeavour to escape when put to flight. Matters thus prepared, by break of day he draws his Forces into the Field; nor did Fulvius delay to meet him, not so much out of any hope himself had of success, as enforced to it by the importunity of his Souldiers. As they went out to fight inconsiderately, so they were drawn up as disorderly, just as the Souldiers list, they took their ground, and as any Capricio or fear induc'd them, left it again, and posted themselves elsewhere. The first Legion was marshall'd in the Front, and its Horse on the left Wing, being spread out in a vast length, though the Field-Marshals oppos'd it, remonstrating, That behind there was no force at all, but so shallow, that the least impression of the Enemy would break through them; but so far were they from considering any wholesom counsel, that they would not so much as give it the hearing. On the other side Annibal a General, of parts vastly superiour, came on with an Army like himself, so that the Romans stood not their very first Charge; and their Commander, though for folly and rashness he equalled Centenius, yet for Courage no way comparable, when he saw the Field like to be lost, and his men in a consternation, gets on Horse-back and fled away, attended with less than two hundred Troopers. The rest of his Army being routed in the Front, and charged by those in Ambuscade both on the Rear and either Flank, were so miserably cut to pieces, that of two and twenty thousand men scarce two thousand escaped; so the Enemy easily possessed themselves of his Camp and what there was to be had.

XXII. When Intelligence of these Overthrows, one upon the neck of another, arriv'd at Rome, it fill'd the City with fear and lamentation, but somewhat alleviated when they considered, that the Consuls on whom the main Chance lay, had hitherto gone on with success; to whom C. Latorius and M. Metellius were dispatch'd with Orders, That they should diligently rally the reliques of those scatter'd Armies, and endeavour that they should not through despair yield themselves to the Enemy, as happen'd after the defeat at Canne; as also to make strict search after those Volunteers that had abandon'd their Colours. The same Commands were issued to P. Cornelius, and likewise that he should make new Levies, who set forth Proclamation in all Market-Towns and places of resort, That Enquiry should be made after the said Volunteers, requiring them forthwith to repair to their Ensigns. All which directions were executed with the greatest care imaginable. Appius Claudius the Consul, after he had constituted D. Junius Captain of the Sconce erected at the mouth of the River Vulturius, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governour of Puteoli, with Orders to them both, That as fast as any Ships arriv'd with Corn from Etruria or Sardinia, they should convey the same to the Camp, went back himself to Capua, where he found his Colleague Q. Fulvius busie in carrying Provisions thither from Castellum, and making all possible Preparations for assaulting that City; which thenceforwards was invested by both Consuls, who besides sent for Claudius Nero the Prætor with his Army from Suessula, who leaving there a small Guard to secure the place, march'd with the rest of his Forces to join them; so that now Capua was furrounded with three distinct Armies, who falling to work in several places, endeavour'd to draw a Line of Circumvallation about it, and in divers Quarters at once they skirmish'd with the men of Capua, whenever they fallied out to hinder their Fortifications, with such success, that at last the Townsmen were glad to keep within their Walls; but before the Line was fully finish'd, the Capuans sent Messengers to Annibal, complaining, That he had abandon'd their City, and as bad as yielded it up to the fury of the Romans, withal beseeching him, That now at least he would relieve them, being not only besieg'd, but shut up by Retrenchments on every side. P. Cornelius advis'd the Consuls by Letters, That before they had fully invested Capua with their Works, they should offer as many of them as thought fit, liberty to come out, and carry their Goods with them; That all should pass free until the fifteenth of March, but whoever stay'd longer, must expect to be treated as Enemies. These Overtures were made to the Capuans, but entertain'd only with scorn, revilings and menaces; Annibal by this time had advanced from Herdonia to Tarentum, as hoping by force or fraud to gain the Castle there, but meeting with a disappointment, turned his March to Brundisium, supposing that Town would be betray'd into his hands. Whilst there he spent his time in vain, the before-mentioned Messengers from Capua accosted him both with Complaints and Entreaties; to whom he magnificently answer'd, That he had once already rais'd that Siege, and was sure the Consuls would never abide his second coming. Thus fed with hopes, those Messengers return'd, but could scarce get into Capua, it was so inclosed round by this time with a double Trench and Rampier.

XXIII. Whilst Capua was thus closely beleaguerr'd, an end was put to the tedious Siege of Syracuse, promoted not only by the Skill of the General and Valour of the Army that assailed it, but also by Intestine Treachery: For Marcellus at the beginning of the Spring not knowing whether he were best bend all his Forces towards Agirgentum against Himilco and Hippocrates, or continue before Syracuse, which he found could not be taken by Storm, being impregnable both by Sea and Land, nor yet starved out, since the passage in a manner lay open, for Carthage to send them in all kinds of Provisions; yet to leave no stone unturn'd, he order'd order'd some Deserters (for there were several of the Syracusan Nobles with the Romans, being expell'd from home, because they would not consent to the Revolt) to sound the minds of those that had been of their Faction, and to assure them, That if Syracuse were deliver'd into his possession by their means, they should remain free, and live at their own discretion; but they could get no opportunity of Conference: For many in the Town being suspected to be that way inclined, all eyes were fix'd upon them, that they should hold no Correspondence with the Enemy. At last a Servant of one of the Exiles being admitted into the City as a Defetter, to a few confiding men propos'd somewhat of the business, who thereupon in a Fisher-boat cover'd with Nets got to the Roman Camp, and discours'd with their Country-men that were there. In the same manner others, one after another, to the number of eighty in all, consulted them. But when all things were adjust'd for betraying the City, one Antalus taking snuff that he was not sooner intrusted with the Intrigue, discover'd it to Epicles, and so they were every one put to death with cruel Tortures. This design thus blasted, a while after another probable one was offer'd: One Damippus a Lacedemonian sent from Syracuse to King Philip, being intercepted by the Romans, Epicles was wonderful solicitous to ransom him, nor was Marcellus unwilling to grant the same, the Romans for some time having courted the Friendship of the Atolians, with whom the Lacedemonians were allied. The fittest place for the Commissioners on both sides to meet for settling that Affair, was at the Wharf Trogili hard by the Tower which they call Galeatra. It happen'd as they repaired thither several times about this business, one of the Roman Commissioners, viewing seriously the Wall, counting the stones that appeared in Front, and reckoning with himself their proportion, whereby he was pretty well able to give a good guess at its whole height, and found it not so high as he and others heretofore had imagined it, so that now he made no doubt but ordinary scaling Ladders might reach it. This he communicates to Marcellus, who look'd upon it as a thing not to be slighted; but forasmuch as there was no coming at that place at present, because by reason of its lowness, it was kept with a stronger Guard than any other part of the Wall, it was thought fit to wait some opportunity; which, as Luck would have it, soon offer'd it self by means of a Fugitive, who gave Intelligence, That there was a solemn Feast held within the City in Honour of Diana for three days together, and what good Cheer they wanted by reason of the Siege, was abundantly supplied with plenty of Wine, of which not only Epicles had bestow'd a great quantity on the Commons, but the great men in every Ward allow'd a proportion besides at their own Charges for their poorer Neighbours to make merry with. Upon this Intimation Marcellus calls a Council of War, and caused his Chief Officers to chuse out fit Captains and Souldiers for such a difficult piece of Service, and privately provided their scaling Ladders, ordering them to refresh themselves and go to sleep, for at night they were to be employ'd in an Expedition. Then when he thought the Enemy after their Feasting and Carousing were got into their first sleep, he commanded one Company of Souldiers to carry Ladders, and near a thousand well-arm'd, to follow them with a silent March to the place, where the foremost mounting the Wall without any noise or opposition, encourag'd the rest to follow them.

By this time the thousand select Souldiers had made themselves Masters of one part of the City, and the rest of the Forces advanced, and with a multitude of Ladders scaled the Wall, a Sign being given them for that purpose by those within from the Gate Hexapylus, for so far they march'd without any opposition, most of the Garrison being either feasting in the Forts, and already drunk and asleep, or else drinking on still, and so drowsie, that they minded nothing; and some few found in their Hutts, were kill'd. The Wicket at Hexapylus they began to break open with great violence, and the Trumpet according to agreement sounded from the Wall, to let them know they were there ready to second them. No longer was the matter carried closely, but with open force, and they made it their business to daunt and terrifie the Enemy, rather than steal upon them unawares, being come as far as Epipole, a place full of Watchmen and Guards; and indeed terrified they were, for assoon as they heard the Trumpets sounding, and the shouts of those that had got possession of part of the Wall and City, the Guards imagining all lost, fled as hard as they could drive along the Wall, or endeavour'd to leap down from it, and in that fright precipitated one another. But still the greater part wholly ignorant of any danger, lay drown'd in wine and sleep, and besides the City was of so vast an extent and scatteringly built, that those in one part were not sensible of what was a doing in the other. But when Marcellus came in with all his Forces, he rouzed them all, and every one was in an hurry to take Arms and defend if they could the City, which was almost taken already; Epicles made haste (from the Island which they call Nasos) at the Head of a Company of Souldiers, making full account to drive the Enemy out again with ease, as supposing they were but some few, who by the negligence of the Sentinels, were got over the Wall, and therefore those of the Town, whom he met running away in a fright, he severely chid, telling them, They themselves increased the tumult, by being afraid of Bugbears, making the matter worse and more terrible than it was. But when he saw all that part of the City called Epipole was seized and full of armed men, after a small Skirmish with Darts at a distance, whereby he only provok'd the Enemy, rather than much hurt them, he march'd back into the Acradine, not so so much for fear of the Enemies force or numbers, as lest some Treachery should happen within by occasion of his absence, and in that confusion he might find the Gates of the Acradine and Island shut against him. Marcellus after he was come within the Walls, from the highest places took a view of the whole City, one of the fairest at that time in the World; at which sight, 'tis said that Great Conquerour could not refrain weeping, whether they were tears of Joy at his having atchiev'd so mighty a Service, or rather of pity condoling the uncertainty of all humane Grandeur, when he call'd to mind the antient Glories of this Town, how they destroyed the Athenian Fleets, and cut to pieces two vast Armies of theirs together with their Generals, how gallantly they waged War a long time with the Carthaginians; How many rich and potent Princes had there held their Royal Courts, amongst whom he could not but with a more peculiar passion remember the late King Hiero, a Prince illustrious for abundance of excellent Endowments which Fortune conferr'd upon him, or his own Virtue acquir'd, but for nothing more famous than his constant inviolable Friendship, and repeated good Offices towards the people of Rome; when all these things at once occur'd to his mind, and withal he consider'd, That all that Beauty and Glory within one hours space was like to be on a light Fire, and reduc'd to rubbish and ashes, it could not but make strange Emotions in so generous a Breast, therefore to make the overthrow as gentle as he could, before he advanc'd his Ensigns against the Acradine, he sent before such Syracusians as were in his Camp to perswade their Countrymen to surrender, and not push on things to the last Extremity.

XXV. But the Gates and Walls of the Acradine were guarded for the most part by Renegades, who having no hopes of saving themselves by a Treaty, would not suffer any others to come near the Walls, or hold any Parley; therefore Marcellus seeing that overture had not success, marcht back unto Euryalus, which was a small Fort on the farther part of the City remote from the Sea, and commanding the Highway that leads into the Fields, and the very heart of the whole Island, a place very convenient for the taking up of provisions; The Governour of this Sconce was one Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides, to whom Marcellus sent Sofis, (one of the Killers of the late Tyrant) to capitulate with him touching yielding up the said place, but after a long Conference could bring him to nothing, but return'd word to Marcellus, That he would take time to consider of it, and so drill'd out the time from day to day whilst Hippocrates and Himilco were advancing with their Troops, not doubting but after their Arrival, they might be able to cut off the whole Roman Army being enclosed on each side within the Walls; Marcellus perceiving that Euryalus was neither like to be surrendred nor easily taken, Encamp'd between Neapolis and Tyche (two parts of the City so named, which for their bigness might pass for intire Cities of themselves) fearing that if he should go into streets well inhabited, his Souldiers greedy of Booty, would not be kept together, but be apt to straggle abroad for plunder; thither came to him, both from Neapolis and Tyche, Agents, with Olive Branches and sacred Fillets about their Heads and Veils, after the manner of Suppliants, beseeching him, To forbear putting the Inhabitants to the Sword, or firing the City; which entreaties (for so they were rather than Propositions or demands) being considered, Proclamation was made throughout the Camp, That no Souldiers should presume to offer the least violence to the persons of any people of Free born condition, but for all goods whatsoever, they should take them for booty. Marcellus's Camp was defended on both sides with Housing, as with a Wall, and he bestow'd a strong Guard at the Gates thereof facing the ends of the streets, lest it should be attack'd, whilst his Souldiers were a pillaging; For as soon as the Signal was given, they every where broke open the Doors and fell a rummaging in every Corner, filling all places with tumult and terrour, but refrain'd from bloodshed, nor was there any end of their rifling and ransacking, till they had seiz'd and carried away every thing of value, and utterly emptied the place of all those riches which the Inhabitants had so long in their prosperity been heaping together. Amidst these firs, Philodemus seeing no hopes of being reliev'd, upon Articles that he should march away safely to Epicides, drew out his Garrison and yielded the Fort to the Romans; whose Souldiers being generally busy in that part of the City which they had already taken, Bomilcar taking the advantage thereof, and of a tempestuous night, wherein the Roman Fleet, by reason of the rough weather, could not ride at Anchor in the main Sea, got out of the Haven of Syracuse with thirty five Ships, and set Sail for Carthage, leaving fifty five Sail still behind with Epicides and the Syracusians, and having inform'd the Carthaginians in what extrem danger the affairs of Syracuse were at that Juncture, return'd again thither reinforc'd with an hundred Sail, for which ('tis reported) he was richly rewarded with Presents made him by Epicides out of King Hiero's Treasury.

XXVI. Marcellus having gain'd Euryalus, and planted there a Garrison, was rid of one of his former fears, viz. Lest some new Forces of the Enemy abroad should get into that Fortrefs behind him, where they might greatly have annoy'd his men, being then as it were enclosed within the Walls. Thence-forwards he began to besiege the Acradine, having posted his Forces at convenient places in three distinct Camps, and was in good hopes in short time to reduce those within to extrem want and scarcity; The Guards on either side had for some days been pretty quiet, when on a sudden the Arrival of Hippocrates and Himilco, so incourag'd the Enemy, that on all parts they of themselves began to attacke the Romans; for both Hippocrates having Encamp'd and strongly fortified himself by the great Key, and given a Signal to those in Acradine, fell upon the old Quarters of the Romans where Crispinus Commanded in Chief, and at the same time Epicides sallied out upon Marcellus's Guards, and the Carthaginian Fleet came and lay close by the shore that was between the City and the Roman Camp, to hinder Crispinus's having any succour sent him from Marcellus; and yet after all this ado, the noise and tumultuous Alarm was greater than the Execution; For Crispinus did not only repulse Hippocrates from his Works, but pursued him as he fled, and Marcellus as easily beat back Epicides into the City; so as they seem'd now sufficiently provided against the like sudden Sallies or Irruptions for the future. Besides there happen'd a Calamity common to them both, viz. a grievous Plague, which much took off their minds on either side from prosecuting the War. It being now Autumn, the place it self naturally unwholsome and a bad Air, and the weather intolerable hot, mightily distemper'd their Bodies by the distemperature of the Season, and noisomness of the place; so afterwards by visiting and tending one another when sick, the Disease was spread and became infectious; so that those that were taken ill, either perisht for want of help and looking to, or else they that went to assist and tend them, were seiz'd with the same violence of the distemper; so that continually there were Coarces carrying to their Graves, nothing to be met with but Spe-dying groans. But at last being continually used to this misery, their hearts were so hardened, that they not only gave over to mourn for the dead, but even so much as to carry them forth or inter them, so that the dead Bodies lay scatter'd all about on the ground, in the sight of those, who every moment look'd for the like miserable death themselves; Thus the dead kill'd the sick, and the sick infected the sound, partly with fear, and partly with corruption and pestiferous stench; Insomuch that some chusing rather to die on the Swords point, would venture alone to invade the Enemies Guards, on purpose that they might be kill'd out of the way. However the Plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian Camp than in the Romans, by reason of bad water, the tedious Siege they had endured, and the great slaughter there committed; Therefore the Sicilians when once they saw the sickness spread so fast, got away, and stole every man home to the Cities near adjoining; but the Carthaginians having no place to retire to, were generally swept away by the raging Pestilence, together with both their Generals, Hippocrates and Himilco, and indeed there was scarce a man of them escaped. Marcellus when he found the Mortality encreased so sorely, drew his men into the City where the Houses and shadowy places yielded some refreshment to the sick, yet still a great many of the Roman Army were by this Pestilence destroyed.

XXVII. The Carthaginian Land Army being thus totally consumed, those Sicilians who had served under Hippocrates withdrew themselves into two Towns which were not great but strong and well fortified, one but three Miles from Syracuse, the other fifteen Miles; and thither they convey'd all manner of Victuals from their own Cities adjoining, and sent abroad for recruits of men. In the mean time Bomilcar was return'd (as we told you, with a greater Fleet) from Carthage, for he gave account of the Syracusians condition in such terms, as gave hopes, not only that he might come time enough to relieve them, but also, that the Romans, notwithstanding they had in a manner taken the City, might be surprized and taken therein themselves, by which suggestions he prevail'd so with the Senate, That they granted him abundance of Ships of Burthen, laden with all sorts of necessary Provisions, but also encreas'd the number of his Men of War, so that with one hundred and thirty Sail of tall Ships, and seventy Merchant-men, he put out to Sea, with a Gale fair enough to waft him over to Sicily, but the same Wind did not serve him to double the point of the Cape Pachymus. The Report of Bomilcar's arrival first, and then his delay beyond expectation, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romans and Syracusians, administering matter sometimes of fear and sometimes of joy unto them both. At last Epicides apprehending, That if the same Easterly Winds should long continue, the Navy might possibly sail back for Carthage, he, leaving the Guard of the Acradine to the Commanders of the hired Souldiers, goes down by water to Bomilcar, riding still with his Fleet in the Road that looks towards Africk, and fearing to venture an Engagement at Sea, not that he was inferior in strength or number of Ships (for he had considerably more than the Enemy) but because that Wind far more favourably for the Romans Fleet than for his; However Epicides was so importunate, that he in fine prevail'd with him to hazard the Fortune of a Sea-fight. On the other side Marcellus seeing the Sicilian Forces gathering together against him from all parts of the Island, and understanding that this Punic Fleet brought vast quantities of provisions, that he might not be blockt up by Sea and Land in an Enemies City, resolv'd to hinder Bomilcar from coming into the Bay of Syracuse. Thus rid the two Armado's affronting each other about the head of Pachymus, ready to Engage as soon as calm weather would give them leave to get out into the open Sea. When the East Wind which had blown strong for several days, was pretty well down, Bomilcar first weigh'd Anchor, and his headmost Ships seem'd to put out to Sea, only as it was thought that they might more easily gain the Cape and Promontory before-mentioned; but so it was, that as soon as he saw the Roman Fleet make towards him, affrighted by I know not what sudden accident, he made all the Sail he could possible out to Sea in earnest, and sending Orders to Heraclea that the Ships of Burthen should return for Africk, himself Coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his Course for Tarentum. And Epicides thus strangely disappointed of his hopes, resolv'd not to go back to be coop'd up in a City for the most part already lost, and therefore Sail'd to Agrigentum, rather there to expect the Issue, than troubling himself how to furnish them with any assistance from thence.

XXVIII. When these Tidings were brought to the Sicilian Forces, That Epicides was gone from Syracuse, that the Carthaginians had abandon'd the Isle, and in effect yielded it again to the Romans; they, having first consulted the minds of those that were in Syracuse, thought it high time to send Commissioners to Marcellus to treat of Terms for surrendring the City: Who being in a manner come to an Agreement, That the Romans should have the Seigniorie and all that properly belonged to the Kings; but for private persons Rights, Estates and Liberties, the Sicilians should enjoy the same, and their ancient Laws as before. The said Commissioners sent to those who were intrusted by Epicides to come to a Parley, and pretended to them, That they were sent from him as well to the Sicilian Army as to Marcellus, That all in general, as well those besieged, as those that were abroad, should be comprized in the Treaty, and none capitulate or enter into any Agreement apart for themselves without all the rest.

XXIX. Hereupon these Commissioners were admitted into that part of the City to visit their Relations and Friends, and did privately acquaint them what Terms they had made with Marcellus, and by giving them good hopes of safety, prevailed with them to join in cutting off Polycletus, Philistion and Sydon, who were Epicides's Deputies there; and accordingly they being assassinated, the people were summon'd to a Common Hall, where, as they were wont before privately to grumble for the want and scarcity of all things, so now they made publick Complaints on that account, till one of the wisest stood up and spoke to this purpose: Although we are beset with so many miseries, yet we have no reason to blame Fortune, since it is in our power to put an end to them when we our selves please. 'Tis well known, the Cause that induced the Romans to besiege Syracuse, was not any spite or ill will, but they did it purely out of kindness to the Inhabitants; for understanding that the Government was usurped by those two Creatures, first of Annibal, and afterwards of Hieronymus, I mean Hippocrates and Epicides, they then and not before began the War, and prepar'd to besiege the City, not intending any harm to the City it self, but only to suppress those haughty Tyrants, and rescue it from slavery; and now since Hippocrates is dead, Epicides departed, and his Deputies dispatch'd out of the way. As also the Carthaginians both by Sea and Land beat out of all possession in Sicily, what reason can the Romans have, why they should not desire Syracuse to be as safe and happy as in good King Hiero's days, their special Friend and Ally? There is therefore no danger at all to be feared either to our City or its Inhabitants, but from our selves, that is, if we slip this opportunity of reconciling our selves to the Romans. For never shall we have the like again, as at this moment, if we now embrace it, as soon as we appear delivered from those insolent Tyrants.

XXX. This Speech was entertain'd with general Applause; however 'twas thought fit to create Prætors before they sent Commissioners, and then out of the Prætors some were chosen to go Commissioners to Marcellus, of whom the Chief when admitted to Audience, spake as follows; *Neither did we the Inhabitants of Syracuse at first revolt from you. But Hieronymus, a Person no less injurious to us than unfaithful to you; nor after when the Peace was re-establish'd after the death of that Tyrant, was it any Syracusan that violated it, but the infractions thereof were made by these Royal Minions, Hippocrates and Epicides, whilst we were oppressed and kept under what with Fraud on one side, and Force on the other; nor can any one truly say, That we were ever at our own liberty, and did not faithfully maintain our Alliance with you. At this instant, as soon as by the Execution of those who held Syracuse in Bondage, we came to be at our own free dispose, immediately behold, we come to deliver up our Arms, surrender our selves, our City and all its Walls and Works, ready to refuse no Conditions that you shall think fit to impose upon us. The Gods have given you, most Noble Marcellus, the Glory of subduing the most illustrious and fairest City of the Greeks; whatever brave Exploits we have heretofore achieved either at Sea, all makes to the advancement of your Honour, and serve but as so many Labels to adorn your Triumph. Desire not therefore by our destruction to have it known only by Report and the Testimony of Fame, what a brave and mighty place it was which you have master'd, but let it remain to Posterity a glorious Monument at once both of your Valour and your Clemency; That whoever henceforward shall come hither by Land, or arrive here from Sea, it may present to their memories both the Trophies of our former Victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians, and also those of yours over us, the bravest Conquest of all the rest; suffer the City Syracuse undemolish'd to do Homage for ever hereafter to your Family, and remain under the Protection of the Marcelline Name. Let not your resentments against Hieronymus have more influence upon you, than your kind respects to the memory of King Hiero, who was abundance longer your Friend than the other your Enemy; his good Offices you were often sensible of, but the folly and madness of his Grandson could not reach you, it only* only centred in his own destruction. There was nothing but they might have obtain'd of the Romans, all was safe there; They were more at Daggers-drawing amongst themselves, and at home was all the danger. For the Renegade's fearing they should be delivered back to the Romans, and not comprized in the Composition, possess the Auxiliaries that were hired Souldiers, that they too would be left in the same predicament; What do they therefore but joining together, snatch up their Arms, and first cut off the heads of the Prætors, and afterwards ran all about to Maffacre the Syracusians, whoever came next in this rage they butcher'd, and rifled all that they could lay their hands on. And because these Rascallions would not be without Commanders, they chose from amongst themselves six Provosts or Captains, three to govern the Acradine, and the other three, Nafos, or that quarter of the City call'd The Isle. But after the uproar was somewhat appeased, the mercenary Auxiliaries, inquiring more strictly what the Articles agreed with the Romans really were? found themselves abus'd with mis-information, and that their condition, and that of the Fugitives, was very different.

To confirm which, the Commissioners seasonably return'd from Marcellus, assuring them, that they were carried away with a false surmise, and that the Romans did not pretend any cause they had to punish them. One of the three Provosts of Acradine was a Spaniard named Merio, to whom amongst the Commissioners Attendants there was purposely sent one of the Spanish Auxiliaries, who having got Merio to a private Conference, first acquainted him in what condition he left Spain (for he was newly come from thence.) That the Roman Arms there carried all before them, That he had an opportunity, if he would do a piece of good service, to make himself a great man, chuse whether he list either to serve under the Romans, or return into his own Country: on the other side if he persisted in that course he was in, and would still be besieged, what hopes could he have being shut up both by Land and Sea? Merio influenc'd with these reasons, when 'twas agreed that new Embassadors should be address'd to Marcellus, sent his own Brother for one, who by the before mentioned Spaniard was introduc'd by himself, unknown to all the rest, unto Marcellus, and after assurance of Protection given, and the manner adjusted how the Intrigue should be mannag'd, return'd to the Acradine. Merio to prevent all suspicion of foul play, declares, That he did not like this perpetual trotting to and fro of Embassadors, he thought it safer neither to send or receive any for fear of some surprize, and to the end the Guards might be more strictly kept, he advised, that the several Quarters of the City should be conveniently divided amongst the Provosts, That each might answer for the Post committed to his Charge. This the rest of the Provosts readily assented unto, and he happen'd to have that part which extended from the Fountain call'd Arcthusa, to the mouth of the great Haven; Of which he gave the Romans notice. Therefore in the night Marcellus caused a Merchant Ship fill'd with armed men, to be towed with a Galley to the Acradine, and landed the Souldiers over against the Gate that was hard by the said Fountain, about the relief of the fourth Watch, and Merio according to Agreement receiv'd them in at the Gate. Marcellus at the very dawning of the day brings up all his Forces before the Walls of Acradine as if he would presently storm, whereby he not only held those in play who were particularly order'd to guard that place; but also drew the Souldiers out of the other part call'd Nafos; who leaving their Guards hastned in Troops to relieve their Fellows and repulse the Romans. During this Tumult several Barges prepared and man'd before, were brought about to Nafos, and there set other Souldiers ashore, who coming unawares upon the Corps du-Guards left weak and thin, and finding the Gates left open by those who were just before gone through them to the Acradine, easily made themselves Masters of Nafos, deserted by the fear and flight of those that should have secured it; nor did any of them use less means to defend themselves, or more eagerness to be gone, than the Fugitives, who durst not well trust their own Fellows, and therefore in the hottest of the Skirmish made their escape. Marcellus being advertiz'd that Nafos was wholly taken, and some part of Acradine, founded a Retreat to his men, lest the Kings Treasure (which was noised to be much greater than it was) should if the rest of the place were taken by storm, happen to be rifled and embezel'd.

The fury of the Souldiers being a little allay'd, and time and opportunity given to those Fugitives that were in Acradine, to run away, The Syracusians eased of their fears set open their Gates, and send Agents to Marcellus, begging nothing else but their own and their Childrens Lives. Marcellus having call'd a Council, where those Syracusians who during these civil dissensions had been forc'd to forsake their dwellings, and take shelter amongst the Roman Garrisons, were likewise admitted to be present, return'd Answer to the said Agents in these words. There were not more good Offices for the space of fifty years received at the hands of King Hiero by the people of Rome, than injuries offered and mischiefs intended against them within these few years past by those that have had the Government of Syracuse; but most of those mischiefs have in the end deservedly lighted upon their own heads, and the breakers of the League have brought upon themselves more grievous punishments than the Romans would ever be willing to inflict; For my own part this is now the third year since I have lain before Syracuse, not with any design to enslave that City to the Romans, but to rescue it from the Tyranny and Oppressions of Rebels and Fugitives; What fair Quarter the Syracusians might have had from me, appears.

pears by the Example of those of that City, who were amongst the Roman Garrisons; by the usage of the Spanish Captain Meric, who delivered up his Garrison; yea by the free resolute surrender of the Syracusians at last, though somewhat at the latest, and their Treatment shall testify the same mild inclinations, for after all my toils and hazards which I have thus long undergone both by Land and Sea before the Walls of Syracuse, I shall count no advantage that might be made of its spoils so sweet and desirable a reward for all my services, as the glory of being able at last to conquer it. Then was the Treasurer sent with a Guard to Najos to receive and secure the Kings Treasure, and the Souldiers had leave to plunder the City, except only their Houses, who had been amongst the Roman Garrisons, at whose Doors Centinels were set to secure them. Amongst many lewd instances of rage and avarice then acted; 'Tis recorded that the great Archimedes, in such a mighty tumult as must be supposed in a City taken by an incensed Enemy, and Souldiers every where running to and fro to rifle it, was so unconcern'd, as to be busy in beholding certain Schemes and Mathematical Figures which he had drawn in the dust, and in that posture was knockt o' th' Head by a rude Souldier not knowing who he was; whereat Marcellus being much griev'd and offended, took care to have him honourably buried; and inquiring out his Relations, not only preserv'd them from all violence, but made very much of them, meerly in respect to his Name and Memory. Thus have you heard by what means Syracuse was won; In which there was as much or more rich Booty got, as if Carthage it self had at that time been taken, with whom it had long vy'd for Wealth and Power. A few dayes before Syracuse was taken, T. Oracilius with eighty Gallies cross'd over from Lilybaeum to Urica, and entring the Port before day, surpriz'd a great Fleet of Merchant-men laden with Corn, and Landing forrag'd all the Country thereabouts, carrying a mighty booty of all sorts aboard, so that he return'd to Lilybaeum the third day after he sail'd from thence with no less than one hundred and thirty Ships of Burthen freighted with Corn and Pillage, which Corn he forthwith sent to Syracuse; where if the same had not so seasonably arriv'd, as well the Victors as the Conquered had smarted under a grievous Famine.

XXXIII. In Spain for these last two years no memorable action had happen'd, and the War was carried on more by Treaties and strengthening Alliances, than by Arms, but this Summer the Roman Generals quitting their Winter Quarters join'd all their Forces, where a Council of War being held, it was unanimously concluded, That whereas hitherto they had only stoppt Asdrubal's intended Expedition into Italy, 'twas now high time to endeavour that an end might be put to the War in Spain; To effect which, they thought they were strong enough, thirty thousand Celtiberians having that Winter been rais'd and put in Arms. The Enemy had three Armies, Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo, and Mago, lay Encamp'd together about five dayes march from the Romans; But Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar, (that old Commander in Spain) was with his Army nearer, at a City call'd Anatorgis; Him the Roman Generals were desirous to attacque first, and hop'd they had strength more than enough to defeat him, and therefore all their care was left after he was routed, the other two should for fear retreat into the Woods and Mountains where they could not become at, and so spin out the War; Therefore it was thought best to divide their Forces into two distinct Bodies, and so at once to compass the whole War of Spain. And thus they parted them, That P. Cornelius with two thirds of the Roman Army and Allies should go against Mago and Gisgo-Asdrubal; Cn. Cornelius with the other third part of the old Army, and all the new-raised Celtiberians to engage the other Asdrubal of the Barchine Family. Both Generals and Armies advancing together, the Celtiberians leading the Van came to the City Anatorgis in sight of the Enemy, but having a River between, where they encamp't. And Cn. Scipio with the Forces before-mentioned continued there, but P. Scipio marcht on to manage that part of the War assign'd unto him.

XXXIV. Asdrubal after he understood, That there were but a few Romans (comparatively) in the Camp, but that their main hopes must depend on the Celtiberian Auxiliaries, knowing well the natural fallens of all barbarous people, and especially of those Nations amongst whom he had so many years been a Souldier, he found means, by the easy Commerce of the same Language (his Camp as well as the Romans abounding in Spaniards) to have secret Conferences, wherein he made a Bargain with the Chiefs of the Celtiberians, for a considerable sum of money, that they should withdraw their Forces and give the Romans the slip. Nor did this to them seem any heinous buliness, or very ill practice, as long as it was not required, That they should turn their Arms against the Romans; and they had as much pay for being quiet, as they should have had for fighting; And as Peace it self, so to return home, and see their goods and Lands, being very grateful and pleasing inducements to every body; that the multitude were as easily perswaded as their Leaders; nor was there any fear of the Romans, for they were so few, that they were not able to retain them by force. Which ought to be a Caveat for all future Roman Generals, and these bad Examples to be used as good Lessons, So far only to trust Foreign Auxiliaries as always to have a greater number of their own natural Souldiers Encamp'd with them. The Celtiberians all on a sudden pluck up their Standards and march off, and when the Romans inquir'd the reason and intreated them to stay; would give no other Answer but that they were call'd away by a War at home; Scipio seeing that he was neither able to retain them by request nor force, nor without them to fight the Enemy, Enemy, nor yet could now join his Brother, knowing not what to do, nor seeing any prospect of safety, resolv'd to retreat as far as he could, taking the greatest care in the World not to engage the Enemy in plain Field, or without some advantage, who now was pass'd the River, and traced him hard at heels in his dismarch.

About the same time his Brother P. Scipio was in no less fear, and greater danger by means of the approach of a new Enemy; This was Masimissa at that time confederated with the Carthaginians, but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans; He with his Numidian Horse encounter'd P. Scipio in his march, and afterwards continually day and night did so infect them, that he did not seize Straglers, and such as went forth for Wood and Forage remote from the Camp, but would often in a braving manner ride to and fro in view of the Romans Works, and by night alarm'd them with sudden Incurfions up to their very Ports and Ramparts, nor would he at any time or place suffer them to be quiet or free from the fear of his charging in upon them; Thus being compell'd to keep within their Trenches, and cut off from the benefit of all things abroad, they lay in a manner as bad as Belieged, and 'twas plain, That they would be much more straitned, if once Indibilis (who was reported to be upon his march with seven thousand five hundred Suessetanes) should join the Carthaginians; whereupon Scipio, otherwise a wary and prudent Captain, overcome with the necessities he labour'd under, entred into an inconsiderate resolution, to advance in the night to meet Indibilis and give him Battel wherever he should find him. Leaving therefore a competent Guard under the Conduct of Lieutenant General T. Fonteius to secure his Camp, himself in person about midnight drew out his Forces, met the Enemy and engag'd them, but the conflict was rather by loose Companies in their march, than with their whole Forces drawn up in Battalia; wherein the Romans had as much the better on't, as could be expected in such a tumultuary fight, until such time as the Numidian Horse (whom Scipio thought he was secure of, and that they had known nothing of his march that way) all on a sudden flank'd them, which put them into great Consternation; and to encrease their terrour, they had no sooner put themselves in a posture to entertain these Numidians, but a third Enemy appears; viz. The Carthaginian Forces, who by this time whilst the others were in Fight, hastening to assist their Allies, were got up thither, and charg'd the Romans in the Rear, who being every way beset, knew not against which first to make head, or on which side they were best with a close pointed Battalion endeavour to break through. The General in this extremity was not wanting either in Valour, or to encourage his men both with his words and Example, but exposing himself wherever he saw most danger, happen'd to be ran through the right side of his Body with a Lance, and that stout Troop of the Enemy that charg'd him, seeing him fall from his Horse, set up a shout and cry'd out, The Roman General was slain! This Voice once spread, caus'd the Enemy to take themselves undoubtedly for Victors, and the Romans to make no other account but they were vanquished; Therefore having lost their Leader they began forthwith to fly out of the Field; but as it was no hard matter to force their passage through the Numidians and other Auxiliaries lightly-arm'd, so to get clear away from so many Horse, and Foot almost as swift as the Horse themselves, was almost impossible, more being kill'd in the pursuit than in the Field, nor had scarce any surviv'd, but that it drawing towards Evening the night shelter'd their escape.

The Punick Generals were not wanting to improve this good Fortune, for as soon as the Battel was over, scarce allowing their Souldiers necessary rest, they marcht with all Expedition to Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar, not doubting but when they had join'd their Forces, to put an end to the War. There was mighty Joy and Congratulation at their meeting between the Generals and Armies for the late Victory, and the cutting off so great a Commander with his whole Army, nor did they in the like doubt but shortly to obtain another Conquest no less considerable. The Romans had yet no tidings of this overthrow, yet were stricken into a sad dumpish silence, or secret prefaging of bad news, as commonly mens minds are wont to fore-give them when some sad disaster is at hand. The General himself seeing not only that he was abandon'd by his Mercenary Allies, but also the Enemy so mightily reforc'd, by good Conjectures, and reason, was rather inclin'd to suspect some misfortune had already happen'd, than to hope for any good success to himself: for how was it possible that Asdrubal and Mago should come hither with their Armies without fighting, if his Brother were yet alive? why had not his Brother either stoppt their march, or at least pursued them in the Rear? Or if he could not hinder the Enemies Generals and Forces from uniting, he would certainly have made halt to join his Brother likewise to withstand them. Distracted with these thoughts he thought the only safe course he could take at present was to get away as far from them as he could, and therefore one night, unknown to the Enemy, and so without any interruption, he dislodg'd and got a pretty deal of ground of them. But as soon as they found him gone in the Morning they dispatcht the Numidian Horse after, who pursued him so violently, that before night they came up with him, and sometimes charg'd him in the Rear, and sometimes on the Flank; obliging them to an halt to defend themselves, though Scipio encouraged them (as the safest course they could take) to continue their march, and yet maintain their Skirmishes with the Enemy, as long as their Foot was not yet come up. But XXXVII. But sometimes fighting and sometimes standing still, they rid but little ground in their March, and night approaching, Scipio drew his men off from fighting, and posted himself on a rising Bank, a place not able to secure an Army, especially already disheartened, but the best and highest he could meet with thereabouts. Here inclosing his Baggage and Horse in the middle, and drawing his Foot about them in a Ring, they made no difficult matter of repulsing the Numidians Incursions; but when all the three Generals with their compleat Armies were come up, 'twas plain they could never maintain the place against them without fortifying it, and therefore Scipio searched every way how he might strengthen it with a Trench and Rampart; but the Hill was so naked of wood, and the Soil so hard and stony, that he could neither find Stakes for Palisado's, nor Turfs for a Bank, nor was able to dig a Trench, nothing being there fit for his purpose; neither was any part so high or steep, but the Enemy might easily ascend and mount it, the Hill on every side having a gentle and equal rising up to the top. However to make some shew of a Rampart, they took their Pack Saddles with their Luggage fastned to them, and piled them up round about to the height of a Mure; and where they wanted Pack-Saddles, they heaped together all sorts of Fardles and Baggage. The Punick Armies easily advanced up the Hill, but the sight of such a strange new-fashion'd Fortification put them to a stand, as wondering what it should be. But their Captains on all sides cry'd out, and ask'd them, what they stood still for? and why they did not advance and pull to pieces that pitiful Bauble, which even Women and Children would be asham'd to be kept off by? Did they not know that the Enemy already taken as in a Pin-fold, lay lurking behind those Fardles? Thus the Officers swagger'd, but in truth it was no such easie matter either to get over that Barricado of Packs, or to remove them as they lay so close piled up, however after a great deal of pains they did rid them out of the way, and made room for the armed men to enter at several places at once, then with no difficulty did they make themselves Masters of the Camp; for what else could be expected when an handful of men, and those already discouraged and terrified, were to deal with vast multitudes, and those too flusht with late success? Yet a great part of the Souldiers flying into the next Woods, escaped thence to P. Scipio's Camp, where T. Fonteius his Lieutenant commanded in Chief. As for Cn. Scipio the Roman General in this Battel, some Authors write, That he was kill'd on the Hill in the first Charge; others, that he with a few others fled into a certain Fort hard by, and that the Enemy not being able to break open its Gates, set fire to them, and so burnt them down and got in, and put both him and all that were with him to the Sword. Thus fell Cn. Scipio in the seventh year after he went into Spain, and the nine and twentieth day after his Brother lost his life; nor was the Mourning less for their Deaths throughout all Spain, than at Rome it self: For the sorrow here was aggravated in part both for the loss of their Armies, and of that Province and the publick Overthrow; but the Spaniards lamented only for their Governours themselves, especially for Cneus, as having been longer amongst them, and was both the first that gained their Affections, and gave them a Specimen of the Roman Justice and Moderation.

XXXVIII. Whilst thus the Armies seemed utterly routed, and both Spains lost, one man recovered all again. There happen'd to be in the Army one L. Marcus the Son of Septimus, a Roman Knight, a forward young Man, and both for Courage and Discretion beyond the Quality he was born in; this excellent natural Disposition was mightily promoted by the Discipline of Cn. Scipio, under whom he had so many years been educated in all sorts of Military Skill. This Gentleman rallying the scatter'd Souldiers that fled, and drawing out some from several Garrisons, had formed no contemptible Army, and join'd with T. Fonteius, P. Scipio's Lieutenant, and so much Authority and Esteem had he gain'd, though in Quality only a Knight, that when they had fortified a Camp within the River Iberus, and resolv'd out of themselves to chuse a General, going by turns to keep Guard at the Rampier till all had given their Suffrages, they unanimously conferr'd the chief Command on him: That little time he had was employ'd in strengthening their Fortifications, and bringing in necessary Provisions; and the Souldiers not only diligently executed all his Commands, but with great chearfulness, and seem'd no longer dejected with their past misfortunes. But after News came that Asdrubal the Son of Gisco had pass'd the Iberus to exterminate all the reliques of the War, and was advanced very near them, and that they saw the Signal of Battel given by this new Captain, calling to mind what famous Generals they had but the other day, and under what experienced Leaders and with what numerous Forces they were wont to go into the Field, they all on a sudden fell a weeping and shaking their heads, and some lifting up their hands to Heaven, seem'd to accuse the Gods, others flinging themselves on the ground, every one invoking his own late General by name. Nor could this Lamentation be stoppt, though each Captain endeavour'd what they could to encourage their respective Companies, and Marcus both threatned and reproached them all, for giving themselves up, like women, to such a vain puleing humour, at a time when they ought rather to rouse up their Spirits to defend both themselves and the Commonwealth, and not to suffer their brave Commanders to lye dead unrevenged, till suddenly the Enemies shout and their Trumpets were heard, being got near the Rampier; then grief turning into fury, they all ran to their Arms, and like mad-men flew to the Ports, and sallied out upon upon the Enemy who came on negligently and out of Order; this amazed the Punicks, whence so many new Enemies should arise, when both their Armies were but the other day cut to pieces? How they that were so lately defeated and put to flight, came to have so much Courage and Confidence? What Commander in Chief they could have now the two Scipio's were slain? Who should be the General, or give the Signal of Battel? Marvelling at these so many unexpected Occurrences, they at first gave ground, and being then briskly charged betook them to their heels, and a foul slaughter had been made of them as they ran; or else the fury of the Pursuers might by their rashness have prov'd of dangerous consequence, if Marcus had not presently founded a Retreat, and himself in person stopping the foremost Ensigns, and forced to hold back some of his men with his hands, had not restrained the eagerness of the Army, whom he led back into their Camp, greedy still of more blood and slaughter. The Carthaginians as at first they fled trembling from the Rampier, seeing none pursue them, imagining that fear made them forbear, with a slow March as it were in contempt retreated to their own Works, where they were altogether as negligent; for though they saw the Enemy near, yet they looked upon them but as the inconsiderable reliques of two late defeated Armies, of which Marcus having notice, resolv'd upon an Enterprize, which at first seem'd not only courageous, but Fool-hardy, viz. to attacke them even in their Camp; but he well consider'd both that it would be easier to master Asdrubal's Camp whilst he was yet alone, than to defend his own against three several Armies, when all their Generals should be join'd; as also, That if it succeeded, he should restore the afflicted state of the Roman Affairs in those parts, or at worst, if he were repulsed, he should however, by so daring an Attempt, vindicate his Forces from contempt and reproach.

But lest so sudden a Design, and the terrour of Night-service, should hinder an Undertaking, the success whereof depended on Fortune, he thought it best in the first place to make a Speech to his Souldiers, and encourage them; therefore having called them together, he thus discourst them: *Either the Reverence and affectionate Love which I had for our late Noble Generals, both whilst living and after their death, or that present hazardous condition wherein we all stand, may easily (my Follow-Souldiers) perswade any one to believe, that this Command wherein you have placed me, as from you it was a very great mark of Honour, so in it self is an uneasy task, and full of care and trouble: For at a time when (but that fear took away the sense of sorrow) I was not so much Master of my own Reason, as to be able to find out any comfort for my own pensive and dejected Soul, I am forced all alone (which is a most difficult thing to do under such mournful circumstances) to seek out means to alleviate the common Calamity of you all. And yet even then when I am to consider by what means I may be able to preserve these poor remainders of two Armies, for the service of our Country, cannot I divert my mind from continual grief? The bitter remembrance of our losses perpetually disquiets me, and both the Scipio's seem to haunt me day and night, and fill my head with cares and terrible dreams, they make me often start out of my sleep, charging me, that I will neither suffer them, nor their Souldiers (who for eight years were your Companions in Arms, and always victorious till now) nor the Commonwealth to be unrevenged, and withal warning me to pursue their Discipline and good Instructions; and as never any one paid a more ready and punctual obedience to their Commands whilst living, so now they are dead; whatever we can most reasonably conceive, they themselves would especially have done in any occurrences, the same I would have you, my Fellow Souldiers, to think the best course and approve, not with vain lamentations and womanish tears to bewail them, as if they were extinct and utterly lost for ever (for they live still, and shall always flourish in the Glory and Renown of their mighty Achievements) but as often as you think of them, think also, that you see them encouraging and leading you on to Battel, and so go into the Field to avenge their blood. Nor was it any thing else but such a kind of sight that was yesterday presented to your eyes and minds, and effected so gallant a piece of service, whereby you taught the Enemy, That the Roman Prowess dyed not with the two Scipio's, and that the vigour and courage of that People, which the Overthrow at Cannæ could not extinguish, will easily struggle through all other storms of adverse Fortune. Since therefore you have shew'd such Valour and daring forwardness of your own accord, I would gladly see how bravely you will behave your selves in an Exploit which your General puts you upon; for yesterday when I founded the Retreat, when you pursued so freely the disorder'd Enemy, I was far from intending to baulk your generous Courage, but only to defer it to a better opportunity and greater harvest of Glory, that a while after, you being prepar'd and arm'd, might fall upon them unprovided, unarm'd, and also asleep. Nor have I, Gentlemen, rashly entertain'd the hope of such an opportunity, but ground on good Reason and Experience; for certainly if any one shall demand of you, by what means you that were so few, and lately defeated too, could defend your Camp against such a multitude, and those likewise rampant with their Victories? You can only answer, That it was because you expecting and fearing their Assault, had both strongly entrenched your selves, and were all prepared and ready in Arms to receive them. Turn the Tables, and the Case will be the same here: men are never less secure than when flattering Fortune seems to have left them nothing to fear; for then growing negligent, they lye exposed to all dangers. Now certain it is, That the Enemy at this instant apprehends nothing less, than that we, whom they come to besiege and assault, should venture to be the Aggressors, and attacke them in their Works? Let us therefore* therefore but dare attempt that, which it cannot be believ'd we durst enterprize, and that self same cause which seems to make it most difficult, shall render it most easie and soonest effected. About the third Watch of the night I will lead you on with a silent march. I have a certain account that their Centinels observe no Order, nor have they any Corps du-Ginard abroad, a shout set up at their Ports, and your first Charge, shall make you Masters of their Camp. Then let me see you perform that slaughter and execution amongst them heavy and dead with sleep, trembling at an unexpected Alarm, and taken napping, from which yesterday you thought much that you were call'd away and reclaimed. I know, this seems a very daring undertaking, but let me tell you, when people are in extremity, and their condition next to desperate, the most resolute Counsels are always the safest; for if when the lucky nick is offer'd, you delay never so little, the opportunity will be past, and never to be retriev'd. One Army is here just by us, two others not far off; now if we venture presently upon the first, our opportunity and advantage is as good as theirs, and you have already made trial of their Forces, and your own. But if we linger till another day, and leave off, contented with the honour of our Yesterday's fally, 'tis forty to one but all the Enemies Generals and united Forces will by that time be upon our Tackets, and will you be able to stand before those three Generals, and three Armies, whom Cn. Scipio when his Troops were fresh and in good plight, was nothing able to cope with? As our Captains by dividing their Forces were overthrown, so the Enemy whilst they are separated may be routed; This and no other is the way to manage at present the War. Therefore let's wait no longer than the opportunity of this very night. Go then a Gods blessing, make much of your selves, take your repast and repose, that being fresh and lusty you may with the same undaunted Courage, break into the Enemies Camp, wherewith you defended your own.

XL.

The Souldiers joyfully entertain'd this new Counsel from their new General, and the more daring it was, the more it pleased them. The rest of the day was spent in furbishing up their Armour and Weapons, and cherishing their Bodies, and the most part of the night they slept quietly. But at the beginning of the fourth Watch they advanc'd. Beyond this next Camp of the Enemy, at six Miles distance, lay other Carthaginians Forces; and between them was an hollow Valley full of Trees; about the middle of which Wood, Marcius imitating Punick subtlety, had privately drawn round and posted a Regiment of Foot, and some Troops of Horse; so having cut off all Retreat, he march'd very still to the foremost Enemy, where he found no Out-guards at the Ports, nor Centinels on the Rampier, but entred the same without any resistance as quietly as if it had been his own. Then they found their Trumpets, and set up a shout, some cut to pieces the Enemy half asleep, some sling fire and dry straw upon their Tents and Huts, some seize the Ports to prevent their Flight; who being thus terrified all at once with Clamour, Fire and Sword, were like men deprived of their Wits, and were neither capable of hearing any Orders, nor to provide in the least for their own defence, so they stumbled by heaps unarm'd, upon Troops of the Armed Assailants, and were hewn to pieces, some run headlong to the Ports, others finding all passages shut, leap over the Rampier, and as many as got away fled with full speed towards the other Camp, where falling into the hands of the aforesaid Ambuscade, not a man escap'd. Yet had any one got clear away, the Romans after they had taken the first, flew with such Expedition to the other Camp, that no tidings of the slaughter could have got thither before them. There they found all things in a more negligent and disolute posture than in the former, as being further from any Enemy, and besides divers of them just at break of day, were rambled abroad to get Corn, and Wood, and other Booty; Their Weapons only stood rear'd up in their Corps-du-Guard, but the Souldiers unarm'd were either lying and sitting on the ground, or carelessly walking before their Trenches. With these thus secure and disorderly, the Romans yet reaking with the Blood of their Comrades, and on the Train of a fresh Victory, began to Skirmish, but the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the Gates; but within, upon the first Alarm, the Souldiers flocking together that way from all parts of the Camp, made a very stout resistance; and as the fight was fierce, so 'tis like, much longer it had continued, but that the Blood on the Romans Targets gave notice to the Carthaginians of the former Execution, and the Defeat of their Companions, which daunted them quite, and made them take their heels, and so as many of them as escaped killing, got away as well as they could, and were all turn'd out of their Camp. So that in one night and days time, by the Conduct of Marcius, two fortified Camps were won from the Enemy, and thirty seven thousand of them slain (as Claudius affirms, who translated the Annals of Acilius out of Greek into Latine) eighteen hundred and thirty taken Prisoners, a mighty Booty got, and amongst the rest a silver Shield weighing a hundred thirty eight pound, with the Figure of Asdrubal the Barchine thereon. Valerius Antias mentions only Mago's Camp to have been taken, and there seven thousand kill'd, and that in another Battel with Asdrubal upon a Sally there were slain ten thousand, and four thousand three hundred and thirty taken, and Piso writes that whilst Mago was pursuing our men who gave ground, he fell into an Ambuscade, and so lost five thousand men; but all Authors agree in applauding and celebrating the Courage and Conduct of General Marcius, and to his true glory they also add Miracles, viz. That as he was making the Speech to his Souldiers, there was seen a flame of fire about his head, to the great terror of all that stood round him, though he himself perceiv'd it not. For a memorial of this Victory

Victory over the Punicks there remain'd until the Capitol was burnt, the aforesaid Shield with the Picture of Asdrubal, and it was commonly call'd Marcius's Shield. Hence-forwards things were quiet a good while in Spain, after such mighty overthrows mutually given, either side declining further hazards.

Whilst these Tragedies were acting in Spain, Marcellus having taken Syracuse, and settled all the affairs of Sicily with such faithfulness and integrity as not only increas'd his own glory, but also the majesty and honour of the people of Rome; he brought away the Ornaments of the City, as rare Statues and curious pieces of Painting (wherein Syracuse abounded) to Rome. And well might he do so, being the spoils of the Enemy, and gallantly gotten by right of Conquest, yet it must be confess'd, That this first set us to admire and dote so much upon the rare Workmanship of Grecian Artifts, and from hence came afterwards that common licentiousness and outrage of robbing and spoiling all places sacred or profane where those Curiosities were to be had; which proceeded so far that at length it turn'd to the spoiling of the Roman Gods themselves, and defacing of that very Temple which by Marcellus himself was first of all so richly beautified with these Ornaments, that Strangers were wont to visit the same out of curiosity, meerly to have a sight of those excellent rarities of all kinds, of which at this day there is scarce any thing left to be seen. To Marcellus came Agents from almost all the several Cities of Sicily to make their Peace; but as their circumstances were not all one, so neither were they all allowed the same terms and conditions; Those who either had not at all revolted, or before the taking of Syracuse had reconciled themselves, were treated and respected as faithful Friends and Allies, but such as submitted afterwards for fear, were regarded no better than vanquish'd Enemies, and to receive Laws from the Conqueror. The Romans had still no small reliques of the War to dispatch about Agrigentum, for there were yet Epicles and Hanno the surviving Captains of the former War, to whom Annibal had dispatcht a third in the room of Hippocrates, viz. a certain Citizen of Hippo, descended from the Libyphoenicians, called by his Countrymen Mutines, a man of action, and educated under Annibal in all the Arts of War. Unto whose Charge Epicles and Hanno committed the charge of the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he so foraged the Enemies Territories, and so nimbly reforted unto all the Confederates to engage them to continue their Fidelity, and to assist them on any occasion, that in a short time all Sicily rang with his Fame, and those that favour'd the Carthaginian Faction began to make him the chief Anchor of their Hopes. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicles the Syracusan, who for a time had been pent up within the Walls of Agrigentum, now not so much by the advice of Mutines, as on the confidence they repos'd in him, came forth and pitcht their Tents at the River Himera. Of which Marcellus being advis'd, presently advanc'd, and sat down but four miles distant from them, waiting to see what they would do; but Mutines gave him neither place to rest in, nor time to consult, but passing the River, with mighty violence fell upon their Outguards, and the next day gave them a fair Battel, and forc'd them to retire within their Trenches. But being called from thence by occasion of a Mutiny of Numidians (who to the number of almost three hundred were departed to Heraclea Minoa) whilst he went to pacify and reclaim them, 'tis said, he was very importunate with the other Captains not to fight in his absence; which they both took in dudgeon, especially Hanno, who now began to be jealous of his own Honour; What, says he, shall Mutines prescribe Laws to us? and a degenerate African over-rule a Carthaginian General, commissioned by the Senate and People? He therefore perswaded Epicles (who was somewhat backward) to pass the River, for if they should wait for Mutines, and win the Field, he would undoubtedly go away with the glory of it.

Marcellus thinking it a foul indignity, If he who repuls'd Annibal himself from Nola, even when he was in his highest Pride for the Victory, should now retreat from these Fellows whom he had already routed both at Sea and Land, gave Orders in all hast for his Souldiers to arm, and advance their Ensigns; whilst he was drawing up in Battalia, ten Numidians came riding to him full speed from the Enemies Host, who inform'd him, That their Countrymen who were first disgusted in that Mutiny which occasion'd three hundred of them to retreat to Heraclea, being now further affronted by seeing their own Commander, by the subtlety of the other two Captains, envying his glory, sent out of the way, just on the day when they were to engage, were resolv'd not to strike a stroke. Though that people be naturally deceitful, yet here they kept their words; nor was this a small Encouragement to the Romans, special Messengers being dispatcht through the whole Army to assure them the Enemy was destitute of Horse, which most of all they stood in fear of; nor were the Enemy less disheartned as not only seeing themselves deserted by their main strength, but fearing they should also be charg'd by their own Horse. So that the Conflict was not difficult, the first push determin'd the fate of the day, the Numidians standing quietly on the Wings when they saw their men ran, accompanied them but a little, for perceiving they all made for Agrigentum, fearing they should there be shut up with a Siege, slipt away into several Neighbouring Cities. Many thousands were here slain, and eight Elephants taken. This was the last Battel Marcellus fought in Sicily, who return'd victorious to Syracuse. By this time, the year was almost expired. Therefore the Roman Senate decreed, That P. Cornelius the Prætor should write to the Consuls at Capua, That whilst now Annibal was remote, and no great matter of consequence like in the interim to be perform'd at their Leaguer, one of them, if they thought fit, should repair to Rome, for chusing new Magistrates. Upon the receipt of which Letters the Consuls agreed between themselves, That Claudius should manage the Elections, and Fulvius remain before Capua; The new Consuls created by Claudius were Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpicius Galba the Son of Servius, a man that had never born any Curule Office of State before. The Prætors were L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpicius, and C. Calpurnius Piso. This last had the City-Jurisdiction, Sulpicius the Government of Sicily, Cethegus of Apulia, and Lentulus of Sardinia. The Consuls had their Commands over the Armies continued for another year.

DECADE III. BOOK VI.

The E P I T O M E.

10. Annibal Encamps on the River Anio, but three miles from Rome; himself in person with two thousand Horse rode up to the Gate Capena, to take a view of the Cities situation. 11. The Armies on both sides two dayes together facing each other in Battalia, stormy weather each time hindered them from an Engagement, though as soon as ever they were retreated to their respective Camps, it prov'd fair. 14. Capua is taken by Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius the Consuls, and the chief men of that City, hasten their own deaths by poison. 15. The Senators of Capua being tied up for Execution, Q. Fulvius the Consul receiving Letters from the Senate, containing a Pardon as to their Lives, pockets them up unread, and proceeds to put them to Death. 18, 19. A Common-Hall being Assembled to chuse a Governor for Spain, and none being willing to accept that Charge, P. Scipio, the Son of him of the same name that was lately slain there, offers himself; and with a general consent is dispatcht thither; who being but a young man not twenty four years old, in one day took the City call'd New Carthage; and was supposed to be of some Divine Descent, both because always after he came to Mans Estate, he constantly frequented the Capitol, as also, because a strange Snake was wont to be seen in his Mothers Bed-Chamber. 21. This Book likewise contains the Actions perform'd in Sicily, the League with the Ætolians, and the wars against the Acarnanians, and Philip King of Macedonia.

V. C. 342. 1. CN. Fulvius Centimalus and P. Sulpicius Galba the Consuls, entring upon their Office on the fifteenth of March, summon'd a Senate and consulted the Fathers touching the management of the War and the disposal of the Provinces and the Armies: Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius, last years Consuls, were continued in their Commands over the same forces, and besides had Orders, Not to depart from Capua, which they were then besieging, until the same was taken: For above all other Affairs, the Romans at that time were most intent upon that; not so much out of anger and revenge, (though they had never juster cause given them by any City) as out of interest; For being a City so rich and illustrious, as by its Revolt it drew away with it several of the Allies, so by its being again reduced to Obedience, it was like to incline many of their minds to the same awful respect as they had formerly for the Roman Empire. The last years Prætors also had their Commands continued, M. Junius in Etruria, and P. Sempronius in Gallia, with two Legions apiece; and so Marcellus remained as Pro-consul in Sicily, to dispatch what remained of the War there, with the same Army he had; and if he wanted any Recruits, was to be re-inforced out of those Troops which were under the Conduct of P. Cornelius the Proprætor in the same Island, provided that he should chuse none of those Souldiers that escaped at Cannæ, whom the Senate had refused to dismiss or suffer to return home before the end of the War. Unto C. Sulpicius, whose Lot it was to have the Government of Sicily, were assign'd those two Legions which P. Cornelius had before, with a fresh Supply out of the Army of Cn. Fulvius, which the last year was so shamefully routed in Apulia; which Souldiers, by a Decree of the Senate, were not to be dismissed the Service sooner than those of Cannæ; and for a further disgrace to them both, it was Order'd, That they should lye all the Winter abroad in the Field, and their Camp not to be within ten miles of any City. L. Cornelius in Sardinia had those two Legions that Q. Mucius had commanded, and if they wanted any Recruits, the Consuls were to make new Levies; T. Otacilius and M. Valerius with the same Forces and Ships which they had already, were appointed to secure the Sea-Coasts of Sicily and Greece. The Greeks had fifty Sail in their Fleet man'd with one Legion: The Sicilians an hundred Ships and two Legions to furnish them; so that the Romans this year maintain'd three and twenty Legions to carry on the War by Sea and Land.

II. In the beginning of the year Letters from the before-mentioned L. Marcius being taken into Consideration by the Senate, the Contents thereof were very acceptable, and all agreed he had perform'd excellent Service; but most of their Lordships were offended, in that he had assumed to himself a Title of Honour, and wrote in this Stile [L. Marcius the Proprætor

Proprætor to the Senate, Greeting] when neither the People nor Senate had bestow'd that Character upon him. 'Twas alledged, It would be a very ill Precedent to have Generals of the Field chosen by Armies and the Solemnity of Elections, always hitherto celebrated in the Name of the Gods and with Religious Auspices, now transferr'd into Camps and Provinces, far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to the Capricio's of the rash inconsiderate Souldiery. But when some urged to bring that matter presently to a Judicial Hearing, it was thought better to defer it, until those Gentlemen whom Marcius had sent, were gone back: As touching the Corn and Cloaths which he desired, it was Order'd to return Answer, That the Senate would take care to supply him. But they would by no means direct their Letter to him with the Title of Prætor, lest they might seem to approve and confirm his Pretensions, which were left to be determined of afterwards: And indeed after his Messengers were departed, the first thing the Consuls did, was to propound that Affair, and it was unanimously agreed, That the Tribunes of the Commons should with all expedition assemble them, and put it to the Vote, Who they would please to send into Spain to command that Army, which lately was under the Conduct of Cn. Scipio? The Tribunes were made acquainted herewith, and a Bill prefer'd to the Commons. But all mens minds were taken up with another more important Controversie then on Foot; for C. Sempronius Blasius had commenc'd a Criminal Process against Cn. Fulvius for the loss of the Army in Apulia, and ceased not in all the Assemblies of the People to inveigh against him, That by ignorance and rashness many Generals had precipitated their Forces into danger, but never any but Cn. Fulvius had so industriously debauch'd his Legions with all kind of vices before he betray'd them; so that it might truly be said, they were undone before ever they saw the Enemy, and were not so much overcome and spoiled by Annibal as by their own Commander. Such small care do people take, now a-days, in their Elections, who or what kind of person it is that they chuse for a General, and to whom they commit that most important Charge of an Army. What a vast difference there is between this mans Conduct and that of T. Sempronius? The latter having the Leading of an Army of Bond-slaves, by Discipline and good Government in a little time brought them to that pass, that none of them when they came into the Field seem'd to be of that blood and condition, but behaved themselves so, as to be a sure defence to their Friends, and a dread to their Enemies: having recovered Cumes, Beneventum, and other Cities as it were out of the very jaws of Annibal, and restor'd them to the People of Rome. Whereas on the contrary, Cn. Fulvius having receiv'd an Army of Roman Citizens, well-born and liberally educated, has taught them vices that Slaves would be ashamed of, and so train'd them up, that amongst their Allies they were insolent and unruly; to their Enemies Hen-hearted and meer Cowards: for so far were they from sustaining the Carthaginians Charge, that they could not endure their sight, but ran away for fear of their shout at a distance; nor indeed was it any wonder, that the Souldiers should stand to't, when their General himself was the first man that took his heels; 'tis rather to be admir'd that any of them kept their ground and died in the Field, that they were not all as timorous as he, and did not accompany their Leader in his shameful Flight. C. Flaminius, L. Paulus, L. Posthumus, and both the Scipio's chose rather to die in the Bed of Honour bravely fighting, than to desert their Armies, though environ'd round with their Enemies: But Cn. Fulvius thought it better to reserve himself to be in a manner the only Messenger that should carry the Tidings of his Armies being overthrow'n. How shamefully partial will our proceedings be accounted, if when those Souldiers that fled out of the Field at Cannæ, should be sentenc'd to be transported into Sicily without hopes of return till the Enemy be beat out of Italy, and the same punishment inflict'd by a late Decree on the Legions under Cn. Fulvius; and yet this Cn. Fulvius their General, who set them the Example of Cowardise, and ran forsooth out of that Battel which his own rashness had engaged them in, shall himself scape scot-free and without any publick Brand of Infamy? If he shall be suffered here at liberty to spend his old Age, as he did his Youth in Taverns and Brothel-houses, whilst his poor Souldiers guilty of no other Crime but being too like their General, are sent away as into Exile, and condemn'd to an ignominious and unlimited Warfare; so unequally managed are our Liberties at Rome between the Rich and the Poor, the Nobles and the Commons. The Defendant shifted off all the blame from himself, and laid it on his Souldiers; That they with impatience bawl'd for the Signal of Battel, and he would not let them go on so soon as they required it, because then it was late, but the next day at a convenient place and on equal ground, he orderly drew them up in Battalia, but when they came to engage, for all their eagerness before, they were not able to stand the shock of the Enemy, whether it were only their Fame that daunted them, or their Force that overpower'd them; That when they all confusedly fled, he himself was carried away in the throng of the Rout, as Varro at the Battel of Cannæ, and many other Generals have been; And what good could he have done the Commonwealth, if he had stay'd behind all alone? Unless his death could have prevented such publick Losses for the future? That he lost not his Army for want of providing them Victuals and Necessaries; That he did not rashly lead them into any places of disadvantage; nor was circumvented by the Enemy for want of diligence in sending out his Scouts before him, but was fairly beaten in the open Field by dint of Sword; and have not the bravest Commanders in the World had the like misfortunes? The Courage of his own men, or of the Enemy, was a thing not in his power either to give or take away, since every one is stout or faint-hearted from his own Nature and Constitution.

Two several dayes he was judicially accus'd, and referr'd to the people to set a Fine on his

his head, the third day the Witnesses were Examined, where after he had been loaded with all kind of reproaches, Evidence was given by many upon Oath, That the consternation and flight took its beginning from the Prator himself, and that the Souldiers finding he had deserted them, and concluding that their General had certainly some good grounds of fear, they thereupon turn'd their backs and fled. Upon this Testimony the whole Court was so incensed, That they cry'd out he ought to be proceeded against Capitally. But about this a new contest arose, for whereas the Tribune had twice refer'd it to the people for a pecuniary mulct, and now seem'd to wave that, and willing to make it a matter of Life or Death, the Defendant appeal'd to the other Tribunes, but they refus'd to interpose, saying, they would not hinder but he might proceed, according to the antient manner used by their Forefathers, either at common Law, or upon the Statute; and bring him, being but a private person, to a Trial, either for his Life, or for a Misdemeanour; Then Sempronius charg'd him point blank with High Treason, and desired C. Capurnius the City Prator to assign a day for a Common Hall, to determine the matter. Then the Defendant endeavour'd to try another expedient to bring him off, which was to get his Brother Q. Fabius (a person for his services and merits high in the affections of the people, and especially for the near hopes he was in of taking Capua) to be present at the Trial, and make an Interest in his behalf; but when the said Q. Fulvius had requested so much, by Letters indited as affectionately as he could devise to move Commiseration towards his Brother, and the Fathers had denied it, and voted, That it was not for the service of the Commonwealth that he should stir from Capua; thereupon before the day appointed for the Common-Hall, C. Fulvius the Criminal, withdrew into the Country of the Tarquinius, and the Commons by an Act decreed, That the same should be accounted a just and legal Banishment.

IV. All this while the whole Force of the War was bent against Capua, and yet it was rather faintly beleaguerr'd than violently assaulted. The Servants and common people could no longer endure the Famine, nor yet were able to send any Messengers to Annibal, all Avenues were so strictly guarded. At last there was a Numidian that offer'd to get clear to him with Letters, and perform'd his word, escaping in the night through all the Roman Camp; which encouraged the Besieged so far as to attempt a sally on all sides of the City whilst yet they had some competent strength left them. And in divers irruptions of their Horse they had generally the better on't, but in Foot-Skirmishes were always worsted, but the Romans were not so glad of their Victories, as vex'd in any sort to be overcome by a belieged and in a manner vanquish'd Enemy; so at length they found out a device to supply by policy what they wanted in strength; a draught was made out of all the Legions of young men that were of the most vigorous, light, and nimble Bodies, whom they arm'd with shorter Targets than Horsemen commonly use, and seven Javelins apiece, each about four Foot long, with Iron Spikes at one end, such as are in the Javelins of those light arm'd Souldiers appointed to begin Skirmishes. Each Horseman mounted one of these behind him, and us'd them both to sit the Horse and ride behind them, and on a signal given, to jump down with wonderful agility. After by daily practice they could readily, and without any fear, perform these Exercises, the Horse advanc'd into the Plain between their Camp and the Town-Wall, to encounter the Capuan Cavalry, who there stood in a Body, and as soon as they were come within a Darts cast of each other, these Javelineers, at a sign given, all dismount in an instant, and so form a Body of Foot, and charge the Enemies with their new-fashion'd Weapons, wounding many both men and Horses; yet the surprize and fright of such an unexpected and novel Encounter, was worse than the real damage, till the Roman Horse finding the Enemy daunted and amaz'd, broke in amongst them, put them to flight, and had the killing of them up to the Gates of the City. Hence forwards the Romans were too hard for them in Horse-Service, and it was Order'd, That there should be some of these light-arm'd Javelineers in every Legion. The first Inventor of this intermingling Foot amongst the Horse, is reported to have been Q. Navius a Centurion, and that he was highly honour'd by the General for the same.

V. Whilst affairs at Capua were in this posture, Annibal's thoughts were distracted, whether he should presently advance thither to preserve that City, or stay to recover the Castle of Tarentum? but the regard of Capua prevail'd, as being a place on which he saw the Eyes of all his Allies were fixt, and like to give a Specimen what would be the Issue of all other Revolters from the Romans; Therefore leaving a great part of his Baggage and all his heavy-harnes'd Souldiers amongst the Bruttians, he hastens into Campania, with a select Body of Horse and Foot; such as were most fit for Expedition; yet as fast as he march'd, there followed him thirty three Elephants; He sat down in a Valley behind the Mountain Tifata, which overlooks Capua, and having at his first coming taken the Castle Galatia, and drove the Garrison out of it by force, he turn'd his Forces against those that were besieging Capua; having first sent private advice to that City, at what hour he would attack the Roman Camp, that they being ready might at the same instant sally out at all their Gates. The Romans having no notice by their Scouts of his advance, were so much the more terrified: for he set upon them in one place, and the Capuans at another, with all their Horse and Foot, together with the Punic Garrison commanded by Bostar and Hanno: The Romans left in so doubtful Case running running all to any one part, they should leave another undefended, did thus divide their Forces, App. Claudius was to grapple with the Capuans; Fulvius to encounter Annibal; Claudius Nero the Pro-Prator, with the Horse of the sixth Legion to secure the road which leads to Suessula; and C. Fulvius Flaccus the Lieutenant General, with the associate Cavalry, was posted along the Bank of the River Vulturinus; The Battel began not after the usual manner, only with Shouts and Out cries, but besides all other clamours of Souldiers, neighings of their Horses, and rattlings of Armour, there was a multitude of Capuans unfit for military service, placed upon the Walls, who with the tinkling of Basons, and beating upon Brazen Vessels (as the manner is in the dead time of night when the Moon is in Eclipse) made such an hideous noise as amus'd and diverted their minds who were engag'd. Appius easily repuls'd the Capuans from the Rampier; but Fulvius had a harder task, Annibal and the Carthaginians charging so fiercely upon him, that the sixth Legion gave ground, who being beat back, a Regiment of Spaniards with three Elephants advanc'd as far as the Entrenchments, and had broke through the Main Battel of the Romans, but that they were afraid of being hemm'd in, and excluded from the rest of their Companies. Fulvius perceiving this consternation of that Legion, and the danger his Camp was in, encourag'd Q. Navius and other prime Centurions, to attack and cut to pieces that Regiment of the Enemy who were now fighting under the Rampier, telling them, That now all was at stake, and they must either give way to the Enemies, who would then more easily enter the Camp than they had already pierc'd through the thick Squadrons of the main body, or else they must dispatch them, before they got further; which would be no difficult service, considering they were but an handful of men, separated and shut out from any succours from their Fellows, and the same Roman Battalions, which now whilst they are affrighted, seem open and interrupted, if they would but make head, and turn on both sides upon the Enemy, were able to environ and cut them off in the midst; Navius upon these words of the General snatcht the Standard of the second Band of the Hastati out of the hands of the Ensign-Bearer, display'd it in the face of the Enemy, threatening to fling it into the midst of them unless his Souldiers made better hast to follow him, and take their share in the Conflict; He was a man of an huge bulk and promising preface, set off the more with his gallant Armour, and withal his advancing the Ensign aloft, attracted the Eyes both of his own Party and of the Enemy, but after he was come up as far as the Spaniards Standard, their barbed Javelins were lanced at him on every side, and the whole shock of the Battel seem'd turn'd upon one single man, yet neither their multitude, nor all that storm of Darts, was able to resist his fury.

At the same time M. Atilius, a Lieutenant General, caused the Standard of the first Band of the Principes to charge this Spanish Regiment. And L. Porcius Licinus and T. Popilius, who had the Guard of the Camp, fought desperately from the Works, and killed the Elephants on the very Rampier, just as they were getting over; whose bodies falling back into the Trench, served as a Bridge for the Enemy to get over upon; so as there upon the Carcasses of the Elephants happen'd a very great slaughter of men. On the other side of the Camp the Capuans and Punic Garrison were long since beat back, and in the pursuit the Conflict was hot at the very Gate of Capua which opens to the River Vulturinus; nor was it so much the Valour of the Defendants that hinder'd the Romans from breaking into the City, as the Balists and Scorpions and other Engines placed there, which gaul'd them at a distance; but especially that brave Attacke of the Romans was dasht by the hurt of their General Appius Claudius, who as he was encouraging his men at the head of them, happen'd to be wounded with a Dart above his breast in the left shoulder. However a great number of the Enemy were slain before the Gate, and the rest in confusion beat into the City. And Annibal perceiving the slaughter that was made of the Spanish Regiment, and how valiantly the Camp was defended, despairing of success, gave over the Assault, founded a Retreat to his Foot, and to secure them, placed his Horse in the Rear, lest the Enemy should fall upon them as they march'd off; which the Roman Legions were wondrous eager to have done, but Flaccus thought it better to forbear, judging they had done well enough already in effecting two such signal Services in one day, viz. to let both the Capuans, and Annibal himself see how little he was able to contribute to their Relief. Those that write the story of this Battel relate, that there were kill'd eight thousand of Annibal's Army, and three thousand Capuans, fifteen Colours taken from the former, and eighteen from the latter. But in others I do not find the Fight so considerable, but that the Fright was far greater than the Conflict; for they say, That the Numidians and Spaniards unexpectedly broke into the Roman Camp, and that their Elephants passing through the midst thereof, overthrew abundance of their Tents with an horrid noise, which made the Sumpter-Horses break their bridles and run straggling to and fro, bearing down all before them; and that besides this Confusion, Annibal added a Stratagem, by sending in certain persons that could speak the Latine Tongue very well (for some such he had with him) who in the Confusion Names commanded the Souldiers, That since the Camp was lost, every one should shift for himself to the adjacent Mountains. But this fraud was soon discovered, and revenged by a great slaughter of his men; and that the Elephants were driven out of the Camp with fire. 'Tis certain, this (however it began or ended) was the last that was fought before the Surrender of Capua, whose chief Magistrate (whom (whom they call, Medixtutichus) for that year, was one Seppius Lefius, a person of mean obscure Birth; 'Tis reported that his Mother upon a time being to expiate some domestical ill Omen that happen'd in her House, on his behalf being (then an Orphan) the Southsayer told her, That Boy should one day arrive to the chief place of dignity in Capua; who not believing any such matter, replied, Truly, Sir, Capua must be in a sad condition when my Child comes to be the most honourable person there; which words spoken in jest, prov'd true in sad earnest. For the City being straitned with Sword and Famine, and its case desperate, all persons of Quality declining Offices, Lefius by complaining, That Capua was abandon'd and betray'd by the great men, prevail'd with the people to Elect him, and was the last of the Capuans that there bore Rule.

Annibal finding that he could neither tempt the Romans to venture a pitch Field, nor was able to break through their Leaguer to relieve the Town, was forc'd, without effecting his design, to dislodge from thence, lest the new Consuls should blockade him up and intercept his provisions. As he was studying what course to take next, a freak took him in the head, to march to rights to Rome, and strike at the very Root of the War, which as he had always desired, so both others commonly grumbled, and himself could not deny, That he had slip't a fair opportunity for that purpose after the Victory at Cannæ; nor did he despair, but that by surprize and the unexpected terrour of an assault, he might make himself Master at least of some part of the City; Besides if Rome were once in danger, he believ'd one or both the Roman Generals would quit Capua, and hasten to its rescue, whose Forces being divided, and consequently weakned, might give either him or the Capuans an opportunity of some good Fortune against them. The only thing that troubled him, was the fear, lest upon notice of his retreat, the Capuans in despair should yield to a surrender; To prevent which he hires a Numidian (a bold Fellow fit for any desperate undertaking) for a large reward to fly unto the Roman Camp as a Deforter, and thence to get into the City, with Letters, privately bestow'd about him, the tenour of which was full of encouragement. That his marching from thence was for their good and safety, whereby he doubted not but to draw the Roman Forces from assaulting Capua, to defend their own City of Rome; and therefore they should not despond, but hold out a few days longer, and he would warrant them the Siege should be raised. Then he caus'd all the Vessels taken in the River Vulturius, to be brought up to the Fort, which he had before erected there for his security, and understanding there were enow of them to transport his whole Army in one night, he drew down his Legions thither in the dark, and before Morning had ferried them all over.

Before this was accomplish'd, Fulvius Flaccus by some Renegado's got an inkling of the design, and sent an Express to Rome to advertize the Senate; which news variously affected mens minds according to their several fancies and dispositions, and as so important an occurrence required, the Senate was immediately Assembled to consult what was to be done? P. Cornelius surnamed Asina, was of Opinion, That without regard of Capua, or any thing else, all the Generals and Forces throughout Italy should be forthwith sent for to secure the City; But Fabius Maximus thought it the most dishonourable thing in the World to raise the Siege of Capua, and be terrified, and hurry to and fro at every beck and vain Menace of Annibal; He that when he was Victorious at Cannæ, durst not yet approach the City, is it likely he can have any hopes of taking Rome, when he was soundly beat but the other day from Capua? If he were marching that way, it was not to besiege Rome, but only to raise the Siege of Capua, which otherwise he knew not how to relieve; That there was no doubt but Jove the witness to those Leagues which Annibal had violated, and the other Gods, would with that Army which was at present in and about the City, sufficiently defend them against his violence and outrages; Between these differing Opinions, P. Valerius Flaccus propos'd a middle Expedient, approved of by the Body of the Senate, for having a due regard to the importance of both Affairs, he advis'd, That an Express should be sent to the Commanders that lay before Capua, to acquaint them, what Guards the City had already, and as for the strength of Annibals Army, or how many Forces would be necessary to continue the Siege of Capua, they themselves could best judge; and therefore if one of the Generals, and part of the Army could be spared, without any hazard of interrupting the Siege, then Claudius and Fulvius should agree between themselves, which should continue there, and which should come with all Expedition to Rome to keep their Native City from being invested by the Enemy. A Decree of the Senate to this purpose being brought to the Leaguer at Capua, Q. Fulvius the Pro-Consul undertook the Expedition for Rome, (because his Collegue was not yet able to march by reason of the wound he lately received;) out of the three Armies he made a Draught of fifteen thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, and with them pass'd the River Vulturius. And having intelligence, That Annibal would march along the road call'd, The Latine Street; he took the other way call'd Via Appia, and sent Curriers before unto Seria, Sora, and Lavinium, which are situate near thereunto, not only to provide and lay up Necessaries for him in their Towns, but to cause the Country to bring in their provisions to the said road, and to assemble what Forces they could into their Towns for their defence, and all to be in Arms and stand upon their Guard.

VIII.

Annibal that day he pass'd Vulturius, encamp'd not far from the River. The next day arrived near Cales in the Sidicines Country, where he spent one day in foraging, and so led his his Army along the Latine Way by Suessula, Allifanum, and the Territories of Casinum, where he remain'd two days encamp'd, and made great spoil in the neighbouring Country. From thence, leaving Interramna and Aquinum, he came near Fregella, as far as the River Liris; where he found the Bridge beat down by the Fregellanes, to interrupt his March. Fulvius was likewise stay'd at the River Vulturius (for Annibal having burnt all the Barges and Lighters) he was forc'd to make Rafts and Punts to set over his men, and found not a little difficulty therein, by reason of the great scarcity of Wood in those parts. But when he was once got over there, met with no obstruction in the rest of his March, but was plentifully furnish'd with all sorts of Provisions not only in the Towns, but on the Road, and the Souldiers were very chearful, and to encourage one another would cry, Come let's mend our pace, remembering that we go to defend our Country. A Post from Fregella that rode night and day, arriving at Rome with the News of Annibals advance to that Town, put the City into great consternation; and the concourse of people, adding vain fictions of their own to the News they heard, made a greater hurry than the Messenger, and set the whole City in an uproar. The Women fill'd not only their private houses with their lamentations, but you should see multitudes of Matrons running about streets with their hair about their Ears, and sweeping the Altars of the Gods with their lovely Locks, kneeling on the bare ground, and with hands lifted up to Heaven, beseeching the Divine Powers, That they would vouchsafe to keep the City of Rome out of the hands of the Enemy, and preserve the Roman Matrons and their Children and little ones from all violence and abuse. The Body of the Senate were ready in the Common Hall to give their Advice whenever the Magistrates desired it, some having receiv'd their necessary Orders, depart every one to his Charge: Others offer themselves to be employ'd in any Service where-ever there was occasion; Guards are set in the Castle, in the Capitol, and upon the Walls; all places about the City were well man'd, the Alban Mount and Castle of Tusculum furnish'd with strong Garrisons. But during this Alarm News came, that Fulvius the Pro-consul was upon his March with an Army from Capua; and because he should not (according to the common course) be abridg'd of his Authority when he came into the City, the Senate pass'd a special Vote, That he should have equal Command with the Consuls themselves. Annibal having most severely plunder'd and wast'd the Fregellanes Country, in revenge for their breaking down the Bridges, march'd through the Frusinat, Ferentinat and Anagnine Territories unto those of the Labici, and so by Algidum, advanc'd towards Tusculum; but being there denied Entrance within their Walls, he went a little below it on the right hand to Gabii, and so into Pupinia, and encamp'd within eight miles of Rome. The nearer the Enemy approach'd, the more dreadful havock they made, and the greater slaughter of the Peasants that fled before them, abundance of all Conditions and Ages being taken by his Numidian Horse who scour'd the Country before his Army.

In this distress and tumult Fulvius Flaccus entred Rome with his Army at the Gate Capena, and march'd through the midst of the City along the street Carina unto Port Esquiline, and going forth thereat, encamp'd between that and the other Gate called Collina: The Ædiles of the Commons conveying Provisions, and the Consuls and whole body of the Senate likewise repairing thither, where they sat in Council about the State of the Commonwealth. And agreed it was, That the Consuls should also lye encamp'd not far from the same Gates; That C. Calpurnius Prator of the City should be Governour of the Castle and the Capitol, and the Senators be always ready in the Forum to be advis'd with upon any sudden Accidents. In the mean time Annibal was come forwards as far as the River Anio, and kept a standing Leaguer but three miles off the City, whence he himself in person with two thousand Horse advanc'd up towards the Gate Collina, as far as Hercules's Temple, and rode all about as near as he could to take a view of the Walls and Situation of the City. Flaccus could not without indignation behold him take this liberty to brave them at his pleasure, and therefore sent out a body of Horse to beat off the Enemy, and send them back to their Camp. Whilst they were skirmishing, the Consuls gave Order, That a Squadron of Numidian Horse to the number of twelve hundred, who some time before revolted from the Enemy, and at that time lay upon the Aventine Hill, should hasten through the City and out at the Esquiline to engage the Enemy, as knowing that none were so fit for that Service, seeing the ground where they fought was very uneven, full of Banks and Vallies, Garden-Houses, Sepulchres and hollow Ways; but when the people at a distance saw them riding from the Castle and Capitol down the open brow of the Hill, an Out-cry was set up, That the Aventine was taken, which caus'd such a general terrour and running, that if the Carthaginian Tents had not been without the other side of the City, the timorous multitude had undoubtedly fled clear away and abandon'd the Town; but instead thereof they now betook them to their Houses, and thence with weapons and stones pelted their Friends as they march'd through the streets instead of their Enemies; nor was there any means to suppress the Tumult, or make them sensible of their mistake, the streets were so crowded with Troops of Country-people and Cattel, which the sudden fright, occasion'd by Annibals approach, had driven into the City. In the Skirmish between the Horse, the Romans had the better on't, and repuls'd the Enemy. And because there was continual need to appease Disorders and Tumults that were apt to arise upon small occasions in several places at once, it was decreed, That all that had been Disturbers, Etators, Consuls, or Censors, should have as much power as if they were still in those Offices, till such time as the Enemy was gone from before the Walls. By which means divers vain and rash Tumults occasion'd by false Alarms in the remaining part of that day and the night following, were happily pacified.

XI. Next morning, Annibal passing the River Anio, drew up all his Forces in Battalia, nor did Flaccus and the Consuls decline the Field, but when both Armies were ready for an Engagement (on the issue whereof depended no less than the whole Fortunes of Rome) there happen'd a mighty showre of Rain intermingled with Hail, which so incommoded both Hosts, that they could scarce hold their Weapons, but were forc'd to retreat into their respective Camps, though on each side fearing nothing less than the Enemy: The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in Battel-array, a like Tempest separated them; and yet each time, they were no sooner retired into their Camps, but the weather presently prov'd fair and calm. These odd accidents the Carthaginians look'd upon as an ominous Prefage to them of ill Luck, and Annibal is reported to have said, That one while his mind, and another while his Fortune, would not give him leave to make himself Master of Rome. There were other occurrences besides as well small as great, which discouraged him. That of most importance was, That whilst he lay with his Host before the Walls of Rome, he understood, there were several Regiments with Banners display'd sent away to reinforce the Armies in Spain. Of less reckoning and yet considerable was this, that he was advertiz'd by certain Prisoners, That the very same plot of ground whereon his Army lay encamp'd, happening in that juncture to be sold, was bought at the full rate, and nothing abated. This he counted such a presumptuous and scornful affront, that Rome should afford a Chapman for that piece of Land which he was possess'd of; That to retaliate the Bravado, he caused a publick Cryer by sound of Trumpet to offer to Sale all the Goldsmiths Shops about the Market-place in Rome, [but met with none that would purchase them.] Not a little affected with these discouragements, he dislodg'd and retreated to the River Tutia, six miles from the City, and from thence to the Grove of Feronia, where stood a Temple in those days famous for its Riches; for the Capenates inhabiting thereabouts, paying their First-fruits and other Gifts there in great abundance, had adorn'd it with great store of Gold and Silver. All which they rifled and took away, only great heaps of Brass there were found there after Annibal was gone, because his Souldiers smote with a kind of remorse of Conscience, thinking, it seems, Exchange no Robbery, had for the Gold and Silver left their Brass-money in the stead of it. The sacking of this Temple all Writers agree in. But Celins saith, That Annibal as he went towards Rome from Eretum turned thither, and sets down his Gifts, or Marches thus, first from Reate, Cutilia, and Amiternum, and that out of Campania he came into Samnium, then amongst the Pelignians, by the Town Sulmo, to the Marrucines, thence by Alba to the Marsians, so to the Village Foruli: nor is there any doubt but he pass'd that way, for the footsteps of so great an Army could not in so small a time be worn out. The only Controversie is, Whether he came that way to the City, or returned back by those places into Campania?

XII. Nor was Annibal so resolutely bent to raise the Siege of Capua, as the Romans to continue and re-inforce it; for he in his return hastened another way, first out of the Lucans Country to the Bruttians, and thence to the Streights towards Sicily, so that he was got to Rhegium before they were aware, and had almost taken them napping. Though Capua during Flaccus's absence was not dully attack'd, yet it was more sensible of his return, and much they wondred why Annibal came not back thither as well as he? But afterwards by some Intelligence from abroad they perceiv'd, that they were abandon'd and forsaken, and that the Carthaginians despair'd of retaining that City. Besides, the Proconsul by Order of the Senate, set forth a Proclamation which was spread in the Town, That all Citizens of Capua who should surrender themselves to him by a certain day, should be receiv'd and have Quarter. But none laid hold of that Overture, being kept in rather by Fear than Loyalty, as apprehending that by their Revolt they had offended beyond all hopes of Pardon. But as none by private discretion came over to the Enemy, so neither was there by publick Council, any good course taken for their preservation; the Nobility had quitted all Care of the Commonwealth, nor could they be got to appear in the Senate. He that held the chief place in their Government was one who thereby gain'd himself no Honour, but by the baseness of his Quality, lost that Dignity and Reverence which was due to his Office. Not one of the chief Citizens would appear in the Common Hall or any publick Meeting, but hugging themselves up in their private Houses, expected daily their own ruine with that of the State. The whole weight and care of Affairs lay upon Bostar and Hanno, Commanders of the Punic Garrison, who were solicitous not so much for the Cities preservation, as their own safety. They wrote Letters to Annibal with expressions not only free, but sharp and upbraiding, taxing him, That he had not only relinquish'd Capua to the Enemy, but betray'd them and the Garrison to the Roman Cruelty to be butcher'd with all kind of Tortures; That he was slunk away amongst the Bruttians, as one that turn'd his face on purpose that he might not with his own eyes behold Capua taken; whereas on the contrary, the Romans could not be withdrawn from thence, even when their Metropolis Rome it self was in danger, so much more constant were they in their Enmity, than the Carthaginians in their Friendship. That if he would draw his Forces, and turn turn the War that way, both they and the Capuans were ready to make a resolute sally; That sure he did not surmount the Alps merely to quarrel with the little people of Rhegium and Tarentum; but where the Roman Legions were, there too ought the Carthaginian Armies to be; Thus were his former glories achiev'd, thus at Cannæ, thus at Thrafymenus were Victories won, by confronting the Enemy by joining Camp to Camp, and hazarding the Fortune of a Battel. Letters to this effect were given to certain Numidians, who for a good reward had offered their service and promised safely to deliver them; and in order thereunto under colour of being Deserters they came to Flaccus and were entertain'd in his Camp, waiting an opportunity to get thence upon their Errand, nor were they suspected, since the grievous Famine in the City gave such probable grounds for them to quit it, but it happen'd that one of these Renegado's Wenches came on a sudden from Capua into the Roman Camp, and gave the General notice, That these Numidians were sent out on purpose to carry Letters to Annibal, as she was ready to justify against one of them, who had acquainted her with the intrigue; being brought Face to Face, the Fellow at first stoutly denied that he knew her; but by little and little he was convicted by the power of truth; when he saw himself like to be tortur'd, and that the Rack was making ready, he made an ingenuous Confession, produc'd the Letters, and made some further discoveries of other Numidians that were lurking in the Camp under pretence of being Revolters; of whom above seventy were apprehended, and together with these new Run-aways, were first scourged, and then had their hands cut off, and so were driven back into Capua.

The sight of this terrible Execution quite daunted the Capuans; The people ran in heaps to the Town-Hall, and forc'd Lesius to assemble the Senate, threatening the great men who for a long time had absented themselves from publick Consultations, That unless they now made their appearance, they would go to their respective Houses, and pull them out by the Ears, so that for fear the Senate was very full; where whilst several of them propos'd the sending of Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Virius (who had been the principal Author of their revolt at first from the Romans) being demanded his advice, spake as follows. "Certainly those that talk of Embassadors, and making of Peace, and surrendering our selves, do neither consider what they themselves would do, if they had the Romans at their mercy, nor what they must suffer since it falls out otherwise; Do you imagine that our surrender now will be as acceptable as that of old, when to get assistance against the Samnites, we yielded up our selves and all we had in the World? Have you already forgot in what a Juncture of time it was that we revolted from the Romans? and what condition both they and we were then in? How we did not barely turn to the Enemy, but also cruelly and ignominiously butcher'd their Garrison which we had amongst us, and whom we might as well have turn'd out as kill'd? How often have we with all the spight and fury imaginable sallied out against them? How often attack'd their Camp? How frequently and earnestly have we sollicit'd Annibal to fall upon them? and (which sure is too late for them to forget) did not we but the other day lend him from hence to storm Rome it self? On the other side reflect a little what they have done against us, how fiercely and maliciously they have prosecuted us, and then you will easily perceive the vanity of your hopes, and what you have to trust to; whilst a Foreign Enemy was yet in Italy, when they had no less a Foe to deal with than Annibal himself, whilst yet the War was so violent that all their Country seem'd in a blaze; they pass'd by all other Affairs, nay they let Annibal himself alone, and sent both their Consuls with two compleat Armies, to Assault Capua; This is now the second year that they have blockt us up, and with Lines of Circumvallation endeavour'd to starve us, during all which time, as well they as we, have endured the extremities of toil and dangers, oft-times cut them to pieces upon their Rampier and about their Trenches, and at last very near beaten them out of their Camp, and all their Fortifications. But to omit these ordinary matters, since 'tis usual for Enemies when they besiege a Town to take pains and run hazards, this I am sure is extraordinary, and a manifest sign of their deadly feud and implacable hatred against us, That when Annibal with a formidable Army of Foot and Horse attack'd their Camp, and had got possession of some part of it, all that danger could not make them one jot withdraw from the Siege. He pass'd Vulturius, and lays desolate all the Territories of Cales with Fire and Sword, yet for all that Calamity and damage of their Allies they would not stir a Foot; He marches forwards with Banners display'd towards Rome it self, but they make as little reckoning of that threatned tempest, as of all the rest. Going over the River Anio, he sits down but three miles from the City, nay advances up to the very Walls, and braves them at their Gates, threatening that he would make Rome too hot for them, if they would not abandon Capua, and yet they would not give over, but beleagu'd us still; wild Beasts and the Savages of the Desert, be they never so much enraged and violent, yet if you go to their Dens, and offer to take away their Whelps, they will turn back from their prey to succour their young ones; But these Romans are yet more fierce and eager, for though their City Rome was besieged, neither their Wives nor Children (whose Cries and Lamentations were heard almost even hither) nor their Altars or private hearths, the publick Temples of their Gods, nor the Monuments of their

"their Ancestors, though all in danger to be violated, nor any other consideration whatsoever could once divert them from the ruin of Capua; so greedy they are of Revenge, so thirsty of our Blood, so fond of glutting their Eyes with our destruction. Nor, perhaps, can we blame them, for undoubtedly we should have treated them at the very same rate, had Fortune given us an opportunity; Therefore since the pleasure of the Immortal Gods is otherwise, and that I ought not to refuse to die, yet whilst I am at liberty and Master of my self, it is in my power to avoid those tortures and reproaches which the Enemy hopes to inflict, by chusing a death that shall be both honourable and gentle; never will I endure to see Ap. Claudius, and Q. Fulvius insolently vapouring and pluming themselves with our Conquest; never will I be haled along the streets of Rome in Chains for a show to set off the Pageantry of their Triumph, and then in a dismal Dungeon, or tyed to a Stake, be first scourged as a Slave, and afterwards submit my Neck to a Roman Hatchet? These Eyes of mine shall not be Spectators of the ruins of my Country, nor look on, whilst this Noble City is laid in Ashes, our chaste Matrons and modest Virgins, and ingenuous Youths, deslour'd and ravish'd, and by force abused with unnatural Lusts. These cruel Romans who heretofore rased utterly to the very foundations, the City Alba, from whence themselves were descended, that there might be no memorial left of their Original, shall we believe they will now spare Capua, which they hate no less mortally than they do Carthage it self? Therefore as many of you as resolve to quit the World before you see these so many and intolerable Calamities, go home with me, where I have a plentiful Supper provided for you all, and when with good Chear and store of Wine you have solac'd your selves, I'll begin a Cup of deliverance to you, which going round, shall soon free our Bodies from tortures, our minds from anguish and the disgraces of insulting Infamy, and rescue our Eyes from beholding, our Ears from hearing, those Cruelties which must certainly attend the Conquered. And to put a full period to our unhappiness, and prevent future indignities, some Servants shall be ready to set fire to a Funeral Pile in the open Yard, and cast our Bodies thereinto; This is the only honest way left us now to death, and becoming Gentlemen; wherein both our Enemies shall with amazement applaud our Courage, and Annibal repent himself for having deserted and betray'd such stout and magnanimous Allies.

XIV. There were more present that could give this Oration of Virius's the hearing, and seem'd to applaud it, than could find in their hearts to put that in Execution which they so recommended. The greater part of the Senate, having in several Wars experienc'd the Roman Clemency, could not despair, but that they might be prevail'd with to extend mercy to them also, notwithstanding all past provocations, and therefore Decreed, and sent Embassadors with Commission to yield up Capua into their hands. In the mean time about twenty seven Senators went home with Virius, and suppd with him, and after they had done what they could by free-taking off their Cups to drown their sorrows, and make themselves insensible of the imminent miseries, did all carouze to one another out of a poison'd Bowl; and then rising from Table, shook hands, and took their last farewell with Embraces, bemoaning their own misfortune and the miserable state of their own Country, some continued there to be burnt in the same Pile, others departed home to their respective Houses. But by reason their Veins were so fill'd with good Chear and Wine, the operation of the Venome was very slow, so that most of them liv'd all that night, and part of next day before they expi'd, but all were dead before the Gates were set open to the Enemy; of whom next day one Legion of Foot and two Squadrons of Horse under the Command of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant General entred at Jupiter's Gate. He first took care to have all the Arms and Ammunition that was in Capua brought in to him, and then planting Guards at all the Gates and Avenues, that none might escape out of the City, secured the Punic Garrison, and Commanded all the Senators to be sent into the Roman Camp, where they were loaded with Irons, and Order'd to deliver what Gold and Silver they had, into the Treasurers hands; the Gold amounted to seventy pounds weight, and three thousand two hundred pounds weight of silver; of the Senators twenty five were sent to Cales to be kept in safe Custody, and twenty eight to Theanum, being all such as were known to have had a principal hand in causing the Revolt from the Romans.

XV. Touching the punishment of these Senators, Fulvius and Claudius could not agree, the latter being more inclined to favour them, the former rigorously bent to chastize them with the utmost severity. Appius therefore referr'd the whole matter to the judgment of the Senate, alledging, that it would be fit their Lordships should take their Examinations, whereby they would have an opportunity to inquire, whether they had held correspondence with any of the Free-Towns of the Latine State that were in alliance with the Romans? Or had from them received any assistance during the War? But Fulvius affirm'd, That was not to be suffer'd, That the minds of faithful Sociates should be disquieted with jealousies and vain suspicions of Crimes; or to be call'd in Question upon the Information of a parcel of people, that made no Conscience of anything they either did or said; and therefore he would for ever crush and suppress all such kind of Inquisitions. Upon this Discourse they parted, and Appius, though he heard his Colleague talk high, did not doubt but he would wait till the Letters arriv'd from Rome to signify the Senates pleasure sure in an affair of that moment; But Fulvius, fearing the same might hinder his purpose, as soon as the Council of War was dismiss'd, Commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies to get ready two thousand selected Horse to march at a third sound of the Trumpet; with this Body of Cavalry he set forwards in the night towards Theanum, and by break of day came into that Town, riding forwards directly to the Market-place, the people running together from all parts, amaz'd at the sight of such a power of Horse, then he order'd the Chief Magistrate, a Sedice, to be call'd, and Commanded to bring forth those Capuans he had in Custody; who being all produc'd were first scourg'd with Rods, and then Beheaded. From thence with the same Party, he rode upon the Spur to Cales, where having seated himself on the Tribunal, as the Capuans there Prisoners, were brought before him, and stood bound to the Stakes; a Currier arriv'd from Rome, and delivered to him Letters from C. Calpurnius the Prætor, together with a Decree of the Senate, and presently there ran a rumour through the whole Assembly, That the hearing and sentence of the Capuans was reserved intirely to the Fathers. But Fulvius, suspecting no less, having receiv'd the Letters, clapt them up in his bosom without breaking them open, and bid the Cryer command the Lictor to proceed to Execution according to Law, and so the Prisoners were all put to Death. Then were the Letters and Decree of the Senate read, but too late to hinder what was already done. As Fulvius was rising from the Bench, Taurica Jubellius a Capuan, walking along the City crouded through the multitude, and call'd upon him by Name, and when Fulvius wondring what he would have, was sat down again. Command me too, quoth he, to be murder'd that thou maist boast another day of having kill'd a far better man and much more valiant than thy self. Flaccus told him, That he was mad, and that if he had a mind to put him to Death, he had now no power, being restrain'd by the Senates Order; To which Jubellius replied, Since after my Country is over-run, my Relations and Friends destroyed, and that with my own hands I have dispatcht my Wife and Children, because they should suffer no Villainous Indignities, I my self cannot obtain so much as to die the same Death which my Country-men have here suffer'd before my face; Let me by my own Courage revenge my self of this Life which is so odious to me; At which words, drawing forth a Sword which he had hid under his Vest, he ran himself through the Breast, and fell down gasping at the Generals Feet.

But forasmuch as the Capuans Execution, and most other affairs there, were transacted by Flaccus alone, and without the consent of his Colleague, some Authors write, that App. Claudius died about the time of that Cities surrender; as also that this Taurica neither came of his own accord to Cales, nor fell by his own hand, but that being with the rest bound to a Stake, and the noise of the people hindring the hearing of what he said, silence was commanded, and that then he spake the before-mention'd words, viz. That he was basely put to death by a fellow nothing comparable to himself for Courage and Vertue; whereupon by the Pro-Consuls Order, the Cryer said to the Executioner; Go, Lictor, and see you let this valiant man have the preeminence; begin with him first, and let him have a greater share of your pains than his fellows. Likewise there are some Authors that say, the Senates Ordinance was read before they were Beheaded, but because the same run, That if he thought good he should refer the whole matter to the Senate; he interpreted it, That he was notwithstanding at liberty to act as he thought most for the Interest of the Commonwealth. From Cales he return'd to Capua, having by the way taken the Towns, Atella and Calatia, upon submission, where the principal persons suffer'd the like punishment. Thus there were about fourscore Senators of Capua put to death, and near three hundred Noblemen of Campania, shut up close Prisoners; others committed to the Custody of several associate Cities of the Latines, came to sundry unhappy ends; and as for the main multitude of the vulgar Inhabitants, they were sold for Slaves. Touching the City it self and Territories, there was great Debate, some were for having a City so strong, so near, so dangerous and mortal an Enemy to Rome, to be utterly rased and destroyed; but the consideration of present advantage prevailed; For in regard of the Country lying round it, which is well known to be the most fertile in all Italy; the City was preserv'd, to furnish the Husbandmen both with convenient Dwellings and a Market; Therefore to inhabit it, a multitude of the meaner Inhabitants as enfranchiz'd Bondmen, ordinary Shop Keepers and Mechanicks, were suffer'd to continue there; but all the Land belonging to the City, and the publick Buildings, the Romans reserv'd in their own hands as forfeited; Besides, though Capua was inhabited like a City, yet it was Ordered, That there should be no Corporation, no Senate, no Common-Hall nor Magistrates; without which the Rabble could never be able to combine together to recover their Liberties; and for giving them Laws and administering Justice amongst them, a Provoist was every year to be sent from Rome. Thus were the affairs of Capua settled, by a course every way commendable; for as the guilty were severely and speedily punish'd, and the vast number of Citizens dispers'd several ways, without any hopes of return, so the City it self was spared, the innocent Houses not destroy'd with fire, nor pull'd down with violence, whereby the Romans, besides their own profit, gain'd the reputation of Clemency amongst their Allies, in preserving such a most rich and antient City, whose ruins not only all Campania, but the neighbouring Nations round about, would very sensibly have bemoan'd and lamented; In the mean time, the same was a sufficient Monument to all the World; both how able the Romans were to chastize their faithless Allies, and how vain Annibal's Protection was like to prove to any that he should undertake to secure.

XVII. The Senate of Rome having dispatcht what was necessary touching Capua, assign'd unto Claudius Nero six thousand Foot out of those Legions which he had at Capua, and three hundred Horse which himself had levied; as also a like number of Foot, and eight hundred Horse out of the associate Latine Forces, which Army he Embark'd at Puteoli, and transported into Spain; landed them at Tarracon, and having laid up his Ships in the Dock, to augment his Forces, put all the Mariners in Arms, and so marching to the River Iberus, received the Army there, from the hands of T. Fonteius, and L. Marcins; and from thence advanc'd towards the Enemy. Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar lay Encamp'd at a place call'd The Black Stones in Ausetania, between the Towns Illiturgis and Mentissa; and Nero had possess'd himself of the mouth of the passage into that Forrest; whereupon Asdrubal that he might not be so closely pent up, and at last reduc'd to some great extremity, sent an Herald, offering, That if he might be permitted freely to march from thence, he would withdraw all his Forces out of Spain; The Roman General was overjoy'd at this overture, and Asdrubal desired there might be a Conference held the next day, where the Romans might set down Conditions and Articles in writing, touching the Surrender of the Fortresses in every City, and appointing the respective days when the Garrisons should be drawn out, and that the Carthaginians might carry away all their Bag and Baggage without any fraud or interruption. Which being consented to, as soon as 'twas dark, and all the night long afterwards, Asdrubal caused the heaviest part of his Army to be getting forth of the Straits by the best ways they could find; but gave special directions that no great number should go that night, because a few would better pass undiscover'd, and more easily get through those Thickets and narrow By-paths. Next Morning the Parley was begun, but by long Conferences and drawing up Articles in writing, and making exceptions, and other designed delays, the whole day was spent, and adjourn'd till the morrow. That night gave the Carthaginians opportunity to send off more of their Forces; nor was the matter brought to a conclusion the day following, but several days wasted in adjusting the Articles, and the nights in privately emptying the Enemies Camp; who having got away the greatest part of their men, began now to wrangle, and would not stand to things which before they themselves had voluntarily offer'd, so that they were still further and further from agreement, for their fears being over, so was their Faith. By this time, almost all his Foot were got out of the pound, when at break of day happen'd a mighty thick Fog, that cover'd the whole Forrest and Plains adjacent; which Asdrubal perceiving, sent a Message to Nero, desiring to put off the Conference till the morrow, because that was an Holy-Day amongst the Carthaginians, on which they made a scruple of Conscience to do any serious business. The Cheat was not yet suspected, the meeting is deferr'd by consent, and immediately Asdrubal with his Horse and Elephants quitted their Camp, and without any noise or opposition escaped, and recovered a place of better security. About ten a Clock it clear'd up, and the Sun breaking out, both chac'd away the mist, and discovered to the Romans that the Enemy had plaid them a Carthaginian Trick, for they saw their Camp empty and forsaken, whereupon Claudius vext to be thus bubbled, hasten'd after, and offer'd them Battel, but they were too wise to Engage, only some Skirmishes happen'd between their Rear, and the Romans Forlorn-Hope and Van-Courriers.

XVIII. Amidst these affairs, neither those States of Spain, who fell off from the Romans upon their late Overthrows, made any application to be reconcil'd, nor were there any new ones that revolted; after the recovery of Capua the Senate and people of Rome were no less careful of Spain than of Italy it self, and resolv'd both to re-inforce the Army there, and to send over a Governour to command that Province in Chief; but who should be the Man was the difficulty, for it seem'd to require an extraordinary caution into whose hands they intrusted a place where two most excellent Generals had been both cut off within thirty days space; Or to find out one fit to succeed in the room of two such grand Masters in the Art of War. Whilst one nominated one, and another, another, the matter at last was referred to the people, that they should meet in Common-Hall for creating a Pro-Consul to be sent into Spain. The day being appointed it was at first expected, That several would have put in for so great a Command, but finding their expectations therein frustrated, it renew'd the lamentation for the loss received, and they began more sensibly than ever to find the want of two such gallant Commanders. However the sad Citizens almost at their Wits end, and not knowing whom to propose, assembled at the time prefixt in Mars's Field; where every mans Eye was upon the Magistrates and great men, to see how they look'd one upon another, and much grumbling and repining there was, That the State should be lookt upon as at so low an ebb, and in such a forlorn desperate Case, that no man durst accept the Government of Spain. When on a sudden P. Cornelius (the Son of the General of that name that was lately slain in Spain) a young Gentleman not full four and twenty years of Age, rose up, and stepping into an higher place where he might be seen, declared, That he was ready to take that Charge upon him; The whole Assembly presently had their Eyes fixt upon him, and with a general Shout, wisht him an happy Government; being required quired to give their Suffrages, not only all the Centuries voted for him, but there was not so much as one man found that did not give his Voice to have him go General into Spain. Yet after the Choice was pass'd, and the first heat of their minds somewhat cool'd, they began silently to reflect what an odd unpresidented thing they had done, guided by Affection rather than Reason, or a due Consideration of his unripe years, which most of all made them repent their Election; though some also dreaded the ill fortune of his Family, and lookt upon it as ominous for him to be sent into the same Province which was already died with the Blood of two of the same Name, and where he must fight over the Tombs of his Father and his Uncle. Scipio perceived this trouble of their minds by the change of their Countenances, soon after the Choice; and therefore causing them to be again assembled, made an Oration, wherein he discours'd both of his own Youth, and of the Government committed unto him, and the future War he was to manage, with such a grandeur of Spirit, and solidity of Judgment, that he re-kindled in every Breast the former zeal they had for him, and fill'd them with more assured hopes than the credit of other mens promises, or the confidence of former achievements are wont usually to create; For the truth is, This Scipio was not only a man rare and wonderful for those many noble Vertues and accomplishments which were really inherent in him, but from his youth he had by artificial means endeavour'd to set off those good Qualities, making shew before the multitude as if most things he did, were either represented to him in nocturnal Visions, or immediately suggest'd to his mind by divine inspiration, whether it were that he himself was tainted with Superstition, and fancied those Enthusiasms, or that he politickly pretended it to accomplish the more easily his designs, and have all his Orders as readily obey'd as if they were Oracles; 'Tis certain, he had from the very beginning prepared mens minds to have extraordinary conceits of him, for from the time that he put on his Toga Virilis [a Garment assum'd by young-men when they came to the Age of discretion] there was not a day pass'd over his head but before he undertook any private or publick affair, he retired into the Capitol, and when he was entred into the Temple, sat him down in a close Isle or Corner, and spent some time in Contemplation alone by himself. This Custom which he observ'd all his Life long, whether by chance or out of design, made many people believe that to be a real truth which was vulgarly reported of him, That he was a person of a Divine Descent, and renew'd a like report of him, as formerly had been spread of Alexander the Great (and one altogether as true as t'other) That he was begot by a mighty Serpent, such a prodigious shape having frequently been seen in his Mothers Bed Chamber, but upon any Bodies coming in, it would scuttle away and disappear. Nor would he ever disavow these Miracles, but seem'd rather to encourage the belief of them, by neither denying nor openly affirming them. Many other devices of like sort, some true, some counterfeit, had conciliated him a wonderful esteem amongst the Mobile, and upon those strong presumptions, the City was easily induced to commit to great a Government, and the Conduct of the most important affairs to his management, though his years and experience seem'd altogether disproportionate. To the old Army in Spain, and those Forces which Cl. Nero had lately transported thither from Puteoli, there were added ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse; and M. Junius Silanus the Pro Praetor was order'd to go along with him as his Adjutant General. So with a Fleet of thirty Sail (all of five Banks of Oars a-picce) he set Sail from the mouth of Tiber, and coasting along the Tuscan Sea, under the Alps, and through the Gulph of Lyons doubled the point of Pyrene, and landed at Emporia (a City of Greeks, for the Inhabitants were descended from Phocaea.) Thence ordering his Ships to Coast about after him, he march'd by land to Tarracon, appointing there a General Diet or Assembly of all the Allies; for upon the report of his Arrival, Ambassadors were dispatcht to meet him from all parts of the Province. There he commanded his Ships to be laid up in Harbour, save only three Gallies that came in Complement to wait upon him from Marseilles, whom he sent home. To the several Embassies (doubtfully suspended by the strange variety of successes that had lately happen'd) he gave Audience and return'd Answers, with such a grandeur of Spirit, grounded upon the assurance of his own Vertues, that though he let not fall one word that favour'd of rigour or rhodomontade, yet all his Discourses carried with them both an awful Majesty and an undoubted Credit.

Marching from Tarracon, he visited both the States of the Allies, and the standing Camp of the Army, where he highly commended the Souldiers, That notwithstanding two such terrible Defeats one on the neck of the other, they yet kept the Field, nor suffer'd the Enemy to reap the fruit of their Victories, but had drove them beyond the River Iberus, and bravely defended their Allies according to the trust reposed in them; as for Marcins, he made so much of him, as easily shew'd he was not subject to so impotent a passion as Envy, nor in the least feared any other persons Merits should eclipse his own Glory. Silanus then succeeded Nero in his Command, and the new Souldiers took up their Winter Quarters with the rest, whilst Scipio having seasonably given the necessary Orders in all parts, return'd to Tarracon; his reputation was no less amongst the Enemy than with his own Citizens and Confederates, and it was lookt upon as a good Omen of future success that they should dread him so much, when no probable account could be given for their extraordinary fears. They had now in several places places betaken themselves to Winter Quarters, Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo as far as Gales on the Coast of the Ocean; Mago in the middle of the Land, about the Forest of Casfulo, and Asdrubal Amilcar upon the River Iberus not far from Saguntum.

XX. Towards the end of this Summer wherein Capua was taken, and Scipio arriv'd in Spain, the Carthaginian Armado sent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, to intercept all Provisions that should be sent to the Roman Garrison in the Cittadel there, had indeed shut up all intercourse by Sea with the said Castle, but by continuing there so long, made Corn more scarce amongst their Friends than with the Enemy; for there was not so much brought in by the Ports being open to supply the Townsmen, as was consumed by such a Rabble of Seamen composed of several Nations, whilst the Garrison being but few, subsisted well enough on their old stores. So that at length the Navy was dismissed with as much joy, as it was entertain'd when it first arriv'd, and yet Victuals was never the cheaper, for after they were gone, no Provisions at all could be brought in from parts abroad.

XXI. At the latter end of the same Summer M. Marcellus arriving at Rome from Sicily, C. Calpurnius the Prætor call'd a Senate for his sake in the Temple of Bellona; where having given an Account of his Actions, and modestly expressed his grief for his own unhappiness, as well as his Souldiers, That when he had reduc'd that Province, he could not have leave to bring home his Army with him, he desired, That he might enter the City in Triumph; but the same was not granted: For the matter being long debated, Which was less convenient, either to refuse him a Triumph being present, in whose name being absent, publick Thanksgivings and Honours had been decreed to the Immortal Gods for the Successes and gallant Actions achieved by his Conduct? Or to admit him to Triumph, as if he had finish'd the War, whom they had order'd to resign his Forces to a Successour, (which was never decreed but when the War remained) and especially when the Army the best Witness, whether he deserved the Honour of a Triumph or not, was absent? A middle Course was at last agreed on, viz. That he should come into the City with that lesser sort of victorious Solemnity call'd Ovation; and the Tribunes of the Commons by Authority from the Senate preferr'd a Bill to the People, qualifying the said Marcellus to retain his Command and Authority that day he should in Ouant manner enter into Rome: But he the day before celebrated a Triumph of his own head without the Walls, on the Alban Hill, and next morning in Ouant-wife came into Town with a rich Booty taken in the Wars carried before him; for in his Pomp he had the Draught of the City Syracuse curiously painted, as also the Catapulta, the Balista, and other wonderful Engines of War, with the Ornaments and Curiosities of a long Peace and Royal Opulency, a power of Plate, Silver and Brads curiously wrought, and other Furniture, rich Tapistry-Hangings and sumptuous Robes, and abundance of exquisite Pictures and Statues with which Syracuse was garnish'd beyond most Cities of Greece; and for a token of his Victory over the Carthaginians, eight Elephants were led along; but one of the most taking parts of the Show, was to see Sosis the Syracusan and Meris the Spaniard marching before him with Crowns of Gold on their Heads, of whom one was the Guide that led them into Syracuse by night, and the other surrendered the Nasos. They were both made free Denizens of Rome, and had five hundred Acres of Land apiece bestow'd on them and their Heirs for ever, which Sosis was to chuse in the Syracusan Territories out of the Lands formerly belonging to the Kings, or any other Enemies of the People of Rome, and also to take any one of their Houses at Syracuse that had been put to death for their Delinquency. Meris and the Spaniards that came in with him, were allotted Dwellings and Lands in Sicily forfeited by such as had revolted; and M. Cornelius was appointed to set out and assign the same; and in the same Country Belligines (who brought over Meris to the Roman Interest) had four hundred Acres allow'd him. After Marcellus had left Sicily, the Carthaginian Navy landed there eight thousand Foot and three thousand Numidian Horse, unto whom revolted the Inhabitants of Marguntum, Hibla, Macella, and some other Towns of small note. The Numidians commanded by Mutines ranged all over Sicily, and destroy'd with fire the Fields and Villages of such as adhered to the Romans, whilst the Roman Army made but a slow defence, being much discontented, partly because they had not leave to return home with their General, and partly vext because they were forbidden to take up their Winter-Quarters in any Towns, but forc'd to lye in the Field, and had there been any to head them, they wanted not an heart to mutiny and rebel; but M. Cornelius the Prætor sometimes with good words, and sometimes with chastisements, made shift both to keep them quiet, and recovered again all the revolted Towns, amongst which that of Murgantia with all its Territories, he gave to the Spanish Souldiers, pursuant to the before-mentioned Decree of the Senate.

XXII. Both Consuls holding hitherto the Government of Apulia between them, seeing now there was no great fear of Annibal and his Carthaginians were commanded to divide that Province and Macedonia between them by Lot, which latter happen'd to Sulpicius, and he succeeded Levinus therein. Fulvius being call'd home to hold the Election for Consuls at the day appointed, the Century of the young men of the Tribe call'd Veturia, happening to have the Prerogative or first Vote, nominated T. Manlius Torquatus and T. Otacilius; Manlius being present, a multitude flockt about him to congratulate his new Honour, (for 'twas not doubted but the rest of the people would consent) but he follow'd with a great Troop, comes to

to the Consuls Tribunal, desiring to be heard a few words, and that the Century which had given their Suffrage, might be order'd to be recall'd; All people were full of expectation what it was he would demand? He desired to be excused by reason of the weakness of his sight. For sure, quoth he, shameless must that Pilot of a Ship be counted, and as impudent a General of an Army, who when he must do all by other mens Eyes, shall yet desire peoples Lives and Fortunes to be committed to his Conduct and Guidance, who is scarce able to guide himself; Therefore may it please you to Command this young Century to give their Voices anew; and in their chusing of Consuls to consider the War that is at present in the Bowels of Italy, and the dangerous condition of the Commonwealth, our Ears still in a manner resounding with that dreadful noise and alarm which the Enemy rais'd but a few months ago under the very Walls of Rome; But the Century with unanimous Shouts declaring, that they would persist in their former Choice? Torquatus again stands up and says, If I were Consul neither should I bear with your insolent manners, nor would you endure the strictness of my Government; To the Scrutiny therefore once again, I bid you, and consider there is a Punick War in Italy, and the Enemies General is no less a person than Annibal. Then the Century being moved, both by his Authority and the Reverence they had for him, as by the Applauses of all the people, admiring his modesty and other Vertues, desired the Consul, That the Century of Seniors of their Veturian Tribe might be call'd, for they had a mind to consult with those of more Age and Experience about this Affair, and by their sage advice and directions nominate Consuls. Who being called, and some time allow'd for them to consult together privately in the Apartment call'd Ovile; These Elders told them there were, as they conceiv'd, but three persons fit to be put in nomination at this juncture, of whom two already were full of all honourable Offices that could be born in the Commonwealth, viz. Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus, but if they had a mind to Create any new Consul against the Carthaginians, there was M. Valerius Levinus, who had perform'd most excellent service against King Philip, both by Sea and Land. Accordingly after the Consultation, and the old Century dismiss'd, the young ones went again to the Ballotting Box, and declared for Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his Glory for the late Conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was absent, in which choice all the rest of the Tribes did readily concur. Let who will laugh at those that prefer and applaud ancient times, for my own part, if there were any City to be found, all whose Inhabitants were Philosophers and wise men (a thing some learned persons have fancied rather than either found or expected) I cannot think we should even there meet with a Nobility of greater Gravity and less Ambition, or a common people better manner'd and instructed. But such is the depravity of this Age, wherein even Children think scorn to follow the directions and authority of their own Parents, that to us it seems incredible that a whole Precinct of young men should have so much deference for their Elders, as not without their advice to make use of their free Liberties in giving their Votes for Election of Magistrates.

Then they proceeded to the Election of Prætors, and the persons created to that Office were P. Manlius Volso, and L. Manlius Acidinus, and C. Lætorius, and L. Cnecius Alimentus. No sooner was this Choice over, but news arriv'd, that T. Otacilius (whom the people would have set up for Consul with T. Manlius Torquatus as aforesaid) was dead in Sicily. The Apollinarian Games exhibited last year, were again renew'd, and a Law made by the Interest of Calpurnius the Prætor, that the same should from time to time be for ever continued. The same year several Prodiges were seen, or talk'd of, as that in the Temple of Concord, the Image Victory which stood on the top thereof, being smitten with lightning and beat down from its own place, fell upon those other Statues of Victory that were fixt on the Front of the said Temple, and there rested without falling further; That at Anagnia and Fregelle the Walls and Gates were blasted with fire from Heaven; That in the Market place of Sudortum there ran streams of Blood for a whole day together; That at Eretum it rain'd Stones, and at Reate a Mule brought forth a Foal; These ill tokens were expiated by the bigger sort of Sacrifices, and by a solemn day of Humiliation, and a nine dayes Sacrifice. Also this year died some publick Priests, and others chosen in their room, as instead of M. Æmilius Nuvida one of the sacred Decemvirs, M. Æmilius Lepidus; In place of M. Pomponius Matho the Pontiff, C. Livius; For Sp. Carvilius the chief Augur, M. Servilius. As for T. Otacilius Crassus the Pontiff, because he died just as his year was out, there was no need of electing any other in his Room; C. Claudius the Flamen or chief Priest of Jupiter forfeited his Office, by committing an error in his sacrificing, and not dividing the Inwards of the Beasts aright.

About this time M. Valerius Levinus, having first sounded the minds of the Ætolian Princes, came with a small Fleet of Ships, nimble Sailers, to their General Diet, before summoned for that purpose; where having acquainted them how Syracuse and Capua were both taken and subdued, and in what a prosperous condition the affairs of Italy were, he added, That it was always the Custom of the Romans received from their Ancestors, to treat their Allies with the highest respect and kindness, sometimes making them Free Denizens of Rome, and equal sharers in all those Priviledges which they themselves enjoy'd, and with others dealing so liberally, that they chose to continue free Allies rather than Citizens; but above all the rest, they had a peculiar Honour for the Ætolians, since they were the first of all foreign Transmarine Nations that entred into Amity with them. As for their bad Neighbours, King Philip and the Macedonians, cedonians, he had so broken their Spirits and weakened their Forces, that they were not only glad to quit those Cities they had formerly by force taken from the Ætolians, but found work enough to defend their own native Country Macedonia: And whereas the Ætolians were much discontented, because the Acarnanians were dismembred from the Body of their State, he did assure them, he would reduce and unite them again under their ancient Government and Jurisdiction. These promises of the Roman General were confirmed and assured to the People by Scopas (at that time Head-Magistrate of that State) and Dorimachus a Prince of the Ætolians, who with less modesty and greater asseverations magnified the Grandeur, Power and Majesty of the People of Rome; but the main Motive was their hope of recovering Acarnania; therefore Articles were drawn and signed, containing the Conditions on which these entered into Alliance with the Romans, wherein a Clause was added, That if they pleased and should like well thereof, the Eleans, Lacedemonians, together with Attalus, and Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus (Attalus was a King of Asia, the other two Princes of Scythia) might be comprized and included. The Articles were these, That the Ætolians should forthwith enter into a War with King Philip by Land, and the Romans assist them with a Fleet by Sea consisting of not less than twenty Sail of Gallies, each of five banks of Oars apiece; That all Cities and Towns that should be conquer'd from Ætolia as far Corcyra, should as to the Soil, Edifices, Walls and Lands thereto belonging, be for ever enjoy'd by the Ætolians; but all their moveable Goods and Plunder fall to the Romans share; That the Romans should use their endeavours that the Ætolians might again possess Acarnania; That if at any time the Ætolians made a Peace with Philip, they should insert a Clause, that the same should be of no force until such time as Philip should have withdrawn his Forces and Arms employ'd against the Romans or any of their Allies and Territories. And in the same manner, if the Romans happen'd to treat with him, they should make the like provision for the security of the Ætolians and their Allies. This Agreement being reduced into Writing, was two years afterwards publicly hung up by the Ætolians in Olympia, and by the Romans in the Capitol, to remain amongst their other Records for a Memorial to Posterity; and the reason why the same was not done sooner, was because of the Ætolian Embassadour's long stay at Rome, which yet was no hindrance at all to their proceedings in the Wars. For both the Ætolians presently began to wage War with Philip, and Levinus by force of Arms took Zant (a small Isle near Ætolia, having but one City of the same Name) all but the Castle, and also Oeniada and Nasus, two Towns of the Acarnanians, which he restor'd to the Ætolians; and looking upon Philip to have his hands too full of fighting with his Neighbours at home, to be able to look after Italy, or perform his Covenants with Annibal, he retired himself to Corcyra.

XXV. The News of the Ætolians Revolt was brought to King Philip as he lay in his Winter-Quarters at Pella; therefore because he had resolv'd in the beginning of the Spring to invade Greece, that Macedonia and its neighbouring Cities might not be molested by the Illyrians, to frighten them from stirring, by the desolations he brought upon others, he made a sudden Inroad upon the Oricinians and Apollonians, and with great terrour coopt them up within their Walls. And having thus spoiled the Illyrians Neighbours, he turn'd his Forces with the like celerity into Pelagonia, and took by storm a City of the Dardanians lying on the Frontiers of Macedonia, and a convenient Pass into that Country. Having in great haste performed these Exploits, he forgot not the War he had with the Ætolians and Romans joining with them, but through Pelagonia, Lynceus and Boticea came down into Thessaly, as verily believing that the people of those Countries would be easily excited to assist him against the Ætolians. Leaving there Persens with a Body of four thousand men to guard the Pass into Thessaly against the Enemy, himself in person, before he should be more embarrassed with greater Affairs, leads his Army into Macedonia, and so into Thrace against the Medes, a People that inhabited a small Province there (not the Medes of Asia) and were wont to make Incursions upon the Macedonians as oft as they perceiv'd that King engaged in a foreign War, and the Realm to be left without a sufficient Guard. To weaken them therefore he plunder'd and laid waste all the Country about Phragranda, and laid Siege to Amphorina the principal City and chief strength of the Median Territories. Scopas having Advice that the King was gone into Thrace, and busie there with his Arms, musters all the Ætolians fit to bear Arms, and prepares to invade the Acarnanians, who, though too weak to cope with him, especially since they had already lost their best fortified Cities, Oeniades and Nasus, and moreover saw the Roman Forces ready also to fall upon them, did rather with rage and despair, than sober Counsel resolve to engage him; for sending away their Wives and Children and all Old people above sixty into Epirus for security, the rest from fifteen to sixty years of Age did all enter into a solemn Oath, That they would never return unless with Victory; and laid an heavy Curse upon those of their own Nation that should entertain within their doors, or relieve with provisions any of them that were vanquish'd and fled out of the Field, earnestly intreating all other people also not to allow them any harbour or accommodations; withal they besought their Neighbours the Epirots, that they would gather all together in an heap such of their dead bodies as should fall in the Battel, and interr them in one Grave, and erect a Tomb or Monument over them with this Epitaph;

Here

Here lie the Acarnanians, who manfully fighting lost their Lives to Defend their Country against the Violence and Injuries of the Ætolians.

Their Courages being heated by these resolutions, they Encamp'd on the Frontiers, expecting the Enemy. But withal dispatch'd Agents to Philip to acquaint him what imminent danger they were in, which caus'd him to give over that War he had in hand, having first made himself Master of Amphormia, and prosper'd in several other undertakings in those parts. The Ætolians upon the news of that solemn Oath the Acarnanians had taken, were grown somewhat cooler, but understanding that Philip was coming that way, were glad to wholly quit the Expedition, and keep within their own Confines. Philip took vast long Marches, as long as the Acarnanians were in Jeopardy, but before he was past the City Dius, being advertiz'd, that the Ætolians were gone back, he himself also returned unto Pella.

Levinus early in the Spring put to Sea with the Fleet from Corcyra, and having doubled the Cape Leucates, sail'd as far as Naupactum, and thence for Anticyra, where he had appointed Scopas and the Ætolians to expect his Arrival. This Anticyra is situate in Locris on the left hand as you enter the Gulph of Corinth. 'Tis but a small Journey by Land from Naupactum thither, and as short a Cutt by Sea; so within three days after they began to Assault that City on both sides; but the fiercest Attacque was from the Water, being manag'd by the Romans, whose Ships were full of all sorts of Artillery and Engines of Battery. The Defendants in few days were forc'd to surrender, and the City delivered into the Ætolians hands, and the Pillage to the Romans, according to the before-mentioned Articles between them. Here Levinus receiv'd Letters, That he was declared Consul in his absence, and that P. Sulpicius was coming to succeed him, but being long detained there by a tedious Disease, his return to Rome was much later than was expected. M. Marcellus entering on his Consulship the fifteenth of March, holding a Senate that day according to Custom, declared, That in his Collegues absence he would meddle with no publick affairs, nor dispose of any of the Provinces. That he knew full well there were many Sicilians that came to complain against him, lurking in the Country Farms of certain of his Enemies and detractors, whom for his own part he should be so far from hindering to publish openly in Rome those Crimes which were devised and charged against him by his Adversaries, That were it not that they pretended to be afraid (forsooth) to bring in their accusation in the absence of the other Consul, he would presently desire the Senate to give them Audience; but as soon as his Colleague arriv'd, he did assure them, this should be the first matter debated, adding, That he was not insensible how industrious M. Cornelius had been, making as it were an Hue and Cry all over Sicily for persons to come in and complain against him, and how the same Gentleman by his Letters full of untruths, endeavour'd to make the City believe, That the War yet continued in Sicily, which was, all out of envy to diminish his glory. Then did the Consul dismiss the Senate, having won that day the reputation of being a person that could notably govern his Passions, and now it seem'd as if there would be a general Vacation, not only of proceedings at Law, but almost all other affairs until the other Consul should come home. This rest and idleness (as commonly it happens) set the Commons (having nothing else to do) a talking, and rumours, murmurs and complaints are every where spread, That by this tedious War, not only all the Country about Rome (especially where Annibal had march'd with his Barbarous Army) was spoil'd and wasted, but all Italy in a manner dispeopled and laid desolate by continual Levies and slaughters, as particularly at Cannæ, where two whole Armies were cut to pieces at once; and now they had got two fierce Martial Men Created Consuls, such as in Peace would be apt enough to kindle a War on some pretences or other, so little was any accommodation of the present bloody differences to be expected at their hands, or that they would seek Peace, that the City might have some breathing time after these Calamities.

But this prattle was interrupted by a dreadful Fire that broke out in several places at once about the Market-place, on the Eve of Minerva's Festival called Quinquatrus. At one and the same time the seven Taverns (which were afterwards reduc'd to five) and the Goldsmiths-Row, (now call'd the new Shops) were all on a light Fire; which soon caught hold of private Houses (for the publick Halls and Palaces were not built there in those days;) as also of the common Gaol, the Fish Market, and the Royal Gallery: The Temple of Vesta, with much difficulty was preserv'd, chiefly by the pains of thirteen Bondmen, who for that service were bought from their Masters at the publick Charge, and made Free. The Fire continued all that night and the next day; nor was there any doubt but it was carried on by humane Treachery, for that the Fires began in several places at once, and those far distant. Therefore the Consul by Authority of the Senate made Proclamation, That whoever should discover the Authors and Fomenters of this Conflagration, should be rewarded; if he were a Freeman, with a good Summ of money, or if a Bond-man, with his Freedom. Which prevail'd upon one Mannus a Slave belonging to the Calavii of Capua, to come in and declare, That his Masters and five other young Capuan Noblemen, whose Parents Q. Fulvius had Beheaded, had kindled this Fire, and were resolv'd frequently to cause the like if they were not apprehended. Being seiz'd, and all their Families, they first endeavour'd to blast the credit of the Witness and his Evidence, alledging, That being scourg'd by his Masters the day before for his Rogneries, he ran away, and to be reveng'd took the advantage of this sad accident to accuse them. But he justifying his Information to their Faces, and some other of their Servants that had an hand in promoting the Fire, being put to the Rack in the middle of the Forum, they confess'd the whole matter, and both Masters and Servants were Executed; The Discoverer had his Liberty given him, and twenty thousand Asles [about sixty two pounds ten shillings sterling] for his pains. As the Consul Levinus pass'd through Capua, the Inhabitants flockt about him, and with Tears begg'd leave to go to Rome, That they might implore the Senates Mercy, to take some Commiseration, and not destroy them utterly, nor suffer the Campanian name to be wholly extinguish'd by the Cruelty of Q. Flaccus. On the other side Flaccus protested, he had no particular spleen against the Capuans, but only he hated them as publick Enemies to the State, and so he would always do as long as he knew them so ill affected as they were to the People of Rome, who had not more desperate and mortal Enemies on the Face of the Earth than they. Therefore he thought it best to keep them up within the Walls, for if at any time they chanc'd to get out, they would range the Country like Savage Beasts, and tear and worry all that come in their way. That some of them were already ran away to Annibal, others gone to Rome to burn that City, and treacherously lay it in ashes; That the Consul when he arriv'd there would behold the fresh prints of Capuan Villany in the ruins of the half-consumed Market-place; Nay they aim'd at the Temple of Vesta, to have quench'd those Eternal Fires, and utterly to have defac'd and destroy'd the Palladium, that sacred pledge on which depends the Fate of the Roman Empire, there reposit'd; and therefore he could not at all think it safe to admit any Campanians within the Walls of Rome. However Levinus taking an Oath of the Capuans selected Agents, That within five days after they should have received the Senates Answer, they would return home again, Order'd them to follow him to Rome; and when he was come pretty nigh the City, both the Sicilians and Aetolians went out to meet him, and attended with this multitude he entred the City at the Head of several vanquisht Nations, who came to accuse two most renowned Generals, Marcellus and Fulvius, of whom the former had lately taken Syracuse, and the latter Capua, two of the bravest Cities in the World.

XXVIII.

Both Consuls in the first place consulted with the Senate about the State of the Commonwealth and the Government of the Provinces. Levinus giving an account in what posture he had left Macedonia, Greece, the Aetolians, Acarnanians and Locrians, and what actions he had perform'd both by Sea and Land, how he had beat back Philip when he offer'd to invade the Aetolians, and had sent him packing to the further parts of his own Kingdom, so that the Legion that was there might very well be recall'd, for the Fleet would be enough to keep off that King from making any attempt on Italy. Thus much he spake particularly of himself and that Province he had presid'd over; As to the other Provinces both Consuls jointly propos'd the same to the Senates consideration, who decreed, That one of the Consuls should have the charge of Italy, and the War with Annibal, the other to command the Fleet, whereof T. Oracilius was lately Admiral, and together with L. Cincius the Praetor govern Sicily. They were Order'd to have two Armies to be kept on Foot in Tuscany and the Cisalpine Gaul, consisting of four Legions; and that the two City Legions rais'd last year, should be sent into Tuscany; and the other two, commanded by Sulpicius the Consul, into Gaul, which latter were to be commanded by such person as the Consul to whose Lot Italy fell, should appoint; And into Tuscany was sent C. Calpurnius, being continued in his Command a year longer, after the expiration of his Praetorship. The main standing Army, as well of Citizens as Allies, was to be reduc'd, so that of two Legions there should be made but one, consisting of five thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse compleat; and those that had serv'd longest to be discharg'd. That of the Allies there should be continued seven thousand Foot and three hundred Horse, with the same respect and consideration of past service in dismissing the oldest Souldiers. As for Cn. Fulvius last years Consul, he ruled the same Province of Apulia, his Command being continued another year, without any alteration of his Forces. But P. Sulpicius his Colleague was commanded to send away all his Army, except Mariners; Likewise it was Ordered, That as soon as the new Consul arriv'd in Sicily, the Army there under M. Cornelius, should be sent out of that Island, only the Souldiers that escap'd at Canna, being as good as two Legions, were to be assign'd over to L. Cincius the Praetor, to keep Sicily in Order. Two other Legions that serv'd under Cornelius the year before, were to go into Sardinia to P. Manlius Volsus the Praetor. The Consuls were enjoin'd in their Levies to compleat the City Legions, not to prefs any that had serv'd in the Armies of M. Claudius, or M. Valerius, or Fulvius, nor in the whole that year to exceed the number of one and twenty Legions of Romans.

XXXIX.

These Acts of the Senate being pass'd, the Consuls proceeded to divide their Provinces by Lot, Sicily and the Fleet fell to Marcellus; Italy and the War with Annibal to Levinus; which no less daunted the Sicilians that stood by, with great impatience expecting how the chance would fall, than if Syracuse had again been taken; They set up such a lamentable Cry, as for the present turn'd all mens Eyes upon them, and occasion'd much Discourse in the Town for a long time afterwards; for they went about to all the Senators, one by one, in vile despicable Garments, protesting, That if Marcellus came again amongst them, as Lord Deputy,

Deputy, they would not only quit their respective Habitations, but abandon the whole Island; for since without any shadow of offence given on their part, he was already their implacable Enemy, what but the highest Cruelties could they expect from him, now they had incens'd him by coming to Rome to complain of him for his former rigours? That it were better for that unfortunate Island to be set all on a light Fire by Aetna's Flames, or to be drown'd in the Sea, than thus to be expos'd as a Prey to a mortal Enemy. These Complaints of the Sicilians first spread amongst the Houses of the Nobles and chief Citizens, by people that either pitied them, or envied Marcellus, came at last to be matter of a publick Debate; and the Consuls were moved to desire the Senates leave to change their Provinces; whereupon Marcellus stood up and said, That in case Audience had already been given to the Sicilians by the Senate, he should, 'tis like, have been of another opinion, but now left any should clamour that they were restrain'd by fear from making their Complaints freely against him, who was immediately to be their Governour, he was content, if his Colleague would consent to exchange Provinces with him; only he requested their Lordships that the same may be no prejudice unto him; for if it had been unjust to give his Colleague the choice of what Province he pleas'd, without putting it to the Lot, a much greater injury and reproach it would be, to transfer what fell to his share by the Lot unto another? So the Senate rather intimating what they would be pleas'd to have done, than making any Order in the Case, broke up, and the two Consuls by consent between themselves, shifted their Provinces; for so destiny would have it, That the same Marcellus, who when affairs were at worst, was the first that had the glory of beating of Annibal, should now in the height of success, (to make him amends) be the last of the Roman Generals, that fell by Annibal's Arms.

The Provinces thus chang'd, the Sicilians were admitted into the Senate, where in a long XXXI Harangue to ingratiate themselves, They magnified the perpetual fidelity of King Hiero towards the Romans; And that as for Hieronimus, and afterwards Hippocrates and Epicides, one main reason why they were so much hated by the people of Syracuse, was for their rebellion against the Romans; That for that cause Hieronimus was cut to pieces by divers of their principal young Noblemen, as it were by publick consent and approbation; and that there was a Conspiracy of no fewer than seventy like noble youths to cut off Epicides and Hippocrates, who being held in hand, and delay'd by Marcellus, that had not brought up his Army to Syracuse at the time appointed, the business took wind, and they were all put to death by the Tyrants. Nay, that Marcellus had been the occasion of setting up those very Tyrants, by sucking and plundering Leontium so cruelly; That yet notwithstanding the chief persons of Syracuse fail'd not daily afterwards to make applications to Marcellus, offering to deliver the City when he pleas'd into his hands, but he from the very beginning was rather willing to take it by storm; and at last, when having in vain try'd all Efforts both by Sea and Land, he found he could not by force accomplish his purpose, he rather chose to accept of two mean Fellows, Solis a Blacksmith, and Meric a Spaniard, to be Authors of betraying the Town, than of the chief men of Syracuse, who had so often freely offer'd their service therein, which he did on purpose that he might with the better colour of Justice, butcher, massacre and plunder the most antient and faithful Allies of the people of Rome. If it had been the people and Senate of Syracuse that revolted to Annibal, and not Hieronimus a Tyrant; If the Syracusians by common consent, had shut their Gates against Marcellus, and the same had not been done (when they had no power to oppose) by their insulting Oppressors Hippocrates and Epicides, if they had wag'd War with the Romans with as much spirit and animosity as the Carthaginians, what more could Marcellus have done? or wherein given greater instances of Hostile rage, than in utterly destroying (as he has done) the whole City of Syracuse? For 'tis certain he hath left the Inhabitants nothing but the bare Walls and empty Houses, and Temples of the Gods violated and ransackt, the divine powers as well as the Citizens being robb'd of their Ornaments; and such havoc he hath every where made, that they have nothing to maintain themselves, their Wives and Children, but hard stones and the bare ground; therefore they did humbly request their Lordships, that restitution might be made, though not of all (which was impossible) yet at least of such things as could be found and rightfully claim'd by the Owners. Having thus made their Complaint, Levinus order'd them to withdraw, that the Fathers might debate thereon; Nay rather let them stay, quoth Marcellus, that I may answer to their Faces, since, most worthy Fathers, We are reduc'd to that pass, that whilst we fight for you abroad, those we subdue in the Field are admitted to be our Accusers in the Senate-House; and that the taking of two Cities hath made both my self and Fulvius Criminals, the one only guilty of subduing Syracuse, the other Capua.

The Syracusians being brought again into the Senate-House, the Consul proceeded thus: XXXI I do not, Venerable Fathers, so far forget the Dignity of the People of Rome and my own Quality and present Command, as to think that I your Consul am bound to plead for my self, or answer the Accusation of these Greeks, in case the Question were of any default or misdemeanour of my own; but the business is not, what I have done (for howsoever I have treated Enemies, the Law of War will justify it) but what they ought to suffer: For if in truth they were not Enemies, 'tis all one as if I had invaded Syracuse whilst King Hiero was living, but if they had not only revolted, but attack'd our very Embassadors with their Arms, and put them to the Sword, If they had shut up their Gates, and fortified their City against us, and entertain'd a Garrison of Carthaginians for their defence, who can complain that they suffer as Enemies, who committed all sorts of Hostility? But they

they say, I refused to accept of the Offer of the principal Syracusians to surrender the City, and chose to make use of Solis and Meric the Spaniard in so great an Affair? I suppose these Gentlemen present are none of the meanest of the Syracusians, since they upbraid others with the poverty of their condition; tell us therefore which of you it was that promised me to open the Gates, or receive into the City my armed Souldiers? Nay on the contrary, you hate and revile those that did it, and cannot even here forbear reproaching them, so far were you your selves from offering any such matter. The meanness of those persons, O Conscrip Fathers, which they object, is a mighty Argument that I refused not the Overtures of any people whatsoever that were willing to serve our Commonwealth. Before ever I invested Syracuse, I endeavoured all means of Peace, both by sending Embassadors, and offering my self to hold a personal Conference with them; but after I found them so impudent, as to offer violence to my Embassadors, and that when I my self gave their Chiefs a Meeting at the Gates, they would vouchsafe me no Answer, having taking a world of pains, and run infinite hazards both by Sea and Land, I made you Masters of Syracuse. What hardships they met with after the City taken, they ought to complain of to Annibal, and his Carthaginians vanquish as well as themselves, rather than before the Senate of the People of Rome who conquer'd them: For certainly, most Reverend Fathers, if I intended to deny that I plunder'd Syracuse, or thought I could not justify it, I would never have adorn'd the City of Rome with their Spoils. And what I have as Conquerour given or taken away from any particular persons, I may justly avow both by the Law of Arms, or their respective Merits, which whether you will please to allow of and ratifie, and now it imports the State, that by reversing my Actions you do not render your Generals for the future more remiss in the like Employments. In fine, my Lords, since you have heard both the Sicilians Complaint and my Defence face to face, we will, with your good leave, all withdraw, that in my absence your Honours may more freely debate the Point, and determine as you shall judge fit. So the Sicilians being dismissed, he went away to the Capitol to muster his Souldiers.

XXXII. In the mean time the other Consul put the matter to the Question in the Senate, where for a long time with hard tugging, it was debated. Many of the Senators following the Opinion of T. Manlius Torquatus, the Head of that Faction, alledged; That the War was waged with the Tyrants equally Enemies to the Syracusians and Romans, the City was to be recovered not taken, and being regain'd after it had so long been languishing under a domestick slavery, 'twas pity it should be exposed to all the Calamities of War. But between the Tyrants on one side, and the Roman Armies on the other, here was a most fair and Noble City (as if it had been the Prize of the Conquerour) ruin'd, a City that had been the Granary and Exchequer heretofore of the People of Rome, by whose Bounty and frequent Assurances in difficulty Exigencies heretofore, and even during the present Punick War this Commonwealth had been seasonably aided and honoured. Should King Hiero arise from the dead, he that had been so true and faithful a Friend to the Romans, with what face could we shew him either Syracuse or Rome? When he must on the one side behold his own dear native Country halfrazed and wholly ruinated by our hands, and on the other, could no sooner enter Rome, but even at the very Gates, he must see it deckt and adorn'd with his own Spoils? But though these and the like Speeches were made to move Compassion towards the Sicilians, and Envy against the Consul, yet the Majority of the Senate in favour of Marcellus passed an Act, That what he had done, either during the War, or after he had conquer'd the Town, should be ratified, and for the future the Senate would take care for the good of the Syracusians, and give particular Orders to the Consul Lævinus to have regard to the welfare of that City, as far as it would consist with the publick safety. Then sending two Senators into the Capitol to the Consul, to desire him to return into the Senate, and the Sicilians being likewise called in, the aforesaid Vote was openly read. The Embassadors had good words given them, and so were dismissed, who sung themselves at the feet of Marcellus, begging, That he would forget and forgive all they had said, either by way of deploring, or in order to alleviate their misery, and henceforwards receive both themselves and their City into his favour and protection: who answer'd them very kindly, and so they went home.

XXXIII. In the next place the Campanians were call'd before the Senate, who as they told a more dismal Tale, so their Cause was nothing so good or plausible: for they could not deny but they had deserv'd the usage they had met with, nor had they any Tyrants on whom to cast their Crimes, only they hop'd they had already suffer'd enough for their faults, since so many of their Senators, by Poison and the Hatchet were taken off; some few of their Nobility only remaining alive, who as they were not conscious to themselves of any such delinquency as to run the same desperate course with the rest, so neither did the Conqueror in all his fury adjudge them worthy of death, in whose behalf they were humble Petitioners to the people of Rome to grant them liberty for themselves, their Wives and Children, together with restitution of some part of their Estates, the rather, as being most of them either in blood or affinity long since allied to the Romans. They being order'd to withdraw, there arose for a while some dispute, whether Q. Fulvius should be sent for from Capua (for the other General Claudius died quickly after the taking of the Town) that the matter might be argued in his presence, as it was between Marcellus and the Syracusians; but when it was observ'd that M. Atilius, and C. Fulvius the Brother of Flaccus (both his Lieute-Lieutenants) and Q. Minucius and L. Veturius Philo, that were Lieutenants likewise to Claudius, who had been present in the whole action, were all now here in Court, it was resolv'd neither to recal Fulvius, nor put off the Capuans to a further day. But M. Atilius Regulus, a person of the greatest Authority of those that had been concern'd in the Siege of Capua, being required to deliver what he had to say to the point, he spoke to this purpose: "I was, as I remember, one of the Council of War that was call'd by the Consuls upon the taking of Capua, and when enquiry was then made, whether any of the Campanians had deserv'd well of our Common-wealth? there were only two Women found capable of that Character, viz. Vesta Oppia, born at Atella, but dwelling then at Capua, and Fancula Cluvia, formerly an Hackney Strumpet; of whom the former daily said Prayers, and offered Sacrifices for the Romans success, the other did privately relieve such of our men as were taken Prisoners; as for the rest of the Capuans there was not one but was as maliciously bent against us, as the Carthaginians themselves; and those whom Q. Fulvius Beheaded, suffer'd death as being more eminent for their Quality, not but that the rest were full as guilty, and deserv'd the same punishment. Yet do I not understand how this House can decide the cause of any Campanians that are Free Denizons of Rome, without consulting the people; as was done by our Ancestors in the Case of the Satri-cans when they rebell'd; for then M. Anistius, a Tribune of the Commons, prefer'd a Bill, and the Commons Voted, That the Lords of the Senate should have jurisdiction of the matter to order therein as they should think fit. Therefore I am of opinion, that we were best in like manner now to refer it to the Tribunes of the Commons, That one or more of them make a Rogation to the people, whereby we may be authoriz'd to proceed; Accordingly L. Atilius, a Tribune of the Commons, by Order from the Senate, did prefer a Bill in these words, "Whereas all the Campanians, Atellanes, Calatines and Subatines, have surrendred themselves, their Territories, Cities, Utensils, and all other things whatsoever, sacred or profane, unto Fulvius the Pro-Consul, to be at the devotion and dispose of the people of Rome, I demand, O Quirites, your will and pleasure, what shall be done with the premisses? The Commons Voted, That what the major part of the Senate present in Council should determine therein, they would hold good and firm.

By vertue of this Ordinance of the Commons, a Decree of the Senate was made, To restore in the first place to Oppia and Cluvia, all their Goods and Liberty, and if they expected any further reward, that they should repair to Rome. For each Family of the Campanians particular Decrees were made too tedious to recite. Some had their Estates Confiscated, and were themselves to be sold for Slaves, together with their Wives and Children, except such of their Daughters as were married before they were reduced to the Roman Government; some were to be continued close Prisoners till further consideration: Others were distinguish'd by the value of their Estates, whether their Goods should be forfeited, or not; All their Cattel taken (except Horses) and all their Bond-slaves (except Males above fourteen years old) and all their goods not affix to the Freehold, were to some to be restored. All the rest of the Campanians, Calatines and Sabatines, but such, who either themselves or their Parents sided with the Enemy, were to pass as free people, provided none of them were a Free Denizon of Rome or Latium. It was also Enacted, That none of those that were within Capua, after the Gates were shut, should after a certain day prefixt, remain either in that City, or any of its Territories, but should have a place allotted for them to dwell in on the other side of Tyberis, so that it were not too near the Bank of that River. Those that during the War were neither in Capua, nor any other City of Campania, revolted from the Romans; should inhabit on this side the River Liris, viz. between it and Rome. Such as came over to the Romans before Annibal came to Capua, were to be removed on the hither side of Vulturnus, provided none of them should possess either House or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. That such of them as were removed beyond Tiberis, they nor their Posterity should ever purchase or hold any Lands, but either in the Territories of Veii, Sutrium, or Nepesum, and withal none of them even there to exceed the flint of five hundred Acres of ground. That the Goods and Chattels of all those that had been Senators, or born any publick Offices at Capua, Atella, or Calatia, should be exposed to sale at Capua; As for such Free born persons whose Bodies were to be sold, they should be sent to Rome. And finally, the Images and Statues of Brass said to be taken from the Enemy, whether sacred or profane, the same were refer'd to the Colledge of Pontiffs, to dispose thereof at their pleasure. With these Decrees the Campanians were dismiss'd, more aggriev'd than when they came to Rome; no longer complaining of Fulvius's rigours, but blaming the severities of the Gods, and cursing their own bad Fortune.

The Sicilians and Campanians thus dispatcht, the Consuls proceeded in their Levies, and having complicated their Armies, they were at some loss to supply the Fleet with Mariners, for neither could they raise enow to Man the Ships, nor was there money in the Chamber of the City to pay them. Whereupon the Consuls set out a Proclamation; That private men according to their Estates rated in the Subsidy-Book, and respective Qualities, should, as heretofore provide Seamen at their own Charges, and furnish them with provision and money for thirty dayes. This Edict caused a general murmur and discontent, to that degree, that there seem'd seem'd rather to want one to head them, than inclination to a publick Mutiny and Insurrection, complaining, "That the Consuls took a course to ruine the Commons of Rome just as they had done the People of Sicily and Campania; That for so many years together they had been exhausted with Taxes, that now they had nothing left but the bare ground, and that wasted and untill'd; for as the Enemy had burnt their Houses, so the State had drawn away all their Servants that should manure their Land, partly by hiring them for some pitiful Pay to go for Souldiers, and at other times pressing them for Gally-slaves. "A man could no sooner get a Brass Farthing, but presently it went for Ship-Money or yearly Tribute; but none of their Lordly Edicts could make them pay what they had not. They might, if they pleas'd, not only distrain their Goods, but seize their persons too, for they had nothing left wherewith to redeem themselves. Nor did they mutter thus in private only, but openly in the Forum, and multitudes together in the hearing of the Consuls themselves, who neither by foul means nor by fair were able to appease them, but forced to declare, That they would take three days time longer to consider of it; which they spent in contriving Expedients, and the next day called a Senate to debate the matter. Where after long arguing, how just the peoples refusal was, the result of the House seem'd to terminate in this, "That whether right or wrong, private men must bear the burden, seeing there was no other remedy; for since there was no Money in the Exchequer, how else should the Fleet be set forth? And without a stout Fleet at Sea, how should Sicily be secured, or Philip be kept off, or indeed any of the Sea-Coasts of Italy be preserv'd from Invasion and Spoil?

XXXVI. The whole Senate being perplext with these difficulties, and every mans wits almost lost and unable to extricate themselves, Levinus the Consul stood up, and made a Speech to this purpose: "As Chief Magistrates precede Senators in Honour, and Senators the Commons in Dignity, so ought both the one and the other to be Examples to them in all cases of Charge and difficulty. For if a man would enjoin his Inferiours to undertake some burthen, the best way is for himself to take as much as he can of it on his own shoulders, and then will they be the more ready to obey and bear a part with him. Nor will it be thought heavy or grievous when every one fees his Superiours go more than equal shares with him; therefore that the People of Rome may have such a gallant Fleet equipped as we desire and have need of, and that private persons may not think much to furnish the same with Mariners, let us that are here in the first place begin the work: I mean let, all us Senators to-morrow bring into the publick Treasury all the Gold, Silver and Brass Coin that we have in our possession, reserving only Rings for himself, his Wife and Children, and a small Tablet for his Son to hang about his Neck, and such as have a Wife and Daughters, for each, one ounce of Gold. And for such as have pass'd the Curule Chair, let them retain the Trappings of their Horse, and a pound weight of Silver apiece, that they may have a Salt of Plate and a Taster to use in their Sacrifices; let the rest of the Senators have only one pound of Silver left, and 5000 Asles (15 l. 12 s. 6 d. sterling) in coined Brasses money for every Family. All the rest of our Gold, Silver, or Brass-money let us presently send in to the Triumvirs, that are the publick Bankers, without making any Ordinance of the Senate for it, that so our voluntary Contribution, and vying as it were one with another to help the Commonwealth, may first provoke those that are of the Quality of Knights, and afterwards the rest of the people to imitate us. This is the only Expedient that we the Consuls, after long Consideration and Conference between our selves, can propose, which we desire you would take, and doubt not of the Blessing of Heaven on it; for when the Publick is safe, our private Fortunes may easily be made good, but by neglecting that, we are sure to ruine each of our selves in the end. This Proposal was so heartily embraced, that the Thanks of the House were return'd to the Consuls for offering it. And the Senate was no sooner risen, but every one sent in his Plate and Treasure to the publick Stock, so eagerly, that they might have their Names entred formost in the Roll, that the Treasurers could not receive, nor the Clerks enter the Quantities fast enough. The Equestrian Order, with no less zeal followed this Example of the Senate, and the Commons, them, as fast, so that (without any Edict, or pressing Oration of the Magistrates) in a trice they had both Seamen enow, and Money enough to pay them, and all the necessary Preparations being compleated, the Consuls advanc'd to their respective Provinces.

XXXVII. Never was there any juncture, during all this War, wherein the state of affairs seem'd more equally balanced between the Romans and Carthaginians, for the Romans both in the Provinces had intermingled joys and sorrows by overthrows in Spain, and success in Sicily; and in Italy, as the loss of Tarentum was grievous, so the keeping still of the Fort there, even beyond their hopes, was matter of comfort; and the late dreadful terrour of Rome's being besieg'd, was soon blown over by the taking of Capua. The affairs also beyond Sea, were chequer'd with interchangeable Fortune; King Philip in a very ill time became their Enemy, but then the Atolians, and Attalus King of the lesser Asia, did voluntarily offer to be their new Allies, Fate even then by that Overture seeming to promise them the Empire of the East. In like sort the Carthaginians, as they lost Capua, so they had won Tarentum; and as they gloried not a little, because without any opposition they had come up to

to the very Walls of Rome, so they were pretty well mortified to find nothing at all gain'd in the end by that Expedition; and that they should be so much slighted, as whilst they sat before one Gate of Rome, an Army of Romans was led forth at another, and sent away into Spain. And even in Spain also, the greater hopes they had, were, that upon the death of two such renowned Generals, and both their Armies routed, the War would be at an end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever, the greater was their vexation to see those Victories rendred vain and of no use to them by the Valour of L. Marcius, an unexpected Captain chosen in haste, and performing such mighty Acts when they thought themselves sure enough that there was no body to make head against them. Thus Fortune poizing their affairs in equal Scales, all things were on both sides in a kind of wavering suspense, and as well their hopes as their fears ran as high as at the very first moment that the War began.

But that which most of all gaul'd Annibal, was that the seeing Capua more vigorously attacked by the Romans, than by him defended, had quite alienated the affections of many of the States of Italy, neither could he secure them all with sufficient Garrisons, unless he meant to Cantonize his whole Army into driblets, which would undo him in the Field; and on the other side he was not willing by withdrawing his Garrisons to trust to his Allies Fidelity, who being once left at liberty, might easily be sway'd any way by their hopes or fears. At last (as he was naturally addicted to Avarice and Cruelty) he resolv'd upon this course, to plunder and make spoil of those Cities which he was not able to keep, and so leave them wast and empty for the Enemy; an Enterprize not more wicked and dishonourable in its first attempt, than mischievous to himself in its consequences; for he thereby utterly lost the hearts not only of those who actually suffer'd under these unjust violences and rapines, but of all the rest besides: for though the present loss and calamity reach'd but some few, yet every body thought himself concern'd in the Example. Nor was the Roman Consul wanting, to sollicit all such Cities as yielded him any grounds of hope, that they might be brought over to the Roman Interest; There were in Salapia two Noblemen eminent above all the rest, Dasius and Blasius, the former a firm Adherent to Annibal, the latter as much as he durst, favour'd the Romans, and by secret Overtures had given Marcellus some hopes of a Revolt, but the matter could not be brought about without the concurrence of Dasius; wherefore after much muling and long delays, he at length resolv'd (rather for want of better Counsel, than on any likelihood of speeding) to address himself to Dasius, and acquaint him with the design. Who not only out of aversion to the thing it self, but Envy to the proposer, as being the only man in the Town that was his match, discovers the Plot to Annibal; whereupon they both were summon'd to appear, and as Annibal was sitting on his Tribunal, dispatching some other affairs, that he might anon the better attend unto the accusation of Blasius, whilst the Plaintiff and Defendant stood apart by themselves a pretty way from the rest of the people; Blasius briskly speaks to Dasius, and again solicited him to deliver up the Town to the Romans; Upon which Dasius (as if now the matter were plain and manifest) cries out aloud, That even just now in the very presence of Annibal he was again instigating him to practise Treason and betray the City. But this seem'd so extravagant a thing, that Annibal nor any present could believe it, but concluded rather that the accusation proceeded from Emulation and Malice, and that therefore he chose to charge him with such a Crime, as was not capable of other Witnesses, that he himself might more freely devise lies against him, and so they were both dismiss'd; yet did not Blasius for all that give over this bold attempt, but continued baiting of him with perpetual remonstrances, how advantageous it would be, both to themselves in particular, and their Country in general, whereby he at last prevail'd with him to consent, that the City Salapia and the Punick Garrison there (which consisted of five hundred Numidians) should be rendred unto Marcellus; but this could not be effected without much bloodshed, for they were the stoutest Squadron of Horse in all the Carthaginian Army, wherefore, though they were surpriz'd, and their Horses stood them scarce in any stead in the City, yet with such Weapons as in that sudden Alarm they could catch up, they first attempted to break their way through, but finding that impossible, they fought still most desperately to the last, nor were there above fifty of them taken alive, all the rest being kill'd upon the spot; and the loss of this Wing of Horse was much more considerable to Annibal than of the City Salapia; for never from that day forwards had the Carthaginians the better of the Romans in Cavalry, which before was the only advantage they had over them, and by which they obtain'd all their Victories.

About this time the Castle of Tarentum was grievously straitned for provissions, and hardly able to hold out, the only hope that M. Livius the Governour, and the rest of that Garrison had, was that they should be supplied from Sicily; and for the safe Convoy thereof along the Coast of Italy, there rode at Anchor a Fleet well near of twenty Sail before Rhegium. The Admiral of which Fleet, and of those Vessels appointed to transport Corn from time to time, was one D. Quintius a person of obscure Birth, but with many brave services he had signaliz'd himself, and won much honour in military affairs; at first he had the Command but of five Ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three-Banked Gallies, were were allow'd him by Marcellus; afterwards for his success in several Conflicts, three more were added of five Banks of Oars apiece, and at last he himself, by calling upon the Confederate Cities as Rhegium, Velia and Pastum for their Quota's of Ships, which by their Treaties they were to furnish the Romans with, made up a pretty Armado, consisting as aforesaid of twenty Sail. As this Fleet put off from Rhegium, it happen'd in their Voyage, that Democrates Admiral of Tarentum, with much a like number of Ships, came up with them about five Leagues from Tarentum, in a Bay call'd The Holy Port. The Romans not dreaming of an Engagement, came out only with Sails, but by good luck at Crotone and Sibaris they had furnish'd his Ships with Rowers also, and his Fleet for the bigness of the Vessels was very well provided and man'd. Just as the Enemies came within Ken, the wind that before blew hard, was laid, and gave them time to fit their Tackle, make ready their Rowers, and putting their Souldiers in a posture: seldom hath it been known, that any two Royal Armado's encounter'd with greater fury or braver Courage, than these two petty Navies shew'd against each other, as sensible that the Battel was of greater importance than all their Ships came to; the Tarentines considering, that if by gaining the Victory they made themselves Masters of the Sea, they should deprive the Roman Garrison of all hopes of provisions for the future, and so should easily gain possession of the Castle, as well as they had recovered their City to its antient liberty after almost an hundred years thralldome; on the other side, the Romans besirred themselves as lustily, that by keeping possession of the Castle, all the World might see, Tarentum was not fairly won from them by main strength or valour, but by stealth and treachery. The Signal was no sooner given on either side, but they ran at one another with the Beaks and Stems of their Prows as hard as they could drive, and still kept on rowing forwards, and as they lay together, mutually slung on their grappling Irons, so that they could not be separated, but fought not only with Darts, and other missile Weapons, but with their Swords too, and as it were hand to hand; their Prows stuck fast one in another, whilst the Poops or Hinder-Decks were driven about with contrary Oars of the adverse part; so near and withal so thick the Ships lay, and in such a narrow compass, that there was scarce one Dart slung in vain, or that lighted into the Sea without doing Execution; with their Beak heads they charg'd one another just as if it had been a Land fight, and so close they were that the Souldiers could step out of one Ship into another as they fought; but remarkable above all the rest, was the Conflict of the two Admiral Gallies, engaging together in the Front of all the rest; In the one was Quintius in person, in the other Nico a Tarentine that was surnam'd Perco, a man that both hated the Romans, and was hated by them, not only for the publick Quarrel, but particularly on his own Account, he being the Ringleader of that Faction which betray'd the City to Anibal. This Captain in the midst of the bufile, as Quintius was busy and at once fighting and encouraging his men, without taking sufficient heed to himself, ran him through with a Spear, who falling down dead in his Armour on the Foredeck, the Victorious Tarentine leaps fiercely on Board the Ship, already amaz'd and disorder'd for the loss of their Commander, easily beat them back, and got possession of the Foredeck; but the hinder deck, the Romans thronging together, defended for a while, till another Galley of the Enemies of three Banks of Oars clapt upon their Stern, and then being attack'd on each side, they were vanquish'd, and the Ship taken; which so much discourag'd the rest of the Romans, that they all began to fly, and several of them were sunk, others got to shore with their Oars, and became a prey to the Thurines and Metapontines; but of the Vessels of burthen laden with Corn, very few fell into the Enemies hands, the rest veering their Sails every way as the Wind serv'd, got out to Sea and escaped. About the very same time at home at Tarentum they had quite different Fortune; for about four thousand of them being gone into the Country to get in Corn, where they stragled and rambled up and down in disorder, of which Livius the Governour of the Castle having notice, and neglecting no opportunities to do them a mischief, sends out C. Persius a stout Captain with two thousand Souldiers well-arm'd, who fell upon them as they were wandering in the Fields, and after he had for a great while had the Execution of them, pursued those few that were left, home to the City, who were let in at the Gates but half open, for fear the Romans following them at heels, should have entered with them Pell-mell, and so have surpriz'd the City; Thus were matters at Tarentum set even at the Foot of the Account. The Romans winners at Land, the Tarentines at Sea, and both of them alike disappointed of their hopes of Corn, whereof they had only a sight, which could scarce fill their Bellies.

XL.

By this time, when most of the year was spent, Levinus the Consul arriv'd in Sicily, having long been expected by the Allies both old and new; his first and most important work was to settle the Affairs of Syracuse which had not yet (the Peace was so young) recovered a fit Regulation. Then he march'd his Legions to Agrigentum, where only remain'd the reliques of War, that City being held by a strong Garrison of Carthaginians; there Fortune was propitious to his first designs. Hanno was the Carthaginians Commander in Chief, but their chief hopes were in the Conduct and Valour of Mutines and his Numidians. This Mutines ranged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and pillaged the Romans Associates in all parts; nor could he by any Force or Stratagem be either intercepted in his return to Agrigentum, or or kept in when he was there, but that he would issue forth whensoever he list. So great Renown he had got by these Exploits, that the General thought his own Glory thereby eclipsed, and began so far to envy him, that whatever good Services he perform'd, the same were not very acceptable to Hanno, because atchieved by him whom he had a private pique against. At last he took away Mutines's Commission, and bestow'd his Command on his own Son, imagining that with his place he should lose also his Authority and that Esteem he had acquir'd amongst the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary; for this his apparent spight doubled their kindness and veneration towards Mutines, who likewise was resolv'd not to put up this Affront without being reveng'd, and therefore privately entered into a Correspondence with Levinus to deliver Agrigentum into his hands. And after Security on both sides given, and the manner of doing it agreed upon, the Numidians at an appointed time seized the Gate that leads towards the Sea, killing or driving away the Warders, and so let into the City, the Romans who waited hard by for that purpose; and marching now through the middle of the City up to the Market-place with a great noise and tumult, Hanno supposing it to be only an Insurrection of the Numidians (as formerly had happen'd) came forth as to appease the Mutiny, but perceiving at a distance a far greater Company than the Numidians, and withal hearing the Roman shouts, with which he was not unacquainted, without offering to strike a stroke he betook him to his heels, and getting out at a Postern Gate accompanied with Epicides and some few more, came down to the Sea-side, where meeting very luckily with a small Vessel, they went aboard and stood away for Africk, leaving the peaceable possession of all Sicily (which for so many years had been both the Seat and Prize of their Wars) unto the Enemy. The rest of the multitude as well Punic as Sicilian, without making any defence, running blindly away, and finding all passages stop'd, were cut to pieces at the Gates. The Town being secured, Levinus caused the chief Burghers concern'd in the Revolt to be first scourged and then beheaded, the rest he sold for Slaves, and all the Booty, and sent the Money to Rome. The report of the Overthrow of Agrigentum being spread through Sicily, presently turn'd all their affections to the Romans; in a little time twenty Towns were betray'd, six taken by storm; forty came in and surrendered of their own accord. The principal persons of all which Cities the Consul either rewarded or punish'd according to every ones deserts, and forced the Sicilians to lay aside their Arms, and apply themselves to Husbandry and Tillage, that the Island might not only yield Bread enough for its Inhabitants, but serve (as often heretofore it had done) Rome and all Italy with Provisions in a time of scarcity. From Agatirna he carried back with him into Italy a lewd Crew of unruly people about four thousand in number, being a Gallimaufry of all sorts of Rascals, banish'd Rogues, Bankrupts, and notorious Malefactors deserving death by the Laws of those several Cities wherein formerly they dwelt, and being run their Country, some for one Fact, some for another, they herded all together at Agatirna, and liv'd by Robberies and Rapine. Levinus thought it no good Policy to leave behind him these Rake-hells in an Island scarce yet well settled in Peace, lest they should continually prove fuel for new Combustions, and therefore took them with him, as knowing they would be of use to the Rhegines to forrage and rove about the Bruttians Country, for they had desired a Company that were well acquainted with thieving and stealing, and these he thought would fit them. And so as for Sicily, this year put an end to the War.

In Spain P. Scipio early in the Spring set his Ships out to Sea, and summon'd all the Auxiliaries of the Allies to rendezvous at Tarracon, ordering all the Ships, both Men of War and Vessels of Burden, to stand for the Mouth of the River Iberus, whither he also commanded the Legions to march as soon as they left their Winter-Quarters, and himself with five thousand of the Associate Auxiliaries from Tarracon repaired thither. Upon his first Arrival he thought good to make a Speech, especially to the old Souldiers who had gone through so many Brunts and Disasters; and therefore having drawn them up in a Body, he in the Head of the whole Army spoke to this effect: "There never perhaps was a new General besides "my self that was obliged by Justice and Merit to applaud and return thanks to his Souldiers "before ever he had employ'd them. But as for me, before ever I saw the Camp or this "Province, Fortune had made me beholding to you; first for your Piety and those kind "regards you paid to my Father and Uncle, both when living and dead. And that when "this Province was as it were wholly lost by those mighty Overthrows, yet you by your Valour recovered the entire possession of it for the People of Rome, and me the next Successour in Sovereign Command. And now since by the favour and assistance of the Gods, "we design and resolve not so much to secure our own Residence in Spain, as to dispossess "the Carthaginians, and not leave them any footing there; not to stand on the Banks of "Iberus to obstruct the Enemies passage, but to go over our selves and make their present "Quarters the Seat of War; I am not without apprehensions, that some of you may think "it a more great and daring Enterprize than comports either with the fresh remembrance of "those late Defeats, or my own green and unexperienced Age. Certainly our disasters in "Spain, no man breathing has reason more to resent or longer to bear in mind than my "self, as having therein lost both a Father and an Uncle, all in less than thirty days space, "whereby sorrow upon sorrow, and one Funeral after another was unfortunately heap'd

"upon our Family. But as this desolate Estate of our private Name (where, in a manner, I alone am left alive of all our Race) as oft as I think thereof, pierces my heart, and wounds me in the tenderest part of my Soul; so both the publick Vertue and Fortune of our Commonwealth do again revive my Spirits, and will not suffer me to despair, since it seems to have been always our Fate to thrive by Afflictions, and not to have compleated any Conquests until we first seem'd utterly overthrown and reduced to the last Extremities. I shall wave Examples of old times, as of Porfena, the Gauls or the Sammites, and begin only with these Punic Wars; How many brave Fleets, gallant Commanders and stout Armies did we lose in the former War? And what shall I say of this which we are at present engaged in? In all our defeats I have been either personally present, or where I was absent, none has reason to be more sensible of them than I. The River Trebia, the Lake Thrasimenus, and the Town Canna, what are they else but so many Monuments, Sepulchres and Tombs of the Roman Armies there cut to pieces, and of their Consuls slain? Add hereto the almost general Revolt of Italy, Sicily, and the greater part of Sardinia: Nay, add moreover this last affright and terrour when the Carthaginian Tents were pitch'd between the River Anio and the Walls of Rome, and from our very Gates we beheld Annibal vaunting himself as a Conquerour. In all these ruines and dreadful shocks of our State, the Vertue and Courage of the People of Rome held up its head above water upright and immoveable. You, Gentlemen Souldiers, were the first, that after the discomfiture at Canna, under the Conduct and good Fortune of my Father, put a stop to Aldrubal in his Expedition towards the Alps, design'd for Italy, who if once he had join'd his Brother Annibal, the Roman Name had undoubtedly by this time been extinct; which Success balanced and supported all our former Losses. At present by the favour of the Immortal Gods, our Affairs are in a more smiling condition, and grow every day better and better both in Italy and Sicily. In the latter, Syracuse and Agigentum are taken, the Enemy clear beaten out, and the whole Island reduc'd to the Roman Devotion. In the former, the Town Arpi is recovered by Surrender, the City Capua taken by Storm, and Annibal himself having in a trembling flight measur'd all the way from Rome to the Bruttians Country in the upper Calabria, is coop'd up in the further Corner thereof, and desires nothing more of the Gods, than that he may with a safe skin get out of his Enemies Land. How absurd and unaccountable then, my valiant Souldiers, will it be, if you who here with my Parents (for both deserve to be equally honour'd with that Name) supported the tottering Fortunes of Rome, at a time when one calamity came thick on the neck of another, and the Gods themselves seem'd to declare in favour of Annibal, should now in the self-same Province let fall your invincible Courage, and grow faint-hearted in this promising Juncture, when all things go prosperously on our side? As for the late Misfortunes which have happen'd here, I wish they might have pass'd over without sorrow as well on my part as yours. But this I will say, That the Immortal Gods, Guardians of the Roman Empire, who inspired all the Wards and Precincts with an unanimous Voice to confer on me the Honour of this Sovereign Command, have not been wanting both by lucky Auguries and happy Auspices, and nocturnal Visions too, to signify and portend us all the success and prosperity we can wish. Moreover, my own mind (which always hitherto I have found the truest Prophet, and which never yet deceived me) does preface and seem certainly to tell me, That all Spain shall be ours, and that in a short time the whole Punic Name and Nation sent packing thence, shall fill all the neighbouring Seas and Shores with Tokens and Relations of their shameful Flight. What my Spirit of it self does thus divine, is confirmed by the infallible Dictates of Reason: For do you not see that the Carthaginians Allies, wearied with their Tyranny and Abuses, send their Embassadors to Court our Friendship and Protection? Are not their three Generals at such odds amongst themselves, as ready to fall foul on one another, they have separated their Forces, and are now gone into different and remote Regions? And undoubtedly the same Fortune is hovering over their heads which was lately our undoing on the very same occasion; for they are deserted by their Confederates just as we were at first by the Celtiberians, and now they have divided their Armies, which was the Overthrow of my Father and my Uncle; neither will their intestine Feuds suffer them to unite, nor are any of them single able to withstand us. Do but you, my gallant Souldiers, favour the Name of the Scipio's, and me the true Off-spring of your late Generals, budding forth from that old Noble Stock, which seem'd cut down to the Roots; go on then, you try'd and ancient Warriours, set over the River Iberus a new Army and a new General, pierce into those Territories which you have often already conquer'd, and where you shall meet every where with Monuments of your former Valour; and doubt not but for my part I shall endeavour so to behave my self, that as you now behold in me the lively Countenance and resembling Features of my Father and my Uncle, so in a little time you shall acknowledge the express Effigies of their Spirits, Faith and Valour, and every one cry, That old Scipio is reviv'd or born again to be their General.

XLII. Wonderfully cheer'd were the Souldiers with this Oration; and leaving for the security of those parts three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse, under the Command of M. Silanus, Silanus, he transported cross the Iberus the rest of his Forces, consisting of five and twenty thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; there he was advised by some about him, Since the Punic Armies were separated into parts so far remote from each other, to attacke the nearest; but he fearing lest by that means he might draw them all together, against whom he should not then be able to make head, chose rather in the mean time to be doing with new Carthage, a City both rich in it self, and much more considerable, as being the Enemies common Magazine, for there were their Arms and money laid up, and the Hostages of all Spain kept; besides, as it was most conveniently situate to cross over to and fro between that and Africk, so it had a bold and large Haven able to receive the greatest Fleet that could spread Canvass that way, and the only Port (if I be not mistaken) of all that Coast of Spain, which opens into our Sea. Yet he communicated his design to none but C. Lelius, who being sent about with the Fleet, was ordered so to steer his course, that at the same time as Scipio fac'd that City by Land, he should then, and not before, enter the Haven; where in seven days after they parted from the Mouth of Iberus, they both arriv'd, and invested Carthage by Sea and Land. He Encamp'd on the Northside of the City, and fortified himself behind, for as to his Front he was well enough defended by the natural situation of the ground. For thus Carthage stands; There is a Creek of the Sea in the middle, well near of all that Coast of Spain, mostly exposed to the Southwest Wind, and running up within the Land about half a Mile, and somewhat more in breadth, at the Mouth thereof there is a small Island towards the open Sea, which shelters the Haven from all other Winds but the Southwest; From the innermost nook of this Bay there bears out a Promontory, which is a Peninsula, and on that the City is built; on the East and South, wash'd by the Sea; on the West there is a Lake which also spreads somewhat to the North, but of uncertain depth, according as the Sea ebbs and flows, and the Isthmus [or neck of Land] which joins the City to the main Continent, is not above a quarter of a mile over; Therefore on that side, being so small a piece of work, the Roman General did not trouble himself to cast up any Entrenchment; either out of a Bravado to shew the Enemy how much he confided in his own strength; or because, in his frequent attackes on the Walls, he might have an open passage to advance and retreat as he pleas'd.

XLIII. Having finish'd what Fortifications he thought needful, he set his Ships in order within the Haven, as resolving to attacke them by Sea; and having in person visited the whole Fleet, and given a special Charge to the Commander of every Ship, to keep diligent watch by night (for the Enemy now at the beginning of the Siege, would be apt every where to take what advantages they could) he then return'd to the Camp, to give his men an account of the reason why he began the War with this Siege, and withal to confirm their hopes of gaining the place; To which purpose he spake as follows, Whoever thinks I have brought you hither to assault one City only, is much mistaken, regarding only your present task without considering its consequences; 'Tis true, you are now battering the Walls of but one City, but in that one City, if you take it, you make your selves Masters of all Spain; Here are the Children of their Kings and principal persons of Quality kept as Hostages; and as soon as they fall into our hands, all those places which now are under the Carthaginians, will join with us; Here is all the Enemies Money and Treasure, without which they cannot continue the War, their Army consisting for the most part of Mercenaries; and the same will be of mighty use to us amongst the Barbarians, since therewith we may be sure to purchase their Friendship. Here is their whole Magazine, their Arms, their Armour, their Artillery and Engines for Land Service, and their Tackling and Stores for equipping Ships to Sea, with which we shall furnish our selves, and leave them as it were naked; we shall likewise gain both a most fair and wealthy City, and a brave Haven lying most opportunely to stock us both by Land and Sea with all things that we shall have occasion for; As these will be vast advantages to us, so the loss will be far greater to the Enemy; This is their Castle for strength, their Granary for Provision, their Treasury for money, their Arsenal for Arms, and in a word their common Storehouse for all things whatsoever; Hither is the most direct passage and shortest cut out of Africk; Here is the only Harbour for Shipping between Gebraltar and the Pyrenean Mountains; from hence all Spain overlooks, and as it were commands Africk. But knowing that you cannot but be sufficiently sensible of the importance of the service, and well prepared for it: I will say no more but this, Let us forthwith for the Honour of the Roman Name, go on, and with all our might storm New Carthage; Which all his Army joyfully consenting to, by crying out unanimously, Let's do't, Let's do't; he led up nearer to the Town, and at once began the Assault both by Land and Sea.

XLIV. Which Mago, the Carthaginian Governour, perceiving, he thus dispos'd of his Forces; two thousand of the Townsmen he Order'd to that part of the City that lay over against the Roman Camp; and five hundred more he posted on a little Hill on the East-part of the City, all the rest he commanded to be in a readines to make resistance in any place where the Alarm should be given, or danger requir'd. Then flinging open the Gate, those two thousand whom he had drawn up within the street leading to the Enemies Camp, issued forth; The Romans, by their Generals Order, retreated a little, that during the Conflict they might be nearer their Camp to be reinforced with fresh men as there should be occasion; At first they flood to't stoutly on both sides, and little odds could be perceived between them; But new Parties coming up continually to the Romans, enabled them after a little time, not only to bear back the Enemy from their Camp, but also to put them to the run, whom they pursued so fiercely, that if Scipio had not caused a Retreat to be sounded, they seem'd like to have broke in along with them into the City, and presently to have taken it; For indeed there was no less Consternation within, than abroad, inasmuch that the Guards and Centinels quitted their Posts, and those that were appointed to defend the Walls, leap'd down and left them naked; which Scipio perceiving from an high Bank, which they call, Mercurius Tutates, he thought it not best to neglect such an opportunity, but sent for his whole Army to advance out of their Camp, and bring with them the Scaling Ladders and other necessities, immediately to storm the City. Himself in person shelter'd under the Shields of three tall lusty young men (for by this time they let fly from the Walls a mighty Volley of Artillery of all sorts) approach'd the City; where he exhorted, encouraged, and gave all necessary Orders; nor did his presence a little enflame the Courage of his men, being an Eye-witness of every ones gallantry or failure. So that sighting the wounds they received, they flung themselves upon the Enemies Weapons, and neither the strength of the Walls, nor the force of those armed men that stood thereon, could keep them back, but resolutely to Scaling they went, vying with one another who should first mount the Walls. At the same time that part of the City which lay towards the Sea was assaulted by the Fleet, but on that side there was more noise and tumult made, than any effectual service done; for what with bringing up their Ships close to the Walls, landing their Souldiers, and mounting their Ladders, with their striving to get foremost and over-haft, they did but hinder one another.

XLV.

In the mean time Mago had fill'd the Walls with armed men, who pepper'd the Assaultants with showers of Darts, Javelins, and all sorts of Artillery; But it was neither the valour of his men, nor the violence of their Weapons that kept them off so much as the very Wall it self; For very few Ladders they had, that could reach to the top of it, and the longer any of them were, so much they were the weaker, so that before they, who were climed up to the highest rounds, could get upon the Parapet, others clambering after them, with their weight overcharg'd and broke the Ladders, and down they came all together; and some, though the Ladders held firm, yet the very height, if they chanc'd to look down, dazled their Eyes, and so turn'd their Heads, that they tumbled off and fell to the ground; Thus Ladders and men being every where over-thrown, and the Enemy encouraged with that success, a Retreat was sounded, which gave the Besieged hopes, not only that the present attack was over, but that for the future they might let their hearts at rest, for their City was tenable against all Scalado's, and as for Batteries and Mounts, that would be a work of time, and their own Generals might come up early enough to relieve them. But scarce was the hurry of the first Assault allay'd, when Scipio commanded other fresh Souldiers to take the Ladders of them that were already weary or wounded, and with greater violence to renew the Attack. For understanding that the Tide was going out, and being inform'd by certain Fishermen of Tarracon, that then, the Lake was Fordable, and that they might that way easily come at the Walls; he led a Party over there. It was now about noon, and besides the natural ebb, a fierce Northern Wind happening to arise, drove the Water out so fast after the Tide, that several shallows were discovered, no where above a mans middle, and for the most part scarce knee deep. Which accident (the more to encourage his Souldiers) he represented as a Prodigy or special Miracle shewn by the Gods in their favour; That to afford the Romans a passage over, they had turn'd back the Sea, and dry'd up the Lake, and open'd a way where never before any Mortals had trod; Let us therefore (quoth he) follow Neptune who here is our Guide, and propitiously will lead us through the middle of the Lake up to the Walls of the Enemy.

XLVI.

Those that went on by Land had desperate service, for not only the height of the Wall kept them off, but also the same being built as it were indented all along, running sometimes out, and presently in again, wheresoever they approach'd, they were liable to be charg'd from thence on both Flanks as well as in the Front; But on the other part, through the Meer, they met with no opposition, for neither was the Wall there fortified with any Bullwarks, as supposing it defended sufficiently by the Lake, nor were there (for the same reason) any Guards plac'd thereon, but all were busy on the other side, where there seem'd to be the greater danger. Thus the Romans, without resistance, unexpectedly entred the City, and march'd with all Expedition towards that Quarter where the Conflict was; and so taken up were the Defendants minds and Eyes, some fighting and the rest looking on and encouraging their Fellows, that not one of them ever perceiv'd the Town taken behind their backs, until the Invaders Darts from thence lighted upon them; then finding themselves beset both ways, every one endeavour'd to shift for himself, the Walls having none left to defend them, were mounted; the Gate equally batter'd within and without, broke all to pieces, and the whole Army entred at their pleasure; whilst those that were already got over the Wall, kill'd all those of the Town they could meet with, but the main body march'd in good Order through the midst of the City up to the Market place; and seeing the Enemy in their flight did chiefly make two ways, some to the Mount on the East-side of the

the City, where was a Guard of five hundred Souldiers, others towards the Castle, (to which Mago himself was retired with most of those who were beat from the Walls) Scipio sent a Party to win the Mount, who gain'd the same at the first Charge; the rest of his Forces he himself led up to attack the Castle, where after some defence, Mago finding resistance vain, and no hopes left to retrieve so desperate a Game, surrendred up the same, together with himself and all that were in it; Till this Fort was yielded, the Execution continued in the City, and all those of years they could meet with were put to the Sword; but then Command was given that they should forbear further slaughter. And the Conquerours generally betook them to ransack and plunder, getting a vast Booty and very rich of all kinds.

There were taken of Free-born People of the Male Sex ten thousand or upwards; but such of them as were Natural Citizens of the place, Scipio discharged, restoring to them such of their Goods as the fury of the Souldiers had left. The Handicrafts-men being about two thousand in number, he obliged by an Edict to serve the People of Rome in their several Crafts, but with a promise, that they should in short time be set at liberty, if they made haste with those Military Preparations wherein they should be employed. The rest of the multitude of Inhabitants, such as were young men, or stout robust Servants, he disposed of in the Navy, which he increased with eight Ships now taken from the Enemy. But the Spanish Hostages he treated with a peculiar respect, and no less kindness than if they had been the Sons of Allies. The Warlike Artillery and Provisions here seized on were almost incredible, of those Engines called Catapults, of the greater fort almost an hundred and twenty, and two hundred eighty one smaller ones; of Scorpions great and small, and of all sorts of Armour and Weapons a mighty quantity, together with seventy four Military Ensigns; likewise a power of Gold and Silver was carried in to the General, two hundred seventy six golden Bowls, almost all of them weighing at least a pound a piece; of Coined Silver eighteen thousand three hundred pound weight, besides abundance of Silver Plate. Of all which an Account being taken, the same was committed to the Charge of C. Flaminius the Treasurer, forty thousand Bushels of Wheat, two hundred and seventy thousand of Barley; of Merchants Ships and Vessels of Burthen there were one hundred and thirteen taken in the Haven, many of them laden with Corn, Armour, Bras, Iron, Sail-Cloth, Cordage, and Timber for Shipping; so that the City it self was to be esteem'd as the least part of what the Romans gain'd there.

The same Evening Scipio having committed the Guard of the City to C. Lelius and the Mariners, return'd himself with the Legions to their Camp; and order'd his Souldiers to refresh themselves, almost quite tired out with the various fatigues of that day, as having fought a Battel in the Field, and undergone so much toil and danger both in taking the City, and afterwards in assaulting the Castle upon great disadvantages. The next day having call'd together his Army and the Seamen, He in the first place return'd thanks and praises to the Immortal Gods, who had been graciously pleas'd not only to deliver into his hands in one days space the most mighty and opulent City in all Spain, but had before heap'd up there almost all the Riches both of Spain and Africk; whereby, as the Enemies were now to seek of all things, and had nothing to help themselves withal, so he and his had enough and to spare of whatsoever their hearts could desire. Then he proceeded to commend the Courage and Bravery of his Souldiers, taking particular notice, That neither the Enemies fierce Sally, nor the mighty height of the Wall, nor the untro'd Fords of the Lake, nor the Fort advantageously situated on an Hill, nor last of all a most strong and well fortified Castle was able in the least to daunt their Spirits, nor hinder them from surmounting and breaking through all these difficulties, till they obtain'd compleat possession of Victory. And therefore though all and every man of them deserved Rewards at his hands, yet the principal Honour of a Mural Crown belonged properly to him that first mounted the Wall; and therefore let him that deserves that Honour come in and claim his Due. Whereupon there were two that put in for't, Q. Trebellius a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and Sext. Digitius a Seaman; nor was the Contention so hot for the Prize between these two themselves, as amongst the whole Forces divided into two Factions, the Land-men taking the formers part, wherein they were headed by M. Sempronius Tuditanus, and the Seamen the latters, for whom also the Admiral C. Lelius himself appeared and made all the interest he could. The Debate growing so fierce, that it was like to come to a Mutiny, Scipio told them he would constitute three Delegates as Judges, who upon full hearing of the Cause and Witnesses, should determine which of the Pretenders had the Right. These Commissioners were C. Lelius and M. Sempronius the Advocates of each Party, to whom he added P. Cornelius Caudinus as an indifferent Person between them both; but this caus'd a greater heat of Contention, because these Gentlemen before endeavour'd to moderate each Party, but they now being taken off by their Quality of Judges, every one pleaded as violently as he list. C. Lelius, rising out of the Court, repaired to Scipio at his Tribunal, acquainting him; That the matter was managed without all moderation or modesty, inasmuch that it was fear'd they would fall together by the Ears; or however if the Peace were kept, yet it would be a detestable Example to future times, if the Reward of Vertue should be obtain'd with Fraud, Lyes and Perjuries: For here stand the Legionary Souldiers on one side, and the Seamen on the other, all ready to swear by all the

the Gods, things as they would have them to be, though in truth they know nothing of the matter; and thus not only draw down the guilt of Perjury on their own heads, but pollute therewith our Ensigns and our Eagles on which they swear, and utterly subvert that sacred and religious reverence due to an Oath, and that he was both by P. Cornelius and M. Sempronius desired to inform him hereof; Scipio kindly thank'd him, and presently call'd all the Forces to an Audience, where he declared, That he was very well satisfied, that Q. Trebellius and Sext. Digitius, both mounted the Wall in several places at one and the same instant, and therefore as an acknowledgment of their Valour, he did on both of them bestow mural Crowns; After which, he confer'd rewards on others according to every ones merit; and above all the rest he applauded C. Laelius the Admiral, equalizing him with himself, and bestowing on him a golden Crown, and thirty head of Cattel.

XLIX. In the next place he caused the Spanish Hostages to be call'd before him; but how many there were of them I know not how to set down, since I find in some Chronicles their number not full three hundred, but in others seven hundred twenty five. The like disagreement there is in other particulars, one Author says the Punick Garrison here consisted of ten thousand men; another says seven thousand, and a third affirms they were not above two thousand. In some I read of ten thousand taken, in others above five and twenty thousand; If I should follow Silenus a Greek Writer, I must have set down of Scorpions great and small, sixty taken; but if I go by Valerius Antias, I should tell you a Tale of six thousand of the greater sort, and thirteen thousand of the smaller, so insufferably will people lie upon Record. Nay 'tis not fully agreed who were the Chief Commanders, for though most Authors name Laelius to be Admiral, yet there are some that aver it was M. Junius Sullanus. Antias Valerius writes, that one Arnes was Governour of the City for the Carthaginians, and taken by the Romans, but other Historians say it was Mago. As little consent there is about the number of Ships, the weight of the gold and silver Plate taken, or the sum of money that was rais'd by the spoils; If there were a necessity of believing any of them, those that take the middle way are most likely to follow truth. But to return again to Scipio, when the Spanish Hostages appear'd, he bid them all have a good heart and fear nothing, for they were falln into the hands of Romans, a people that always delight to oblige people by kindness and Civilities, rather than to over awe them with fear and severities, and to enjoy the Friendship and faithful Alliance of Foreign Nations, more than to hold them in subjection and slavery. Then after he had taken the Names of their Cities, he also call'd over the Prisoners, how many there were of each Nation, and sent Messengers to their homes to come and receive them; such Cities as happen'd to have Embassadors present, their Countrymen were restored immediately to them, and the rest committed to the Custody of C. Flaminius the Quæstor, to use them kindly till an opportunity was offer'd of sending them away. Whilst this was a doing, from the middle of the Crowd of Hostages, a very ancient Lady, the Wife of Mandonius, Brother to Indibilis the Chief of the Iltergetes, flung her self at the Generals Feet, beseeching him most earnestly, That he would give special Command, that such of the Female Sex as were Prisoners, might be carefully kept and respected as they ought to be. Scipio told her, They should want for nothing. We regard not that (quoth she) so much, for a very little will be enough for us in our present wretched condition; My care is for another matter, when I behold the blooming youth of these Virgins here, for as for my own part, I am out of date, and past the fear of those injuries which our Sex is most expos'd unto: Now there stood about her divers Virgins in the prime of their Age, and extremely handsome, the Daughters of Indibilis, and some other fair young Ladies of like Quality, who all paid her as much respect as if she had been their Mother. Scipio replies; Both my own strict Discipline, as well as the general Civility of the people of Rome, may assure you, Madam! That nothing shall amongst us suffer abuse, which in any part of the World is held inviolable; such outrages I am oblig'd to restrain for my own credit and the honour of Rome; but both your Quality and Vertues engage me to a particular care of your safeties, who in the midst of these your Calamities forget not the honour of your Sex: Then he entrusted them to the charge of a person of approved Integrity, who was charg'd to treat them with as much modesty and respect as if they were the Wives and Daughters of their nearest Friends and Benefactors.

L. By and by the Souldiers brought before him a young Lady of Marriageable years, so lovely a Creature to look on, that wherever she pass'd she attracted every Bodies Eyes and Admiration; Scipio inquiring her Country and Parents, amongst the rest came to understand, That she was contracted to a young Gentleman call'd Allucius a Prince of the Celtiberians; Therefore causing her Parents and Sweet-heart to be sent for, when they arriv'd, having understood how passionately the young man lov'd her, he entred into a more familiar Discourse with him, than with either the Father or Mother of the Maid, and in these terms entertain'd him; I am a young man as well as your self, and so neither of us need blush to speak of the affairs of Love; when your Lady was brought Prisoner before me by my Souldiers, and I understood what a passion you had for her, (which her Beauty easily made me believe) I thought my self oblig'd to do, as I would be done by, in the like Case; For if I were minded to enjoy the pastimes of youth (especially in an honest honourable way) as I might, if I had not wholly devoted my self to the service of the Publick, I should not only think the highest transports of affection venial towards my Mistress, but dread nothing so much as a Rival, or any violence offer'd to her person and honour; so in this respect, I have to the utmost favour'd your Amour; your Spouse has been kept here with no less modesty and reverence than if she had been all this while with your Father and Mother-in-Law, her kind Parents; Reserv'd she has been and kept for you alone, that you might receive her untouched, and as a Present worthy both of you and my self; All the return I expect for this gift, is, That henceforth you will be a Friend and Well-willer to the State of Rome, and if indeed you take me to be an honest good man, such as all these Nations have known both my Father and Uncle to have been before me, then be assur'd, That the City of Rome yields abundance more that are like us, and that there is not a Nation this day under Heaven, that is either a better Friend or a more formidable Enemy. The young Prince confounded between an excess of joy and bashfulness, held Scipio by the hand, and invoc'd all the Gods, beseeching them to recompence him for this superlative favour on his behalf, who should never be able to make acknowledgments for the same, suitable either to his own desires, or the merits of the thing. Then the Maids Parents and Kindred were call'd, who since the Lady was restor'd gratis, for whose Redemption they had brought a great sum of gold, began to intreat Scipio, That he would be pleas'd to accept thereof, which they should take as the next kindness to that he had done them in delivering their Daughter; Scipio seeing them so importunate, seems willing to take it, and bids them lay it at his Feet; Then calling Allucius, Here, says he, besides the Portion you are to have from your Father-in-Law, Let me help to encrease your Marriage Fortune, take all this Gold and keep it for you and yours; So being sent home over-joy'd with these Presents and Civilities, he fill'd all the Country with Scipio's Praises, and how brave and worthy a person he was, telling them, There was come over into Spain a young man, in all respects, resembling the Immortal Gods, and who equally vanquish'd all men with his Arms and his Courtesies. Amongst his Dependents he soon rais'd fourteen hundred choice Horse, and with them return'd to Scipio.

LII. Laelius continued with Scipio, till the Prisoners Hostages, and Booty were by their mutual consent dispos'd of; and then in a Galley of five Banks of Oars was dispatcht away for Rome with tidings of the Victory, withal carrying Mago and about fifteen Senators Prisoners thither; Scipio spent those few dayes he design'd to remain at Carthage, in exercising his Sea and Land Forces; The first day he caus'd all the Legions to run in their Arms a four-miles-course; Next day he employ'd them in scouring and furbishing up their Armour before their Tents; The third day they drew up in Parties and charg'd one another as in Battalia, but arm'd only with wooden Swords, and blunt rebated Darts and Javelins. The fourth day they rested; The fifth they ran again in their Armour as before, and so continued this course of Exercise all the while they quarter'd at Carthage. Whilst the Seamen as often as the weather was calm, and would permit, used to row out into the open Sea, and vye one Galley with another for nimbleness, and sometimes representing shews of a Sea-fight; Thus without the City they were busy in hardening their Bodies and enuring their minds for service both at Sea and Land; and within the Town nothing was heard but the clatter of Artificers and Workmen preparing all sorts of military Furniture, shut up in divers Shops and Workhouses for that purpose. The General had his Eye every where; now he was aboard the Fleet, by and by exercising himself with the rest of the Legions, sometimes he took a view how the Works went on, in the Armory, and amongst the Shipwrights, where every one endeavour'd to out work the other, hoping so much the sooner to gain their Liberty. Having thus set them to work, and repair'd the Walls where there were any breaches or decays, leaving a sufficient Garrison, he march'd back to Tarracon, being met by the way by several Embassies, of whom some he presently dispatcht, and appointed others to attend him there, where he had ordered a General Diet or Assembly to be held by the Deputies of all the Allies, old and new; and almost all those Nations on this side of Iberus, and many of the further Spain appear'd accordingly. The Carthaginian Generals industriously suppress'd the report of New Carthage's being taken, but when it grew too notorious to be any longer denied or concealed, they used all their Art to undervalue it and make it seem as a thing of no great moment; That there was indeed one single City of Spain taken by surprize, and as it were by stealth in one dayes time; which small exploit had so puff'd up the young man, that he fancied it a mighty Victory; but when their three Generals, and their Victorious Armies should approach him, the Ghosts of his Father and his Uncle would begin to haunt him. Such like Speeches they gave out amongst the people, though in themselves they were sadly sensible, how great a blow it was, and how much their strength in all respects was decay'd by this loss of New Carthage.

The E P I T O M E.

1. Cn. Fulvius the Proconsul with his Army is slain at Herdonea by Annibal. 2. But Cl. Marcellus the Consul has better Fortune against the same Enemy at Numestrio, and obliges Annibal to retreat by night. 14, &c. Marcellus pursues him, and wged him still as he retired, until he obliged him to another Engagement. 16. Wherein at first Annibal had the better on't, but in the next Fight Marcellus worsted him. 17, 18. Fabius Maximus the Father being Consul, recovers Tarentum by the Treachery of some in that City. 20, 21. Scipio fights with Aldrubal the Son of Amilcar at Betula in Spain, and defeats him, where amongst others having taken a Royal Youth of wondrous Beauty, he sent him home to his Uncle Mallaniffa with several Presents. 29. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quintius Crispinus the Consuls going out to take a view of the Country, are surprized by Annibal with a Stratagem, Marcellus being killed, and Crispinus escaping by Flight. 32, &c. This Book also contains the Allions of P. Sulpicius the Praetor against Philip and the Achaeans. 38. The Consuls take a solemn Survey of the City, and purged it by Sacrifices, where there were enrolled an hundred thirty seven thousand one hundred and eight persons. By which Account it appeared how many Romans were lost by the late unfortunate Wars. 41, &c. Aldrubal having with a fresh Army passed the Alps to join his Brother Annibal, is cut off with six and fifty thousand of his men, by the Conduct of M. Livius, but especially by the good Service of Claudius Nero the other Consul: 45. Who being appointed to make head against Annibal, left the Camp so privately, as the Enemy was not aware of it, and with a choice Body of Souldiers, surrounded Aldrubal, and so defeated him.

I.

THE Affairs of Spain standing thus, as we have related. In Italy the Consul Marcellus, after the Recovery of Salapia by Treachery, took by Force Maronea and Sales, two Towns of the Samnites, not less than three thousand of Annibals Souldiers left there in Garrison, being cut to pieces. A great part of the Spoil was divided amongst the Souldiers, and amongst other things there were got two hundred and forty thousand Bushels of Wheat, and one hundred and ten thousand of Barley, yet was not this good News equal to that Loss which presently after followed near Herdonea, where Cn. Fulvius the Proconsul lay encamp'd, hoping to recover that City, which after the defeat at Cannæ had revolted from the Romans, a place neither very well situate for Defence, nor having in it any considerable Garrison; but that which most increased Fulvius's hopes (a man naturally negligent and presuming) was, That those within began to be weary of the Carthaginian Government, especially after the loss of Salapia, and when they heard that Annibal was retired to the Bruttians; of all this Annibal had private notice from Herdonea, and excited as well with desires of retaining an Associate City, as of surprizing a careless Enemy, marches thither with great Expedition, that he might arrive before they had any notice of his coming; and that he might terrifie them the more, advanc'd in Battel-Array. The Romans with equal boldness, but far inferiour both in Strength and Conduct, drew up in an hurry and gave them Battel, their fifth Legion and left Wing charging with great resolution; but Annibal had ordered his Cavalry, That whilst the Foot were engaged, and their thoughts and eyes wholly taken up, they should fetch a Compass, and some of them attacque the Enemies Camp, and the rest fall upon their Rear, he himself frequently repeating to his men the Name of Cn. Fulvius as ominous, because two years before he had defeated a Praetor of the same Name almost in the same place, and did assure them the Fortune of this Battel would be alike; nor did he deceive them: For after many of the Romans were slain in the Foot-Service, and yet kept both their Ground and their Ranks, on a sudden the Enemies Horse fell upon their backs, and a sad Cry was heard from the Camp. The sixth Legion which composd the second Battalion, being put into disorder by the Numidian Troops, discomposd the fifth, and all those that were in the Front; so some of them were put to flight, and many cut to pieces, amongst whom was Cn. Fulvius himself with twelve Colonels. But how many in all of the Romans and their Confederates were slain in that Fight, who can certainly affirm? when I find in some Authors thirteen thousand, in others but seven thousand; the Conquerour enjoy'd their Camp and all their Spoil. And as for the City Herdonea, perceiving it had been inclinable to revolt to the Romans, and that it would hardly continue Loyal after he was gone, he burnt it down, having caused the chief Citizens that had caball'd with Fulvius to be executed, and the rest of the Inhabitants to be transported to Metapontum and the Surians. Such of the Romans as made shift to escape, fled scarce half arm'd by several ways to Marcellus the Consul in Samnium.

II.

Marcellus nothing daunted with this Defeat, gave the Senate an account of it, but withal advertiz'd them, That he himself, the same person that curb'd the pride of Annibal after the Victory at Cannæ, was now again advancing towards him, and doubted not but quickly to interrupt his jollity. But at Rome their Fear for the future was no less than their Sorrow for the past Overthrow. The Consul marching from Samnium into Lucania, encamp'd near Numistro in a Plain, within view of Annibal who lay on the Hill. And for greater shew of confidence, was the first that drew out into the Field; Annibal was as ready to meet him; and their Battalia's were so ordered, that the Carthaginians right Wing possess'd themselves of the Hill, and the Romans left Wing spread up to the very Town. They fought fiercely from Nine a Clock until Night; for when the Van-guards on both sides were tired out, the first Legion of the Romans and their left Wing of Horse, on their side, and the Spanish Forces, and Balearian Slingers with the Elephants, on Annibal's side, renew'd the Battel, and stood firm for a long time, neither of them giving ground: At last the third Legion was brought in to supply the first, and the left Wing of Horse to assist the right; as likewise the Enemy was re-inforc'd with new Troops, so that the Skirmish which before was faint and dull, was on a sudden more eager and dreadful than ever before, managed with fresh courages as well as Bodies; and long it might have continued, had not the approach of night parted them, leaving it uncertain to which of them the honour of the Victory might belong. The Romans next morning drew up in Battalia by Sun rising, and stood expecting the Enemy a great part of the day, but finding that not one of them would stir out of their Camp, they at leisure gathered the Spoil of the Field, and drawing together their own slain in an heap, burnt their Bodies. The Night following Annibal silently dislodg'd and march'd away for Apulia; Marcellus as soon as it was day perceiving the Enemies flight (leaving his wounded men in Numistra with a small Garrison under the command of L. Furius Purpureo, a Colonel) with the grofs of his Army pursued them, and came up with them about Venusia; there for some days the Out-Guards, both Horse and Foot, skirmish'd with each other, but in a tumultuary manner, rather than any set Engagement, wherein the Romans had generally the better on't. From thence the Armies passed through all Apulia without any memorable Action, by reason Annibal always marched in the night, seeking out some place of advantage for Ambuscades: to avoid which, Marcellus would not stir to follow him but in broad day light, and sending forth Scouts before to discover the Coasts.

At Capua, Flaccus still spends his time in selling the Noblemens Estates, and letting out to farm the forfeited Lands (which he let all for so much Corn-Rent) and that there might not be wanting new matter for severities against that wretched people, a fresh Design and Conspiracy, secretly carried on by them, was discovered; you must know, He had drawn his Souldiers out of the City, both that he might the better lett the empty Houses, with the Fields, as also fearing lest the exceeding pleasantness and delights of the Town, should debauch and effeminate them, as it had done Annibal's; therefore he forced them to build them Hutts all along under the Walls, and about the Gates, which were most of them made of Hurdles and Boards, and some wattled with Reeds, and all thatch'd with Straw, as it were on purpose to serve for Fewel in case of a Fire: Now there were one hundred and seventy Capuans, the chief of them being several Brethren of the Family of the Blossii, who had agreed at a certain hour of the night to set all the Camp on Fire at several places; but the same being revealed by some of the same Family, the Gates being suddenly shut up by the Proconsul's command, and the Alarm given, all the Conspirators were seized, and, after rigorous Examinations and Tortures, condemned and executed. The Discoverers had their Liberty given them, and each a reward of ten thousand Asses [about thirty one Pounds, five Shillings Sterling] Acerra being partly burnt, and Nuceria wholly demolished, the Inhabitants of those Towns made complaints for some place to dwell in, Fulvius directed them to make application to the Senate, who gave the Acerrans leave to rebuild the Houses that were burnt, and as for the Nucernines (because they rather chose it) they were removed to Atella, the Atellanens being transferred to Calatia. Amidst the many weighty Affairs that the Romans had to manage, and which fell out sometimes well and sometimes ill, they forgot not their Garrison in the Castle of Tarentum; but sent M. Ogulnius and P. Aquilius as Commissioners into Etruria, to buy up Corn to be carried thither, appointing a thousand Souldiers drawn out of the City-Army, one half Romans and the other Allies, to guard the Corn thither, and then to remain there to strengthen the Garrison.

The Summer was now almost spent, and the time for chusing of Consuls drew on, Marcellus by Letters acquainting the Senate, That he could not for the interest of the Common-wealth, stir a foot from Annibal, whom he continually pursued, and pressed upon him daily to force him to an Engagement. The Fathers were in some perplexity, loth to call away the Consul from the War, when he was in prospect of doing them considerable service, and as unwilling to be without Consuls for the Year ensuing; to prevent both, it was thought the best course rather to call home the other Consul Valerius, though he were out of Italy in Sicilia; to whom L. Manlius the Praetor, by the Senates Order, wrote to that purpose, sending him also the other Consul's Letters, that he might thereby understand why they recalled him rather than his Colleague, who was nearer home.

About this time arrived at Rome Ambassadors from King Syphax, advising of several Victories their Master had obtained against the Carthaginians, and that as he was not a more mortal Enemy to any people in the World than the Carthaginians, so there was none that he desired so much to enter into Alliance with, as the Romans; to which purpose he had heretofore sent his Agents to the two Scipio's in Spain, and now they were come hither, so willing he was to seek the Romans Amity from the Well-head. The Fathers not only returned them a most obliging Answer, but sent back with them Ambassadors of their own, viz. L. Genucius, P. Petellus, and P. Popilius, with rich Presents to his Majesty, that is to say, a Gown of State, a Purple Robe, an Ivory Chair, and a Golden Bowl weighing five Pound. They had also Instructions, after they had dispatched their Affairs in that Court, to visit other Princes and great Lords of Africk, for whom they were also furnish'd with Presents, as Purple Robes richly Embroidered, and Golden Bowls of three Pound weight apiece. Likewise M. Atilius and Manius Acilius were sent as far as Alexandria in Egypt, to complement King Ptolomy and Queen Cleopatra, and renew the League of Amity with them: To the King, they carried a Gown and Purple Robe, and an Ivory Chair; to the Queen, a Purple Veil, and rich Cimmarre Embroidered with Diamonds.

This Summer abundance of strange Stories came from neighbouring Towns and Villages of Prodigies that had been seen, as, that at Tusculum there was year'd a Lamb having an Udder yielding Milk; The Temple of Jupiter struck with Lightning, and almost all the Roof beat off; That almost the same day at Anagnia the Ground before the Gate was struck in like manner, and continued burning a whole day and night without any matter of Fuel, and that the Birds had forsook their Nests which they had built in Diana's Grove, near the Cross-wents in the same Town; That in the Sea, not far from the Port of Tarricina, there were seen Serpents of a wonderful bigness, playing and leaping on the top of the Water, as Fish are wont to do; At Tarquinius a Sow farrow'd a Pig with an humane face; And in the Country of Capena, about the Feronian Grove, there were four Statues that sweat blood for the space of a day and a night. The Pontiffs made an Order, That these Prodigies should be expiated with the greater Sacrifices, and a solemn Day of Prayers was kept at all the Shrines in Rome, and the like at Capena at the Temple of Feronia.

V. M. Valerius the Consul call'd home by the beforementioned Letters, leaving the Province and Army to the charge of Cnecius the Prætor, and having sent M. Valerius Messala the Admiral, with part of the Fleet toward the Coast of Africk, as well to get what Booty he could, as also to discover what the Carthaginians were doing; does himself, with ten Ships, set Sail for Rome, where being arriv'd, he presently call'd a Senate, and gave an Account of his Proceedings, That whereas for well nigh sixty years, Sicily had been the Seat of War both by Land and Sea, where oft they had sustained great overthrows, he had now brought those troubles to an happy end, and settled that Island in an intire peace; That there was not in all Sicily one Carthaginian left, nor one Sicilian of all those which were forced away by the Tyrants, but were return'd every one to his City and his Farm, where they were all busie in ploughing and sowing, the Land which before lay wast, being again cultivated and made fruitful, not only to serve its own Inhabitants, but to serve as a faithful Store-house, and supply plentifully the Romans on any Exigency in Peace or War. Then Mutines, and if there were others that had deserved well of the people of Rome, were brought into the Senate, and had honours done them to discharge the Consul's promise on that behalf; Mutines in particular was made a free Burgher of Rome, by a Bill preferred to the Commons by one of their Tribunes, on an Order of the Senate. In the mean time M. Valerius Messala arriving on the Coast of Africk with fifty Sail before it was light, unexpectedly made a descent on shore in the Territory of Utica, which he plundered far and near, took captive great multitudes of people, besides other Booty of all sorts, and therewith returned safe to their Ships, and over to Sicily, arriving at Lilybaum the thirteenth day after he sail'd from thence. Some of the Prisoners upon Examination gave the following Information, which was forthwith transmitted to Levinus the Consul, that he might the better understand the present posture of the Affairs of Africk, That Massinissa, the Son of Gala, a most warlike young Prince, was at Carthage with five thousand Numidian Horse, and that other mercenary Souldiers were hired throughout all Africk to be sent over into Spain to Asdrubal, that he with as great an Army as he could possibly raise, should with all Expedition march into Italy, and join Annibal; for that the Carthaginians concluded would be the only hopeful course to compleat their Victory: That moreover there was a mighty Fleet to be Equipped for regaining of Sicily, which they believed would arrive there very suddenly. The Consul communicating this Intelligence to the Senate, the Fathers would not detain him till the Election-day, but would have him name a Dictator, and presently be gone to his Province; but then a Debate arose that took up some time; for the Consul declared as if he would in Sicily nominate M. Valerius Messala the Admiral for Dictator: but the Fathers denied, That a Dictator could be created out of Roman Ground, which was terminated by Italy, M. Lucretius the Tribune of the Commons putting it to the Question, the Senate pass'd an Order, That the Consul before he went out of Town should refer it to the Vote of the people in their Common Hall, and whom they chose, he should declare to be Dictator; and if he refused to propose the same, the City-Prætor should do it; and if he also declined it, that then the Tribunes should propound it to the Commons: which last was done; for the Dictator would not refer it to the people, alledging, That it lay altogether in his own power: and therefore he forbade the Prætor to meddle. But the Tribunes fear'd him not, and the Commons Enacted, That Q. Fulvius, who was then at Capua, should be named Dictator: but the Eve before that Assembly of the Commons was held, the Consul slips away privately in the night for Sicily, and the Senate being thus left in the lurch, were forced to write to Marcellus, That

That he would assist the Commonwealth, thus defeated by his Colleague, and name the person Dictator whom the Commons had made choice of, so Q. Fulvius was declared Dictator, and pursuant to the same Decree of the Commons, Fulvius P. Licinius Crassus, the Arch-Pontiff, his General of the Horse.

VI. The Dictator after he was come to Rome, sent Cn. Sempronius Blasus his Lieutenant from Capua to the Army in Tuscany, instead of C. Calphurnius the Prætor, whom by his Letters he order'd to go and take upon him the Government of Capua, and the Forces there; and appointed the day for chusing Consuls, but could not then finish that affair, by reason of a difference that happen'd between him and the Tribunes of the Commons; For the younger sort of the Century, Galeria chancing to have the first Vote, nominated Q. Fulvius and Q. Fabius for Consuls, and all the rest of the Centuries seem'd like to go the same way; but the two Arenis Tribunes of the Commons interposed, alledging, That it consisted not with Civility for one and the same man to desire always to be continued in Office, and a much more untoward precedent it would be, to chuse the same person that held the Elections; Therefore if the Dictator should suffer his name to be put in nomination, they would dissolve the Assembly, but if some other might be propounded in his stead, they might proceed; The Dictator justified the proceedings of the Assembly by the Authority of the Senate, and a Decree of the Commons and divers Precedents; for when Cn. Servilius was Consul, after Flaminius his Colleague happen'd to be kill'd at Thrasimene, by Authority of the Senate a Bill was propos'd, and pass'd by the Commons, That whilst the War continued in Italy, the people might chuse the same men Consuls again, when and as often as they should think fit; and that he had many Examples thereof, as in old times there was L. Posthumus Megellus, being Inter-regent, and holding the Elections, was himself chosen Consul with C. Junius Bubulcus, and of late Q. Fabius, who would never have suffer'd his Consulship to have been continued, if the same had been against Law, and not for the good of the publick. After they had long squabbled with these and the like Speeches, they agreed at last to refer it to the Senate, who considering that the present Juncture requir'd old expert Commanders, and such as were of most skill in the Art of War, were not pleas'd that the Election should be stopt; so in the end the Tribunes gave way, that they should proceed, where were declared Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third; Then Prætors were chosen, L. Veturius Philo, T. Quintius Crispinus, C. Hostilius Tubulus, and C. Aurunculeius, which being done, Q. Fulvius gave up his Dictatorship. At the end of this Summer, a Carthaginian Fleet of forty Sail, Amilcar Admiral, pass'd over to Sardinia, and at first invaded and wasted the Fields of Olbia, but P. Manlius Volso the Prætor, making head against them there, they sail'd to the other side of the Isle, and foraged the Country of Caralita, and with a booty of all sorts return'd to Africk; The same year at Rome several Priests died, and some were created to succeed them; As C. Servilius was made Pontiff in the room of T. Otacilius Crassus, and Tiberius Sempronius Longus, the Son of Tiberius, was made Decemvir for the Sacrifices in the stead of one of the same name, but the Son of Caius; M. Marcius the King of Sacrificers, departed this Life, and M. Aemilius Pappus the grand Curio, but none were chosen this year to succeed them; The Censors were L. Veturius Philo, and P. Licinius Crassus the Arch Pontiff, which latter had neither serv'd the Office of Consul nor Prætor, but skip'd from being an Ædile into a Censorship; but these Censors neither made choice of any new Senators, nor did any other publick Act, L. Veturius being taken off by death, which caused his Colleague Licinius to throw up his Office; The Ædiles of State, L. Veturius, and P. Licinius Varus, exhibited the Roman Games, and held them one day extraordinary; The Plebeian Ædiles, Q. Catus and L. Porcius Licinus, set up certain brazen Statues in the Temple of Ceres, out of moneys levied by Fines, and represented very stately shows and pastimes, considering the poverty of those times. Just at the end of the year C. Lælius Scipio's Lieutenant arriv'd at Rome in four and thirty days from Tarracon, and entering the City with such a power of Prisoners, set the people a running every where to see the sight, the next day being introduced into the Senate he acquainted the House, That new Carthage the Metropolis of Spain, was taken in one day, and several Cities recovered, that had revolted, and new ones entred into Alliance with; From the Prisoners they understood in effect the same things as M. Valerius Messala had signified in his Letters. The thoughts of Asdrubal's advance into Italy most of all disturb'd the Senate, as being scarce able to make their Party good against Annibal and his Arms; Lælius in a general Assembly of the people discours'd the same things; The Senate Order'd their thanks to be return'd to Scipio for his good service, and that Lælius should go back again with the same Ships with all Expedition. I have refer'd the taking of Carthage to this year, though I am not ignorant that some place the same in the year following, but I think it improbable that Scipio should lie idle a whole year in Spain, and perform nothing memorable.

Fabius the fifth time, and Fulvius the third entred into their Consulship the 15. of March, and both were order'd to take care of Italy, but had particular Provinces, Fabius to be about Tarentum, Fulvius in Lucania and amongst the Bruttians. M. Claudius continued in Command, the Prætors cast Lots for their Provinces, C. Hostilius Tubulus happen'd to have the City, L. Veturius Philo the Foreign Jurisdiction, with the care of the Gauls; T. Quintius Crispinus, Capua; C. Aurunculeius, Sardinia. The Armies were divided as follows; to Ful- vious two Legions which M. Valerius Leuinus had in Sicily; Q. Fabius those that C. Calpurnius commanded in Tuscany, and the City-Forces to supply their places in Tuscany, over which Calpurnius was to be Governour; T. Quintius to have the Army at Capua; that C. Hostilius should receive from C. Latorius the Proprætor the Forces that lay at Ariminum, M. Marcellus to have the same Souldiers that served him so well when he was Consul; to M. Valerius with L. Cnecius (being continued in Commission in Sicily) the Cannæan Troops were allotted, and to supply the same out of the Legions that were left of Cn. Fulvius; for they being rallied together, had been sent thither by the Consuls, and for their greater reproach put into the same condition with the others. C. Aurunculeius enjoy'd the same Legions in Sardinia as belonged there before to P. Manlius Volso; P. Sulpicius continued over the same men and Fleet, to have an eye upon Macedonia. Thirty Sail of Gallies were order'd to be sent out of Sicily to Fabius the Consul at Tarentum, the rest of the Fleet to cruise on the Coasts of Africk for Prizes, and M. Valerius Leuinus to go over with them himself, or else to depute either L. Cnecius or M. Valerius Messala to command them. In Spain there was no Alteration, save only that Scipio and Silanus were continued in their Commands not for a year, but till such time as they should be recalled. Thus were the Provinces divided, and the Forces bestow'd for this year.

VIII. Whilst the State was taken up with these Affairs of greater importance, the Assembly for electing a Grand Curio [or Priest of the several Wards of Rome] in the room of M. Amilius reviv'd the old Quarrel. The Patricians [or Nobles] denying that C. Mamilius Vitulus one of the Candidates ought to be put in Nomination, because he was a Commoner, and never any but a Patrician had yet held that Office. The Tribunes referred it to the Senate, who gave it in favour of the People; so this was the first Commoner in that place. Also P. Licinius the Chief Pontiff compell'd C. Valerius Flaccus to be Inaugurated Priest of Jupiter against his will, C. Latorius was made a Decemvir in the place of Q. Mucius Scævola deceased. The cause and occasion of that enforced Inauguration of a Flamen I would willingly have passed over in silence, but that the ill Name he had, turned afterward to high Reputation. This Flaccus for his debauch'd and riotous course of life in his youth, being hated by L. Flaccus his own Brother, and other Relations, was for that reason chosen Flamen by the Archpriest to reclaim him; and indeed no sooner was his mind taken up with Religious Rites and Ceremonies, but he left off all his Extravagancies, began a new man, and thenceforward there was none of his Age in all the Town better esteemed of, or more beloved both by his own Kindred and Strangers.

IX. This general Reputation put him on such an assurance of his own Worth and Dignity, that resolv'd to recover the Privilege of sitting in the Senate, for many years lost and discontinued by the insufficiency and vileness of the Flamens; coming therefore into the House, L. Licinius the Prætor commanded him to depart, whereupon he appeal'd to the Tribunes of the Commons, alledging, That he only demanded the ancient Right of the Priesthood conferr'd together with the Sacred Robe and Ivory Chair. The Consul said, That a Right was not to be grounded upon old musty Precedents, long since obsolete, but on present usage; for neither in our Fathers nor Grandfathers memory has any Priest of Jupiter usurped this Claim: But the Tribunes concluded, That though the matter was as it were forgot by the negligence of former Priests, yet the same ought to be no prejudice to the Rights anciently and duly belonging to the Office. Which they having declared, the Prætor made no further opposition, but with great applause both of the Senators and Commons, he was led into the House, and took his place in the Senate; though all men thought he gain'd that point rather in respect to his late change of Manners, and present strictness of Life, than in the right of his Priesthood.

X. The Consuls before they set forwards to their Provinces, levied two City-Legions to serve for Recruits to compleat the several Armies. The old City-Army Fulvius the Consul committed to C. Fulvius Flaccus his Brother and Lieutenant, to march them into Tuscany, and bring up the Forces that were there at Rome. And Fabius the Consul caused his Son Maximus to muster up the reliques of the Fulvian defeat (amounting to three thousand three hundred thirty six) and carry them into Sicily to M. Valerius the Proconsul, and bring thence the two Legions and thirty Gallies allotted him. The sending them away did nothing diminish the Garrisons of that Province either in strength or shew; for besides the two old Legions recruited to their full complement, he had a Power of Renegado's and Numidian Deferters as well Horse as Foot; he had likewise such of the Sicilians as had heretofore served under Epicides or the Carthaginians, and so were become good Souldiers. All which foreign Auxiliaries having intermixt with his several Roman Legions, kept up still the Species of two competent Armies, with one of which he commanded Cnecius to secure that part of the Island which had belonged to King Hiero, and with the other he himself quarter'd in those Territories which heretofore were divided between the Romans and Carthaginians. He also provided a Fleet of seventy Sail to guard the Coasts and command the Sea, whilst he and Mutines took a progress to view the whole Country, and see which was well husbanded, and which not, and accordingly commend or chastize the Owners; so that by his Care there was such plenty of Corn, that they sent great store of it to Rome, and also to Catana, whence it might be convey'd to the standing Camp at Tarentum.

But

But the transporting of the Souldiers into Sicily (who were for the most part Latines and other Allies) had very near been the occasion of a great Insurrection; For the Latines and Confederates in all their Assemblies began to grumble, That for ten years together they had been exhausted with continual Levies and Taxes; That every year almost they receiv'd some mighty overthrow; Many slain in the field, others consumed with Diseases; that such of their Citizens as were lifted for the Romans, were in more danger than such as were taken by the Punicks, for the latter are sent home gratis, but the former, by the Romans, are sent out of Italy into banishment, rather than to warfare; That now for eight years the Army that escap'd at Cannæ are languishing in Sicily, and like to be in their Graves before the Enemy be beat out of Italy, being still strong and flourishing. If no old Souldiers must return to their Country, but new ones continually lifted, in a short time there will be none left; Therefore 'tis best to deny the people of Rome, now at present, what we shall quickly be forc'd to do whether we will or no, when we are reduc'd to the utmost poverty and desolation; That if once the Romans perceive all their Allies thus resolv'd, they would be more inclined to a Peace with the Carthaginians than hitherto; for otherwise, whilst Annibal was alive, there would never be Peace in Italy. These and the like Speeches passed in their Diets; There were then thirty Colonies of the people of Rome, and all their Representatives being in Town, twelve of them flatly denied the Consuls, and said they were not able any longer to find either Men or Money; The names whereof were these, Ardea, Nepete, Sutrium, Circeii, Alba, Caracoli, Suessa, Sora, Setia, Cales, Narnia, and Interamna. The Consuls startled at this unexpected blow, hoping to fright them from this lewd resolution, and thinking to do more good by treating them roughly, than by smoothing and complementing, told them; That they had assum'd the confidence to lay that to the Consuls, which they durst not for their heads repeat again to the Senate, for it amounted not so much to the avoiding of the duties of War, as an open revolt from the people of Rome; That therefore their best way was to repair home to their Principals, and before the thing was taken notice of, consult with them as men that had rather let fall some unadvised words, than that would persist in such a dangerous course; and let them know, that they had not Capuans, or Tarentines to deal with, but Romans, from whence they were descended, and sent into conquer'd places to increase Posterity, so that if they had any Piety, or loving memory for their antient Country, they would take new measures. For their present designments would otherwise tend to subvert the state of Rome, and make Annibal Lord of all Italy. When the Consuls one after another had thus school'd them, the Agents nothing mov'd with their words, told them, That they knew not what other Message to carry home, nor could their Senates take new Counsels, having neither men to raise, nor money to pay them; The Consuls finding them thus obstinate, reported the matter to the Senate, which caus'd so great a consternation, that most of them thought, it would prove the utter ruin of the State; For other Colonies would follow the Example, and all their Allies join in betraying the City of Rome to Annibal.

The Consuls were not wanting to comfort and encourage them, by remonstrating, That the rest of the Colonies were still firm in their fidelity and duty, and as for these Mutineers, if there were Embassadors sent to threaten and not entreat them, they would easily be reduc'd to revere the Majesty of the Roman Empire; The Senate leaving it to them to act as they thought most fit for the publick interest, having first founded the inclinations of the other Colonies, they cited their Agents before them, and demanded whether they had their Quota's of Souldiers ready which had been laid on them? For eighteen Colonies M. Sextilius an Inhabitant of Fregelle made Answer; That both those Souldiers were ready, and if there were need of more, they should be levied, and that they would readily perform whatsoever else the people of Rome should command or desire; For as yet they were able enough to do, and as for their hearts they were better than their abilities. The Consuls after a short Speech, to signify, that they thought it not enough to commend them for their merits themselves, unless the whole Senate did also publicly give them thanks, commanded them to go along with them into the Council-House, where the Senate having carest'd them with the most obliging Language, order'd the Consuls also to carry them to the Common-Hall, and there to make known, as well their former faithful services and favours, as their present signal good will to the Republick; and even now, though so many Ages past, I think it would be an injury to their deserved praise if I should not particularly record their Names; They were, The Signins, Nolans, and Norbans, the Saticulans, Brundisians, Fregellans, Lucerines, Venusines, Adrians, *Firman*s and Ariminians; and on the Coast of the other Sea, the Pontians, Pastans and Cosans; and of the Inland Cities, the Beneventans, Assermines, Spoleatans, Placentines and Cremonians. By the assistance of these Colonies was the state of Rome at that juncture supported, and for the same had the publick thanks both of the Senate and People. As for the other twelve Colonies which had refused obedience, the Lords of the Senate gave express command, that no notice should be taken of them, and that the Consuls should neither dispatch nor retain them, nor so much as speak to them; as esteeming that silent chastizement to comport best with the Majesty of the people of Rome. The Consuls taking care with all expedition for whatsoever else was necessary for the War: It was thought fit to bring forth the Vicissimary Gold (or twentieth part of all the Taxes,) which had been reserved in the secret Treasury for the last extremity of Affairs, Affairs, being four thousand pounds weight of Gold, whereof five hundred pounds weight was distributed to the Consuls, and to M. Marcellus and P. Sulpicius the Proconsuls, and T. Veturius the Prætor, Governour of Gaul; Besides which, a hundred pounds weight was particularly allotted to Fabius the Consul, to be carried to the Garrison in the Castle at Tarentum; the rest was employed in Cloths for the Army that carried on the War in Spain, with so much reputation to themselves, and their General.

XIII. Before the Consuls took the Field it was also resolved, that certain Prodigies should be expiated: For in the Alban Mount, the Statue of Jupiter was blasted with Lightning, and a Tree near the Temple, as also the Lake Hostia, the Wall of Capua, the Temple of Fortune, and the Wall and Gate of Sinuessa: Some also reported, That a Fountain at Alba ran Blood, and at Rome within the Sanctuary of the Temple of Fors Fortuna a little Image that stood on her Coronet, fell down of its own accord from the Head of the Goddess into her hands; and 'twas very well known, that at Prævernum an Ox spoke, and a Vultur flew into a Shop in the Market-place when it was full of people; and at Sinuessa was born a Child of doubtful Sex, or both Male and Female, commonly called an Androgynos [or Man-woman] as for the most part Greek words admit an easier Composition than Latine; as also that it rain'd Milk, and a Child born with an Elephants Head: satisfaction for these fearful Tokens were made by the greater Sacrifices, a solemn Procession to all Shrines, and publick Supplications held all day long; and that C. Hostilius the Prætor should set out the Games in Honour of Apollo, as of late they had been vowed and promised. In those days Q. Fulvius the Consul held the Election for chusing of Censors, who happen'd to be both Persons that had not yet been Consuls, viz. M. Cornelius Cethegus and P. Sempronius Tuditanus. They by Authority of the Senate obtain'd an Act of the Commons, enabling them to let to Farm the Lands of Campania; but in their Review of the Senate a Controversie happen'd, for whereas by Lot it fell to Sempronius's share to nominate who should be Chair-man or President of the Senate, Cornelius alledged, That by ancient Custom the same belonged to such person as had first born the Office of Censor now surviving, who was Manlius Torquatus: Sempronius on the other side insisted, That as the Gods had by Lot bestow'd the Priviledge upon him, and empower'd him to chuse whom he pleased, so he would freely make use thereof according to the best of his Judgment, and was resolved to chuse Q. Fabius Maximus, the most worthy man in Rome, even Annibal himself being Judge; who at last was establish'd therein, and then the rest of the Senate was called over, eight persons only being cashier'd, amongst whom was L. Cæcilius Metellus the scandalous Author of abandoning Italy after the defeat at Canna; which offence was likewise taken notice of in the Review of Knights and Gentlemen; but very few they were that fell under that Brand, in comparison of those, who being in the Cannian Legions, had their Horses taken from them, whereunto for further punishment was added, That so many of them as had served on publick Horses, allowed by the City, should not be admitted to reckon the time past into their military Service, but were obliged to continue the Wars ten years forward, and find themselves Horses. They also discovered abundance of persons who were bound to serve on Horse-back, and being above seventeen years of Age, had neglected it: all whom they degraded, and made liable to common Contributions. After this they bargain'd by the great for rebuilding the seven Shops, the Fish-shambles and Royal Gallery burnt down by the late Fire.

XIV. All things requisite being thus dispatch'd at Rome, the Consuls took the Field; Fulvius advancing first to Capua, whom Fabius following a few days after, having by word of mouth pressed his Colleague, and by Letters Marcellus, to attacke Annibal briskly, and hold him in play, whilst he assaulted Tarentum; for if once that City were taken, and the Enemy expelled, he would have no place of safety to hide his head in, nor hopes of staying much longer in Italy. He also dispatch'd an Express to Rhegium to the Governour of that Garrison consisting of eight thousand men, posted there by Lævinus the Consul against the Bruttians, most of them brought over, as aforesaid, from Agathyrna in Sicily, being people enur'd to live by Spoil and Rapine, to whom were added a multitude of Deserters that daily came in from the Bruttians, altogether their Matches, for audaciousness and Poverty ready to engage in any desperate Adventure. This Squadron of Ruffians were order'd first to forrage the Bruttians Territories, and next to attacke the City Caulonia, both which they did not only stoutly, but greedily execute, and having chased away the Peasants, storm'd that Town. Marcellus both encourag'd by the Consuls Letters, and a good opinion he had of himself, that none of all the Roman Captains was better able to match Annibal, as soon as the season yielded any Forrage for his Horse, took the Field, and advanced towards Annibal who then lay quarter'd near Cannusum, soliciting that City to a Revolt, but understanding of Marcellus's approach, dislodged from thence; and because that was an open Champaign Country, sought out places more proper for an Ambuscade: Marcellus pursued him close at heels, and still encamped hard by him, and always had no sooner entrench'd, but drew out and offer'd Battel; but the other would only engage with small Parties of Horse, or light-arm'd Foot in Skirmishes, not willing to run the risque of a pitch'd Field; yet at length he was drawn to it in spite of his teeth: For as he march'd away by night, Marcellus pressed upon his Rear in those plain open grounds, and when he went to encamp, fell upon his Pioneers, and would not suffer them to finish their Entrenchments, whereby they were necessitated to a Battel, and fought with Banners display'd and all their Forces, but being towards night parted with equal Fortune, making shift to fortifie themselves as well as they could at a very little distance; next morning by break of day Marcellus drew up, nor did Annibal decline the Encounter, having first with a large Harangue encouraged his men, That not forgetting Thrasimene and Canna they would now chastize the Enemies insolence, for they saw how he brav'd them, and would neither let them march nor encamp in quiet, nor gave them any time to breathe or look about them; That every morning the Roman Army was as sure to stare them in the face as the Sun; but if in one smart bout they would but soundly let him blood, they would no more be pester'd with his daring importunities. Heartned with these Encouragements, and withal vext at the Romans continual teasing them, they charg'd very fiercely upon them; two hours and above the Fight had lasted, when the Roman right Wing and extraordinary Troops of the Allies gave ground; which Marcellus perceiving, orders the eighteenth Legion to come up to the Front, but whilst the former trembling retreat, and the latter but slowly advance, the whole Army was disorder'd, and by and by fear overpowering shame, turn'd their backs. There fell in the Battel and Pursuit two thousand seven hundred Citizens and Allies, whereof four Roman Centurions, two Colonels, M. Licinius and M. Fulvius, four Standards lost in the right Wing that fled first, and two in that Legion that was design'd to relieve them.

Marcellus, after they were got into their Camp, ratted up his Souldiers with such a sharp and reproachful Speech, that it was more grievous to them than all the fatigues and dangers of that unfortunate day. I am (quoth he) however bound to render all the praises and thanks I can, in such a shameful juncture, to the Immortal Gods, that they suffer'd not the victorious Enemy who drove you like so many trembling sheep to your Works, to storm your Camp like-wisely: For undoubtedly you would have abandon'd your Rampier and Tents with the same Cowardize as you quitted the Field; what foolish dread is this that has possess'd you? Can you so soon strangely forget who they are you engage with? Even the very same in beating whom and pursuing them after they were routed, you spent all the last Summer; whom of late flying night and day, you have so often challeng'd to a Battel? Whom in all Skirmishes you perpetually have worsted, whom but yesterday you would neither suffer to march, nor encamp? But I will waive that which you may boast of, and mention only that which ought to make you eternally blush, but yesterday you grappled with them on even Terms; and what I wonder has last night or this morning weakned you, or strengthned them? Methinks I do not behold my own old Souldiers, I do not, sure I do not, talk to Romans, your Bodies and Arms are the same; but if you had had the same Spirits, the same Souls, would you ever so basely have shew'd your Enemies your backs? and suffer'd them to take away here the Colours of a Company, and there the Standard of a Regiment? Hitherto they would only boast that they had cut off some Roman Legions, you are the first that this day have given them an opportunity to glory of having put our Armies to the Run. This smart Discourse touch'd the tenderest part of their Souls, and with a general Cry they begg'd he would forgive them this days misfortune, and try when he pleas'd another time their Courage. Nay, Sirs, says he, quickly will I try it; to-morrow shall you into the Field again, that you may, being Conquerours, obtain that pardon, which whilst vanquish'd, you do not deserve. Those Troops which had lost their Colours he order'd should have only Barley instead of Wheat for their Provisions, and caused the Centurions of each of those particular Companies to have their Swords taken from them. And commanded the whole Army, Horse and Foot, to be ready next morning; so the Assembly was dismissed, not one of them but acknowledging that they were most justly reproach'd, and that there was not a man in the whole Army, besides the General himself, but was bound to make amends either with his own death, or the gaining of a notable Victory. Next day they were all ready in their Armour early, and the General commended their forwardness, declaring, That those who fled first yesterday and lost their Banners, should now go on in the Forlorn-hope, and that he did strictly charge all and every of them to fight so manfully as to overcome, and be sure that the News of yesterdays Overthrow arriv'd not at Rome before that of their this days Victory. After which he bid them refresh themselves with some Victuals, that they might not faint, if the Battel should happen to prove tedious, with which his Souldiers hearts being much chear'd up, they courageously march'd into the Field.

Which when Annibal had notice of, Look you, says he, what an Enemy have we to deal with! who neither will endure good or ill Fortune, but if they prosper, push on their Victories, and even when vanquish'd renews the Dispute with their Conquerours. Then he order'd the Trumpet to sound and drew up in Battalia. The Fight was more sharp and furious on each side than the day before, the Punicks striving to maintain their yesterdays Honour, and the Romans to wipe off that shame; The left Wing of the Romans and those Squadrons that lost their Colours fought in the Vanguard, and the twentieth Legion was marshal'd in the right Wing, L. Cornelius Lentulus and C. Claudius Nero commanding them respectively, whilst Marcellus by his Prefence and Encouragement confirm'd the main Battel. On Annibal's side the Spaniards had the Vanguard, and indeed were the very flower of his Army; but the Fight remaining for a great while doubtful, Annibal orders his Elephants to be led up to the Front, hoping hoping they might affright and disorder the Enemy; and indeed, at first they did somewhat confound their Ranks, so as partly by trampling them under foot, and partly by dispersing them, they had on one part laid naked the main Body; and greater had the flight been, but that C. Decinius Flavius, a Colonel, snatching up a Standard from the first Band of the Hastati, commanded all that Company to follow him, leading them up to the place where those strange Beasts made the greatest havoc, and bid them throw their Darts as fast as they could at them; which being so near, did certain Execution against Beasts of so great a Bulk, and standing so thick: And though all were not wounded, yet those that were (so uncertain is their nature to those that use them) running backwards, turned the rest; and now not only that single Band, but every Souldier that could get up, pelted them with Javelins, whereby the Elephants ran more fiercely on their own Party, and overthrew more of them than before they had of the Enemy, by how much fear gave them now a greater Spur than the conduct of those that managed them; so they having put the Punicks Front into confusion, the Roman Foot press on, and with little difficulty put them to the Rout; then Marcellus sends in his Horse to pursue them, who beat them into their Camp; into which they could not get without extreme difficulty: for two Elephants falling down just at the Gate had stop't it up, so that the Souldiers were forced to clamber over the Trench and Rampire; which occasioned the greatest slaughter, there being in all kill'd eight thousand men, and five Elephants; yet prov'd it not an unbloody Victory to the Romans, for they lost almost seventeen hundred of the two Legions, and above thirteen hundred of their Allies. Annibal next night march'd off; Marcellus would have followed him, but could not for the multitude of his wounded men. The Scouts brought word next day, That Annibal was making towards the Bruttians Country.

XVII. About the same time the Hirpini, Lucani, and Vulsiens, delivering up those Garrisons of Annibal's which they had in their Countries, surrendred themselves to Q. Fulvius the Consul, who received them graciously, only rebuking them in words for their past misdemeanours; to the Bruttians also was proposed the like hopes of pardon, when two Brothers, Vibius and Pastius, the noblest men of that Nation, came to desire Terms for them. Q. Fabius the Consul had taken the Town Manduria amongst the Salentines by force, where were taken near four thousand people, and other good Booty. Thence he march'd to Tarentum, and encamped just by the mouth of the Haven. Those Ships which Livius had to convoy Provisions, he partly fill'd with Engines for Battery, and partly with Artillery, Stones and all kind of Darts; and so likewise the Ships of Burthen, as well as the Gallies, were employ'd, some to bring Machines and Scaling Ladders to the Walls, and others Souldiers at a distance to pelt the Defendants: For they were Masters of the Sea, the Punick Fleet being sail'd to Corcyra, when first King Philip attack'd the Ætolians. In the Bruttians Country, those that were besieging of Caulonia, fearing upon Annibal's advance that way to be surpris'd, retired to a little Hill safe for the present, but otherwise void of all relief; but Fabius at the Siege of Tarentum was by a trifling accident assist'd to achieve the taking of that Town of so great importance; Annibal had posted there a Garrison of Bruttians, whose Commander was fallen in love with a small Baggage that had a Brother in the Roman Army, who being advertized by his Sister of the Intrigue she had with this considerable Stranger, did not despair but by her means he might work him to betray the City; and acquainted the Consul with his hopes, who judging it not altogether vain, permits him as a Deserter to fly into Tarentum, and by his Sisters means being ingratiated with the Governour, pump'd him first at a distance, and then seeing the weakness of the man, wheedled him by Female endearments to betray the place he was appointed to guard. The whole contrivance being adjusted, the Souldier in the night is privately sent out of the City, and passes between the Guards back to the Consul, acquainting him with their Agreement; who thereupon in the beginning of the Night giving a Signal to those in the Castle, and who had the Guard of the Haven, himself in person fetching a compass about, gets privately to the East-side of the City; then presently does the Trumpet at once sound from the Castle, and from the Port, and from the Ships that lay in the open Sea, and every where there was a mighty clamour and tumult where there was least of danger; the Consul in the mean time keeping his men all still and quiet; so that Democrates, formerly Admiral, who then happened to have the Guard of that Quarter, finding all hush near him, and such a noise in other places as if the City were already taken, fearing lest whilst he lingered there, the Consul should break into the Town, leads his Forces towards the Castle, whence proceeded the most frightful clamour. Fabius having waited as long as he thought fit, and by the late silence (for before every Body was crying, To Arms! To Arms!) that the Guards on that side were drawn off, orders his Scaling Ladders to be set up to that part of the Wall where he was informed the Bruttians kept Guard; which they easily mounted, the Bruttians receiving and helping them: and so descended into the City, broke open the next Gate that all their Party might enter; and much about break of day, with mighty hallowing and whooping, but no opposition, marched to the Market-place; when those that were engaged against the Castle, and at the Port began to turn and make head against them.

In

In the Court-Yard of the Forum they were somewhat oppos'd, but rather briskly, than XVIII. for any continuance: The Tarentines were neither in Courage, nor Arms, nor skill, nor yet in vigour and strength of Body equal to the Romans; Therefore as soon as they had discharg'd their Darts, almost before they came to handy gripes, they betook themselves to their heels, and through By-Allies which they were well acquainted with, and their Friends Houses, shifted for themselves; but two of their Commanders, Nico and Democrates fighting stoutly were slain. Philomeneus who was Author of their Revolt to Annibal, was seen riding full speed out of the Battel, and afterwards his Horse found alone, but his Body never heard of, it being commonly believ'd, that he was flung off headlong into an open Well; As for Carthalo the Captain of the Punick Garrison, having flung down his Arms, as he was coming to the General with a long story of his Father's kindness to the Romans and his own, a common Souldier meeting him, knockt him o' th' head; The Carthaginians and Tarentines arm'd, and unarm'd, were equally put to the Sword, and not a few of the Bruttians too, whether by mistake, or on the old grudge against them, as being the first that join'd with Annibal, or to extinguish the report of Treachery, that Tarentum might seem rather regain'd by pure valour. The slaughter being pretty well over, they fell to the spoil; there are said to have been thirty thousand Slaves taken here, a vast deal of Plate and ready money; eight hundred and seven pounds weight of Gold, and Statues and curious Pictures almost equal to those of Syracuse; but Fabius abstain'd from that kind of Pillage, with a greater Gallantry than Marcellus: for when his Secretary askt him, What should be done with the Statues? (vast Images they were of the Gods drawn in Armour) Prethee, sayes he, let us leave the Tarentines their angry Gods; The Wall that separated the City from the Castle was dismantled and thrown down. In the interim, Annibal having taken those upon rendition that lay before Caulonia, hearing that Tarentum was invest'd, hasten'd night and day to relieve it, but on his march receiving advice of its being taken, Nay then, quoth he, The Romans have their Annibal too, and by the same Art as we took Tarentum, we have lost it; yet that he might not seem for fear to turn back, he Encamp'd where he heard the news, five miles off that City; and after a short stay, betook himself to Metapont, whence he sent two young Gentlemen with Letters, in the name of the chief people of that Town, to Fabius at Tarentum, offering, That if he would pass by what was past, they would surrender both the City and Punick Garrison into his hands; To which Fabius giving Credit, assigns a day when he would appear before the Town, and return'd Answers to those chief Citizens, which were carried to Annibal; who not a little jocund that he should out-wit even Fabius himself, plants his Ambuscades not far from Metapont; but Fabius taking the Auspices before he march'd from Tarentum, found them once, and a second time, not at all propitious; and when he Sacrificed, the Soothsayer warn'd him to have a care of some trick from the Enemy. The Metapontines seeing he kept not his day, sent fresh Messengers to inquire why he delay'd? who being seiz'd and threatned, for fear of torture, discovered the whole intrigue.

In the beginning of this Summer P. Scipio in Spain having spent the whole Winter in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people, partly by Presents, and partly by releasing their Hostages and Prisoners; one Edesco a famous Captain of the Spaniards came in to him; His Wife and Children were in the Romans Custody, but besides that, there was another, I know not what fatal inclination almost through all Spain that led their minds to side with the Romans against the Carthaginians; which also occasion'd Indibilis and Mandonius (without dispute the greatest person in Spain) with all their Dependants, to retire from Aldrubal, and possess themselves of the Mountains lying over his Camp, whence they might easily correspond with the Romans. Aldrubal perceiving the Enemy to encrease in strength, and himself by like insensible degrees to grow weaker, and that if he did not attempt something extraordinary, all would be lost, resolv'd to fight with the first opportunity. To which Scipio was no less forwards, both from the hopes his late success had given him, as also because he was willing to engage rather with one of them first, before their three Armies were join'd. However lest he should be hamper'd with them all at once, he had augmented his Forces, for seeing there was no use for the Fleet, no Enemy appearing upon the Sea-Coast, he laid up all the Ships at Tarricon, and added the Seamen to his Land Forces, and Arms enough he had taken at Carthage, or at least made by the Artificers afterwards. With these Forces Scipio early in the Spring march'd from Tarricon (for by that time Laelius was return'd from Rome, without whom he would undertake no grand Expedition) and march'd towards the Enemy. His passage was all calm, and every Nation as they pass'd, courteously receiv'd them, and amongst the rest, Indibilis and Mandonius met him with their Forces. Indibilis spoke for them both, but not at all like a Barbarian, foolishly and unwarily, but with a modest gravity, and rather as excusing his revolt as necessary, than boasting of it as undertaken at the first opportunity; For (he said) he knew right well, that the very name of a Deserter was no less odious to those they leave, than suspected amongst those with whom they join; nor could he blame those that did so, if it were not the bare name, but the double dealing that occasion'd it; Then he enumerated at large his good services for the Carthaginians, and on the other side their Avarice, Pride and all kind of injuries to him and his Countrymen; so that hitherto they had only had his body, but his mind was long since there where right and faith were observ'd; just as those fly to the protection of the Gods, who no longer are able to endure the violence and injustice of men; That all he desired was, that his coming over, might neither be reckon'd a Crime, nor an Honour, but as from that day they found him, so and no otherwise they would value him. Scipio made Answer, That in truth he would do so; nor could he count those Fugitives who judg'd themselves not bound to that Alliance where nothing was inviolable, nor any duty regarded, either towards God or Man. Then were brought forth their Wives and Children, who were received with mutual tears of joy, and for that day they were conducted to their Lodgings; The next Morning they concluded the particulars of their Treaty, and then were for the present dismiss'd to gather together their Forces, with whom returning, they thenceforwards quarter'd in the same Camp with the Romans, until, by their guidance, they came up with the Enemy.

XX.

The Carthaginian Army which lay next them, was that of Asdrubal near the City Batula; before his Camp there were Out-Guards of Horse, on whom the Roman Van-Couriers, though weary with their march, before ever they chose their ground to encamp on, did as it were in contempt, make so brisk a charge, as easily shew'd what heart there was in both Parties; for the Carthaginian Troops fled in confusion to their Camp, and the Romans advanced their Standards almost up to the very Ports; and so that day their Stomachs being only whetted for a Battel, they pitcht their Tents. In the night Asdrubal retreated his Forces to a Mount, which on the top had a good large Plain, a River on his Rear, and in the Front as well as on both sides, a steep Bank; there lay under this Hill-top another Plain lower than the other, which was also enclosed with a like high-bank, as difficult for ascent as the former; into which, Asdrubal the next day, when he saw the Enemy resolv'd to fight him, sent down his Numidian Horse Slingers and Africans. Scipio riding about through the several Squadrons and Regiments, shew'd them the Enemy; You see (quoth he) their hearts already misgave them, they despair before hand to fight on even ground, but take the advantage of Hills and Banks; and 'tis only in confidence of the place, rather than any assurance they have in their Arms or their Courage, that they adventure to stand before you; but you remember Carthage had Walls far higher than yonder Mounds and Banks, and yet the Roman Souldiers quickly mounted and got over them; and suffer'd neither Hills, nor Forts, nor the Sea it self to resist the fury of their approaches; Those altitudes the Enemy have posted themselves upon, will only do them this service, that they may run away down Hill; but even there too, I trow, I shall lay a block in their way. For presently he order'd two Regiments forth, one to keep the Streights of the Valley through which the River runs, the other to seize the Road that leads from the City by the winding side of the Hill into the Fields; Himself led on the Van Couriers, who yesterday beat off the Enemies Horse-Guards, towards their Light arm'd Squadrons that stood on neither brow of the Hill, at first they were to pass over a rough uneven ground, and met with no difficulty but that of the way it self; but no sooner were they got within reach, but a mighty storm of all sorts of Darts, and other Weapons, came down thundering upon them as thick as Hail; who answer'd them again with a shewre of Stones, wherewith the ground being all over-spread, it served them very conveniently for Ammunition, and at this sport the Snaplack Boys, Lackies, and other riff-raff that followed the Camp, being mixt amongst the Souldiers, were as busy as the best; the truth, is the ascent of it self was very difficult, and much more when they were so pelted, and as it were overwhelmed with Darts and Stones, yet being enur'd, as they were, to climb Walls, and resolutely bent on the service, the foremost Ranks did at last reach the top; where having once got plain ground, and sure footing, they found the Enemy, who were light and nimble, to run here and there, and shift well enough for themselves, as long as they charg'd at a distance, not able to stand their ground in a close Engagement hand to hand, but easily beat back upon their main body that stood on the upper Hill; whither Scipio having order'd this Victorious Party to follow them, divided the rest of his Forces with Lalius, commanding him with one Brigade to march about on the right hand of the Hill, and seek the easiest place to get up at, whilst he himself, with the other, takes the left hand way, and fetching a small compass fell in pell-mell, and charg'd the Enemy on the Flank; This somewhat discompos'd their Front, being apt upon the sudden shout and alarm to turn their Wings and Ranks that way; but whilst they were in this hurry, to confound them quite, Lalius was got up, and whilst they retreat to keep him off, and prevent their being wounded in the Rear, their Front is weakned and broken, and so gave the Romans of the middle Battel opportunity also to break in, which they could never have done (considering the disadvantage of the steep Bank) as long as the Enemies Ranks stood firm, and the Elephants in their Fore-front; but now great slaughter was made on all sides, and especially by Scipio, who charged through the Enemies (they being as good as naked) from the right Wing to the left; nor had they any opportunity to escape, for Roman Guards had beset the passages both on the right hand and the left, and as for the Gate of the Camp, their General and chief Officers flying that way, had stop't it up, and the Elephants were thereabouts, whom being now frighted, they feared no less than the Enemy; so that there were slain eight thousand or upwards.

Asdrubal

Asdrubal who before the Conflict had secur'd his Money, sent the Elephants before, and having rallied as many as he could of those that escaped out of the Camp, made haste along the River Tagus towards the Pyrenean Mountains; Scipio being Master of the Enemies Camp, gave all the Booty to his Souldiers, except such Prisoners as were of Free-born condition. When the Catalogue was brought in of those that were taken, he found they were ten thousand Footmen and two thousand Horse; of whom such as were Spaniards he freely released and sent home; but the Africans the Treasurer was order'd to sell for Slaves: Then the whole multitude of Spaniards as well those that had before yielded themselves, as those who were yesterday taken Prisoners, applauding his Clemency and Nobleness, with a general shout saluted him by the Title of King; whereupon causing the Cryer to make silence, he told them, That he took the Title of Imperator [General or Commander] whereby his Souldiers called him, to be the greatest of all others. As for the Title of King, although in other places it be most Honourable, at Rome it was odious and not endured, however if they meant to express the bravest Qualities by that appellation, they should find he had a mind truly Royal, but desired them to be content silently to judge so, and refrain using the word. The Barbarians were not so stupid as not to be sensible of this Grandeur of Mind, that he should as it were look down from some greater Elevation and Scorn, upon that glittering Title which astonishes all other Mortals with its Charms. Then he made several Presents to the Princes and Grandees of Spain, and out of abundance of Horses that were taken, desired Indibilis to chuse out three hundred, and take them for his own. The Treasurer going to sell the Africans according to Order, found amongst them a Youth of a most comely Personage and charming Countenance, and understanding that he was of Royal Descent, carried him before Scipio; who asking him who and of what Country he was, and how he came in the Army being so young? I am (answers he, with tears standing in his eyes) a Numidian, and in my own Country they call me Massiva; being left an Orphan by my Father, I was bred in the Court of Gala a King of the Numidians my Grandfather by the Mothers side. When my Uncle Malinissa came over lately with a Body of Horse to aid the Carthaginians, I attended him into Spain; but never was in any Battel before, being by him forbidden, because of my youth; but that day they were to fight with the Romans, I unknown to my Uncle, got an Horse and Arms, and went into the Field, where my Horse falling, flung me down headlong, and so it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans. Scipio bid them set him by, and proceeded with the Affairs before him, which being dispatch'd, he descending from the Tribunal, took the Lad with him into his Pavilion, and ask'd him, If he were willing to be sent back to his Uncle Malinissa? He reply'd with tears of Joy, Ay, with all my heart; whereupon the General gave him a Gold Ring, an Embroider'd Robe, a Spanish Caslock with a Gold Button, and a good Horse and Furniture, ordering a Convoy of Horse to wait on him as far as he pleased, and so dismissed him.

After this a Council of War was held, and some advis'd to pursue Asdrubal with all diligence and expedition; but Scipio reckoning that hazardous, lest then Mago and the other Asdrubal should join Forces with him, was content to send a Party to keep the Pass on the Pyrenean Mountain, and himself resolv'd to spend the rest of the Summer in receiving the Submissions of other States of Spain. As he was on his Return to Taricon, and pass'd the Forest of Castulo. The other two Punick Generals, Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo, and Mago came out of the further Spain to Asdrubal, too late for help, he being already defeated, but yet very seasonable to consult with touching managing the War for the future. They conferr'd together how the Spaniards in each Province stood affected? Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo only was of Opinion, That the farther part of Spain towards Cales and the Ocean Sea, were altogether unacquainted with the Romans, and faithful to the Carthaginian Interest; but both Mago and the other Asdrubal agreed, That Scipio by his Courtesie had won all their Affections, both States and private Persons; and that there would be no end of Deserting and Revolts till all the Spanish Souldiers were either remov'd to the farther parts of that Country, or carried into Gaul in Italy; That if the Senate of Carthage had not granted such a Commission, yet of necessity Asdrubal must into Italy, not only because there was the Head of the War, and on which depended the main Chance, but also that thereby he might draw all the Spaniards far enough from the Fame of Scipio. And since his Army, what with running over to the Enemy, and what with the late Overthrow, was much diminished, the same must be recruited not only with as many Spaniards as could be levied, but also that Mago, delivering his Army to Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo, should cross the Seas unto the Isles of Majorca and Minorca with a considerable Summ of Money to hire Auxiliaries; That Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo should march away with the Army into Portugal, and not hazard a Battel with the Romans; That out of the Cavalry there should be a draught made of the best Troops to the number of three thousand, who should serve under Malinissa as a flying Army to assist their Allies in the nearer Spain, and forrage the Enemies Towns and Fields. And so the several Generals parted to put these Resolutions in practice. This being the summ of what pass'd in Spain this year. At Rome Scipio's Fame daily increas'd, and Fabius, though he won Tarentum rather by Craft than Valour, yet had much Honour paid him for that Service. The Name of Fulvius began to grow dull, and Marcellus lay under some reproach, not so much for that at first he was worsted, as for that before the Summer was half over he had as it were taken up his Winter-Quarters at Venusia, whilst Annibal was ranging at his pleasure through Italy; the truth is, C. Publicius Bibulus a Tribune of the people was his Enemy; and from the first Battel which proved unfavourable, he had endeavoured to render Claudius infamous and odious to the Commons, and was contriving a Bill for taking away his Commission: But Marcellus's Friends and Relations prevail'd, That, leaving the Army with his Lieutenant, he might come to Rome in person, to clear himself of what was objected, and that they would not proceed in his absence to abrogate his Command. And it happened, that about one and the same time, Marcellus came to Town, to wipe off these aspersions, and Q. Fulvius the Consul upon occasion of holding the Elections.

XXIII. The Question touching the continuance or taking away of Marcellus's Command was agitated in the Flaminian Circus with a vast concourse of people of all Degrees; the Tribune not only accused him, but the Nobility in general, That by their fraudulent practices and dilatory proceedings, Annibal had now for ten years continued in Italy, as if it were his proper Province, and spent more of his life there than he had done in Carthage it self, though his native Country; That the people of Rome now tasted the fruit of proroguing Marcellus's Command, and continuing one and the same man so long in power, for what has followed, but his Army twice routed? and now forced to take up their Quarters at Venusia, and lye hous'd for fear of Sun-burning? But Marcellus so effectually refuted his Adversaries Invectives, by recounting his manifold good services, that not only the Bill preferred against him was quash'd, but the very next day he was by unanimous Votes of all the Centuries, created Consul; and for his Colleague was chosen T. Quintius Crispinus, who at present was Prætor: The day following, the Prætors were created, viz. P. Licinius Crassus Dives, then Sovereign Pontiff; P. Licinius Varus, Sex. Julius Cesar, and Q. Claudius Flamen. During this Choice of Magistrates, the City was not a little disquieted with apprehensions of a Rebellion in Tuscany, wherein the Arretines were like to be the Ring-Leaders, as was advertiz'd by C. Calpurnius the Governour of that Province; therefore immediately Marcellus the Consul Elect was dispatched to inspect the State of Affairs in those Parts; and, if he found cause, to draw the Army out of Apulia thither: by whose Arrival, the Tuscans were frighted from their designs and kept quiet: Agents from Tarentum apply'd themselves to the Senate for peace, and to be restored to their former Liberties and Laws; but were answered, That they must attend again when Fabius the Consul was come home from thence; The solemn Games, both those called Roman, and those of the Commons, were celebrated this Year with a Day extraordinary. The Ædiles of State were L. Cornelius Caudinus, and Servius Sulpicius Galba; those of the Commons, Q. Cæcilius, and C. Servilius: but as to this last, some denied, That he was lawfully either Tribune before, or Ædile now; because it was found, that his Father, of whom for ten years the current opinion had been that he was slain by the Boii, when he was a Triumvir, near Modena, was still living, and in bondage to the Enemy; and therefore it was doubted whether his Son by right were capable of any Magistracy.

XXIV. In the Eleventh Year of this Punick War, M. Marcellus entered upon the Consulship the fifth time (reckoning that when he was chosen and did not hold it because of some error alledged in his Creation) and with him T. Quintius Crispinus; to both of them was assign'd Italy for their Province, and the former Consuls two Armies: But because there was another Army on Foot at Venusia under Marcellus, they were to chuse which two they pleas'd of the three, and the third should be committed to him that should happen to have the Province of Tarentum, and the Salentines Country. The other Provinces were dispos'd as follows, amongst the Prætors; P. Licinius Varus, to have the City-Jurisdiction; P. Licinius Crassus, that of the Foreigners, and what other charge the Senate should appoint; to S. Julius Cesar, Sicily; to Q. Claudius Flamen, Tarentum; Q. Fulvius Flaccus was continued in Commission for another Year, and to be Governour of Capua, and have under him one Legion; so was also C. Hostilius Tubulus as Proprætor to succeed C. Calpurnius in Sicily, and have the two Legions that were there; and L. Veturius Philo, to remain in the same Quality in his old Province the Cisalpine Gallia, with the two Legions he had before; The same Order the Senate pass'd in favour of C. Arunculeius; and though it were questioned before the people, yet they confirm'd him in Sardinia with two Legions; and to have also the fifty Men of War which Scipio should send back from Spain, to secure the Coasts of that Island; Scipio and Silanus were still to enjoy their Commands in Spain, and the same Forces; only whereas Scipio, what with the Ships from home, and those taken at Carthage, had a Fleet of eighty Sail, he was to remit fifty of them to Sardinia; because it was reported, That the Carthaginians were that Year making mighty Naval Preparations, and that they would scowre the Seas and all the Coasts of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia with a Navy of two hundred Sail. In Sicily the Forces were thus divided, the Cannian Army was granted to S. Cesar, and M. Valerius Levisus (for he too was continued) was to be Admiral of those seventy Ships already there, whereunto were to be added thirty more from Tarentum, and with that Navy of a hundred Sail, he should, if he thought fit, cross the Seas, and pillage the Coasts of Africk; P. Sulpicius had his Command renewed, that with the Fleet he had before he might attend the Provinces of Greece and Macedonia. In the two City-Legions, there was alteration; but the Consuls were empowered to raise what Recruits they saw necessary. The Roman Empire was that Year defended with one and twenty Legions; and P. Licinius Varus the City-Prætor had charge charge to refit those thirty old Ships that lay at Ostia, and to man out twenty more new ones, that there might be fifty Sail abroad to defend the Coasts near Rome. C. Calpurnius was forbid to remove his Army from Arretium before his Successor arriv'd; and the like command was laid on Tubulus, and especially to prevent any Mutinies.

The Prætors went away for their respective Provinces, but the Consuls were detained a XXV. while longer upon account of Religion, because when they went to expiate certain Prodigies, they found not the Gods very propitious or easy to be appeas'd; From Campania it was related, That two Temples, that of Fortune, and that of Mars, were blasted with Lightning, as also several Sepulchres; That at Cumæ the Mice (forsooth) had nibbled some of the gold in Jupiters Chappel (so apt is superstition to concern the Gods in every trifling accident.) That at Cassinum a great swarm of Bees settled in the Market-place; That Lightning had toucht the Wall and Gate of the Town Ostia; That at Cære a Vultur flew into Joves Temple, and that at Volsinii a Pool was turn'd into Blood: To avert these tokens there was one day spent in Supplications, and for several dayes together great Sacrifices kill'd, but not found acceptable, and for a long time the Gods would shew no signs of favour; but all these ill portents in the Issue lighted only on the Consuls heads, without much danger to the State; The solemn Games in honour of Apollo, were first celebrated by P. Cornelius Sulla, the City Prætor, when Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius were Consuls, and thence-forwards all City Prætors had observ'd them, but they were only vow'd from year to year, and held on uncertain days, but this year a Pestilence grievously afflicting the City and Country, yet rather by long tedious lingering Diseases than any mighty Mortality, on that account both Supplications were made at every Shrine, and P. Licinius Varus, the Prætor of the City, was required to prefer a Bill to the people, that the aforesaid Games should be vow'd for ever on a stated day, and in pursuance of that Law, he was the first that so vow'd them, and order'd them to be held the fifth of July, and on that day they were kept always after.

Concerning the Arretines there continually arriv'd suspicious reports, which encreas'd XXVI. the Senates Care to secure that Town; Therefore they wrote Letters to C. Hostilius, That he should, without delay, cause them to find Hostages, and send them to Rome by C. Terentius Varro, who carried these Orders; Upon whose Arrival, Varro caused one Legion, that encamp'd before the Walls, to march into the Town, and having planted Guards in places requisite, summons the Senators together, and demands of them Hostages, who requiring two days time to consider of it, he told them, If they did not forthwith provide them, he would on the morrow seize on all the Senators Children; Then he caus'd the Colonels to keep the Gates, and the Prefects of the Allies and Centurions to be upon the Watch, that none in the night made their escape out of the City: But this was not so diligently perform'd, but seven of the principal Senators, with their Children, got away; who being found wanting next morning when the Senate was call'd over, all their Estates were confiscated; of the other Senators Hostages to the number of a hundred and twenty, being for the most part their own Children, were received and delivered to Terentius to be conveyed to Rome; whose report of things still encreas'd the Senates Jealousies; Therefore as if a Sedition in Tuscany were just at hand, they order'd him the said Varro to march with one of the City Legions to Arretium, and there keep Garrison, whilst C. Hostilius with the rest of the Army, kept moving to and fro through the whole Country, and prevent all occasions of mischief; Terentius coming thither with his Legion, demanded the Keys of the Gates, of the Magistrates, who pretended they were lost, but he believing they were designedly laid out of the way, presently claps on new Locks and Keys on all the Gates, and took care to be Master of all things in the Town. He gave special warning also to Hostilius, as touching the Tuscans in general, that he should never rest secure of their fidelity, unless he had first depriv'd them of all possible means of rebelling.

After this there was great debate in the Senate about the Tarentines, Fabius defending XXVII. and pleading for them after he had conquer'd them by his Arms, but others were much incens'd against them, and most said their crime was no less than the Capuans, and that they ought as severely to be punish'd; at last the Vote of the House pass'd according to the advice of M. Acilius, that the City should be kept under a Garrison, and none of the Inhabitants suffer'd to range without the Walls, and that the whole matter should be re-heard, when the affairs of Italy were in a more settled condition; nor was the dispute less hot concerning M. Livius, Governour of the Castle of Tarentum, some condemning him, because through his negligence the City of Tarentum was betray'd to the Enemy; others voting to have rewards bestowed upon him for having so bravely defended the Castle for five years together, and because by his means chiefly the City was recovered; but some were for a middle course, urging, That the cognizance of the matter did not so properly belong to that House, as to the Censors; and of that opinion was Fabius himself, but added withal, that he must confess Livius had been a main means of the recovering of Tarentum (as his Friends boasted in his favour) for if he had not lost it, it could never have been regain'd. T. Quintius Crispinus, one of the Consuls, went into Lucania with recruits to the Army that had served under Q. Fulvius Flaccus; but Marcellus was still detain'd by new scruples of Religion, and odd pre-sages happening one after another; amongst other things, whereas in the Gallick War at Clastidium, Clasidium, he had made a Vow to build a Temple to Honour and Virtue, the same being finish'd, the Colledge of Priests would not suffer it to be Dedicated; because they said, one Chappel could rightly be dedicated but to one Deity and no more; for otherwise, if it should be smitten with Lightning, or any other prodigious token happen therein, it would be a very difficult matter to expiate the same, since they could not know to which God the Sacrifices ought to be made, for one Sacrifice cannot be offered to two Gods, unless in some special Cases; so there was fain to be another Temple erected just by, to Virtue, and great hast was made to run it up, but it was not his Fortune to see either of them Dedicated. At last he set forwards to the Army that he left last year at Venusia, carrying with him recruits. Crispinus seeing Fabius had got so much honour by taking of Tarentum, laid Siege to Locri in the Bruttians Country, having sent for all sorts of Engines of Battery, and other Artillery from Sicily, and also Ships to assault that part of the Town which lay towards the Sea; but he was forc'd to give over that Siege, because Annibal was advanc'd as far as Licinium, and he was told his Colleague had drawn his Forces already out of Venusia, with whom he was willing to join; therefore from the Bruttii he returns into Apulia, and between Venusia and Bantia the two Consuls encamp'd, not above three miles from each other; Annibal having turn'd the War from Locri, comes that way too; and both Consuls being men of hot Spirits, were every day leading their Souldiers into the Field to offer him Battel, not doubting but if they could engage him now with the joint Forces of two Consular Forces, they should put an end to the War.

XXVIII. Annibal considering that in the two Bouts he had last year with Marcellus, once he was Conquerour, and the other time worsted, concluded if he had only him to deal with, he should do well enough, but knew he was not a match for them both; Therefore resolves to piece out the Lions Skin with his old Foxes Tail, and sought all opportunities to entrap them with an Ambuscade; frequent Skirmishes happen'd with various success, which the Consuls feared would spin out the Summer, and thought that in the mean time they might well enough carry on the Leaguer of Locri, to which purpose they order'd L. Cincius to bring over the Fleet from Sicily, and a part of the Army that lay at Tarentum to march thither also to assault it by Land. Annibal by certain Thurines had notice of this design, and to way-lay their passage, plants two thousand Horse, and three thousand Foot, in secret ambush under the side of the Petellian Mount; who falling upon the Romans as they march'd carelessly without any Scouts abroad, slew two thousand of them, and took very near as many more Prisoners, the rest scatter'd in their flight through Woods and private ways, got back to Tarentum. One misfortune usually follows another, between Annibal and the Roman Camp was a little Hill over-grown with Wood, which at first was possess'd by neither Party, for the Romans knew not the situation of that side which lay towards the Enemies Camp, and Annibal thought the best use could be made of it was for an Ambuscade, and therefore in the night hides certain Troops of Numidian Horse in the middle of that Wood, with charge that none of them should stir out in the day time, lest they or their Armour should be discovered; The Souldiers in the Roman Camp cry'd out, That Hill by all means was to be gained, and secured by some small Fort; for if Annibal possess'd himself thereof, the Enemy would lye as it were over their heads, and command them at pleasure; Marcellus was of the same opinion, but propos'd to his Colleague, that they two with a Party of Horse should first take a view of the place, for then they would be better able to judge of its conveniency, Crispinus consents, and away they troop, attended but with two hundred and twenty Horse, whereof forty were Fragellanes, the rest Tuscans, and with them went M. Marcellus the Consuls Son, and A. Manlius, both Colonels, and two Captains of the Allies, L. Aremnius and M. Aulius. Some have written that as the Consul Marcellus was sacrificing that Morning when the first Beast was kill'd, its Liver wanted that part which in that superstitious kind of Learning they call'd its Head; in the second Bullock all was right, save only that the head seem'd much bigger than ordinary, which the Soothsayer was troubled at, because both the defective and over-grown Bowels did equally betoken ill Success.

XXIX. But as the Consul Marcellus was so eager of fighting with Annibal, that he thought he was never encamp'd close enough to him; so then when he rode on, he gave Orders, That the Souldiers should be ready immediately to advance upon a Signal given, in case the Hill he was going to view, should suit with their purpose. Now before the Camp there was a small Plain which lay open to the view of the Hill, on the top whereof the Numidians had planted a Spy to give them notice if he saw any of the Romans straggling too far abroad for Forrage or Wood, that they might all at once start out upon them, for little did they dream of so great a Prize as now offer'd it self. This Fellow gave the sign; but they that were to rise from the top and ridge of the Hill in the Front, did not appear, till others fetching a compass, had got inclosed the Romans on the Rear, and then all at once set up a shout and fell on. The Consuls were in a Valley, and could neither get up to the pitch of the Hill, because 'twas possess'd by the Enemy, nor yet retreat, being also beset by them behind; yet they might have continued the Skirmish, and held out a good while, but that the Tuscans all ran away, and discouraged the rest, and yet the Fragellanes (to give them their due) did did not give over the Fight, though thus basely deserted, as long as the Consuls remain'd unhurt, and heartned them on both by their Words and Examples, for they fought manfully amongst the thickest of the Enemy; but when they saw them both wounded, and Marcellus run through with a Lance fall down dead from his Horse, then they (being but very few left alive) with Crispinus the other Consul (who was wounded with two Javelins) and young Marcellus who was sore hurt, shifted for themselves as fast as they could: Of the two Captains of the Allies M. Aulius was slain, L. Aremnius taken Prisoner, five of the Consuls Lictors fell into the Enemies hands, the rest either killed, or escaped with the Consul surviving: Of the Horse forty three were killed in the Skirmish and Pursuit, and eighteen taken alive. In the Camp there was much ado, and crying out to go help their Generals, but before they could advance, they saw one of their Consuls and the Son of the other both wounded with the rest of the small remnant of this unlucky Expedition, hastening towards their Camp. The Death of Marcellus, as in other respects it was to be lamented, so especially because unbecoming his Age (for he was above sixty) and the prudence of an experienced Captain, he should so inconsiderately bring himself and his Colleague, and in a manner the whole State into such imminent danger. I should but weary the Reader to report all the different stories related by Authors touching the Circumstances of this Gentlemans unfortunate end: For to wave others, L. Lalius has publish'd three several Accounts of that Affair, one traditionary from common Fame, the other extant in an Oration made in praise of Marcellus by his own Son who was present in the Action, and a third which he after diligent inquiry avouches as the very truth. But however Reports vary, most say, That he went out of the Camp to view a certain Ground, and all agree that he was cut off, being surprized by an Ambuscade.

Annibal made no doubt but he had put the Enemy into a mighty Consternation by killing of one their Consuls, and wounding the other; and therefore that he might not be wanting to improve the Advantage, presently removes his Camp to the said Hill, where finding the Body of Marcellus, he gave it Honourable Burial. Crispinus afflicted for the Death of his Colleague as well as with his own Wounds, marches off privately in the night, and got upon the nearest Mountains, where he encamped and fortified himself on an high Ground, and naturally advantageous on every side. And now the two Generals used all their Wits, one to contrive Shams and Wheedles, and the other to prevent them. Annibal with Marcellus's Body was become Master of his Ring and Signet, with which Marcellus fearing he would play some tricks, sent Expresses to the neighbouring Cities to acquaint them, That his Colleague was killed, and the Enemy had got his Ring; therefore if any Letters came in Marcellus's Name, or under his Sign Manual, they should regard them as Counterfeits and Snarcs. This Message was scarce got to Salapia, when Letters were brought thither as from Marcellus, That he intended to be there in person the night following, and therefore willed the Souldiers that were there in Garrison to be in readiness, if he should have any occasion to use them. But the Salapians being forewarn'd, easily smelt the Plot, That Annibal design'd to be reveng'd on them not only for revolting, but also for killing his Troopers, treated the Messenger (who was a Roman Fugitive) with very fair words, but sent him back, that he might not observe how they prepared matters; for as soon as he was gone, they dispose of all the Townsmen in apt places for Guards round the City, and set extraordinary Watches. About the Gate where 'twas believ'd the Enemy would come, was posted the main strength of the Garrison. Annibal about the fourth Watch came up to the Town, having a Company in the Van that consisted of Roman Fugitives and in Roman Arms, who coming to the Gate all spoke Latine, and rouzed the Watch, bidding them make haste and open the Gate, for the Consul was come. The Watchmen making as if they had been half asleep when they began to call, bustled about and bestirred themselves mightily. The Portcullis was let down, which some of them with Leavers and Pullies began to pull up, as high as a man might go under it upright. The passage was scarce open when the Rencado's rush'd in at the Portal, striving who should enter first; but when about six hundred of the Enemy were got in, on a sudden letting go the Rope that held it up, down comes the Portcullis with a mighty noise and makes all fast. The Deserters that were let in, to make a shew as if they were all amongst Friends, had their Arms not on their backs but their shoulders, as well enough for a March, and the Salapians being well arm'd, easily cut them to pieces, whilst others from the Gates, Walls and Bullwarks, with Stones, Darts and Javelins, pelted the rest of the Enemies that were without, and drove them off. So Annibal caught in his own trap, was glad to be gone, and march'd to raise the Siege of Locri, which Town Cincius had for some time batter'd furiously with abundance of Engines brought out of Sicily, inasmuch that Mago the Governour began to despair of defending the place, but his hopes were reviv'd, first by the news of Marcellus's being kill'd, and especially by an Express, That Annibal having sent his Numidian Horse before, was in Person with the rest of his Army on their March to relieve him. Therefore alfoon as by a Sign from the Tops of the Hills he understood the Numidians were near hand, he flings open the Gate, and makes a desperate Sally on the Enemy, which caus'd for a while a doubtful Fight, because unexpected, and not that he was of equal strength; but alfoon as the Numidians too charged in in the Rear, the Romans were so scar'd, that they run in droves to the Sea and got aboard their Ships, abandoning their Works, and leaving behind them all their Engines of Battery and other Artillery: So by the approach of Annibal, Locri was set free.

XXXI.

Crispinus after he was advertiz'd that Annibal was return'd to the Bruttians, commanded M. Marcellus a Colonel to lead the Army, which his Collegue had commanded, towards Venusia; whilst he himself march'd his Legions to Capua, the pain of his Wounds being so grievous, that he could scarce endure the shaking of his Horse-litter. He sent Letters to Rome of the Death of his Collegue, and in what a dangerous condition he was himself, so that he could not repair to Rome to hold the Elections, both because he thought he should not be able to hold out so tedious a Journey, as likewise for that he was in pain for Tarentum, lest Annibal should bend his Forces thither out of the Bruttians Country; That it would be necessary to send him some discreet and experienced persons with whom he might consult concerning the Affairs of the State. The reading of these Letters caused great lamentation for the death of one Consul, and no less fear of losing the other. Therefore Q. Fabius the Son is dispatched to the Army at Venusia, and to the Consul were sent three Commissioners, Sext. Julius Caesar, L. Licinius Pollio and L. Cnecius Alimentus who was but just arriv'd from Sicily. They were to acquaint the Consul, That if he were not able to come to Town himself, he should within some part of the Roman Territories nominate a Dictator for holding the Elections. And that if he himself went to Tarentum, then the pleasure of the Senate was, That Q. Claudius the Prætor should march thence with his Legions into such part of the Country where he might defend most Cities of the Allies. The same Summer M. Valerius with a Navy of an hundred Sail, passed over from Sicily unto Africk, and landing near the City Clupea, wafted the Country a long way without any opposition; but retir'd in a hurry to their Ships, being advertiz'd that the Carthaginian Armado consisting of eighty three Ships, was making that way; with whom they engag'd not far from the said City Clupea, and took eighteen of them, and scatter'd the rest, and so with a mighty Booty obtain'd both at Sea and Land, return'd unto Lilybæum. Likewise this Summer King Philip assist'd the Achaens at their humble request, being oppress'd by Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedemonia, and also by the Ætolians, who wafting an Army over the narrow Sea between Naupactum and Patra (which the Inhabitants call the Rios) wafted their Territories. There was also a Report, That Attalus King of the lesser Asia would make an Expedition into Europe, because the Ætolians in their last Diet had chosen him their Protector.

XXXII.

When therefore Philip made a descent into Greece, the Ætolians met him near Lamia, under the Conduct of Pyrrhus, who was that year created Prætor with King Attalus, because the latter was absent; but they had with them Auxiliaries from him, and almost a thousand from the Roman Fleet sent by P. Sulpicius; but Philip routed them in two several Battels, with great slaughter in each, so that they were glad to shelter themselves within the Walls of Lamia, whilst Philip retired unto Phalera, a Town in the Gulf of Malea, heretofore very populous for its excellent Haven, and safe Rodes near hand for Ships to ride in, and other advantages both by Sea and Land. To this place repaired Embassadors from Ptolemy King of Egypt, and from the Rhodians, Athenians and Chians as Mediators to take up the Differences between Philip and the Ætolians, and of nearer Neighbours there was Aminander Prince of the Athamanians: Not that any of these were so much concern'd altogether for the Ætolians, (a sort of People more fierce and imperious than the Greeks generally use to be) but to prevent Philip from intermeddling with the Affairs of Greece, which might prove of dangerous consequence to their Liberties hereafter. After some time spent, this Consult touching Peace was put off to the General Council of the Achaens, and a time and place appointed for holding the same; and in the mean time a Truce for thirty days obtained. The King marching thence through Theffaly and Boetia, came to Chalcis in Eubœa, that he might hinder and beat off King Attalus who was reported to be coming with a Fleet against that Province, leaving there a Guard to withstand Attalus (in case he should in the interim pass over) Philip with a small Party of Horse and light-arm'd Foot visited Argos, where by common Consent the Honour of celebrating the Herean and Nemean Games, was conferr'd upon him, because the Kings of Macedonia report themselves to be defended from that City. As soon as the first of these Sports were over, he immediately hastened to the said general Diet or Assembly long before proclaimed; where matters were fairly advanced for putting an end to the Ætolian, lest thereby the Romans or King Attalus should take occasion to invade Greece; but all was broken off by the Ætolians themselves before the Truce was quite expired, upon the News that both Attalus was come to Ægina, and the Roman Navy arrived at Naupactum: For being called into the Grand Council of the Achaens (where were present the same Mediators as at Phalera) they first complain'd, That in some particulars the Truce had been broken, and in fine told them flatly, That there could not possibly be an end of the Wars, unless the Achaens yielded up Pilos to the Messenians, and Atintania were restor'd to the Romans, and the Ardyæians to Scerdiletus and Pleuratus. Philip could not without indignation hear those he had conquer'd prescribing Laws and Conditions to their Conquerour, declaring, That for his part he never had any hopes of the Ætolians, and therefore did not on that score either admit of the Treaty for Peace, or grant a Cessation from from War, but merely that he might have all those Princes and States witnesses that he was heartily inclinable to Peace, and they the only cause of the War. So without any Peace concluded he dismiss'd the Assembly, leaving the Achaens four thousand Souldiers for their Guard, and receiving from them five men of War, which if he could join with the Carthaginian Navy lately sent him, and those other Ships he expected out of Bithynia from King Prusias, he thought he might be able to engage the Romans who had long lorded it in those Seas. Himself presently from this Council returned to Argos, for now the time drew near of the other Sports call'd the Nemean Games, which he was willing to have celebrated in his presence.

The King being busy about his Plays, and diverting himself with more liberty than he ought to have done in a time of War, had intelligence, that P. Sulpicius the Roman Admiral; loosing from Naupactum, was landed between Sicyone and Corinth, waiting that goodly and most fruitful Country. This rouz'd King Philip from his sports, and taking with him his Cavalry (the Foot being order'd to follow) making long marches, he came unexpectedly upon the Foragers, as they were wandring in the Fields, and loaded with Pillage, and beat them back to their Ships; which Victory, though inconsiderable, serv'd to encrease the jollity of the rest of the Games, where Philip spent his time in all kind of Festival Delights, and for popularity laid aside his Crown, his purple Robes, and Royal Ornaments, and in habit equal'd himself to the rest of the people, than which nothing is more grateful to Free Cities; and thereby he had undoubtedly ingratiated himself very much, and given hopes of continuing their Liberties, if he had not spoil'd all again by his intollerable Debauchery and Lasciviousness; for he would ramble night and day, with one or two Companions, amongst blind naughty Houses by the Sea-side, and by putting himself in the garb of a private person, as he was the less taken notice of, so the more dissolute and extravagant he was; and whilst he pretended to others a vain shew of Liberty, turn'd all to his own licentiousness; nor did he purchase all his pleasures with gold, or perswade them with fair words, but often added force to his wickedness, so that it was dangerous for any Parent or Husband to go about to prevent or delay his Lust; From Aratus, a chief person amongst the Achaens, he took his Wife Polycratia, and in hopes of her being made a Queen, perswaded her to go with him into Macedonia; The solemn Games being spent in these Villanies, a few days after he march'd to Dyme to drive out the Garison of Ætolians, which the Eleans had call'd and received into that Town; there the Achaens, under the Conduct of Cycliadas their Chief Magistrate, met him, as hating both the Eleans because they did not join with the rest of the Achaens, and the Ætolians as believing that they excited the Romans against them. With these conjoin'd Forces, King Philip pass'd the River Larissus, that divides the Eleans from the Dymeans Territories.

The first day they entred upon the Enemies Confines they spent in Foraging; the next day they march in Battalia towards the City, sending before their Horse to make a Bravado before the Gates, and challenge the Ætolians, who are a sort of people ready enough for Excursions and Skirmishes. They had yet no intelligence that Sulpicius with fifteen Sail was cross'd over from Naupactum to Cyllene, where having landed four thousand men, in the night, that no notice might be taken of it, put them into Elis; Therefore when amongst the Ætolians and Eleans they beheld Roman Standards, that unexpected fight put them into a mighty Consternation; The King at first was for retreating, but seeing a Skirmish began between the Ætolians and Trallans (a sort of Illyrians) wherein his Party was shrewdly put to't, he with his Cavalry charg'd a Regiment of Romans, where his Horse being run through with a Javelin, threw the King head-long, which occasion'd a most furious Fight on each side, the Romans to attacque the King, and his own Souldiers to rescue him; nor was he less brave in his own defence, when getting up he was forc'd to fight on foot amidst whole Squadrons of Horse; but beginning to have the worst on't, and many falling round about him, some of his men mounted him on another Horse, and hurried away. That night he encamp'd five miles off from the City Elis, and next day drew all his Forces to a Country Town somewhat fortified (Pyrgus they call it) where he heard a great many Peasants had bestow'd their Cattel, hoping to secure them from Foragers; This rude and unarm'd multitude he overcame with the very terrour of his first approach, and that Booty serv'd to Ballance the disgrace he met with at Elis: As he was dividing the spoil (there were four thousand persons, and Cattel of all sorts to the number of twenty thousand) a Courier arrives from Macedonia, with news, That one Eropus by corrupting the Governour, had surprized the City Lychnidus, and several Villages of the Dassaretians, and endeavour'd to raise the Dardanians to join with him; Therefore postponing the Achaic and Ætolian War to that domestick mischief (yet leaving two thousand five hundred Souldiers of all sorts, under the Command of two Captains, Menippus and Polyphanta, to guard his Allies) he hastned from Dyme through Achaia, Boetia, and Bebais, in ten days march arriv'd at Demetrias in Theffaly. Where other Messengers brought tidings of a greater Insurrection, viz. That the Dardanians had in vast numbers invaded Macedonia, and were Masters of Orestis, and marching down into the Plains of Ægeæum; and that 'twas currently reported amongst the Barbarians, That King Philip was slain. The truth is, in that Expedition which he made at Sicyon against those that spoil'd the Country, he was carried by his high-metled Horse under a Tree, and against an Arm thereof, broke off one Corner of the Crest of his Helmet, which being taken up by an Ætolian, and carried home to Scerdeletus, who knew by the mark that it was the Kings, this story of his death was thereupon divulged. After Philip's departure out of Achaia, Sulpicius arriving with his Navy at Ægina, join'd with Atalms; The Acheans not far from Messene fought with the Ætolians and Eleans, and worsted them; King Atalms and P. Sulpicius took up their Winter Quarters at Ægina.

XXXV. At the end of this year, T. Quintius Crispinus the Consul died of his Wounds, some say at Tarentum, others in Campania; having first nominated L. Manlius Torquatus, Dictator, for holding the Elections, and celebrating the solemn Games; The like never happen'd in any former War, that both the Consuls should be slain, and leave the Common-wealth as it were Fatherless, and yet no memorable Battle fought. The Dictator named for his Master of the Horse, Cn. Servilius, who was then Ædile of State. The Senate at their first meeting order'd the Dictator to exhibit the grand Roman Games, which M. Æmilius the City Prætor had represented when C. Flaminius and Cn. Servilius were Consuls, and vow'd again at five years end. The Dictator held them accordingly, and also vowed them for the five years following. But there being at present two Consular Armies so near the Enemy, both without Generals, the principal care that troubled both Senate and People, was with all speed to create Consuls, and such whose Vertue and Prudence might be secure against Punic Craft, since during this whole War, the over-hasty heads and hot Spirits of the Leaders had prov'd pernicious to the publick, and even this very year the Consuls by too much eagerness to fight the Enemy, had been most unexpectedly ruin'd; Howbeit the immortal Gods in pity to the Roman name, spar'd the innocent Armies, punishing the Consuls rashness, with the loss only of their own Lives.

XXXVI. The Fathers of the Senate casting their Eyes every way for fit Consuls, C. Claudius Nero appear'd the most likely man; but where to suit him with a Partner was the question? For though they knew him to be a gallant man, yet they thought he might be a degree too warm for this juncture and such an Enemy as Annibal, unless he were moderated by some discreet and wary Collegue. Now there was M. Livius, who many years ago, was condemned by the judgment of the people for what he had done in his Consulship, [viz. as having unjustly divided the Illyrians spoils] which disgrace he resent'd so heinously, that he withdrew into the Country, and for several years refrain'd not only the City, but all Company. In the eight year after this judgment given against him, the Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Valerius Lavinius, brought him back to Town, but he appear'd in old threadbare Cloaths, the hair both of his head and beard grown long and neglected, shewing whereever he came how firmly he still retain'd the memory of that affront. The Censors L. Veturius, and P. Licinius enjoin'd him to trim himself, and lay by that odd slovenly Apparel, to make his appearance in the Senate, and discharge publick Duties like other persons of his quality; but even when any debate happen'd, he either gave his Vote in a single Ay or No, or if the House were divided, went over to which Party he lik'd, and testified his mind by his silence, till lately the cause of his Kinsman, M. Livius Macarius, when his honour was brought in question about the loss of Tarentum, prevail'd with him to stand up and deliver his mind in the Senate in a notable Discourse; which affected all that heard it so much the more, because 'twas after so long a discontinuance, and occasion'd them to speak of the unhandsome usage he had receiv'd from the people, and the damage the publick had sustain'd by losing the service of so worthy a man so long, both in the Field and the Senate, during this dangerous and tedious War; That neither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Lavinius could be join'd with C. Nero, because 'twas not lawful to chuse both Patricians; The same obstacle lay against T. Manlius, and besides he had already once refused, and would again decline it if offer'd, but M. Livius and C. Claudius would make a most excellent pair of Consuls. Nor did the people when the Fathers put him in nomination, seem unwilling to chuse him. The only man in all the City that oppos'd the conferring that honour upon him was himself; Saying, That this would be the most scandalous argument of levity and inconstancy that the City could be reproach'd with; To take no pity of his misery, when he went in mourning under the sense of an unjust accusation, and now against his will to cloath him in a glittering white Garment, that he may put in for the Consulship; to brand and advance one and the same person, and at once inflict punishments and confer honours on him; If they judge him a good man, why did they condemn him as a Criminal and a Villain? If they have found him tardy, why should they entrust him with a second Consulship who manag'd his first so lewdly? Whilst thus he argued and complain'd, the Fathers reprov'd him, and bid him recollect, Was not M. Furius recall'd from banishment? and did not he restore his Country to her former dignity, who had disgracefully spew'd him out? The harshness of a mans Country, like that of his Parents, is only to be adduc'd and mitigated by Patience and a modest submission; In fine, they prevail'd, and with one Voice, chuse him and C. Claudius Consuls.

XXXVII. Three days after the Court for Prætors was held, and those created were L. Porcius Licinius, C. Mamilius, and the two Hostilii Catones, Aulus and Caius. The Playes done, and Elections finish'd, the Dictator and Master of the Horse resign'd their Offices. C. Terentius Varro

Varro was sent into Tuscany, that C. Hostilius might go out of that Province to Tarentum, to command that Army which formerly belong'd to T. Quintius the Consul. And T. Manlius to go over into Greece, as Embassadour to observe how affairs went; the rather because this Summer the Olympian Games were to be celebrated, where would be a resort from all parts of Greece, at which, if he might with safety, they would have him present, that if he could light upon any Sicilians who were fled their Country, or any Tarentines banisht by Annibal, he should perswade them to return home, assuring them that the Romans would restore to them whatever Estates they had before these Wars began. This being like to prove a most dangerous year, and no Consuls in being, all mens Eyes were fixt on the Consuls Elect, when they would divide the Provinces, and assign every one his Charge. The Senate upon the motion of Q. Fabius Maximus, was pleas'd to undertake their reconciliation in the first place, for heretofore there had been notable Feuds between them, which the Calamity that beset Livius rendred more bitter and inveterate, as thinking the other on that account condemn'd him; Therefore he seem'd the more implacable of the two, and said, There was no need of a reconciliation, for they would both act the more vigorously for the publick upon emulation, each knowing that by any default, he shall but augment the glory of his Rival Collegue; yet the Authority of the Fathers prevail'd with them to bury their private animosities, and with common advice and united affections, administer the affairs of the publick. Their Provinces were not intermingled as in former years, but distant on the extreme Frontiers of Italy; one against Annibal amongst the Bruttians and Lucans; The other in Gaul against Asdrubal, who by report was already advanc'd near the Alps. He whose Lot it should be to have Gaul, was to take his choice which he would have of those two Armies in Gaul or Tuscany, to which the old City Forces should be added. He that went to the Bruttians should take which of the two late Consuls Armies he pleas'd, together with the new City Levies, and that Army which the Consul refused, Q. Fulvius the Pro-Consul should receive, and command for a year; C. Hostilius lately removed out of Tuscany to Tarentum; they ordered to shift again, and go to Capua, with one Legion, the same that Fulvius commanded last year.

seilles brought word, That he was got into France, and that the people there were mighty glad of his coming, because 'twas said he had brought abundance of Gold with him, to hire Auxiliaries amongst them. Whereupon Agents were sent thither from Rome to find out the truth, viz. S. Antistius, and M. Retius, who at their Return, gave an account, That they sent out some Spies with Guides from Marseilles, to enquire concerning the premisses of the chief men of France; and that it was most certain, Asdrubal, who had already levied a vast Army, would early next Spring pass the Alps, and that nothing staid him at present but those Mountains being unpassable because of the Winter-Season. L. Aquilius Pætus was created and consecrated Augur, in the room of M. Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Dolabella King of the Sacrificers, instead of M. Mercius, who dyed two years ago. Also the City was solemnly purged, and a general survey taken by the Consors, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus, there being found a hundred thirty seven thousand one hundred and eight Citizens, a number less by a pretty deal than before the War. This was the first Year, since Annibal's coming into Italy, that the Comitium [or place of the general Assembly] was covered over head, and the Roman Games once renewed by Q. Metellus and C. Servilius Ædiles of State; as also the Plebeian sports held for two days by their Ædiles, Q. Mamilius, and M. Cecilius Metellus, who likewise offered and set up three Statues in the Temple of Ceres; with a solemn Feast in honour of Jupiter, at those Games. Now C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius, the second time enter upon the Consulship, who having before parted their own Provinces, commanded the Prætors to cast Lots for theirs: The City Jurisdiction fell to C. Hostilius, who had also that over the Foreigners, to the end the other three might be spared to go into the Provinces; A. Hostilius to Sardinia; C. Manlius to Sardinia; and L. Porcius to Gaul. In all, three and twenty Legions were to be employed, two under each Consul, four in Spain, the three last-mentioned Prætors two a-piece, two with C. Terentius in Tuscany, two with Q. Fulvius amongst the Bruttians, two to Q. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salentines Country; one at Capua under C. Hostilius Tubulus, and two new ones to be levied for the Guard of the City. For the first four Legions the people chose Colonels, in the rest the Consuls nominated them.

Before the Consuls set out, there were Sacrifices offered for nine days together, because at XXXIX:
Vei it had rained Stones; and, as it falls out, when one Prodigy is mentioned, others are presently told, it was reported, That at Minturnæ the Temple of Jupiter and Marica's Grove, at Atellæ the Wall and Gate, were all sing'd with Lightning; and that at Capua a Wolf by Night came in at the Portal, and worried one of the Watchmen. By Order from the Pontiffs, these Prodigies were expiated with the greater Sacrifices, and one days Supplication. After which, there was another Novendial Sacrifice, because in the place call'd the Arministrum, it seem'd to rain Stones. But mens minds were no sooner pacified with these Religious Rites, but they were terrified anew with an Infant born at Frusino as big as an ordinary Child of four years old, and, to encrease the Miracle, they could not distinguish of what Sex it was, like that two years before at Sinnessa: The Wizards sent for out of Tuscany affirm'd this, above all the rest, to be a foul and untoward Prodigy, advising, That it should forthwith be carried out of the Roman Territories, without touching the Ground, and so drowned in the Deep: Accordingly, they put it in a Coffin; and when they had carried it forth a good way on the Sea, flung it in. The Pontiffs made a Decree, That three Sets of Virgins, nine in each Company, should go through the City, as in Procession, singing certain sacred Songs to be learnt in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, composed by Livius the Poet. The Temple of Juno the Queen on the Aventine Hill being strucken with Lightning, the Soothsayers declared, That the same concerned the Matrons of the City, and that the Goddess must be appeased with an Offering: All the good Dames that had Houses in the City, or ten Miles round, were summoned into the Capitol by the Ædiles of the Chair, where amongst themselves they chose out a Committee of twenty five, into whose hands all the rest should deposite some small part of their Dowry; of which was made a fair large Golden Basin, and offered to Juno on Mount Aventine, and withal they sacrificed to her with wonderful Devotion. Soon after the Decemvirs ordered another solemn Sacrifice to the same Goddess, the formality whereof was thus: There were two white Heifers led from Apollo's Temple into the City, through the Gate Carmentalis; next were carried two Images made of Cypress-Wood, representing Queen Juno; then the seven and twenty Virgins in long Robes went singing in her praise, the Verses perhaps applauded by the gross Wits of that Time, but now if we should recite them, they would be thought sorry ridiculous Stuff: after these Lassies followed the Decemvirs with Chaplets of Laurel, and in Vestures embroidered with Purple, from the Gate aforesaid along the Street Ingarinus into the Common Hall, where the Pomp staid, whilst the Maids, taking hold of a Cord that went through all their hands, sung another Song, and kept time with feet, dancing very curiously; thence they marched by the Tuscan Street and Felabrum through the Beast-Market, and so forwards to the Clivus Publicus, till they came to Juno's Temple, where the two Heifers were sacrificed by the Decemvirs, and the Cypress Images set up in the Chapel.

XL. Having thus made the Gods and Goddesses their Friends, the Consuls made a more strict Levy for Souldiers than had been known in the memory of man; for the terror of the War was redoubled by the approach of a new Enemy into Italy, and there were fewer men fit for Service to be found, so they were forced to require the Colonies on the Sea-Coast, who pretended to be exempted from the Militia by a Sacred Constitution, to bear Arms: And such as refused, they summoned at a certain day to shew the Senate their Privilege, where appeared the Deputies of these Towns following, Ostia, Allia, Antium, Anxur, Minturne, Sinuessæ, and from the upper Sea, those of Sena; but having all pleaded what they could, there were none found to have any Right to be dispensed with when an Enemy was actually in Italy, but those of Antium and Ostia; so the young and serviceable men of those Colonies were sworn, That not above forty of them should at any time lye all night out of the Walls of their Colony, so long as the Enemy continued in Italy. When all the Fathers were of Opinion, That the Consuls ought with all expedition take the Field (for 'twas fit to oppose Annibal as soon as he came down the Alps, that he might not inveigle the Cisalpine Gauls and Tuscans, apt enough to rebel; and Annibal was by himself to be held in play, that he might not get out of the Bruttians Country, and march towards his Brother) yet Livius still made delays, not confiding in the Armies of his Provinces, whilst his Colleague had his Choice of two excellent Consular Armies, and a third no whit behind them, commanded by Q. Claudius at Tarentum; Therefore he made a motion for calling the Volunteers, that had been Slaves, again to their Colours. The Senate gave ample Commission to raise Recruits where they would, and to chuse or change any of the Armies, and to draw out any from the Provinces as they found most expedient for the Commonweal. All which was done and settled by them with the greatest concord and mutual satisfaction. The Volunteers were added to the nineteenth and twentieth Legions; stout Assistance was sent from Spain by Scipio to this War, as some Authors write, no less than eight thousand Spaniards and French, two thousand Legionary Souldiers and eighteen hundred Horse, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards, and that M. Lucretius brought over these Forces; as likewise that C. Mammius sent four thousand Archers and Slingers out of Sicily.

XLI. Letters out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Prætor augmented their fears at Rome, signifying, That Asdrubal had quitted his Winter-Quarters, and already passing the Alps; That there were eight thousand Ligurians listed and arm'd who would join him as soon as he came into Italy, unless some Forces were sent into that Province to busie them at home; That for his own part he had but a weak Army, but would venture as far as he might with safety. These Advertisements caused the Consuls (having in great haste dispatch'd their Musters) to set forwards to their Provinces sooner than they intended, to the end each of them might detain the Enemy in his Province, and not suffer them to join. But that which most promoted such their design, happen'd to be a mistaken Opinion Annibal himself had entertain'd. For though he doubted not but his Brother would that Summer arrive in Italy, yet considering what difficulties he himself met with, and how he spent five months, what in getting over the Rhône passing the Alps, and fighting with several of the Inhabitants, by the way, he did not believe nor expect that he could come so early, which made him continue continue the longer in his Winter-Quarters; but Asdrubal in his March found all things more easie and expeditious than he himself or others could hope for; for the Averni, and, by their Example, other Nations both of France, and about the Alps, not only entertain'd him readily, but followed him to the War. Besides, as he conducted his Army through the same passages which were prepared and made open by his Brother's March, and were before craggy Precipices and unpassable; so in the twelve years time since by continual travelling of some or other that way, both the Roads were now much better track'd, and the Nature of the Peasants rendred more civil and sociable. For the people before being not used to Strangers, nor having ever seen Passengers amongst them, were in a manner meer Savages; and not knowing at first whither Annibal was bound, they fancied that he came to surprize their Fortresses and Caves, and take Captive their people, and drive away their Cattel in Booties, and so opposed him all they could. But now the Fame of the Punic War (wherewith Italy hath twelve whole years been harassed, and as it were all in a Flame) had taught them, That their Alps were only visited as a Thorough-fare; That two mighty Cities divided by Seas and large tracts of Land lying between them, were vying with one another for Riches and Empire. These were the Reasons that open'd the Alps to Asdrubal. But look what time he gain'd by his speedy March, the same he lost again in vain at Placentia, whilst he rather lay to block it up, than assault it. He imagined the winning of such a City standing in a plain open Country would prove no difficult task, and the famousness of the place induced him to believe, that by the destruction thereof he should strike a terror into all the rest. Nor did he by that Siege only hinder himself, but detain'd Annibal too, who before on the first News of his being so unexpectedly got over the Alps, was in all haste going to take the Field, which (after he understood he was fat down before Placentia) he delay'd to do, as knowing what tedious work Sieges commonly prove, and how vainly he himself attempted the same Colony when he return'd victorious from Trebia.

The Consuls marching out of the City several ways, as if they had gone to two distinct Wars, distracted mens minds with various cares; Sometimes they revolved on the various Losses and Overthrows they received at Annibal's first coming into Italy; sometimes they were troubled to imagine, what Gods they could hope would be so propitious to their City and Empire, as that at one and the same time all their Actions every where should prosper, and give them success both at home and abroad; That hitherto their State had been supported by vicissitudes of good and ill Fortune in distinct places, whilst it seemed precipitating into ruine in Italy at Thrasymenus and Cannæ, Victories in Spain buoy'd up her Spirits. Afterwards when in Spain Overthrows came thick one on the neck of another, and shockt her with the loss of two most excellent Generals and two Armies almost at once, successes in Italy and Sicily supported the drooping Head of the Republick; and the interval of place, when one of the Wars was always so remote, gave opportunity to respire and recover themselves. But now here were two Tragedies to be acted at once on one and the same Stage; Two distinct and terrible Wars entertain'd in the Bowels of Italy, two of the most renowned Captains in the World inclose between them the City of Rome with their dreadful Arms, and the whole bulk of the War contracted to one place, the whole burden laid on one shoulder. For no doubt, which soever of these Generals shall get a Victory, he will in an instant join Forces with the other. Nor did the sad remembrance of the last years Funerals, wherein two Consuls were swept away at one Stake, a little terrifie the people. And with these perplexed melancholy thoughts they accompanied their present Consuls going to their several Provinces. It is also found in some Records, that Livius parted with such resentments against his Fellow-Citizens, that when Fabius, as his last Advice, besought him that he would not rashly hazard a Battel with the Enemy, before he were very well acquainted with his Nature, he should with some emotion declare, That as soon as he could get sight of the Enemy, he would fight him. And being ask'd the reason of so much haste? should reply, Because either by a Victory over the Enemy I shall gain immortal Honour, or by the Overthrow of my ungrateful Country-men acquire some satisfaction to my self, if not altogether honest and commendable, yet at least such as they have deserv'd at my hands; before Claudius the Consul was come into his Province, C. Hostilius Tubulus, with some Regiments lightly appointed, fell upon Annibal as he pass'd through the farther Borders of Larinum, towards the Salentines, and charging upon his Army, whilst they were in the disorders of a march, slew four thousand of them, and took nine Colours. Q. Claudius who had Garrisons all up and down the Salentines Country, upon advice of the Enemies advance that way, drew out to meet them; but Annibal to avoid engaging with two Armies at once, dislodges by night out of the Territories of Tarentum, and retires amongst the Bruttians, and Claudius back to his Salentines. Hostilius in the way to Capua meets the Consul Claudius near Venusia, where out of both Armies were selected forty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse, which the Consul intended to employ against Annibal, the rest Hostilius was order'd to lead to Capua, and deliver up to Q. Fulvius the Proconsul.

Annibal having drawn together all the Forces he had either in Winter-Quarters, or the Bruttian Garrisons, comes to Grumentum in Lucania, hoping to recover those Towns that had for fear revolted to the Romans. The Roman Consul having his Scouts abroad, tends the

the same way, and encamps not above a mile and an half off. The Enemies inmost Works seemed almost joined to the Walls of that Town, and between their formost Rampier and the Roman Camp was not above half a Mile, which space was a Plain, but overlook'd by a Ridge of bare open Hills that run along on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and on the Romans Right, not suspected by either Party, because there were no Woods nor any Holes to conceal an Ambuscade; several Shirmishes happen'd between small Parties, but none worth mentioning. The Romans only drift was to keep the Enemy there, and Annibal was as willing to be gone, yet for shew, drew out into the Field in Battalia with all the strength he could make. The Consul had borrowed a little of the Enemies Craft; for since in those open Hills there was less fear of Ambuscade, he thought fit so much the rather to lay one, ordering five Regiments of Foot and as many Troops of Horse to get over those Hills by night, and lye close in the Vallies behind, instructing T. Claudius Asellus a Colonel, and P. Claudius a Prefect of the Allies, who had the Leading of them, both as to the time and manner of their shewing themselves and attacking the Enemy, himself as soon as it was light had drawn all his Forces, Horse and Foot, into the Field. Nor was it long before Annibal likewise gave the Signal of Battel, and great shouts were made in his Camp by the Souldiers running to their Arms. The Horse and the Foot promiscuously hurried out at the Ports, and in scattering Troops hastened towards the Enemy, whom when the Consul saw in this disorder, he commanded C. Aurunculeius a Tribune of the third Legion, that he should with that Legions Cavalry charge them as furiously as might be: For whilst they were thus like sheep spread in tumultuary heaps over the Plain, they might easily be surprized and routed before ever they could be brought into Array.

XLIV. Hannibal himself was not yet got out of the Camp, when he heard the Clamours of some of his men that were fighting; this quickned his march with the rest of his Forces towards the Enemy; The formost were already terrified with the Horse, and now the Romans first Legion and Right Wing of Cavalry were coming up to charge them. The Carthaginians disorder'd as they were, fought at a venture, as each Company happen'd first to meet either Horse or Foot. The conflict grew hotter by fresh Supplies still coming up, and increased by the numbers that continually rush'd out (like Bees in swarms) to fight, and undoubtedly in all that hurry, Annibal had reduced his men to order and a regular Form of Battalia, (no easy matter to do, unless where the Leader is very skillful, and the Souldiers experienc'd and well disciplin'd) if it had not been for the shout of the before mentioned Troops, which they heard at their backs, as they came running down the Hills upon them. Then they grew afraid in earnest lest they should be hemm'd in and shut out from their Camp, to which they fled as fast as they could, and being so near, the slaughter was the less, yet the Horse charging all the way upon their Rear, and the other Party running easily down Hill, and doing great Execution on their Flank, there were in all cut off above eight thousand men, more than seven hundred taken, nine Standards won, and of their Elephants (which could do no service in this sudden tumultuary Engagement) four kill'd and two taken. Of the Romans and their Allies were slain two hundred. The next day the Carthaginians kept close; the Romans drew up again in the Field, but seeing no body come to oppose them, fell to rifle and strip the Bodies of the Enemy, and gathering their own dead together, buried them; Afterwards for several dayes together they would brave the Enemy up to their very Gates, as if they would with Banners display'd, have march'd into their Camp; till one night about the third Watch, Annibal leaving behind him a great many Fires, and some few Tents standing in that part next the Romans, and a few Numidians to shew themselves at the Gates and on the Rampier, march'd off his Army, designing for Apulia; when it grew day the Roman Army came up near their Works, as they us'd to do, and the Numidians as they were ordered, shew'd themselves, and having so for a good while cheated the Enemy, on a sudden retire, and out of a back Port, follow full speed after their Fellows; The Consul finding their Camp so still, and that even those few he saw in the Morning did now disappear, sending first two Troopers to discover how the case stood, and they bringing word, that all was safe, march'd into their Camp with his Army, but staid no longer than whilst the Souldiers ranlackt it, then sounded a Retreat, and long before night return'd to his own Camp; next Morning by break of day, following the Enemy by the track and report of the Country, making swift and large marches, came up with them not far from Venusia; there too, they had a scuffling Skirmish, and above two thousand Carthaginians slain, who afterwards marching only by night and cross the Mountains to avoid fighting, went to Metapont; whence he sent Hanno the Governour of that City with a small Party to levy Forces amongst the Bruttians, and having thereby, and with Forces out of that Garrison recruited his Army, returns to Venusia the same way he went, and from thence to Cannusium. Nero fail'd not all this while to dog him at heels, and as he march'd toward Metapont, had sent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucans Country, that those parts might be without a Guard.

XLV. Whilst this was doing, four French Troopers and two Numidians, sent to Annibal with Letters from Asdrubal, after he was dislodg'd from the ineffectual Siege of Placentia, travelling through the midst of Enemies almost the whole length of Italy, as they were following lowing Annibal in his Retreat from Metapont, miss'd their way, and lighted upon Tarentum, where by the Roman Foragers ranging in the Fields, they were taken and brought before Q. Claudius the Proprætor; whom first they entertain'd with slim flams and intricate Answers, but being brought to the Rack, confess'd, That they were carrying Letters from Asdrubal to Annibal; with which Letters, sealed as they were, he sent them under the Guard of L. Virginus and two Troops of Samnite Horse, unto the Consul Claudius; who having caused the Letters to be read, and the Bearers examined, began to think with himself, That this was not a time wherein the ordinary methods of Conduct, and each mans asking precisely in his own Province, and with one certain Enemy, would be for the service of the Commonwealth, That some new unthought of, unprovided against Exploit was boldly to be attempted, which when first undertook should startle and affright his own Citizens no less than the Enemy, but being once happily achiev'd, would turn their fears into excessive transports of joy. Sending Asdrubals Letters to the Senate, he by the same Express, acquaints them what he was resolv'd to do, and withal advises them, That since Asdrubal writes to his Brother to meet him in Umbria, and with that City-Army oppose the Enemy at Narnia. Having wrote thus to the Senate, and sent Orders before through the Territories of the Larinates, Marrucines, Frentanes and Præutians (which was the way he intended to march) that they should out of their Towns and the Country round, provide Victuals, Horses, Carts, and all other accommodations, and have them in readines; he out of all his Forces, both Romans and Allies, picks out six thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, the very flower and strength of the whole Army, and he came at in the Lucans Country; so setting out by night, he wheel'd about into Picenum, and with all the speed imaginable, marches directly towards his Colleague, having left the Command of his Camp to Q. Cælius his Lieutenant.

In the mean time they at Rome were in no less fear and bustle, than they were two years ago, when the Carthaginian Camp lay before their Walls. Nor could they tell what to make of this odd and bold Adventure of the Consul, whether they should praise or condemn it, so that it was plain they would measure and esteem of it by the Event, which is the unjustest thing in the World. But thus they whisper'd, That the Camp depriv'd of all its most gallant men, was left as it were in the Jaws of Annibal, without a General; That the Consul pretending an Expedition into the Lucans Country, was indeed gone they knew not whether towards Picenum and Gallia, leaving his Camp no other security in the World, but the Enemies mistake, and not knowing that the General and best part of the Army were absent. But what will be the consequence if this be discover'd? And Annibal shall with his whole Army follow Nero, who is gone out but with six thousand Souldiers? or shall assault the Camp left as it were a prey, without strength, without Conduct, and without any body that had power to take the Auspices [without which they were not to fight or attempt any matter of moment, and the same could only be done by some Chief Magistrate.] The old defeats receiv'd in this War, the fresh remembrance of two Consuls slain but last year, increased peoples fears, and so much the more, because when all those disasters happen'd, the Enemy had but one Army, one General in Italy, but now of one Carthaginian War there are become two, two vast Armies, and as good as two Annibals in Italy; For Asdrubal was the Son of the same Father Amilcar, and every way as grand a Captain, having for so many years together been us'd to fight with the Romans in Spain, and famous for two Signal Victories, wherein two whole Armies, with their most renowned Generals, were cut to pieces. Nay in some respects he may be said to be superiour to Annibal; for the speed of his Journey out of Spain, and raising the people of France to assist him, he may boast that he hath exceeded his Brother, having rais'd an Army in those very places where the other lost the greater part of his Souldiers with hunger and cold, than which there is no kind of death more miserable; To all this, they that were skill'd in the affairs of Spain, added, That he had not now to deal with an unknown General, but with C. Nero, the very same Nero whom he bubbled and made a very Baby of heretofore, when being by chance beset in a place of disadvantage he fool'd him with a pretence of making Articles of Peace, till he had privately got away his Army; To conclude, in all the Discourses at Rome, they magnified every thing on the Enemies part beyond truth, and as much too much lessen'd their own, the natural effect of their fear, which evermore interprets all things for the worst.

Nero being got so far off Annibal, and forwards on his way, that he thought he might with safety divulge his design, makes this short Speech to his Souldiers, Never did any General venture upon an Enterprize that could seem more bold and dangerous, than this of mine, and yet in truth there is nothing more safe; I lead you, Gentlemen! to certain and assured Victory, even to that War, which my Fellow Consul manages, and did not set forwards unto, until he was furnish'd by the Senate with Forces both Horse and Foot to his own hearts content, more in number and better provided than if he had gone against Annibal himself; now you bringing so considerable an addition of strength, must needs, altogether, over-power the Enemy; for when 'tis heard when we draw out into the Field (for I'll take care it shall not be known before) that the other Consul, and the other Army is come in, it must undoubtedly give us a Victory; Fame and reputation are all in all in War, and small matters many times do wonders by making impressions on mens passions of hope or fear. The whole whole Glory almost of the Success will fall to your share; for 'tis always seen, that any assistance that comes in last, though never so small, is thought to have influenced the whole Action, and that without them it had not succeeded. And you see with what concurrence, admiration, and affectionate favour all people do entertain and regard you by the way, an assured good Omen to our present Expedition. And indeed vast multitudes both of men and women flock'd every way out of the Fields and Villages to behold them, and ran along between their Ranks and Files, at once making Vows for their Success, and praying for, and applauding them, calling them, the Life-guard of the Commonwealth, the brave Defenders of Rome and its Empire, in whose hands and arms were repositd the Safety and Liberties of them and their Children; and therefore they besought all the Gods and Goddesses to give them a lucky March, a prosperous Battel, and a timely Victory over their Enemies, that themselves might quickly be obliged to pay their Vows, and that as now they followed them with minds solicitous for their safety, they might in few days come forth to meet them with joyful hearts as they returned in Triumph for their Victory: Then would every one invite, offer, and importunately beg of them to accept of him rather than any body else, what they need for themselves or their Horses, as being ready most frankly to part with any thing to those that must defend and preserve every thing they had. On the other side, the Souldiers were as modest as they were liberal, would take nothing but what was absolutely necessary. Nor would they stay a jot with any, nor flinch from their Colours, but eat their Victuals as they went, and march'd night and day, allowing themselves scarce so much sleep as would support Nature. When they drew somewhat near the other Army, Nero sent Messengers before to his Colleague to acquaint him of his coming, and to know whether he would have them come openly or privately, by day or by night, and whether into his Camp, or quarter by themselves?

XLVIII. Livius thought it most convenient, that they should come privately by night up to his Camp, where he had given a Watch-word and Command, That every Colonel should take a Colonel into his Tent, every Centurion a Centurion, each Cavalier a Horseman, and so of the Foot; for by no means would they have the Camp enlarged, that the Enemy might not perceive the other Consuls Arrival, and they could make the better shift to pig in one with another in this strait compass, because Claudius's Army had little Baggage, bringing with them in this Expedition, nothing almost but their Arms. But in their March their number was considerably increased by Volunteers, both old Souldiers that had served out their ten years in the Wars, and so had been discharged, and lusty Youths of whom multitudes offered themselves, but he would list none but such as were of strong bodies and like to do good Service. The place where Livius lay encamped was near Sena, and Asdrubal's Tents not much above half a mile off; therefore Nero being now pretty near rested, and lay close till night in the Mountains, and then with great silence came and were kindly received and welcom'd every one into the Tents of those of his own Rank and Quality. The next day a Council of War was held, where also was present L. Porcius Licinus the Prætor, who lay encamped hard by the Consul, and before their coming, what by seizing of Passes, and what by frequent Skirmishes, and falling sometimes on the Enemies Rear, and by and by goring them in the Flanks, had done very good Service. Many of the Commanders were of opinion to put off a Battel for a while as well that Nero might rest and refresh his men, who were wearied with so tedious a March, and want of sleep, as that himself might in the mean time be better acquainted with the Nature of the Enemy. But Nero not only advised, but with all earnestness intreated, That since the celerity of his March had made his design safe and easie, they would not by delays render it rash and dangerous: at present Annibal, by reason of his mistake (which yet they must not think would always continue) lay secure and quiet without either attempting his Camp, which he had left without a General, or offering to follow him; and before he should stir, Asdrubal's Army might be cut to pieces, and he himself be returned into Apulia; whoever by deferring, gives the Enemies respite, does as much as in him lies, betray that Camp to Annibal, and open him a way to come into Gallia at his pleasure and join Asdrubal: Therefore presently the Signal must be, the Army immediately drawn into the Field, and use made of this mistake of the Enemies as well absent as present, whilst they neither know that they have to do with fewer; nor these, that they are to encounter more than formerly. These Reasons prevailed, the Council broke up, and presently they draw out into the Field.

XLIX. The Enemy likewise were quickly ranged in good Order before their Camp, but that which delay'd the Battel, was that Asdrubal advancing with a small Party of Horse before the Ensigns, to take a view of the Enemy, happen'd to observe amongst them a great many old Targets which he had never seen before, and Horses more lank and lean than formerly, besides they seem'd to be more in number. Hereupon suspecting, that which was indeed, in haste he sounds a Retreat, and sent out some to the River where they had their water, to see if they could catch any of them, or at least to take notice, whether they were swarthy and Sun-burnt more than ordinary, as having been travelling lately. Likewise he order'd a View to be taken at a distance of their Camp, whether the Rampier were any where enlarged, and to listen attentively whether they could hear one or two Trumpets sound in their Camp; who bringing back an Account of all these Circumstances, the Camps not being enlarged, was a thing that continued their mistake. For they were still but two, just as they were were formerly, one of M. Livius, the other of L. Porcius, and the Rampiers or Trenches of either not set out one jot further in any place. But that which sway'd most with Asdrubal, as being an ancient experienced General, and well acquainted with the Roman Customs, one Trumpet in the Prætors Camp, but two in the Consuls: whence he concluded, That undoubtedly both Consuls were there, but how the other of them should get away from Annibal, sorely troubled his mind, for he could not imagine that which was the truth of the Case, viz. That Annibal should be trickt in a matter of such moment, as to be ignorant what was become of that General, and that Army, whose Camp was held within view of his own; Therefore he concluded, That he must by some unusual and mighty overthrow be disabled to follow him; and was greatly afraid that himself was come with help too late when their affairs were grown desperate; and that the Romans were courted by the same good Fortune in Italy as in Spain; and sometimes again, he thought his Letters might not come to his Brothers hands, but that the Consul might intercept them, and so halt to prevent, and cut him off by the way. Not a little perplext with these various thoughts, he puts out all the Fires, and commanded all his Souldiers, without noise, to get together their Baggage and be ready to march, on a Signal given, at the first Watch; But in that consternation and hurry in the dark, two Fellows whom they had for their Guides, being not carefully lookt after, gave them the slip, one running into a lurking hole, which he had a good while had in his Eye, the other being well acquainted with the shallows of the River Metaurus waded over, so that the Army deserted by their Guides was forc'd to march at random through the Fields, and divers of them weary and sleepy with watching, laid them down here and there, and left their Colours with very few Souldiers about them; Asdrubal commanded them to follow the River and march on its Banks till the day should shew them the Road; but going thus by the windings and turnings of the stream they ridded but little ground, and when in the morning they endeavour'd to get over, they could find no place convenient, for the further they went upwards off from the Sea, the higher were the Banks, which straitning the River made it deeper though narrower than it was lower, so that spending all the day thus unfortunately he gave the Enemy opportunity to pursue him.

First Nero with all the Cavalry came up, then Porcius with the Light arm'd Foot, who on all sides playing upon Asdrubal's Forces, already weary and disheartned, oblig'd them to quit their march, which was no better than a Chace, and to endeavour to encamp themselves on an high Bank just by the River side; but then Livius was come up with all the rest of the Infantry, not in the usual posture of a march, but ready arm'd and in good order; when they were all join'd and arrang'd in Battalia, Claudius had charge of the Right Wing, Livy of the Left, and the Prætor of the main Battel. Asdrubal seeing there was no avoiding but fight he must, left off fortifying the place for a Camp, and put himself in order as fast as they; in the middle of his Front and before the Standards he plac'd his Elephants, next them in the left Wing were his French men to oppose Claudius, not that he trusted so much to them as that he thought the Enemy would be afraid of them, himself in person on the Right Wing with a body of Spaniards (in whom, and his old Souldiers, he reposed his greatest hopes) resolv'd to confront Livius; the Ligurians were behind the Elephants in the middle, but the Battel was rather drawn out in length than breadth: The French men were defended by an Hill that bore out over them. The Spaniards Front was over against the Romans left Wing, and all the right hand Battalions were as it were out of the Battel and did nothing, for by reason of the Hill they could neither a Front, nor a Flank charge the Enemy; Between Livius and Asdrubal was begun a mighty Conflict with great and dreadful slaughter on each side; There were the two Generals, there the best part of the Romans Foot and Horse, there were the Spaniards experienc'd Souldiers, and wonted to cope with the Romans, and there too were the Ligurians, an hardy and Warlike people; thither too the Elephants were turn'd, who at first disorder'd the Front, and made the Standards retreat; but the Battel then growing more fierce, and the clamours louder, they would no longer be rul'd by their Riders, but run up and down the two Armies like Ships without a Steersman, so that you could not tell to which side they belong'd. On the other hand Claudius, seeing with all their efforts his men could not gain the Hill that was against them; Cries out, And did we march such a tedious way, and in such haste to do just nothing at all? Saying which words, he detach'd some Regiments, and wheel'd about behind the whole Army, and unexpectedly not only to the Enemy, but to those of his own Party; charges the Enemy on the Enemies left Flank, and was so nimble, that presently after they appear'd on one side, some of them were got behind them; so that the poor Spaniards and Ligurians were slaughter'd on all sides, Front, Flank and Rear, and the Execution was come up to the French: but there was no resistance worth speaking of, for a great part of them had before deserted their Colours, running away in the night, or lying asleep under the Hedges, and those that were present being wearied with marching and watching (for of all people they can least endure toil) they were scarce able to bear their Arms on their shoulders, and

besides it was about Noon, and what for heat and thirst they stood panting and could do nothing, but tamely yielded their Bodies to be cut to pieces, or taken Prisoners.

LI. There were more Elephants kill'd by their Governours themselves than by the Enemy; for their manner was to have about them a Carpenters Chizzel and a Mallet, and when the Beasts happen'd to rage and turn upon their own Troops, their Masters would set the said Chizzel between their Ears, just at the joint where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and drive it in with all their force, which was found the speediest way to kill so huge a Beast when he would be manag'd no longer; The first practiser thereof being Asdrubal, who as he had in sundry Engagements shew'd himself a brave Commander, so never did he give more signal proofs thereof than in this very Battel; He it was that kept up the Battel so long on his side, both by encouraging his men that fought, and exposing himself to all dangers as freely as the meanest Souldier. He it was that sometimes by entreaties, and sometimes smart rebukes, incens'd those that were weary and given out, to make fresh charges on the Enemy; He it was that stop't those that fled, and by rallying them, renew'd the Fight in several places, where the work seem'd altogether done; and at the very last, when he saw evidently that the Enemy had the honour of the day, and his misfortune beyond retrieve, resolving not to survive the defeat of that Army, which chiefly follow'd his Standards upon the reputation of his name, he spur'd on his Horse into the thickest of one of the Roman Regiments, and there, as became the Son of Amilcar, and the Brother of Annibal, gallantly fighting against a multitude he was slain. In all the whole War never was there at one Field so many of the Enemy slain, and the overthrow at Canna was repaid them to the full, whether we consider the loss of the General, or of the Army. Six and fifty thousand of them kill'd, five thousand four hundred taken, besides a great booty of all sorts, and a considerable quantity both of gold and silver; above four thousand Romans that were Prisoners with the Enemy, recovered, which made some amends for those lost that day, for 'twas not an unbloody Victory, here being almost eight thousand of the Romans and their Allies, who there lost their Lives. And so little stomach had the Conquerours to more blood and slaughter, that next day when it was told the Consul Livius, that abundance of Cisalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, who either were not present at the fight, or fled from thence, were going together in a Troop homewards, without any certain Commander, without Ensigns or any kind of order, so that if he would but send a Party of Horse after them, he might cut them every one to pieces: he replied, No, No, Let some survive to carry abroad the News both of the Enemies Defeat and our Valour.

LII. Nero the very same night after the fight drew out his Party, and with more Expedition than he came, return'd to his own Leaguer, where in six dayes time he arriv'd, being nothing so much reforted to as before, because he was so quick, that no Messengers were before him to tell the news, but wherever he came the people were almost out of their senses for Joy; As for Rome, it cannot be express'd how strangely people were affected, both one way and the other, how dumpish the whole City was, whilst in doubtful expectation, and with what transports they receiv'd the tidings of the Victory. Ever since they heard of Claudius's march, from Morning till Night, were all the Senators in the Council-Chamber, and with the Magistrates, and the Forum always fill'd with people; The Ladies and good Wives because they could assist no way but by their Vows and their Prayers, spent all their time in running from one Shrine to another, and wearied the Gods with their Supplications. Whilst the City was in this suspense and perplexity, there was spread at first an uncertain rumour, That two Narnian Troopers were come into the Camp which lay against the passages into Umbria, from the Consuls Army, and brought word, That the Enemy was routed; But this was rather heard than believ'd, for not only the news was so great and joyful, that their minds were not yet enlarg'd enough to receive it, so the suddenness made it incredible, for the same story related, That the fight was two days, and they could not think Claudius could be got thither so soon. Presently after an Express from L. Manlius Acidinus confirm'd the Report; which Letters being brought through the Forum to the Prætors Tribunal, and the Lords of the Senate sent for, the people did so throng about the Door, that the Messenger could not get along for the Crowd, bawling out, That the Letters should be read at the Market-Cross from the Rostra, before they were carried to the Senate; but at last being driven away and quieted by the Magistrates, who had much ado to appease their unruly Joy. The Letters were read first in the Senate, and then in the Common-Hall, and entertain'd according to every ones humour, some being therewith fully satisfied, but others would believe nothing till they had an Express and Letters from the Consuls themselves.

LIII. After this, they heard that such Messengers were coming, and presently the people of all sorts, young and old, ran out to meet them, every one desiring to be the first that heard the certainty of such glad Tidings; All the Road as the Bridge Milvius was fill'd with a continual crowd; The Messengers were L. Veturius Philo, P. Licinius Varus, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, who attended with this multitude, came into the Forum, some demanding of them, them, others of their Attendants, What News? All were answer'd, That the Enemies Army was cut to pieces, their General slain, the Roman Legions brave and lusty, both the Consuls safe and well; Then presently did every one impart the news to others; much ado they had to get to the Senate House; and more, to keep out the Rabble. After the Letters had been there read, the Messengers were brought to the Common-Hall, where after the Letters were again read, L. Veturius declar'd at large by word of mouth the circumstances of the whole Action; which was concluded with a general shout of the whole Audience; Then away went some to the Temples of the Gods to return thanks and pay their Vows, others home to cheer their Wives and Children with the happy tidings: The Senate pass'd an Act, That since M. Livius and Claudius the Consuls had with the safety of the Legions vanquish'd and slain the Enemies Forces and their General, there should be held a solemn Procession or Thanksgiving for three dayes together; which was Proclaim'd by C. Hostilius the Prætor, and Celebrated both by Men and Women; All the Temples throughout the City were all the three dayes equally throng'd, and the Matrons and their Children most richly drest, as if they now had nothing more to fear, or the War had been wholly ended, return'd Thanks to the Immortal Gods. Nay this Victory chang'd the state of the City, so as from that day forward men durst make Contracts, buy and sell, borrow and lend, and pay Debts to their Creditors as freely as in a time of settled Peace. C. Claudius the Consul as soon as he return'd to his Camp, caus'd Asdrubals Head, which he had carefully brought with him, to be slung before the Enemies Out-Guards, and the African Prisoners to be shew'd them in their Chains; and two of them were let go to tell Annibal the story of their overthrow; who upon this double loss and mournful Calamity, both to his Country and Family, fetcht a deep sigh (as 'tis reported) and said, Ah, I see, I see what will be the Fate of Carthage! and presently dislodging, that he might call his Auxiliaries together, whom spread at large he could not defend, he retired into the Bruttians Country, the furthestmost Corner of Italy, and took with him thither all the Inhabitants of Metapont, and as many of the Lucanians as were under his power.

A PADUAN,

From the Building of Rome to his Time.

DECADE III. BOOK VIII.

The Epitome of the 8th Book.

1. 2, &c. Things done successfully in Spain by Silanus, Scipio's Lieutenant, and by L. Scipio his Brother against the Carthaginians. 5, &c. By Sulpicius the Proconsul, and Attalus a King of Asia against Philip King of Macedonia, upon the account of the Aetolians. 9. A Triumph being decreed for M. Livius and Claudius Nero the Consuls; Livius, who had done all his exploits in his own Province, was carried in a Chariot with four Horses; whilst Nero, who came into his Colleagues Province, to assist him in the accomplishing of his Victory, followed on Horseback, gaining more glory and reverence in that guise; for he had done more service in the War than Livius his Colleague had. 11. The fire in the Temple of Vesta, through the negligence of a Virgin that did not look after it, went out; for which the Virgin was whipt with a Rod. 14. 15, &c. P. Scipio made an end of the War in Spain with the Carthaginians the fifteenth Year after the War began, and the fifth after he went thither: and having totally excluded the Enemy from the possession of Spain, retook it. Then being carried over from Tarraco into Africa, to Syphax King of Numidia, he and his retinue in two Ships, he made a League with that Crown. 18. Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo lay with him there at a feast upon the same bed. 21. He gave new Carthage an entertainment of Fencing in honour of his Father and his Uncle, not by professed Fencers, but such as either out of respect to their General, or by way of Challenge, enter the Lists; in which, Regulus's Brother fought for the Kingdom. 22. When the City Astapa was besieged by the Romans, the Towns People, building a Funeral Pile of Wood, kill'd their Wives and Children, and threw themselves also headlong into it. 24. Scipio himself, who had been taken with a grievous Distemper, as soon as he recovered, appar'd a Sedition raised in some part of the Army, and forced the Rebelling Nations of Spain to a surrender. 35, &c. There was a Peace also made with Massinissa King of Numidia, who promised him assistance if he came over into Africa; and likewise with the Gaditanes, after the departure of Mago thence, to whom he wrote from Carthage, that he should go into Italy. 38. He returned to Rome, and was made Consul. 40. He stood for the Province of Africa, but Q. Fabius Maximus opposing of him, had Sicily given him, with a permission to go over into Africa, if he thought it for the good of the Commonwealth. 46. Mago the Son of Amilcar crost over from the lesser Balearian Island [called Minorca] where he had wintered, into Italy.

Although upon Asdrubal's coming over, the scale of Fortune seemed as much elevated for the benefit of Spain, as depress'd to the disadvantage of Italy; yet a War, just like the former, on a suddain broke out again in that Country. Now the Romans and the Carthaginians at that time were thus in Spain circumstantiated. Asdrubal Son of Gisgo was gone as far as the Ocean, and Gades, whilst the Coast of the Mediterranean, and almost all Spain to the Eastward, was Scipio's, and subject to the Romans. The new General Hanno, who succeeded in the room of Barchinus Asdrubal, coming over with a new Army out of Africa, and joyning Mago, when he had, in a short time, raised a great number of Men in Celtiberia, which lies between the two Seas, Scipio sent M. Silanus to oppose him, with ten thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Silanus making as great Marches as he was able (for roughness of the Roads, which were straitned with frequent Woods, as Spain generally is, was an hinderance to him) prevented not only the Messengers, but the very flying report of his coming, and by the help of Guides, that were Renegades out of the same Country of Celtiberia, came up to the Enemy. I find in the same Authors, that when they were about ten thousand Paces from the Foe, there were two Camps hard by the way, where they marched; on the left hand, the Celtiberi, a new Army of above nine thousand Men; and on the right hand, the Camp of the Carthaginians. The latter latter of which were guarded and secured with Men and Sentinels, according to the best method that Soldiers use, though the former lay neglected and regardless, as belonging to Barbarians and fresh-water Soldiers, that had not so much fear upon them, because they were in their own Country. Wherefore Silanus, thinking it his best course to attack them first, commanded his Ensignes to be born as much to the left hand as was possible, without being discovered by the Carthaginians, whilst he himself, having sent his Scouts before, charged up to the Foe as fast as he could.

II. He was about three thousand Paces from them, before scarce any of the Enemy perceived his approach; for they lay upon Hills that were craggy rough places, whilst he in an hollow Vale, which by being so lay out of sight, ordered his Men to sit down and refresh themselves. In the mean time the Scouts returned, confirming what the Renegadoes had said. Then putting their Baggage all in an heap together, the Romans took up their Arms, and marched all in Battalia to the Fight. They were a thousand Paces from the Foe, when they first got sight of them; at which the Carthaginians began on a sudden to tremble. Mago galloped out of the Camp upon the first noise and tumult that he heard. Now there were in the Celtiberian Army four thousand Shield-Men, and two hundred Horse, which compleat Legion (for about that strength it had) he placed in the front, putting the rest, who were light-armed Men, in the rear. As he led them in this manner out of the Camp, the Romans threw their Javelins at them before they were well got out of the Vale. The Spaniards swooped down at the Weapons which were thrown by the Foe, and then rose up again to sling them back again; which the Romans receiving (as they use) upon their Shields, that were joyned together at their close order, they came by that means Foot to Foot, and began to fight with their Swords. As to the roughness of the place, though it made the swiftness of the Celtiberians (whose way it was to run as they fought) of no use to them, was no great disadvantage to the Romans, for they all were accustomed to a standing fort of fighting; save that the straitness of it, and the brambles that grew there, broke their ranks, so that they were forced to engage one to one, or two to two as in a Duel. That therefore which hindered the Enemies flight, was at the same time the occasion of their being slaughtered as easily as if they had been bound hand and foot. And now, when almost all the Shield-Men of the Celtiberians were killed, the light-armed Men and Carthaginians, who came to their assistance from the other Camp, were smitten and slain; not above two thousand Foot, and all the Horse, who had scarce yet entered into the Battel, escaped with Mago, whilst Hanno the other General, with them who came last when the fight was over, was taken alive; almost all the Horse, and all the old Foot that were left, following Mago, came the tenth day to Asdrubal in the Province of Gades. The Celtiberian new Souldiers getting into the adjacent Woods, fled thence to their own homes. By this very seasonable Victory they did not gain near so much by ending that present War, as by stifling the cause of a future, which was so likely to ensue, if the Carthaginians could have persuaded the other Nations to take up Arms as they had done the Celtiberians. Wherefore, when he had commended Silanus in very kind expressions, Scipio having some hopes of putting an end to the War, if he did not frustrate it himself by delays, went, to finish what remained thereof, into the farthest part of Spain against Asdrubal. The Carthaginian therefore having his Camp in Betica, in order to keep the minds of his Allies to their Allegiance, immediately took up his Ensigns, and more like a Flight than a March, led his Men to the Ocean and to Gades: But then imagining, that as long as he kept his whole Army close together, he should be exposed as a large mark for the Romans to aim at; before he passed the Strait to go to Gades, he dispersed his Soldiers all about into the several Cities, that they might defend themselves within the Walls, and the Walls also with their Arms.

III. Scipio observing the War was dissipated all over the Country, and that to carry his Men to the several Cities, would be a tedious rather than a great task, marched back again; yet lest he should leave that Region free to the Enemy, he sent L. Scipio his Brother, with ten thousand Foot and a thousand Horse, to attack the most opulent City in those Parts, which the Barbarians call Oringin; which City is situate in the Confines of the Melessians, a Spanish People, whose Country is very fruitful, though the Inhabitants digg Silver there too. That was Asdrubal's head Quarters, from whence he made excursions round about upon the inland People. Scipio having pitched his Camp near that City, before he invested it with any works, sent certain Messengers to the Gates, to try at that small distance how the Inhabitants stood affected, and to persuade them to make experiment rather of the friendship than the force of the Romans; but having no peaceful answer, he enclosed the City with a Trench and a double Bulwark, dividing his Army into three parts, with a design that one part should be continually making their assault, whilst the other lay still in the mean time. When the first part began to attack it, the Fight was very bloody and doubtful, for they could not easily come near to make use of their scaling Ladders, for the Darts that fell upon them from the Walls: And now those who had set their Ladders up against the Walls, were some of them thrust down with Forks made on purpose, whilst others were laid hold on with Iron Hooks, and were in danger to be by them plucked up to the top. Which when Scipio perceived, and that the Battel was now pretty equal through the smallness of his numbers; yea, that the Foe was too hard for him, as fighting from the Wall, he made the first party retire, and fell on with the other two at once; which thing put the Enemy (who were already tired with fighting with the first) into such a fright, that not only the Towns People forsook the Walls and ran forthwith away, but the Carthaginian Garrison also, for fear the City should be betrayed, quitting their station, betook themselves into one certain place. That made the Towns People the more afraid, that if the Enemy should once get into the Town, they should be all killed as fast as they came to hand, without any distinction or question whether they were Carthaginians or Spaniards: Wherefore straight opening the Gate, they ran in great numbers out of the Town, holding their Shields before them, lest any Darts might be thrown at a distance upon them, but holding out their right hands naked, that the Romans might see they had thrown away their Swords. Whether the Romans did not perceive that by reason of the distance between them, or whether they suspected some ill design to be in it: I cannot tell; but this is certain, they fell upon those that were coming out, and killed them as an opposite Army, carrying their victorious Ensigns in at the same Gate. In other parts also they cut and broke the Gates open with Axes and Hatchets, whilst every Horseman as he came in, went (according to order) directly to take possession of the Forum [or Market-place.] The Horse had a party of Triarii assistant to them; and though the Legionary Soldiers went through the other parts of the Town, yet they abstained from pillaging any Man that they met, except such as defended themselves with Arms. The Carthaginians were all committed to Prison, with about three hundred Towns-Men who had shut the Gates; the rest had the Town at command, and their Goods restored to them. There fell at the Siege of that Town about two thousand of the Enemy, but not above ninety Romans.

The taking of that City, was not only happy for them that were employed in it, but made their arrival look very glorious to the General and the rest of the Army, when they came with such a multitude of Captives before them. Scipio therefore having commended his Brother, and with as much Rhetorick as he was able, compared the taking of Oringin by him, with the taking of Carthage by himself, because the Winter was now at hand, being neither able to attempt Gades, nor follow Asdrubal's Army, which was so scatter'd all over the Country, led his Army back into the hither Spain, where sending the Legions into Winter Quarters, and his Brother Lucius Scipio, with Hanno the Enemies General, and the other noble Captives, to Rome, himself went to Tarraco. The same Year the Roman Navy, sent over by M. Valerius Lavinus the Proconsul, out of Sicily into Africa, did a great deal of spoil in the Country about Utica and Carthage, driving the Cattel away out of the utmost bounds of the Carthaginians about the very Walls of Utica. As they went back to Sicily, the Carthaginian Navy (consisting of seventy long Ships) met them, of whom seventeen Ships were taken and four sunk, the rest being routed and put to flight. The Romans being thus victorious both by Land and Sea, sailed toward Lilybeum with a great Booty of all forts; and then having cleared the whole Sea of the Enemies Ships, they carried great quantities of Corn to Rome.

V. In the beginning of that Summer, when these things were performed, P. Sulpitius the Proconsul, and King Attalus having Wintered at Ægina (as I told you before) they sailed from thence to Lemnus with their Navies joyned together; the Romans being five and twenty Gallies with five banks of Oars a-piece, and the Kings five and thirty. Then Philip, that (whether he must meet the Enemy by Land or Sea) he might be ready upon all occasions, went in Person to Demetrias, a City lying upon the Sea Coast, and appointed his Army to meet him upon such a day at Larissa. Thereupon there were Embassadors sent from his Allies all round about, as soon as they heard the King was come to Demetrias; for the Ætolians were grown more haughty, not only upon the score of their alliance with the Romans, but also in regard that Attalus was arrived, and pillaged all their Neighbours. Nor were the Acarnians only, and the Bœotians, with those that live in Eubœa, in great fear, but the Acheans also; whom (besides the Ætolian War) Machanidas King of Lacedemon, by pitching his Camp a great way from the Argive Confines, put into a great fright. All these therefore, considering what dangers hung over each of their Cities both by Land and Sea, desired the Kings assistance. Nor were the News from his own Kingdom relating to Peace, there being a report, That Serdiletus and Pleuratus were in an uproar, and that the Medes above all the rest of Thracia, were like to invade the neighbouring parts of Macedonia, if the King were detain'd in any foreign War. The Bœotians indeed themselves, and the inner Nations of Greece, had sent word that the Ætolians had block'd up the avenue of Thermopylae, where the narrow Pass so streightens the way, to hinder Philip from going to defend his Allies Towns. So many tumults round about him were enough to rouse even a slothful General; wherefore he, dismissing the Embassies, promised them, That as time and opportunity should serve, he would assist them every one; but for the present, would have them mind what was most necessary. Thereupon a supply was sent to the City, from whence word was brought, That Attalus coming over from Lemnus with his Navy, had pillaged all the Country round every City. Wherefore he sent Polyphantus with a small party into Bœotia, and Menippus, one of the Kings Captains, with a thousand Targeteers (whose Targets were like half Moons) to

Chalcis;

Chalcis. To whom he added also five hundred Ænians, that they might be able to defend all parts of the Island. He himself went to Scotussa, to which place he ordered the Macedonian Forces should be brought from Larissa: There he was told, That the *Ætoli*ans were to have an Assembly at Heraclea, and that King Attalus would come thither to consult about the great affairs of the War. To disturb their meeting by his sudden arrival, he marched to Heraclea as fast as he could; but coming thither after the Assembly was dismissed, he only destroyed the Corn (especially in the Ænian Bay) which was almost ripe, and so led his Army back to Scotussa; and there leaving all his Army behind, he marched with a Royal Party to Demetrias: from whence, that he might be ready for the Enemy at every turn, he sent certain Persons into Eubœa, Phocis and Peparethus, to choose out such high Places, from which Beacons or Fires might be well seen. He himself, in the mean time, set up a Watch-Tower in Tislaus (which is an extraordinary high Mountain) that by the help of those Fires in the air, at a good distance, he might discover in a moment what the Enemy did. Mean while the Roman General and King Attalus, came over from Peparethus to Nicaa, from whence they sent the Navy into Eubœa, to a City call'd Oreum, which as you go from the Demetrian Bay to Chalcis and Euripus, is the first City in Eubœa on your left hand. Now Attalus and Sulpitius were agreed, That the Romans should attack it by Sea, and the Kings men from the Land.

VI. Four Days after the Navy arriv'd, they set upon the City, having spent all that time in private Conferences with Plator, whom Philip had made Governour of that Place. The City has two Forts, one lying to the Sea, the other in the middle of the Town; from thence there is a Mine down to the Sea, to which a Tower of five stories high affords a great Blockade; there it was that they had the first bloody bout, the Tower being filled with all sorts of Weapons on the one side, and Warlike Engines prepared and fixed to attack it on the other. That fight therefore having drawn all Peoples thoughts and eyes towards it, Plator that while let the Romans in at the Gate of the Castle which lay upon the Sea, which was taken in a moment. The Towns People being driven thence, made to the other Fort that was in the middle of the Town, but were kept out by certain Persons set there to keep the Gate; by which means, being excluded, they were slain and taken in the street. But the Macedonian party stood altogether under the Castle Wall, without either running away, or fighting very stoutly; then Plator (having got leave of Sulpitius) set ashore at Demetrias a Town in Phthiotis, going himself to Attalus. Sulpitius being proud of his success at Oreum, goes presently with his victorious Army to Chalcis, where the event did not answer his expectations. For there is a place where out of the wide Sea you come into a straight Gulph, which at first sight looks like two Ports lying several ways, but it is a most mischievous Harbour for a Navy to ride in: For, not only sudden and stormy Winds come down from the high Mountains on both Shoars, or the streight of Euripus reciprocates at certain times (not seven times a Day as the report goes) but a rowling torrent comes down, as from a steep Mountain, along the Sea, which is turned to and fro, like the Wind, at no certainty; by which means, the Ships have no rest either Night or Day. Nor was the Navy only got into such a dangerous place, but the Town also was encompassed on one side with the Sea, on the other from the Land with good Fortifications, and a strong Guard, but most secure and impregnable in the fidelity of its Governours and head Men, which had been wavering and false at Oreum. This one thing therefore he did very prudently, for the Romans (considering that he undertook the business so rashly) that weighing all difficulties, he, lest he should spend time to no purpose, immediately removed his Navy from thence over to Cymus in Locris (which is the Port of the Opuntians) a City situate a thousand Paces from the Sea.

VII. In the mean time Philip had notice from the Fires set up at Oreum, though too late, through the treachery of Plator, who retarded their being put into the Watch-Tower; but his Navy being too weak for the Enemy, he could not easily have access to the Island: And yet as soon as he received the summons to come and assist Chalcis, he march'd with all speed; for though Chalcis it self be a City belonging to the same Island, yet it is divided from it by such a narrow Sea, that it joyns to it by a Bridge, and is more accessible that way than by Water. Wherefore Philip, having defeated the Garrison, and routed the *Ætoli*ans, who had possession of the streight of Thermopylae, when he was come from Demetrias to Scotussa, as he did by the third Watch after he set out thence, and had forced the trembling Foe into Heraclea, himself went in one Day to Elatia in Phocis, which is from that place above sixty thousand Paces. About the same Day the City of Opus was taken and rifled by King Attalus; Sulpitius gave the King all that plunder, because Oreum had some Days before been sack'd by the Roman Souldiers, the Kings Men having no share in the booty. The Roman Navy was gone to Oreum, and Attalus not knowing of Philip's arrival, spent his time in exacting of money from the chief Men of the City; yea, so little foresight he had of the matter, that had not certain Cretenians by chance gone a good way from the City a foraging, and by that means spied a party of the Enemy at a distance, he might have been surpris'd. Attalus unarm'd and discompos'd made away as fast as possible to the Sea to his Ships, and Philip came up as they were putting off from the Land, affrighting the Seamen even from the

the shoar; thence he returned to Opus, accusing both the Gods and Men, that he had lost the fortune of such a considerable affair, which was snatcht almost even out of his eyes. He blamed the Opuntians too at the same time, for that, when they might have protracted the siege till his arrival, yet as soon as they saw the Enemy, they yielded to almost a voluntary surrender. Then having settled all matters about Opus, he marched to Torone. And Attalus went first to Oreum, where since there happened a report, That Prusias King of Bithynia was gone over into his Country, he omitting the Roman affairs, and quitting the Ætolian War, returned for Asia. Sulpitius also carried his Navy back to Ægina, whence in the beginning of the Spring he came; in the mean time Philip took Torone, with as much ease as Attalus had done Opus. That City was inhabited by Renegadoes that came from Thebes in Phthiotis; for when their City was taken by Philip, they made an Alliance with the *Ætoli*ans, who gave them that Seat, which was the remainder of a City waisted and laid desart by Philip in a former War. Then marching from Torone, which, as I said before, he had taken, he took Tritonon and Drymae, two small and pitiful Villages in Doris: Thence he came to Elatia, where he had ordered the Embassadors of Ptolomy and the Rhodians to expect him. And there, when they began to treat of putting an end to the Ætolian War (for thither came Embassadors from the late Council of the Romans and *Ætoli*ans held at Heraclea) news came, that Machanidas had resolved to set upon the Eleans as they were preparing for the Olympick Games: He therefore thinking that he ought to prevent that design, sent away the Embassadors with a courteous answer (saying, That he was neither the cause of that War, nor would be any hinderance (if upon just and honourable terms he might comply) to a peace) and marching with all speed through Boeotia, fell down as low as Megara, and from thence to Corinth; where having taken up Provisions, he went to Phlius and Pheneus: But when he was come to Ereæ, hearing that Machanidas, being affrighted at the noise of his arrival, was fled back to Lacedæmon, he marched to Ægium to the Council of the Acheans, which was there held, supposing that he should find the Carthaginian Navy there too, which he had sent for, to make himself able to do something by Sea. The Carthaginians were gone over some few Days before to Phocæa [Islands] and from thence into the Acarnanian Ports, when they heard that Attalus and the Romans were come to Oreum, as fearing lest their design was upon them, and they might be surpris'd in the Rhium, which is the very Mouth of the Corinthian Bay.

Philip was much vexed and dissatisfied, that though he made so much hast in all his expeditions, yet he met with nothing in time, but fortune seem'd to jilt his swiftness, by snatching all his success just out of his very eyes. Nevertheless, in the Council he dissembled his discontent, and spoke very courageously, calling both Gods and Men to witness, that he was never wanting (either in place or time, but wheresoever the Enemy was in Arms, thither he always went as fast as he possibly could, though no one could hardly tell, whether he made more hast to engage in a War, or the Enemy to run away from it; for so Attalus got from Opus, so Sulpitius from Chalcis, and so at that time Machanidas escaped out of his hands. But he said, that flight was not always successful; nor could that War be reckon'd difficult, in which, if you once engage with an Enemy, you overcome him. But that which was the greatest Argument, his security was, that he had the confession of his Enemies for it, that they were no ways equal to him; and that he should in a short time certainly gain a victory, so that they should not fight with him with any better event than they had hopes. The Allies were glad to hear the King say so; and then he restored Ereæ and Triphylia to the Acheans, and Alipheria to the Megalopolitans, who had sufficiently proved it to be theirs; then with some Ships that he had of the Acheans (which were three Gallies with four banks of Oars, and as many with two) he went over to Anticyra, where having gotten seven Gallies, and above twenty Barks, which he had sent into the Corinthian Bay to joyn the Carthaginian Navy, he went into Erythræ, a Town belonging to the *Ætoli*ans, near Eupalium, and there he landed. But the *Ætoli*ans were aware of his coming, for all the Men that were either in the Fields, or in the adjacent Castles of Potidania or Apollonia, fled into the Woods and Mountains; but the Cattle, which for hast could not be driven off, were taken and carried into the Ships. Having sent these and the rest of the booty, with Nicias Governour of the Acheans, to Ægium, he went to Corinth, and ordered his Foot-Forces to be led thence through Boeotia by Land, whilst he himself, sailing from Cenchrea along by Attica above Sunium, in the middle almost of the Enemies Navies, he came to Chalcis. There, having commended their fidelity, that neither hope nor fear had changed their resolutions, and exhorted them to remain as constant for the future in their alliance, if they desired to be in their present condition, rather than to undergo the fortune of the Oritans and Opuntians, he sailed from Chalcis to Oreum; where having committed the Government and keeping of the City to such of the Nobility, as chose rather to run away than surrender themselves to the Romans; he crossed over to Demetrias from Eubœa, whence he first came to assist his Allies. After which, having laid the keels or foundations of one hundred long Ships at Cassandra, and got together a great number of Ship-Carpenters to perfect that work, seeing not only that Attalus's going away, but the aid he himself gave to his then oppressed Allies, had made all things quiet in Greece, he went back into his own Kingdom to make War upon the Dardans.

IX. At the end of that Summer, when these things passed in Greece, Q. Fabius Maximus, who was sent Embassador from M. Livius the Consul, to the Senate at Rome, having brought word, That the Consul thought L. Porcius with his Legions a sufficient guard to the Province of Gallia, so that he might come thence, and the consular Army be brought away. The Senate ordered, not only M. Livius, but his Colleague, also C. Claudius, to return to the City; save that there was this one exception in the Decree, that M. Livius's Army should be brought away, and Nero's Legions, that opposed Annibal, should stay in the Province. Now between the Consuls there was this agreement, made by Letters; That as they had unanimously carried on the business, so, though they came out of several Countries, they should arrive at the City both on a day; and that he who came first to Præneste should stay there for his Colleague. It so happened that they came both to Præneste at the same time; from whence having sent the Edict before hand, that three Days after there must be a full Senate held at the Temple of Bellona, they approached near to the City, out of which the multitude ran in all haste to meet them: Nor did the rabble salute them all together, but each one for himself desiring to touch the Consuls Conquering Hands, some congratulated, and other gave them thanks, That by their means the Commonwealth was preserved. When they therefore having, as it is the custom for all Generals, told what they had done, had likewise required, that for their faithful service to the Commonwealth, not only the Gods might be honoured, but they also have the privilege to enter in Triumph into the City; to which the Senate made answer, That they would decree what they required, first upon account of the Gods, and secondly next to the Gods, on the score of the Consuls merits, they ordered, not only a supplication in both their Names, but a Triumph to both of them. In which affair, left they two, who had unanimously carried on the War, should be divided as to the Triumph, they made this agreement, That since M. Livius had done all his business in his own Province, and that day when the Battel was to be, 'twas his turn to observe the auspices and so begin the Battel; and that Livius's Army was brought to Rome, but Nero's could not stir out of the Province; that therefore M. Livius should enter the City upon a Chariot drawn by four Horses, with the Soldiers following of him, and C. Claudius should go in on Horse-back, without any Souldiers to attend him. The Triumph being thus concerted, as it augmented the glory of them both, so did it most encrease his fame, who yeilded as much to his Colleague in point of honour, as he outdid him in desert: For they said, That Man on Horse-back in six days time ran all the whole length of Italy, and engag'd with Asdrubal in Gallia the same day, that Annibal thought he had pitched his Camp against him in Apulia: By which means one Consul, for both parts of Italy, opposed on the one hand his policy, and on the other his Body, against two great Captains, against two great Commanders. That the name of Nero was enough to keep Annibal in his Camp; and what was the ruine of Asdrubal but his arrival? Wherefore the other Consul might go, if he would, enthroned upon a lofty Chariot with so many Horses, but a true Triumph was carried through the City upon one single Horse; and Nero, though he went on foot, would be renowned both for the glory that he gain'd in that War, and that he contemned in that Triumph. These discourses of the Spectators pursued Nero as far as the Capitol. They brought of Money into the Treasury three millions and eighty thousand Sesterces; M. Livius gave the Souldiers fifty six Asles a piece, and C. Claudius promised his absent men as much when he returned to the Army. It was observed that Day, the Soldiers cast forth more jocular Verses upon C. Claudius, than upon their own Consul: That the Horse commended L. Veturius and Q. Cecilius, two Lieutenants, very much; exhorting the Commons, To make them two Consuls for the next year. That the Consuls back'd the Horse-mens proposal, and the Day following in an Assembly, declared before the People what stout and faithful service those two Lieutenants especially had done them.

X. When the time of Assembly was now at hand, and it was ordered that the Assembly should be held by a Dictator, C. Claudius the Consul declared M. Livius his Colleague Dictator, and Livius made Q. Cecilius Master of the Horse; but he created the same Cecilius also Consul with L. Veturius at the very time when he was Master of the Horse. Then the Prætorian Assembly was held, and C. Servilius, M. Cecilius Metellus, T. Claudius Asellus, Q. Mamilius Turinus, who then was Ædile of the People, were created Prætors; which Assembly being ended, the Dictator laid down his Office, and dismissing the Army, went by an order of Senate into the Province of Etruria to make inquisition, What People of Etruria or Umbria had any intentions to revolt from the Romans to Asdrubal a little before his coming, and which of them had assisted him with Men, Provisions, or in any other manner. These things were done that Year at home and abroad. The Roman Games were performed thrice over, from the beginning to the end, by the Ædiles Curules [chief Surveyors of publick works and actions] and the Plebeian Games also as often, by the Plebeian Ædiles, whose names were Manius Pomponius Matho and Q. Mamilius Turinus. In the thirteenth Year of the Punick War, when L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus were Consuls, the Province of the Bruttii was given to them both, that they might wage War with Annibal. Then the Prætors chose their Posts, M. Cecilius Metellus the City, Q. Mamilius a Foreign Aid, C. Servilius Sicily, and T. Claudius Sardinia. The Armies were thus divided: to one of the Consuls, that which C. Claudius had, who the Year before was Consul; and to the other, that which which Q. Claudius the Proprætor had, which was two Legions. M. Livius the Proconsul, who was continued in Commission for another Year, was to have the two Legions of Volunteers in Etruria of C. Terentius the Proprætor. And it was decreed, that Q. Mamilius, who had resigned his Jurisdiction to his Colleague, should have Gallia with the Army there, commanded by L. Portius the Proprætor; he being enjoined to pillage all those Gallick Countries, that had revolted to the Carthaginians upon the arrival of Asdrubal. C. Servilius was to take care of Sicily, in the same manner as C. Mamilius had done with the two Cannensian Legions. The old Army, under the command of A. Hostilius, was brought out of Sardinia; and the Consuls raised a new Legion for T. Claudius to take over along with him thither. Q. Claudius was continued in Commission for another Year to be Governour of Tarentum, and C. Hostilius Tubulus of Capua. M. Valerius the Proconsul, whose business it had been to defend the Sea Coast about Sicily, was commanded to deliver up thirty Ships to C. Servilius, and with all the rest of the Navy to return home.

XI. In the City which was much concerned for the great jeopardy they were in upon the prospect of such Wars, the People laying all the causes of both their good and bad fortune upon the Gods, related many strange Prodigies, to wit, That at Tarracina, the Temple of Jupiter, and at Satricum, that of the Goddesses called Mater Matuta, were set on fire by Lightning. But the Satricans were no less terrified at two Snakes that rowled into the very door of Jupiter's Temple. From Antium News was brought, That the ears of Corn appeared bloody to the reapers. At Cære there was a Pigg born with two heads, and Lamb both Male and Female. At Alba they said, there were two Suns seen; and that at Fregelli it grew light of a sudden in the night time. It was reported also, That an Oxe was heard to speak in the Roman Dominions, and the Altar of Neptune seen to be all over in a sweat in the Circus Flaminius. That the Temples of Ceres, Salus, and Quirinus were fr'd by lightning. The Consuls therefore were ordered to make greater Sacrifices than ordinary upon the account of these Prodigies, and Supplications one Day: But that which terrified the minds of men more than all the Prodigies that either were seen at home, or told of from abroad, was the fires being out in the Temple of Vesta; for which, that Vestal Virgin, who was to look to it that night, was whipt with a rod by the order of P. Licinius the Chief Priest. Which accident, though the Gods had no hand in it, but it happened by mere humane negligence, was ordered to be atoned for with great Sacrifices, and Supplication to be made at the Temple of Vesta. Before the Consuls went to the War, they were admonished by the Senate, That they should take care to restore the Commonalty into the Country again; that by the bounty of the Gods the War was removed from the City of Rome, and out of Latium, so that the People might live in the Country now without fear; that it was not fit they should take more care to cultivate Sicily than Italy. But this was very difficult to the People, not only by reason that the free Inhabitants were lost in the Wars, but for want of Servants, because their Cattel were driven away, and their Villages all demolished or burnt. Nevertheless a great part of them, compelled by the authority of the Consuls, returned into the Country. Those that first made mention of this were the Embassadors from Placentia and Cremona, who complained, That the neighbouring Galls made incursions into their Country, which they laid waste; and that great part of their husbandmen were gone away, their Cities being but thin, and their Country wast and desert. Mamilius the Prætor was ordered to defend the Colonies from the Enemy. The Consuls, in pursuance to an order of Senate, made an Edict, That all who were Citizens of Placentia or Cremona, should return before such a day into their Colonies. Then in the beginning of the Spring they went to the War. Q. Cecilius the Consul received the Army from C. Nero, and L. Veturius from Q. Claudius the Proprætor, and fill'd it up with new Men that he himself had raised. The Consuls led their Army into the Country belonging to Consentia, which they pillaged all over: But when the Men were laden with spoils, they were disturbed by the Bruttii, and Numidian Darters in a new pass, inasmuch, that not only the Booty, but their Souldiers themselves were in danger; though it was a tumult rather than a fight. Wherefore having sent their plunder before them, the Legions escaped safe into secure Places. Thence they marched into Lucania, which Country returned and submitted to the Roman People without any fighting.

XII. There was nothing done with Hannibal that Year; for neither did he offer himself, having receiv'd such a wound, both publick and private; nor did the Romans molest him whilst he was at quiet. So very great did they think that one Commanders strength to be, though all things else about him had been ruined. And indeed I know not, whether he were more admirable in Prosperity or Adversity. For though he were not only in an Enemies Country for thirteen Year, so far from home, and carried on the War with such variety of fortune, and an Army not of his own Countrymen, but made up of a mixture of all Nations, that had neither the same Laws, Customs or Language; but different Complexions, different Garments, different Arms, different Rites, different Religions, and almost different Gods too; yet he so coupled them together, as it were, by one common band, that they never mutiny'd either among themselves or against their General, though he often wanted Money to pay them, and Provisions were scarce in the Enemies Country; for lack whereof, in the former Punick War, there was a great deal of mischief done among the Officers

Officers and Souldiers. But when Asdrubal's Army with its General, in whom all hopes of Victory lay, was destroyed, and Annibal leaving the rest of Italy was got into one corner of it, inhabited by the Bruttii, who would not wonder, that there should never be any disturbance in his Camp? For besides other things, there was this addition made to his necessities, that he had no hopes to maintain his Army out of any other except the Bruttian Dominions; which though they were all cultivated, was but a very little to keep so great an Army: Besides that great part of their Youth were taken from the Plow to the Wars, and they had an ill custome, natural to that Nation, to turn Robbers whilst they were Soldiers. Nor had he any thing sent from home, the Carthaginians being only very solicitous to keep Spain, as if all things were well enough in Italy. In Spain things had partly the same success, and partly different; the same, in that the Carthaginians being conquered in a Battel which they fought, and losing their General, were forced to fly into the utmost part of that Country as far as the Ocean; and different, because Spain was more apt, not only than Italy, but than any other Region of the whole World, to renew a War, in regard to the nature both of its Soil and Inhabitants. And for this reason the first of all the Provinces, which the Romans entered into, upon the Continent, was the last of all that was totally subdued, and that but lately neither, in our time, under the conduct and auspicious management of Augustus Caesar. Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo (who was the greatest and most renowned General in that War, next to the Barchines) coming at that time back from Gades, and being put in hopes of renewing the War by Mago, Son to Amilcar, made Levies in the farther Spain, and armed a multitude of Men, to the number of fifty Thousand Foot, and four Thousand five Hundred Horse. Of which latter most Authors agree, though some write, that there were seventy Thousand Foot brought to the City of Silpis: And there the two Carthaginian Generals sat down together upon the open Plains, because they would not decline fighting.

XIII. Scipio, when he heard of such a vast Armies being raised, he, fearing that he should not find the Roman Legions strong enough for such a Multitude, if he did not make a shew at least of some Auxiliaries from the Spaniards (and yet he must not lay so much stress upon them, as that by falsifying their Oaths (which was the ruine of his Father and Uncle) they might be able to make any great alteration in his affairs) sent Silanus before to Colcas, who was King of eight and twenty Towns, to receive from him those Horse and Foot which he had promised that Winter to raise; and going himself from Tarraco, mustered up immediately among his Allies that live upon that Road a small number, till he came to Castulo. The Auxiliaries brought thither by Silanus, were three Thousand Foot and five Hundred Horse. Thence therefore they marched on to the City Batula with all their Army of Citizens, Allies, Horse and Foot, whose number was forty five Thousand. Mago and Massinissa set upon them, as they were pitching their Camp with all their Horse: and they had disturb'd them as they were fortifying themselves, if a party of Horse, that was planted very opportunely by Scipio behind a bank to that end, had not surpriz'd and routed them. For those Men, even before they had well engag'd in the fight, defeated all that were most forward, next to the Bulwark, opposing the very fortifiers, though with the rest, who marched under their Ensigns, and in Battalia, they had a longer and that a doubtful conflict. But as soon as the Regiments were commanded from their Posts, and their Souldiers drawn off from their Works, whilst more were ordered to take up Arms, and fresh Men still supplied the room of such as were tired, so that a vast body of armed Men rush'd out of the Camp into the Battel, the Carthaginians and Numidians immediately turn'd their backs. And at first they marched off in Troops, without disordering their Ranks either through fear or haste: but soon after when the Romans fell more sharply upon their Rear, so that their shock was insupportable, they forgot all order, and ran to all places that were next at hand, which way soever they could. But though in that fight the Romans were a little more encouraged, and the Enemy somewhat disheartened, yet they did not for some days after cease to make excursions with their Horse, and light-armed Men.

XIV. When they had sufficiently tryed their strength by these light skirmishes; Asdrubal first led his Men forth into the field, and then the Romans came out. But both the Armies stood before their Bulwarks in Battle Array: and seeing that neither of them began the fight, when it was toward Evening, their Forces were led back, first the Carthaginians, and then the Romans, into their Camps again. This they did for several days, the Carthaginian being the first that drew his Men out of their Camp, and when they were weary with standing, gave the first signal for their retreat. They neither of them ran too far forward, threw any Javelin at the other, or were heard so much as to speak. The Romans on the one side, and the Carthaginians, mixt with Africans, on the other, made the main Body of their Armies, whilst the Allies fill'd up the Wings, and Spaniards were on both sides in the head of each Wing. Before the Punick Army there were Elephants that look'd afar off like so many little Castles. Now there was this discourse in both their Camps, That they would fight in the same posture that they had stood: and that the main Body, of Romans and Carthaginians, who were the Cause of the War, should engage with equal strength of con-

rage and Arms. Which Scipio perceiving to be firmly believed, chang'd all the order of his Men against that Day they were to fight; giving a charge through all his Camp, That the Men and their Horses should refresh themselves with meat before day; and the armed Horsemen stand ready with their Horses bridled and saddled. So when it was hardly yet day-light, he sent all the Horse with the light-armed Souldiers into the Punick Stations, and then immediately marched forth himself with the slow Body of the Legions: But contrary to every Bodies expectation, both Allies and Enemies, having strengthened the Wings with Romans, he received the Allies into the main Body. Asdrubal being alarmed at the noise of the Horse, as soon as he leap'd out of his Tent, and saw a tumult before his Bulwark, his Men in a fright, the Legions Ensigns glittering at a distance, and all the Plains full of the Enemy, he presently sent all his Horse to meet those of the Romans: he himself going out of his Camp with the Body of Foot, nor changing any thing in the usual order of his array. The Horse engaged very doubtfully for a long time, nor could the Battel be of it self made an end of, because they that were beaten (as they were almost on both sides) had a safe way of retreating into the Body of the Foot. But when the two Armies were now come within five Hundred Paces of one another, the signal was given for a Retreat, and Scipio opening his Ranks, to receive all the Horse and light-armed Soldiers into the middle, he divided them into two Parties, and placed them as Reserves behind the Wings. Then when the time to begin the fight was now come, he ordered the Spaniards (who were the main Body) to march very slowly, and sent a Messenger from the right Wing (which he himself commanded) to Silanus and Marcus, To extend their Wing on the left side, as they saw him do on the right; as also, that they should engage the Enemy with the nimblest Horse and Foot they had, before the main Bodies could come up. Accordingly having widened their Wings, with three Regiments of Foot, and three Troops of Horse, with Skirmishers besides, they made up with speed to the Enemy, whilst the others followed in an oblique Figure. For there was a Bay, as it were, in the middle of them, because the Spanish Ensigns moved but slowly, and the Wings were already engaged; whilst all the strength of the Enemies main Body, that is to say, the Carthaginian old Soldiers, and the Africans, were not yet come within a Darts cast, nor durst to run into the Wings to assist them that were a fighting, for fear of opening their main Body to the Foe that was coming against them. The Wings therefore were sore prest with a doubtful Battel; the Horse, light-armed Men and Skirmishers wheeling about to the Flanks, whilst the Foot lay hard upon the Front, to break off the Wings from the rest of the Army.

XV. And then the Fight was not by any means equal on any side, not only, because the Baleares [Slingers] and Spanish young Soldiers were opposite to the Roman and Latin Veterans, but also, because now the Day was pretty far spent, their strength began to fail the Army of Asdrubal, who being surpris'd by the Mornings Tumult were forced to go forth hastily to the Battel, before they had sufficiently fortified their Bodies with meat. Now for that reason Scipio had industriously made delays, that the Fight might be late; for it was one of the Clock before the Foot fell on in the Wings, and somewhat later before the main Bodies engaged; inasmuch that the noon-tide heat of the Sun, and the fatigue of standing in their Arms, together with hunger and thirst, made them faint and uneasy, ere they closed with the Enemy. Wherefore they stood leaning upon their Shields. And, besides other inconveniencies, the Elephants also being hared by the tumultuous way of fighting among the Horse, light-armed Men, and Skirmishers, were come out of the Wings into the main Body. The Carthaginians therefore being tired both in their Bodies and minds gave back, yet kept their Ranks as well as if the whole Army had retreated at the command of its General. But the Conquerours for that reason pressing harder upon them on every side, when they saw them make way, so that the shock could not easily be born, though Asdrubal detained them, and withstood their retreat, crying out, That there were Hills behind them, to which they might safely retire, and therefore they should not make so much haste; yet fear overcoming their modesty (seeing all that were nearest the Enemy gave way) they immediately turn'd their backs and ran away as fast as they could. And then at first they began to stop their Ensigns at the foot of the Hills, and to recall their Men into their Ranks, seeing the Romans loth to lead their Army upon those steep Places. But when they saw them soon after come briskly on, renewing their flight they were driven and frighted all into their Camp. Nor were the Romans far from the Bullwark, and had at that effort barely taken their Camp, if, instead of the Suns shining very foultry hot, as it does through Clouds that are big with Rain, there had not fallen such a storm, that the Conquerours could hardly get back into their Camp. Besides which, some were awed by Superstition from attempting any thing more that day. The Night and the Rain invited the Carthaginians, though tired sufficiently before with the fatigue of the Day, and Wounds which they received, to take their necessary and natural rest; but yet since fear and danger did not give them time to lye down, the Enemy being to attack their Camp at break of Day, they got stones from all their neighbouring Vales to raise and strengthen their Bullwark, resolving to defend themselves with Fortifications, seeing they could not trust to their Arms. But the revolt of their Allies caused the flight to be more safe than staying there : the beginning of which revolt proceeded from Atanes a petite King of the Turdetani, who went over to the Enemy with a great number of his Countrymen. After that there were two wall'd Towns delivered up to the Roman by the Governours of them. Wherefore left that mischief should increase upon him, Asdrubal, seeing them once inclined to a defection, in the dead of the night following remov'd his Camp.

XVI. Scipio, as soon as it was Day, when those that were upon the Guard brought him word, That the Enemy was gone, sending the Horse before, he ordered the Ensigns to march. And with such speed did they pursue, that if they had gone directly after, they had certainly overtaken them. But they trusted to the Guides, who told them, there was a nearer way to the River Batis, where they might set upon them as they were going over. Asdrubal, seeing his passage over the River was intercepted, turned toward the Ocean; and then his Men set a running as hard as they could, which carried them some distance from the Roman Legions. But the Horse and light-armour coming up with them sometimes in their Rear, and sometimes in their Flanks, teased them and made them halt. At last, whilst upon frequent tumults, their Ensigns stood still, and they engaged sometimes with Horse, and sometimes with Foot, the Legions overtook them. Then there was (not a Fight, but) as it were a butchering of Sheep; till their General (the author of their flight) with almost six Thousand Men half armed escaped into the adjacent Hills; but the rest were all slain and taken. The Carthaginians fortified a tumultuary Camp all in haste upon a very high Place; from whence, seeing the Enemy had in vain endeavoured to get up, it being so steep and rough, they easily defended themselves. But the Siege, being in a naked and barren place, was hardly tolerable even for a few Days. Wherefore they went many of them over to the Enemy; and at last the General himself took Shipping (nor was the Sea far off that place) and in the night time leaving his Army, fled to Gades. Scipio hearing that the Enemies General was gone, left ten Thousand Foot, and a Thousand Horse with Silanus to besiege the Camp: whilst himself, with the rest of his Forces, at seventy encampings, returned to Tarraco, forthwith to inquire concerning the petite Kings and Cities thereabout, that he might reward them according to their real merits. After his departure, Massinissa coming to a private conference with Silanus, that he might make his Nation also comply with his new designs, went over with a few of his Countrymen into Africa: nor was the cause of his suddain revolt to the Romans at that time so evident, as his constancy in his allegiance to them even to his dying Day made it even then appear just, and that he did not do it without some good reason. Then Mago went for Gades in the Ships that Asdrubal sent back, whilst all the rest being deserted by their Generals, partly by revolting, and partly running away, were dissipated through all the neighbouring Cities: so that there was no party of them to be found that was considerable either for their number or strength. Thus chiefly by the conduct and good fortune of P. Scipio, were the Carthaginians beaten out of Spain in the thirteenth Year after the War began, and the fifth after P. Scipio had that Province and that Army. Not long after Silanus sending word, That he had defeated the Enemy, returned to Scipio at Tarraco.

XVII. L. Scipio with many noble Captives was sent to Rome to tell the News of Spain being recovered. Which thing, though all other People were very glad and proud of, he only that performed those great exploits, being a Person of indefatigable virtue and truly to be admired, reckoned the recovery of Spain but as a small matter in respect of those things that he in his mighty Soul had conceived. For he now look'd toward Africa, the great Carthage, and the consummation of the glory of that War, which he foresaw would be a great addition to his Honour and Renown. Wherefore he, thinking it best before-hand to try how things would probably go, and to win the affections of the Kings and Nations there, resolv'd first of all to make an attempt upon Syphax, who was King of the Masæsylians. Now the Masæsylians are a People near the Moors, looking most toward that part of Spain, where new Carthage stands. At that time there was a League between that King and the Carthaginians, which Scipio supposing to be no more sacred or regarded by him than it usually was by all Barbarians, whose faith depends upon their fortune, he sent an Envoy to him, called C. Lælius, with certain Presents. At which the Barbarian being pleas'd (seeing that now the Romans were prosperous in all Places, and the Carthaginians not only disabled in Italy, but brought to nought in Spain) consented to an alliance with the Romans, but said, he would not make or take a solemn promise to confirm it, save in the presence of the Roman General himself. Whereupon Lælius, having received the Kings word for this only, That he should come thither safe, returned to Scipio. Syphax was of very great importance to him in all cases, now that he aimed at Africa, as being the richest King in all that Country, having try'd even the Carthaginians themselves in War, and having a Country that lay so conveniently toward Spain, which is divided from it by nothing save a narrow Sea. Scipio therefore, since he could accomplish it no other way, thought this enterprise deserv'd to be attempted with great hazard: and for that reason, leaving L. Marcus at Tarraco, and M. Silanus at New Carthage (whither he had travelled over land by great Journeys from Tarraco) as a Guard to Spain; himself with C. Lælius setting out in two Gallies Gallies of five banks of Oars a-piece, from Carthage sail'd in a calm Sea, most commonly with Oars, and sometimes with a small gale of wind, into Africa. It so happened, that at that very time Asdrubal being beaten out of Spain, was come into the same Harbour with seven Gallies of three banks a-piece, and had cast Anchor there. But when they saw the other two Gallies of five banks a-piece, making no question of their being the Enemies, they feared they might be overpowered by a greater number before they could get a-shore; infomuch, that being all in a tumult and a fright, though they did what they could to get away, 'twas all to no purpose. For the Gallies of five banks, having a fresher Gale than ordinary, were got into the Port before the Carthaginians could weigh their Anchors. But there was no harm done besides what they suffered by their consternation; because the Romans being in a Port belonging to the King, durst not meddle with them. Wherefore Asdrubal going first, Scipio and Lælius went presently after a-shore, and so to the King.

That look'd very great to Syphax (as it really was) that the Generals of two of the most opulent People of that age should come, in one Day, to desire his alliance and friendship. He invited both of them to lye at his House; and seeing fortune had put them under the same roof, he endeavour'd to bring them to a conference in order to compose their differences. But Scipio denying that he had any private quarrel with the Carthaginian, which he could end by discoursing with him; or that he could treat with an Enemy concerning any thing relating to the Commonwealth without the Senates consent, the King on the other hand was very earnest with him, that one of his Guests might not seem excluded from his Table; but that he would be perswaded to come to the same meal, and he complied. So they supped together at the Kings Palace; yea, Scipio and Asdrubal (since the King would needs have it so) lay at Supper upon the same Bed. Now Scipio was so courteous a Man, and had so much natural wit, that by his eloquence, he did not only make Syphax, though a Barbarian, and not uled to Roman manners, but even his mortal Enemy [Asdrubal] his Friend; who pretended, He much more admired him now he saw him, than for all his warlike Exploits: Nor did he question but Syphax and his Kingdom were at the Romans service; such an art that Person had to win affections. So that the Carthaginians must not ask how Spain was lost, but study how they may keep Africa. For that Roman General was not come there to travel only and see fashions, leaving his new Conquest and his Armies to come over into Alia with two Ships, thereby to put himself into an Enemies Country under the power of a King, whose fidelity and honour he had never try'd, but with hopes to gain all Africa. That he had this a long time in his thoughts, yea publicly murmured, that, as Annibal did in Italy, Scipio could not wage War in Africa. Scipio having made a League with Syphax went out of Africa, and though with cross, for the most part, and violent Winds, he was mightily tossed at Sea, the fourth Day he arriv'd at New Carthage.

Spain as it was at rest from the Punick War, so it appeared that some of its Cities, through their consciousness of what they had been guilty of, were quiet for fear, more than love and duties sake: of which, the most eminent were Illiturgi and Castulo. For the Castulonians, though they had been Allies to the Romans in their Prosperity, yet when the Scipios with their Armies were slain, they had revolted to the Carthaginians; and the Illiturgians by betraying and killing such as fled to them for succour, had added a new crime to that of their revolt. But upon those People at his first coming, when Spain was in a doubtful disposition, it would not have been to his advantage so much, as according to their deserts, to have exercised any severities; though now when things were all compos'd, because the time of inflicting due punishment upon them seem'd to be come, he sent for L. Marcus with the third part of his Forces from Tarraco, and order'd him to go and attack Castulo: whilst he himself, with the rest of his Army, arriv'd at Illiturgi in about five Days. The Gates were shut, and all things set ready for the defence of the Town; their Conscience of what they knew they deserv'd, being to them instead of a Declaration of War. Then Scipio began to exhort his Souldiers, saying, That the Spaniards themselves by shutting their Gates, shew'd not only what they feared, but what they deserv'd: wherefore they ought to wage War against them with much more animosity than against the Carthaginians. For with these they contend'd almost without any passion for Empire and Glory only, but of those they ought to take revenge for their treachery, cruelty, and villany. That now the time was come, in which they might be even with them for the horrid murder of their fellow-souldiers, and the treachery that was designed against themselves also, if they had fled that way: yea, that they might make them an example to all posterity, and provide, that no man should ever think any Roman Citizen, or Soldier in any fortune so mean as to injure him. The Souldiers being excited by this exhortation of their General, divided their scaling Ladders among such Men as they chose out of every maniple: and when the Army was so parted between them, that Lælius commanded one half as Lieutenant, they attack'd the frighted City in two places at once. Then not one General only, or a great many of their Nobility, but their own fear, being conscious of what they had done, perswaded the Towns-men with all speed to defend their City; for they remembered, and told each other, That it was not Victory but Punishment which was sought for of them. That it was of great importance where a Man dye; whether in a Battel and in the Field, where the fortune of War, which is common

Officers and Souldiers. But when Asdrubal's Army with its General, in whom all hopes of Victory lay, was destroyed, and Annibal leaving the rest of Italy was got into one corner of it, inhabited by the Bruttii, who would not wonder, that there should never be any disturbance in his Camp? For besides other things, there was this addition made to his necessities, that he had no hopes to maintain his Army out of any other except the Bruttian Dominions; which though they were all cultivated, was but a very little to keep so great an Army: Besides that great part of their Youth were taken from the Plow to the Wars, and they had an ill custome, natural to that Nation, to turn Robbers whilst they were Souldiers. Nor had he any thing sent from home, the Carthaginians being only very solicitous to keep Spain, as if all things were well enough in Italy. In Spain things had partly the same success, and partly different; the same, in that the Carthaginians being conquered in a Battel which they fought, and losing their General, were forced to fly into the utmost part of that Country as far as the Ocean; and different, because Spain was more apt, not only than Italy, but than any other Region of the whole World, to renew a War, in regard to the nature both of its Soil and Inhabitants. And for this reason the first of all the Provinces, which the Romans entered into, upon the Continent, was the last of all that was totally subdued, and that but lately neither, in our time, under the conduct and auspicious management of Augustus Caesar. Asdrubal the Son of Gisco (who was the greatest and most renowned General in that War, next to the Barchines) coming at that time back from Gades, and being put in hopes of renewing the War by Mago, Son to Amilcar, made Levies in the farther Spain, and armed a multitude of Men, to the number of fifty Thousand Foot, and four Thousand five Hundred Horse. Of which latter most Authors agree, though some write, that there were seventy Thousand Foot brought to the City of Silpi. And there the two Carthaginian Generals sat down together upon the open Plains, because they would not decline fighting.

XIII. Scipio, when he heard of such a vast Armies being raised, he, fearing that he should not find the Roman Legions strong enough for such a Multitude, if he did not make a shew at least of some Auxiliaries from the Spaniards (and yet he must not lay so much stress upon them, as that by falsifying their Oaths (which was the ruine of his Father and Uncle) they might be able to make any great alteration in his affairs) sent Silanus before to Colcas, who was King of eight and twenty Towns, to receive from him those Horse and Foot which he had promised that Winter to raise; and going himself from Tarraco, muster'd up immediately among his Allies that live upon that Road a small number, till he came to Castulo. The Auxiliaries brought thither by Silanus, were three Thousand Foot and five Hundred Horse. Thence therefore they marched on to the City Batula with all their Army of Citizens, Allies, Horse and Foot, whose number was forty five Thousand. Mago and Massinissa set upon them, as they were pitching their Camp with all their Horse: and they had disturb'd them as they were fortifying themselves, if a party of Horse, that was planted very opportunely by Scipio behind a bank to that end, had not surpriz'd and routed them. For those Men, even before they had well engag'd in the fight, defeated all that were most forward, next to the Bulwark, opposing the very fortifiers, though with the rest, who marched under their Ensigns, and in Battalia, they had a longer and that a doubtful conflict. But as soon as the Regiments were commanded from their Posts, and their Souldiers drawn off from their Works, whilst more were ordered to take up Arms, and fresh Men still supplied the room of such as were tired, so that a vast body of armed Men rush'd out of the Camp into the Battel, the Carthaginians and Numidians immediately turn'd their backs. And at first they marched off in Troops, without disordering their Ranks either through fear or haste: but soon after when the Romans fell more sharply upon their Rear, so that their shock was insupportable, they forgot all order, and ran to all places that were next at hand, which way soever they could. But though in that fight the Romans were a little more encouraged, and the Enemy somewhat disheartened, yet they did not for some days after cease to make excursions with their Horse, and light-armed Men.

XIV. When they had sufficiently tryed their strength by these light skirmishes; Asdrubal first led his Men forth into the field, and then the Romans came out. But both the Armies stood before their Bulwarks in Battle Array: and seeing that neither of them began the fight, when it was toward Evening, their Forces were led back, first the Carthaginians, and then the Romans, into their Camps again. This they did for several days, the Carthaginian being the first that drew his Men out of their Camp, and when they were weary with standing, gave the first signal for their retreat. They neither of them ran too far forward, threw any Javelin at the other, or were heard so much as to speak. The Romans on the one side, and the Carthaginians, mixt with Africans, on the other, made the main Body of their Armies, whilst the Allies fill'd up the Wings, and Spaniards were on both sides in the head of each Wing. Before the Punick Army there were Elephants that look'd afar off like so many little Castles. Now there was this discourse in both their Camps, That they would fight in the same posture that they had stood: and that the main Body, of Romans and Carthaginians, who were the Cause of the War, should engage with equal strength of con-

rage and Arms. Which Scipio perceiving to be firmly believed, chang'd all the order of his Men against that Day they were to fight; giving a charge through all his Camp, That the Men and their Horses should refresh themselves with meat before day; and the armed Horsemen stand ready with their Horses bridled and saddled. At that time there was a League between that King and the Carthaginians, which Scipio supposing to be no more sacred or regarded by him than it usually was by all Barbarians, whose faith depends upon their fortune, he sent an Envoy to him, called C. Lælius, with certain Presents. At which the Barbarian being pleased (seeing that now the Romans were prosperous in all Places, and the Carthaginians not only disabled in Italy, but brought to nought in Spain) consented to an alliance with the Romans, but said, he would not make or take a solemn promise to confirm it, save in the presence of the Roman General himself. Whereupon Lælius, having received the Kings word for this only, That he should come thither safe, returned to Scipio. Syphax was of very great importance to him in all cases, now that he aimed at Africa, as being the richest King in all that Country, having tryed even the Carthaginians themselves in War, and having a Country that lay so conveniently toward Spain, which is divided from it by nothing save a narrow Sea. Scipio therefore, since he could accomplish it no other way, thought this enterprise deserved to be attempted with great hazard: and for that reason, leaving L. Marcus at Tarraco, and M. Silanus at New Carthage (whither he had travelled over land by great Journeys from Tarraco) as a Guard to Spain; himself with C. Lælius setting out in two Gallies

Gallies of five banks of Oars a-piece, from Carthage sailed in a calm Sea, most commonly with Oars, and sometimes with a small gale of wind, into Africa. It so happened, that at that very time Asdrubal being beaten out of Spain, was come into the same Harbour with seven Gallies of three banks a-piece, and had cast Anchor there. But when they saw the other two Gallies of five banks a-piece, making no question of their being the Enemies, they feared they might be overpowered by a greater number before they could get a-shore; inasmuch, that being all in a tumult and a fright, though they did what they could to get away, 'twas all to no purpose. For the Gallies of five banks, having a fresher Gale than ordinary, were got into the Port before the Carthaginians could weigh their Anchors. But there was no harm done besides what they suffered by their consternation, because the Romans being in a Port belonging to the King, durst not meddle with them. Wherefore Asdrubal going first, Scipio and Lælius went presently after a-shore, and so to the King.

That look'd very great to Syphax (as it really was) that the Generals of two of the most opulent People of that age should come, in one Day, to desire his alliance and friendship. He invited both of them to lye at his House; and seeing fortune had put them under the same roof, he endeavoured to bring them to a conference in order to compose their differences. But Scipio denying that he had any private quarrel with the Carthaginian, which he could end by discoursing with him; or that he could treat with an Enemy concerning any thing relating to the Commonwealth without the Senates consent, the King on the other hand was very earnest with him, that one of his Guests might not seem excluded from his Table; but that he would be perswaded to come to the same meal, and he complied. So they supped together at the Kings Palace; yea, Scipio and Asdrubal (since the King would needs have it so) lay at Supper upon the same Bed. Now Scipio was so courteous a Man, and had so much natural wit, that by his eloquence, he did not only make Syphax, though a Barbarian, and not used to Roman manners, but even his mortal Enemy [Asdrubal] his Friend; who pretended, He much more admired him now he saw him, than for all his warlike Exploits: Nor did he question but Syphax and his Kingdom were at the Romans service; such an art that Person had to win affections. So that the Carthaginians must not ask how Spain was lost, but study how they may keep Africa. For that Roman General was not come there to travel only and see fashions, leaving his new Conquest and his Armies to come over into Alia with two Ships, thereby to put himself into an Enemies Country under the power of a King, whose fidelity and honour he had never tryed, but with hopes to gain all Africa. That he had this a long time in his thoughts, yea publicly murmured, that, as Annibal did in Italy, Scipio could not wage War in Africa. Scipio having made a League with Syphax went out of Africa, and though with cross, for the most part, and violent Winds, he were mightily tossed at Sea, the fourth Day he arrived at New Carthage.

XIX. Spain as it was at rest from the Punick War, so it appeared that some of its Cities, through their consciousness of what they had been guilty of, were quiet for fear, more than love and duties sake: of which, the most eminent were Illiturgi and Castulo. For the Castulonians, though they had been Allies to the Romans in their Prosperity, yet when the Scipios with their Armies were slain, they had revolted to the Carthaginians: and the Illiturgians by betraying and killing such as fled to them for succour, had added a new crime to that of their revolt. But upon those People at his first coming, when Spain was in a doubtful disposition, it would not have been to his advantage so much, as according to their deserts, to have exercised any severities; though now when things were all composed, because the time of inflicting due punishment upon them seemed to be come, he sent for L. Marcus with the third part of his Forces from Tarraco, and ordered him to go and attack Castulo: whilst he himself, with the rest of his Army, arrived at Illiturgi in about five Days. The Gates were shut, and all things set ready for the defence of the Town; their Confidence of what they knew they deserved, being to them instead of a Declaration of War. Then Scipio began to exhort his Souldiers, saying, That the Spaniards themselves by shutting their Gates, shewed not only what they feared, but what they deserved: wherefore they ought to wage War against them with much more animosity than against the Carthaginians. For with these they contended almost without any passion for Empire and Glory only, but of those they ought to take revenge for their treachery, cruelty, and villany. That now the time was come, in which they might be even with them for the horrid murder of their fellow-souldiers, and the treachery that was designed against themselves also, if they had fled that way: yea, that they might make them an example to all posterity, and provide, that no man should ever think any Roman Citizen, or Soldier in any fortune so mean as to injure him. The Soldiers being excited by this exhortation of their General, divided their scaling Ladders among such Men as they chose out of every maniple: and when the Army was so parted between them, that Lælius commanded one half as Lieutenant, they attacked the frightened City in two places at once. Then not one General only, or a great many of their Nobility, but their own fear, being conscious of what they had done, perswaded the Towns-men with all speed to defend their City; for they remembered, and told each other, That it was not Victory but Punishment which was sought for of them. That it was of great importance where a Man dye; whether in a Battel and in the Field, where the fortune of War, which is common to all men, used oftentimes to raise the vanquished and afflict the conquerour; or whether, when their City was burnt and demolished, they expired before the faces of their Wives and Children, by stripes and bonds, suffering all the cruelties and indignities imaginable. Wherefore, not only those of military age, or Men, but Women also, and Boys came thither to assist them even above their strength either of body or mind; reaching them Weapons as they fought, and Stones to fortify the Walls. For it was not the Liberty alone which was at stake (for which the Valiant were most concern'd) but the extremity of all Punishments and ghastly Death was before all their Eyes. Their minds were inflamed, not only with striving who should take most pains, or undergo most danger, but even by looking at one another also. Wherefore the Fight was begun with so much ardour, that that very Army which subdued all Spain, being often repelled by the Youth of that one Town, was put to a dishonourable plunder. Which when Scipio saw, fearing lest by so many vain attempts of his Men his Enemies courage should increase, and his Soldiers grow more disheartened, he thought it his business to endeavour to bear a share in the danger, and chiding the Soldiers sloth, commanded the Ladders to be brought to him, threatening, That he himself, if the rest were afraid, would get up. Accordingly he went, with no small hazard, under the Walls; at which a shout was set up round about by the Soldiers, who were much concerned for their General, and Ladders began to be erected in several Places at the same time. On the other side Lelius made his onset; whereby the strength of the Townsmen was overcome, the Defendants knock'd down, and the Walls seized. The Castle also on that side where it seemed impregnable, was taken in the hurly-burly.

XX. The African Fugitives, who at that time were among the Roman Auxiliaries, whilst the Townsmen were employed in defending those Places, where they thought there was most danger, and the Romans got up wherever they could make their approaches, spied a very high part of the City, which, because it was covered with an exceeding high Rock, was neither fortified with any works, nor had any men to defend it. They therefore being light-timber'd Men, and through much exercise very nimble, carried Iron Spikes along with them and clim'd up where they could, by the unequal prominencies of the Rock. But where it was in any Place too steep and smooth, they stuck their Spikes in at small distances, and made steps as it were; the first of them helping those that followed up by their hands, and the last heaving up such as went before them, till they came to the top. Then they ran down into the City which was already taken by the Romans. Then it appear'd that the City was attack'd merely out of spleen and hatred; since no one was desirous to take any live Prisoners, nor minded the Plunder, though every thing lay wide open to their rapine: they only kill'd both arm'd and unarmed, Women as well as Men; yea, their cruel fury proceeded even to the slaughter of Infants. Then they put fire to the Houses, and demolished those they could not burn; so earnest they were to obliterate the very footsteps of that City, and raise the very memory of their Enemies seat. From thence Scipio led his Army to Castulo; which City, not only the Spaniards, that came thither, but also the remainder of the Punick Army, that was left since their being routed and scattered to all parts, stood in defence of. But the News of the slaughter at Illiturgi had prevented Scipio's arrival; whereupon a terror and despair had seized on all the Castulomans: and upon several accounts, since every single Person would consult his own Interest without regard to any body else, there arose first a tacite jealousy, and then open discord made a division between the Carthaginians and the Spaniards. The latter of whom were publicly perswaded by Cerdubellus to make a surrender. Himilco commanded the Punick Auxiliaries; all whom and the City, by a private compact, Cerdubellus betrayed to the Romans. But that Victory was more mild than the former: nor were these People guilty of so great a crime; besides, that their voluntary surrender had taken off some part of the Enemies fury. Then Marcius was sent to reduce the Barbarians, if any there were not yet in perfect subjection to the Roman Empire.

XXI. Scipio went back to Carthage to pay his vows to the Gods, and set forth the fencing Prize, which he had designed upon account of the death of his Father and his Uncle. But this was a Prize not fought by such sort of Men, as common Fencers use to pick up, when they make choice of Slaves and such Free-men as will make sale of their Blood. No this was all voluntary and gratis done. For some were sent from the petite Kings to give a sample of that courage which was so natural to their Nation: whilst others professed, That they would fight purely out of respect to the General; and a third sort were drawn by emulation and ambition to challenge, and if challenged, to shew they would not decline the Combate. Some again, who were not able, or at least not willing to end their controversies by verbal disputes, agreeing between themselves, That the Victor should have the thing contended for, decide it by the Sword. Nor were they obscure Persons, but Men of Birth and Quality, such as Corbis and Orsua who were Cousin-Germans; and being at variance concerning the Principality of the City called Ibis, declared they would fight for it. Corbis was the Elder; but Orsua's Father had been the last Prince or Governour, having received the Dignity from his elder Brother when he dyed. Scipio would fain have composed the difference, and reconciled them by reason; but they said, That could not be among among such near Relations as they were; nor would they have any God or Man, save Mars alone, to be Judge in their Cause. The elder was the stronger, and the younger in the very flower of his Age; but both of them desired rather to die in the Combate, than either to be in subjection to the other; and therefore, since they could not be perswaded out of their fury, they gave the Army a very signal entertainment, shewing, What a mischief the desire of Empire is among mankind. The elder with his experience and slight that he had, very easily overcame the unskilful strength of the younger. To this Prize of Fencing were added Funeral Games to make up the solemnity, with preparations both from the Province and the Camp.

Their affairs in the mean time were nevertheless carried on by the Lieutenants. For XXII. Marcius having past Betis, a River, which the Inhabitants call Cirtium, took two rich Cities without fighting, by surrender. Then there was a certain City, always on the Carthaginians side; but that did not so much deserve their anger, as that, without the necessities of War, they bore an extraordinary hatred to the Romans. Yet their City was not so secure, either by its situation, or any fortifications, as to make them more haughty than ordinary: but the natural inclinations of the Inhabitants, who delighted in Robbery, put them upon making excursions into the neighbouring Countries of such as were Allies to the Romans, to seize the straggling Roman Soldiers, knapsack or scullion Boys, and Merchants that pass that way. Besides which, they had likewise kill'd a great Company, who, because it was unsafe for a few, were going together through their Confiner, (in an ill place to fight in) out of an Ambuscade. When therefore the Army approach'd to attack this City, the Townsmen, being conscious of what they had done, since neither a surrender could be any security to Men so obnoxious, nor they had any hopes either with their Walls or Arms to preserve themselves, they did a foul and a barbarous act against themselves and those that belonged to them. They pitched upon a place in their Forum, where they laid all their Goods of greatest value: and having ordered their Wives and Children to sit upon that heap, they piled Wood and Faggots about them. Which when they had done, they commanded fifty young Men in Arms, That till the event of the Battel were known, they should be as a Guard there to their fortunes, and those Bodies, which were more dear to them. That, if they saw they were like to have the worst out, and the City just ready to be taken, they might be sure all those who engaged in the fight would perish there: and therefore they desired them for the sake of all the Gods in Heaven and Hell, that remembering their liberty, which that day would be taken from them, either by an honourable death, or infamous slavery, to leave nothing for the enraged Enemy to insult over: But since they had Fire and Sword in their hands, they would with those kind and faithful Instruments, rather destroy what needs must be lost, than let the Foe have any thing on which to exercise their cruel scorn. To these exhortations they added a dire execration, if hope or compassion caus'd any one of them to balk their design. Then mustering all their Forces together they flung open their Gates, and with a mighty noise ran out. Nor was there any Guard strong enough at that time in their way: because nothing could less be feared, than that they would dare to come forth of their Walls. Only some very few Parties of Horse, and light-armour were thereupon forthwith sent out of the Roman Camp to meet them. Wherefore the Fight was more sharp in regard to their vehemence and resolutions, than regular or orderly at all. Thereupon the Horse, who first came up to the Enemy, being repelled, put the light-armour'd Men in a fright; and they had fought under the very Bullwark, had not the Body of the Legions, though they had but little time to prepare, put themselves in Battalia. But for all that too they were for some time at a plunge about the Ensigns, seeing the Enemy, blinded with fury, ran with such hardiness upon their Swords. The old Soldiers, who for a long time were very pertinacious against their rash assaults, suppressed those that followed, by killing such as first came to hand: and some after endeavouring to advance somewhat farther, when they saw ne'r a Man of them gave back, but that they all dyed obstinate at their Feet, they opened their main Body (which by reason of their Multitude they could easily do) and enclosing the Wings of the Enemy, kill'd every Man of them as they fought in a circular form.

XXIII. And these things were done by the angry Enemy, when they fought according to the Law of War against Men in Arms, and such as made resistance. But there was a much more barbarous Massacre in the City; where their own fellow-Citizens murdered an innocent company of Women and Children that wore no Arms, throwing most of their Bodies into the kindled Pile half dead; insomuch that Rivers of Blood almost put out the rising flame, till they themselves at last, quite tired with the miserable slaughter of their Friends, threw their own Bodies, with their Arms into the midst of the Fire. When the slaughter was over, the victorious Romans came in; and at the first view of such a barbarous act stood for a while astonished. But then, when they saw the Gold and Silver that glittered through the heap of other things, and would out of a covetous humour, natural to Mankind, have snatched it out of the Fire, they were some of them scorched by the flames, and others singed by the heat, there being no way for the foremost to retire, because the crowd was so great behind them. Thus Astapa was consumed by Fire and Sword, without any booty taken taken by the Soldiers: and Marcus having all the rest of that Region delivered to him out of fear by way of surrender, led back his conquering Army to Scipio at New Carthage. At that very time there came Renegadoes from Gades, who promised, They would betray that City, the Punick Garrison that was in it, and the Governour of that Garrison with the Navy, to the Romans. Mago had there stop'd his flight; and having got ten Ships together from the Ocean, had raised some Auxiliaries, not only beyond the Streights on the Coast of Africa, but out of the adjacent parts of Spain through the assistance of Hanno, who was Prefect there. When therefore they had mutually obliged themselves and the Renegadoes by solemn promises of fidelity, Marcus was sent thither with the nimblest Regiments they had, and Laelius with seven Gallies of three Banks, and one of five, that they might attack jointly both by Land and Sea.

XXIV. Scipio himself falling extremely sick, though said to be much worse than really he was, because every one made some addition 'tis a thing so natural to mankind to propagate reports) to what they heard, put all the Province, but especially the remoter parts of it into disorder: whereby it was evident, what a great disturbance his being truly dead would have made, if a false rumour could raise such storms. Hence neither Allies continued in their fidelity, nor their Army in their duty. Mandonius and Indibilis, whose expectations were not answered (they having designed the Kingdom of Spain for themselves, now that the Carthaginians were beaten out) stirred up their Countrymen (the Lacetans) with the Celtiberian Youth, and in an hostile manner depopulated the Suesetane and Sedetane Territories, which belonged to the Allies of the Roman People. Another civil tumult arose in the Camp near the River Sucro; where there were eight Thousand Soldiers, set as a Guard to those Nations, that live on this side the River Iberus. Now they were disgusted, not just then, when they heard the General was sick, but long before, being grown licentious, as People use to be, by their continued peace and ease; and somewhat the more, because having been used so much to plunder the Enemies Country, they were now in Peace more straitened and kept in. But at first they talked only in private, and said, If there were a War in the Province, Why were they idle? if otherwise, and that the Province were quite subdu'd, Why were not the Romans gone back into Italy? They also demanded their pay with more insolence, than became the modesty and custom of Soldiers; besides that, their Sentinels gave sawcy language to the Tribunes as they went their rounds. Some also went a foraging in the night time about the Country that was at Peace: and in fine, they left their Ensigns in the Day time openly without any furrow: so that all things were carried according to the pleasure and licentious humour of the Soldiers, but nothing, consonant to the Rules and Discipline of War, or the commands of those that governed. Yet the form of the Roman Camp continued by this only means, that they, thinking the Tribunes, who were a little infected, would not be free from the contagion of that sedition and defection, permitted them to act as Judges in the Principia [the middle of the Camp] fetching the Word from them, but went themselves, in their turns, to visit all the Guards and Watches. By which means, as they had taken from them the power of commanding, so they preserved the shew of obedience to them, though they were their own Masters. Hereupon a Sedition broke out, when they perceived the Tribunes reprehended and disapproved of what was done, endeavouring to withstand it, and publicly declaring that they would not be partakers in their fury. Wherefore having turn'd the Tribunes first out of the Principia, and soon after, out of the Camp, the sole command was conferred by general consent upon the Heads of the Sedition, two private Sentinels, whose names were C. Albius Calenus, and Atrius Umber. Who being no ways content with the Tribunitial Ornaments, were so bold as to make use of those Sovereign Ensigns, the Axes and Rods. Nor did they think, that those Axes and Rods were like to fall upon their Necks and Backs, which they had carried before them to terrify others. For the report of the Death of Scipio, which they believ'd, though false, had blinded their minds: upon the common News whereof they did not doubt, But to set all Spain in flames by a War. In which tumult, they might not only exact Money of the Allies, but also rifle the neighbouring Cities. And that, amidst such disturbances, when all Men durst do what they pleas'd their actions would be less conspicuous.

XXV. When they expected fresh intelligence, not only of his Death, but Funeral also, and none came, but the false rumour vanished, the first Authors of it were inquired after. Whereupon each one excusing himself, so as that they might seem rather to have believed it at a venture, than made such a story, the Heads of the Sedition were weary of their Ensigns, and fear'd, that instead of that vain shadow of Empire which they bore, a true and a just Authority would soon turn it self upon their Heads. The Sedition being thus at a stand, there was certain intelligence brought, that Scipio was not only alive but well too, and there came to confirm it seven Tribunes of the Soldiery, who were sent by Scipio himself. At whose first arrival their minds began to be exasperated: but soon after, those Tribunes perswading such as they met and knew, with fair words, they were appeased. For going about first to every Tent, and then into the Prætorium [the Generals Tent] and Principia, where they saw any crowds of Soldiers talking together, they spoke to them; asking asking rather, What was the cause of their sudden fury and consternation, than accusing them for what they had done? They generally gave out that they had not their pay at the Day appointed: *But though at the same time, when the * villany was committed at Illiturgi, after * In the destruction of two Generals, and two Armies, the Roman Glory was preserved by their v.a. In the tour, and the Province kept still in subjection, the Illiturgitans having the due reward of their crimes, there was no Man would thank them for what they had done.* Seeing therefore that they complained in this manner, they told them, Their requests were but just, and they would tell the General of it. That they were glad the case was no worse, and might be so easily remedied: and that Scipio, through the mercy of the Gods, with the Commonwealth, was able to thank them for all their pains. Scipio who was used to War, but a stranger to Seditions, was mightily concerned at it, lest either the Army should offend him, or he punish them too much. For the present therefore, as he had begun, he thought fit to deal very gently with them, and by sending Collectors all about to the Cities that were Tributaries toward the paying of the Army, to put them in some nearer prospect and hopes of their pay. Thereupon he set forth an Edit, That they should come to Carthage for their arrears, either in small parties, or all together, as they pleased. But that which totally quieted this Sedition, which was already of it self in a languishing condition, was the sudden reconciliation of the rebellious Spaniards. For Mandonius and Indibilis were come home again, having quitted their enterprise, when they heard that Scipio was alive: nor had the seditious now any Countrymen or Stranger wherewithal to communicate their Fury. Wherefore considering all things, they found there was nothing left for them to do, better than the safest refuge, which was, To resign themselves either to the just anger, or the clemency of their General, which was not even yet to be despaired of. That he had pardoned even his Enemies, with whom he had fought: and that their sedition was carried on without any blood or wounds, being neither cruel it self, nor consequently deserving any very severe punishment. Which words of theirs were according to the nature of Mankind, who are but too rhetorical when they would lessen their own guilt. This only doubt they made, Whether they should go to fetch their pay in single Regiments or all together: but that opinion took which they thought carried most safety in it, That they should go all at once.

At the same time, when they were in this consultation, there was a Council held about XXVI. them at Carthage; where they differed in opinion, Whether they should punish only the Authors of the Sedition (who were not above five and thirty) or whether a defection, rather than a sedition, of such ill example, ought to be revenged upon more. But the milder opinion took place; That whence the fault first sprung, there the punishment should be laid: and that any sort of chastisement was enough to keep the multitude in order. Having dismissed the Council, to shew he minded what he was about, Scipio ordered the Army, that was at Carthage, to go immediately against Mandonius and Indibilis, and to take Provisions along with them for several Days. Then sending the seven Tribunes of the Soldiers, who before also went to Sucro to appease the Sedition, to meet the Army, there being five Names brought in of such as were Ringleaders of the Sedition, he ordered the Tribunes to get them invited into some Inn by Men fit for that purpose, with fair words, and courteous behaviour, and when they were drunk, to bind them. They were not far from Carthage, when those they met told them, That the next day the whole Army went with M. Silanus against the Lacetans; which News did not only free them from all fear, which tacitely lay upon their Spirits, but made them exceeding glad; because they were like to have a sole General, more than to be under his command. About Sun-setting they came into the City, and saw another Army preparing all things for their March. Then having been entertain'd with speeches made on purpose, in which they were complemented and told, That their arrival was very happy and opportune for the General; that they should come just upon the setting out of another Army, they refreshed themselves. Which when they had done, they laid hold of the Authors of the Sedition without any noise, when they were brought into the Inns by Men fit for that purpose, and bound them. At the fourth Watch the carriages of the Army, which they pretended would march, began to set out. At break of Day the Ensigns moved; but the Body of the Army was stop'd at the Gate, and Guards sent to all the Gates of the City to hinder any Body from going out. Then those, who came the Day before, being summoned to an Assembly, ran all together with speed and vehemence into the Forum to the Generals Tribunal, designing to frighten them with their shouts. At the same time the General also got up upon the Tribunal: and the Soldiers being brought back from the Gates, planted themselves behind the unarm'd Assembly. Thereupon all their courage was cooled as they afterward confessed, That nothing terrified them so much as the Generals strength and colour (whom they expected to find very ill) he having such a complexion (they said) as that they never remembered him to have such an one even in the field. He sat silent for a while, till word was brought that the Authors of the Sedition were come into the Forum, and all things were ready.

Then the Cryer commanding silence, he thus began, I thought I should never want words XXVII. to speak to my Army: not that I ever made words more than things my business; but because, almost from my childhood having lived in a Camp, I was always used to military dispositions;

yet how I shall speak to you, I do not know; no, not so much as by what name to apply myself to you, and call you: Citizens? who have revolted from your Country. Or Soldiers? who have refused my command and conduct, and broken your military oath. Enemies? I own you have the bodies, faces, habit, and guise of Citizens: but I see the actions, words, designs, and inclinations of Enemies. For what have you either desired or hoped for, but what the Iltergetes and Lacetans have done? Nay, they followed Mandonius and Indibilis, who were Princes, when they rebell'd: but you have conferred the command and conduct of your Persons upon Umbrius Atrius, and Calenus Albius. Tell me, you did not all do so, or desired it should be so, but that it was the fury and madness of some few. I am very willing to believe you when you say so. For there have such things been committed, as if they were common to all the Army, could be atoned for without great Sacrifices. But I am loth to touch them, as I would be to touch wounds; though if they are not touch'd and handled, they cannot be cured. And indeed, since the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, I did not think there had been any place in the whole Province, or any Person, where or to whom my life had been an eye-sore: so cautiously did I behave myself, not only in respect to our Allies, but even my Enemies also. In my own Camp (see how I was mistaken!) the report of my Death was not only well taken, but expected too. Not that I would have you think every one of them guilty (for if I thought my Army wished my Death, I would dye here presently before their faces; nor would my life do me any good, if it were hateful to my Countrymen and fellow Soldiers). But every multitude, like the Sea, though of its own nature immovable, as the winds and breezes move it, is calm or stormy: and the original cause of all your fury were the Authors of it, for you are mad by contagion. Nor do I think you know even to this Day to what pitch your fury would have risen; what you would have attempted against me, your Country, Parents, Children, the Gods (who are witnesses of your oaths) the Auspices, under which you have fought, the custom of War, discipline of your Ancestors or the Majesty of the Roman Empire. I say nothing of myself: you believ'd that report inconsiderately, rather than with any satisfaction. But say I were such a Person as that it were no wonder an Army should be weary of my Government. Pray, what had your Country deserv'd of you, when you betray'd it by plotting with Mandonius and Indibilis? when you took that Commission, which the Roman People gave them, from the Tribunes, and conferred it upon private Men? when, not content to make them Tribunes, you (though a Roman Army) bestow'd the Fasces, i. e. Rods of your General upon them that never had any servant to command in their lives. Albius and Atrius lay in the Prætorium: the Trumpets sounded upon their Orders: the Word was fetch'd from them: they sat upon the Tribunal of the Proconsul Scipio: they had Liſtors to attend them, who put the People by, to make room for them as they walk'd along; and the Rods and Axes carried before them. Do you think it strange for it to rain stones; for Temples to be burnt by Lightning, or that Animals should bring forth such or such a monstrous Off-spring? But this is a Prodigie that cannot be expiated with any sacrifices, nor any supplications, without the blood of them, that were so audacious as to be concerned in it.

XXVIII. Now I would fain know (though there can be no reason for an ill act) what your intention or design could be in a thing so wicked as this was. The Legion, that was sent to Rhegium for a Guard to that place, basely murdered the chief Men of the City, and kept that Town for ten years. For which the whole Legion, consisting of four Thousand Men, were all beheaded with an Axe in the Forum at Rome. But they first followed (not Atrius Umber, a fellow scarce better than a knapsack boy, and one of an ominous name, but) Decius Jubellius, a Tribune of the Soldiers: nor had they join'd themselves with Pyrrhus, the Samnites, or Lucanians, who were Enemies to the Romans: whilst you have communicated your designs with Mandonius and Indibilis, with whom you were like to have made an Alliance. They, as the Campanians Capua (which they took from the old Tuscans) the Mamertines in Sicily Messane, in like manner resolved to make Rhegium their perpetual seat; nor ever designed to molest either the Roman People or their Allies by any War. Would you have lived always at Sucro? where if I should have gone away when I had subdued the Province, and left you, you ought to have called both Gods and Men to your relief, that you did not return to your Wives and Children. But you had cast the memory of them, as of your Country and me, quite out of your minds. But I have still a great desire to find out the drift of this your design, which, though very wicked, was not so mad as to have no meaning in it. Would you, who were but eight Thousand Men, though all no doubt of more worth than Albius and Atrius are, to whom you put your selves in subjection, have taken Spain from the Roman People, whilst I was alive, and the rest of the Army safe, with whom I in one Day took Carthage; with whom I routed and put to flight four Generals, and four Armies of the Carthaginians, whom I expell'd out of this Province? But I'll omit and wave my Name. The only injury you have done me, is that you so easily believ'd my Death. Why, what? if I had dyed, would the Commonwealth and the Roman Empire have fallen with me? Good Heaven forbid it; that a City built for all eternity by the direction of the Gods, should be as perishable as this frail, mortal Body of mine. The Roman People still survive Flaminius, Paullus, Gracchus, Postumius Albinus, M. Marcellus, T. Quintius Crispinus, C. Fulvius, and my Relations, the Scipios, so many and such great Commanders, who were taken off in one War, and will out-live a thousand more, that shall die, some by Sword, and others of Diseases: and do you think then, that the Commonwealth of that great People would have been buried at my Funeral, that am but a single Person? You your selves, when my Father and Uncle, two Generals, were slain, chose, here in Spain, Septimus Marcius for their Leader against the Carthaginians, who were proud of a late Victory. I speak this to shew the folly of your imaginations: as though the Province of Spain would ever be without a Commander. Would M. Silanus, think you, who was sent hither with the same Commission as I was, L. Scipio my Brother, or C. Lælius, two Lieutenants, be wanting to revenge the honour of the Empire? Could the Armies, the Generals, their Dignity, or their cause be compared to each other? yet if you were superiour to them in all these respects, would you bear Arms for the Carthaginians against your Country, and your own fellow-Citizens? Would you have Africa to command Italy, and Carthage the City of Rome? What injury has your Country done you?

An unjust condemnation indeed, with a miserable and unworthy banishment, put Corio'anus XXIX. heretofore upon going to fight against his own Country; but his private Piety to his Mother, Wife and Children, recall'd him from that publick Parricidy. What grievances, what rage incited you? Was the deferring of your pay for a few days, when your General was sick, a sufficient ground for you to declare War against your Country? Why should you revolt from the Roman People to the Iltergetes? Why should no manner of thing, either Divine or Humane, be sacred to you? Why, indeed, my Soldiers! you were really mad: nor was the force of a distemper more violent upon my Body, than it was upon your minds. I am afraid to tell what the Men believ'd, what they hoped, or what they wished for. Let all things be swallowed up in oblivion, if it be possible: if not, at least let silence cover them. I do not deny but my speech may seem severe and harsh to you. But how much worse do you think your deeds are, than my words? And do you think it fit that I should bear with all that you have done, when you your selves will not endure to have it all so much as related? But I shall not upbraid you even with that any more; I wish you may as easily forget those things as I shall. Wherefore as to you all in general, if you repent of your error, I have revenge enough and to spare. But Albius Calenus and Atrius Umber, with the rest that were the Ring-leaders of this cursed Sedition, shall pay for it with their Blood. And their punishment ought to be to you not only not irksome, if you have recovered your senses, but a very joyful spectacle: for they had no designs more pernicious than upon you. He had scarce made an end of speaking, ere a general terrour was, by design before hand, struck into all their Eyes and Ears. For the Army, which enclosed the Assembly round, made a clattering with their Swords against their Shields; and the Cryers voice was heard, calling over the Names of those that were condemn'd in that Council. Wherefore they were dragg'd forth naked; and at the same time all the Instruments of Execution were brought out. Then the Offenders being tyed to a stake, and whip'd with Rods, were beheaded with an Axe: whilst the by-standers were so benum'd with fear, that there was not so much as any groan heard, much less any insolent word against the severity of the Punishment. After that, when they were all dragg'd out of the way, and the place purg'd, the Soldiers, call'd over by their Names before the Tribunes Military, swore to be true to P. Scipio, and had, each Man, their pay in order as they answered.

Thus was the Sedition ended, which began at Sucro. At the same time Hanno, Mago's XXX. Præfect being sent from Gades to the River Batis, with a small Band of Africans, and tempting the Spaniards with his Money, put four Thousand young Men in Arms. But soon after being forced from his Camp by L. Marcius, and having lost most part of his Men amidst the hurly burly at the taking of the Camp, as also some in their flight (the Horse pursuing the stragglers) himself with some few made his escape. Whilst these things were transacted at the River Batis, in the mean time, Lælius, having got out of the Straits into the Ocean, came by Sea to Carteia. That City is situate upon the Coast of the Ocean, just without the Straits mouth. They had hopes, as I said before, of recovering Gades, without any fighting, by treachery, there being certain Persons come to the Roman Camp, who on their own accord had promised to betray it. But the treachery was discovered before it was ripe for Execution; and Mago, having seized all the Conspirators, committed them to the custody of Adherbal the Prætor, with a charge that he should carry them to Carthage. Adherbal accordingly, having shipped them in a Gally of five Banks of Oars, and sent that before, because it was slower than one of three, himself with eight of three banks a-piece followed at a small distance. The Gally of five Banks was now just come into the strait, when Lælius in another of the same make, coming from the Port of Carteia with seven Gallies of three Banks after him, made up to Adherbal and his Gallies; as taking it for granted, that the Gally of five Banks being got into a rapid Gulph, could not go back against that Tide. The Carthaginian being surpriz'd, was for a while at a stand, and could not tell what to do: whether he should follow the five-bank'd Gally, or tack about toward the Enemy. But this delay took from him all means of avoiding the Fight, for they were now within a Darts cast of each other, and the Foe prest upon every side. The Tide also had taken away his power of guiding the Ships: nor was the Fight like a Sea engagement, there being nothing voluntary, nor any thing of art or stratagem in it. Only the force of the Sea, and the Tide, which commanded all the Fight, carried them against their own Ships, whilst they strove with their Oars to make a contrary way toward those of the Enemy: inſomuch that you might see one that was running away, forced back by the Whirlpools, and dashed against the Conquerours, and one that was in pursuit, if she light into a contrary tract of the Sea, turn away as if she had fled. And now one of them in the very Fight, when it made up with its armed stemm to bidge the Enemy, received, perchance, it self a wound in the side from the prow of another; whilst another that was going to run a cross the Foe, was in a moment turn'd with her stemm against the Tide. By which means (fortune ruling all) there was a doubtful conflict between the three-bank'd Gallies; but the Roman Gally of five, whether by reason of its weight and bulk, or that it had more rows of Oars to cut through the Whirlpools, being more easily governed, sunk two of the Enemies of three Banks, and brushing by another, broke all her Oars on one side: besides which, she had battered the rest that had come in her way, had not Adherbal, with the other five Ships, set sail and crost over into Africa.

XXXI. Laelius going back victorious to Carteia, and having heard what was done at Gades, to wit, that the Treason was detected, the Conspirators sent to Carthage, and all his hopes frustrate, he sent Messengers, the same way they had come, to L. Marcius, to tell him, That unless they should spend time to no purpose, in lingering at Gades, they must return to the General; to which Marcius assented, and some few Days after they both returned to Carthage. At whose departure Mago, who was fore put to it both by Land and Sea, had not only time to breath; but also hearing that the Illyrgetes were in Rebellion, he being thereby in hopes to recover Spain, he sent Messengers to the Senate at Carthage, who magnifying the Sedition that was in the Roman Camp, and likewise the defection of their Allies far beyond what it really was, should move them, To send Auxiliaries, wherewithal to regain the Empire of Spain, which their fore-fathers left them. Mandonius and Indibilis return'd into their own Country, and staid for some small time in suspense, till they knew what was resolved concerning the Sedition, believing, That if they pardoned the errors of their Countrymen, they might possibly excuse them also. But when they heard how severe that punishment inflicted on their own Men was, they supposed their crime would be thought to deserve the like penalty; and therefore putting their Countrymen again in Arms, and mustering up the Auxiliaries, which they formerly had, they marched over with twenty Thousand Foot, and two Thousand five Hundred Horse into the Sedetane Confines, where they at the beginning of their defection first encamped.

XXXII. Scipio having easily reconciled the minds of his Soldiers, not only by discharging his promise, and giving them all (whether guilty or not guilty) their pay, but by speaking and looking very kindly among them, before he removed his Camp from Carthage, called an Assembly, in which he made a long Invective against the treachery of the petite Kings, and said, He did not go with the same thoughts to revenge that offence, as he did of late to heal a miscarriage among his own Countrymen. For then he went, as if it had been to cut his own bowels, when with sighs and tears he expiated the imprudence or guilt of eight Thousand Men, by taking of the heads of thirty; but now he marched with joy and satisfaction to take off the Illyrgetes, they being neither born in the same Country, nor any ways allied or engaged to him, save only by a promise of friendship which they had basely broken. That he was pleased to see, that he had in his Army not only none but Countrymen, or Allies, and those of Latine extract, but also that there was hardly any one Soldier but what was brought out of Italy, either by his Uncle Cn. Scipio (who was the first Roman that came into that Province) or by his Father the Consul, or by himself. That he would carry them home again into their own Country to share in a deserved Triumph, who had been all along accustomed to the name and conduct of the Scipioes: and hoped, that when he stood for the Consulship, they would stand by him, as though their common honour were at stake. As to the present expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis, if any one thought it properly a War, he must needs forget the exploits which he had done. For he really was concerned more upon the score of Mago, who was fled out of the World into an Island surrounded by the Ocean with a few Ships, than at the Illyrgetes. For he was a Carthaginian General, and had a Pinick Guard with him be it more or less; but these were a company of Robbers and Banditti: who though they had some little strength, enough perchance to ravage the adjacent Countries, burn the Houses, and drive away the Cattel, yet in a field at a set Battel they had none. They therefore would vie with him more by their swiftness in running away, than through the trust they had in their Arms. Wherefore, that he thought fit to subdue the Illyrgetes, before he departed from that Province; not for that he feared any danger from them, or that any new War would thence arise, but first, that such a wicked defection might not go unpunished, and secondly, that it might not be said, that in a Province which was so stoutly and successfully subdued, there was any Enemy left. He therefore exhorted them in the name of the Gods to follow him, not so much to wage a War (for he had not to do with an Enemy that was equal to him) as to take revenge of a company of Malefactors.

XXXIII. Having made this Speech he dismissed them, with a charge, That they should prepare themselves to march next Day; and so setting forth, he came in ten Days time to the River Iberus. Then passing the River, he the fourth Day encamped in sight of the Enemy. Now there was a plain enclosed round about with Mountains, into which Scipio having ordered the Cattel, which he had forced, most of them, out of the Enemies Country, to be driven, driven, in order to provoke the fury of the Barbarians, he sent a party of light-armed skirmishers to stand perden; by whom when the fight was by pickeering begun, he ordered Laelius with the Horse to fall on from an Ambuscade. For the Mountain hanging over very conveniently, covered the Horse who lay there ready. Nor was there any delay made in the affair: but the Spaniards seeing the Cattel afar off, ran up to seize them, and the light-armour fell upon them, as they were laden with the booty. At first they frightened them with Darts which they threw at them, but soon after laying aside their light Weapons, which are more fit to provoke than decide a dispute of that kind, they drew their Swords, and setting Foot to Foot began the Fight; in which it was like to have gone hard with them, had not the Horse come in. Nor did they only charge up directly, and kill'd them in the Front, but some likewise wheeling about the bottom of the Hill, fell into the Reer to intercept a good many of them. By which means there was a greater slaughter, than such light skirmishes use to make. The rage of the Barbarians was rather inflamed by their ill fortune, than their courage diminished: and therefore, lest they might seem dismayed, they marched forth into the Field next Morning as soon as it was Day. But the narrow Vale (as I told you) could not contain all their Forces: only about two parts of the Foot and all the Horse went down into it; the rest of the Foot stood upon the side of the Hill. Scipio therefore supposing the narrowness of the place to be an advantage to him; not only because the Roman Soldiers could fight better in a streight than the Spaniards could; but also because the Enemies Forces were drawn down into a place, that would not hold them all, he contrived another way, as seeing, That in so narrow a compass he could not bring his Horse to cover the Foot, and that the Enemy too would find their Cavalry, which they had drawn out along with the Foot, very useless. Wherefore he commanded Laelius, To bring the Horse about the Hills the most secret way that he could; and to divide the Horse from the Foot Battel as far as possible. Mean time he turned all the Ensigns of Foot upon the Foe, putting four Regiments in the Front, because he could not make it wider. But he made no delay from fighting; that thereby he might divert the Enemy from taking notice of the Horse, which passed along over the Hills. Nor did they perceive them to be led about, before they heard the noise of an Horse Fight at their backs. Thus there were two sorts of Fights: whilst two Battalions of Foot, and two of Horse fought all the length of the Plain, the narrowness of the Vale not allowing the Battel to be mix'd of both. Since therefore, neither the Spanish Horse assisted the Foot, nor the Foot the Horse, but the Foot trusting to the Horse, were rashly posted in the Plain and kill'd, whilst the Horse, who were circumvented, could not sustain either the Roman Foot before them, (for their own Foot Forces were already gone) or the Horse behind them, they defended themselves a good while (their Horses standing still) in a circular form, but were at last every Man of them cut off, nor was there so much as one left of all the Foot and Horse that engaged in that Vale. The third part, that stood in safety upon the Hill as Spectators, rather than designed to share in the fight, had both time and place to escape. Among them the petite Kings themselves also fled away, before the whole Army was circumvented, escaping in the hurly burly.

XXXIV. The same Day the Spanish Camp, besides the other booty, was taken with near three Thousand Prisoners. There fell of Romans and their Allies in that Battel one Thousand two Hundred, but were above three Thousand wounded. The Victory had been less bloody, if they had fought in a more open plain, where it had been easie for them to have ran away. Indibilis, laying aside all thoughts of War, and fancying nothing to be safer for him in his afflicted circumstances, than to fly to Scipio's known integrity and clemency, sent his Brother Mandonius to him; who falling down before him, Accused the fatal madness of those times, when not only the Illyrgetes and Lacetans, but even the Roman Camp also were, by a kind of pestilent contagion, possessed with fury. That his own, his Brothers, and the rest of their Countrymens condition was all the same; that either, if he thought fit, they must resign their breath to Scipio from whom they received it; or being twice preserv'd, must devote their Life, which they ow'd to him only, perpetually to his service. That before, they had confidence in their own cause, when they had not as yet experienced his clemency; but that now, they had no trust in their cause, but all their hopes were reposed in the mercy of their Conquerour. Now there was an ancient custom among the Romans, that they never used their Authority over any Person (that was not in League with, or otherwise obliged to them) as a Friend and Ally, before he had surrendered all things both Divine and Humane; before they had received Hostages, taken away their Arms, and put Garrisons into their Towns. Wherefore Scipio, having severely inveighed against Mandonius, who was present, and Indibilis, who was absent, said, That though they ought justly to have dyed for their offences, yet they should live through the bounty of him and the Roman People. But that he would neither take their Arms from them (for those were pledges belonging to such as fear'd, lest the party should rebel again) but would leave them free, and their minds also void of dread. Nor would he take revenge upon innocent Hostages, being resolved to punish them themselves if they again revolted, and demand satisfaction, not of a naked, but an armed Enemy; saying moreover, that he would leave it to them, who had tryed both fortunes, whether they would rather have the Romans to be propitious.

or cruel to them. Mandonius being thus dismiss'd, with nothing but a mulct of Money which was required to pay the Soldiers: he himself having sent Marcus before-hand into the farther Spain, and Silanus back to Tarraco, when he had stay'd some few days, till the Illyrii paid their Money, he, with the nimblest of his Men, overtook Marcus, who was now got near the Ocean.

XXXV. The affair touching Masiniſſa, which was formerly begun, was for sundry reasons deferred, because the Numidian had a desire to come and treat with Scipio himself, and receive his promises from his own mouth. That was the cause of so long and rambling a Journey as Scipio then took. Masiniſſa being at Gades, where he was inform'd by Marcus of Scipio's coming, pretended, that the Horses were spoiled by being shut up so in an Island, which caused not only a scarcity of all things among other people, but they themselves also were sensible of it; besides, that the Horse-men were grown dull with idleness: By which means he induced Mago to let him go over into the Continent to plunder the neighbouring Countries of Spain. When he was got over, he sent three Numidian Noble-men before him to appoint a time and place for the Parley; two of whom he order'd to be kept by Scipio for Hostages, and the third to be sent back to conduct Masiniſſa to the place where they were to meet: and so they having but a small retinue, came to speech with one another. Now the Numidian had heard so much of Scipio's great actions, that he admired him before he saw him, having in his mind the image of a proper and a brave man. But he was struck with greater admiration when he came face to face; for besides that there was a great deal of Majesty naturally in him, he was set off with long hair, his Body not artificially trick'd up, but manly and military, and his Age in its vigour, which was the fuller and more graceful, because his recovery from a late distemper had as it were renew'd the flower of his youth. The Numidian therefore being almost astonished at the first sight of him, gave him thanks for sending back his Brothers Son; and told him, That from that time he had sought that occasion of seeing him; which being by the bounty of the Gods then offered to him, he had not omitted. That he desired to serve him and the Roman People, to such a degree, that no Foreigner should ever strive to do more for them. That though he had had that inclination a long time, yet he was not so well able to put it in execution in Spain, which was a strange Country wherewith he was not so well acquainted: but he would do it in that Country where he was born and bred to the hopes of his Fathers Kingdom, with all the industry imaginable. And if the Romans would send Scipio, as their General into Africa, he had good hopes that Carthage would not be long liv'd. Scipio was glad to see and hear him, because he knew that Masiniſſa was the chief Commander of all the Enemies Horse, and that he being a Youth, carried the tokens of courage in his very face. They therefore having mutually obliged each other to fidelity, Scipio went back to Tarraco; and Masiniſſa having by permission of the Romans (lest he should seem to have gone over to no purpose) plunder'd the adjacent Countries, return'd to Gades.

XXXVI. Mago, being his affairs were desperate in Spain, which he had formerly, first from the Mutiny of the Soldiers, and then from the defection of Indibilis, very great hopes of, was just going into Africa, when News was brought to him from Carthage, That the Senate order'd him to carry the Navy, that they had at Gades, into Italy; and there when he had rais'd as many Gauls and Ligurians as he could, to join Annibal; and not to suffer that War which was begun with the greatest animosity and greater fortune to grow old before it was ended. To that end there was Money sent to Mago from Carthage, and he exacted as much as he could from those of Gades; plundering not only their Treasury, but their Temples too, and compelling all people to bring forth their Gold and Silver to publick view. As he sail'd by the Coast of Spain, not far from New Carthage, he set his men ashore, and having ravaged all the neighbouring Country, went on from thence to the City. Where having kept his Soldiers on board in the day-time, he led them in the night to that part of the Wall through which Carthage had been taken by the Romans: supposing not only that the Garrison there was scarce strong enough, but also that some of the Townsmen were inclined to innovation. But frightened Messengers out of the Country had brought word concerning the Plunder by him committed, how the Country-people ran away, and of the Enemies being arrived. And indeed they saw a Navy in the day-time, for which reason it was manifest they had cause to set a Guard before their City. Wherefore being armed and marshalled, they were kept within the Gate that looks toward the Lake and the Sea: and as soon as the Enemy came up (the Sailors and the Soldiers all together) to the Walls with more noise than force, the Romans on a sudden opening the Gate, broke forth with a great shout, and putting the Foe into disorder (who upon their first approach, and as soon as they came to sling their Javelins, turn'd their backs) pursued them to the very shore with great slaughter. Nor had there been any one of them alive after that flight and fight, if the Ships, which lay there, had not receiv'd them. Nay they were afraid even when they were aboard; and fearing lest the Enemy should come in with their own men, drew up their Ladders, cut their Cables, and would not stay to weigh their Anchors. And many of them swimming to the Ships, when they were uncertain, by reason of the darkness, whither to make, or what to avoid, most miserably perished. The next day when the Navy was gone back to the Ocean from whence it came, there were eight hundred men slain, and two thousand Arms found between the Shore and the Wall.

Mago

Mago being gone back to Gades, but excluded thence, went with his Navy to Cimbris (a place not far from Gades) from whence he sent Ambassadors to complain, That the Gates were shut against him who was an Ally and a Friend: of which they clear'd themselves by saying, It was occasioned by the concourse of the multitude, who had been injurious to them, in that the Soldiers that were on board had plunder'd them of their Goods; but notwithstanding he took their * Suffetes, (which is the chief Magistrate among the Carthaginians) with the Questor, * A Judge: and having scourg'd them, commanded them to be nailed to a Cross. Then he went over to Pityusa, an Island about an hundred thousand fathom from the Continent (which the Carthaginians at that time inhabited) where the Navy was very peaceably received, and not only provisions bountifully supplied, but as an addition to their Navy, a great many young Men and Arms. In the strength whereof the Carthaginian cross'd over to the Baleares [Islands called Majorca and Minorca] which lye about fifty thousand fathom from that. Now the Baleares are two, one greater and more opulent in Arms and Men: besides that it had a Port where he thought he might conveniently winter; for now it was the latter end of Autumn. But his Navy was met there with as much Hostility as if the Romans had dwelt in that Island. As they now most commonly make use of Slings, so did they then, and no other Weapon. Nor is there any single person in any other Nation that is so excellent in that Art, as all the Balearians are. By which means there was such a volley of stones, like a thick shower of Hail, pour'd in upon their Navy as it approached to the shore, that they not daring to enter the Port, tack'd about into the main Sea again. Then they went to the lesser of the Balearian Islands, which is a fertile Soil, but not so strong in Men and Arms. Wherefore there going ashore they pitch'd their Camp above the Port in a place well fortified, and having got possession of the Town and Country without any contest (after they had rais'd two thousand Auxiliaries there, whom they sent to Carthage to winter) they put their Ships into the Docks. After Mago's departure from the Coast of the Ocean, the Gaditanes surrendered themselves to the Romans.

These things were done in Spain by the Conduct of P. Scipio; who, having delivered the Province up to L. Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus, returned himself to Rome. And having a Senate call'd upon his account at the Temple of Bellona, he declared what he had done in Spain; how often he had fought in pitch'd Battels, how many Towns he had taken from the Foe, what Nations he had reduced into subjection to the Roman People; that he went into Spain against four Generals, and four conquering Armies, but had left ne're a Carthaginian in all that Province. For all which he rather attempted to gain a Triumph, than pertinaciously sought it; because it was never known to that day that ever any man triumphed, unless he were or had been a Magistrate [as Consul, &c.] The Senate being dismissed, he enter'd the City, and carried before him into the Treasury fourteen thousand three hundred and forty two pound of Silver Bullion, with a great deal of coined Silver. Then L. Veturius Philo held an Assembly for the chusing of Consuls, in which all the Centuries unanimously elected P. Scipio Consul, whose Colleague was P. Licinius Crassus the High-Priest. But it is recorded, That that Assembly was greater for number than any that had been celebrated all that War: because the people met from all parts, not only to give their Votes, but to behold P. Scipio; running in crowds both to his house, and into the Capitol to see him sacrificing an hundred Oxen, which he in Spain had vowed to offer to Jupiter; and promised themselves, that as C. Iulius had put an end to the last Punick War, so P. Cornelius would do to that which was at hand; and that, as he had driven the Carthaginians out of all Spain, so he would out of Italy too; wherefore they designed Africa to be his Province, as soon as he should have ended the War in Italy. Then there was held an Assembly for chusing of Pretors: in which there were two elected, that then were Ediles of the People, whose Names were Sp. Lucretius and Cn. Octavius, and two private persons, Cn. Servilius Capio, and L. Aemilius Papus. P. Cornelius Scipio and P. Licinius Crassus began their Consulship in the fourteenth year of the Punick War. Their Provinces were assigned to the Consuls, to wit, Sicily to Scipio, without Lots, by his Colleagues agreement, because the care of Holy things were allotted them; the City falling to Cn. Servilius; Ariminum (so they call'd Gallia) to Sp. Lucretius; Sicily to L. Aemilius; and Sardinia to Cn. Octavius. After that a Senate was held in the Capitol; where upon the Proposal of P. Scipio an Order of Senate was made, That what Games he vowed in Spain during the Mutiny among the Soldiers, he should set forth and defray out of that money which he himself had brought into the Treasury.

Then he introduced the Saguntine Ambassadors into the Senate: where the eldest of them said; Grave Fathers, though there be nothing more calamitous than what we have suffer'd, to make us for ever true to you; yet such are the deserts of you and your Generals toward us, that we are not sorry for our losses. You undertook the War upon our score, and have maintain'd so constantly for these fourteen years, that not only you your selves have been in the greatest danger, but you have put the People of Carthage too into the same circumstances. When you had such a dreadful War in Italy and Hannibal your Enemy, you sent Consuls with an Army into Spain, to gather up, as it were, the reliques of our shipwreck. P. and Cn. Cornelius, since they came into that Province, never ceased to do all things that might conduce to our good, and the ruine of the

the Enemy. They have first of all restored to us our Town; they have redeemed our Fellow-Citizens, who were sold all over Spain, from slavery to liberty, sending men to find them out. When we were just a going to be happy instead of being so miserable as before, P. and Cn. Cornelius, your Generals, dy'd more, if 'twere possible, to our grief, than yours. And then we thought our selves brought back from distant places to our ancient Seat, only to perish once again, and see a second ruine of our Country; nor did we fancy there was any need of a Carthaginian Army or General to undo us; for we might be destroy'd by the Turdetans, our old Enemies, who had been the cause of all our former misfortunes: when unexpectedly you sent us this same P. Scipio: whom, we having seen, declar'd Consul, think our selves the happiest of all the Saguntines, and will tell the same to our Fellow-Citizens, concerning him who was our hope, our help, and deliverance. Who when he took a great many Cities in Spain from your Enemies; pick'd out the Saguntines in all places from among the other Captives, and sent them back into their own Country. In fine, he so afflicted Turdetania (a Nation so much at enmity with us, that if that were safe, Saguntum could not stand) with War, that it will not be terrible not only to us, but (without envy may I speak it) even our posterity. We see your City destroy'd, in favour of whom Saguntum was sack'd by Annibal. We receive Tribute out of your Country, which is not more pleasant to us upon the score of profit than revenge. For these things, than which we could neither hope nor wish for greater from the immortal Gods, the Senate and People of Saguntum sent us ten Ambassadors to you to give you thanks: and likewise to congratulate, that you have managed your affairs so well in Italy and Spain for these several years, that you have subdu'd Spain, not only as far as the River Iberus, but even to the end of the Earth, the Ocean; and have left the Carthaginian nothing in Italy but what the Bulwark of his Camp incloses. We were commanded also not only to return thanks to the great and good Jupiter, who presides over the Capitol, but to offer unto him this Present (with your permission) which is a Crown of Gold, upon the account of that Victory: wherefore we intreat you to permit us, and that, if you think good, what benefits we have received from your Generals, you would by your Authority ratifie and perpetuate. The Senate answer'd the Saguntine Ambassadors in this manner: That the destruction and restauration of Saguntum would be an example to all Nations of a faithful Alliance preserv'd on both sides. That their Generals did well according to order and the mind of the Senate, when they retriev'd Saguntum, and redeem'd its Inhabitants from slavery; that whatever else they did, which was a kindness to them, was done according to the will of the Senate; and lastly, that they permitted them to lay their Offering in the Capitol. Then there was a peculiar place and a Banquet provided for the Ambassadors, with Presents to each of them of ten thousand Sesterces a man. After that the other Embassies were brought into the Senate, and had their Audience: and whereas the Saguntines desired, that as far as it was safe for them, they might go and see Italy: they had Guides assign'd them, and Letters were sent through all the Towns, that they should entertain the Spaniards very kindly. Then Proposals were made touching the Commonwealth for the raising of Armies, and concerning the Provinces.

XL.

When the People commonly reported, that Africa, as a new Province, was design'd for P. Scipio without casting Lots, and he himself content with no moderate glory, us'd to say, That he was declared Consul, not only to wage, but to end a War; nor could that be made an end of any otherwise, than by his transporting his Army into Africa; and told the people openly, that he would do so, even against the Senates order: his design being not at all pleasing to the chief of the Senate (besides that the rest of them through fear or ambition began to murmur) Q. Fabius Maximus being asked his Opinion, he said; Grave Fathers, I know a great many of you think, that we are this day about a business that's done to our hands, and that he who shall give his opinion concerning the Province of Africa, as a new thing, will speak to no purpose. But in the first place I cannot tell how Africa is already so certainly design'd to be our stout and warlike Consuls Province, since neither the Senate hath thought fit that it should be a Province for this year, nor have the people given their consents. If it be, I think the Consul only is to blame, who pretending he refers a thing to you that is already settled, affronts and laughs at the Senate, and not the Senators in general who gave their opinions touching any thing that is here debated. For my part I am sure, by dissenting to this hasty Expedition into Africa, to undergo the censure of two things; the one, of my natural inclination to make delays; (which let young men call sloth and fear, if they please, whilst I am satisfied, that though the counsels of others have always seem'd more plausible at first sight, mine have proved better in the end) the other, of spite and envy against the daily growing glory of the valiant Consul. From which suspicion, if my past life and manners, nor a Dictatorship, and five Consulates, together with so much glory gained at home and in the Wars, does not vindicate me, who am rather cloy'd with it, than desire any more, let my age at least deliver me. For what emulation could there be between me and him, who is not so old even as my Son? No man either in the Senate or among the People ever heard me, when I was Dictator, in the vigour of my age, and the greatest Employment, refuse, that the Master of the Horse, who envy'd me (a thing never heard of before) should be made equal to me. I chose rather to see by actions, you hear only in words, that he who in the judgment of others was compared to me, should prefer me before himself even by his own confession. Far be it from me, who have born so many honourable Offices, to propose a quarrel or an emulation with a Youth who is in the flower of his age: to wit, that the Province of Africa, if it be not given to him, may be assign'd

to

to me, who am not only a weary of business, but even of living too. No, I must live and die with what glory I have already gain'd. I kept Annibal from making a Conquest, that he might be vanquish'd even by you, who now are in your full strength.

This one thing, P. Cornelius, you ought to pardon in me, if, as I never prefer'd the applause of men before the interest of the Commonwealth, I do not value your honour above the publick good. If indeed there were either no War in Italy, or the Enemy such an one, as that a man could get no credit by conquering of him, he that should keep you in Italy, though he did it for the publick good, might seem to go about to rob you of an opportunity of going to War, and gaining great glory there. But seeing Annibal has been our Enemy, and with an entire Army beset Italy for these fourteen years, will you be sorry, P. Cornelius, to lose your glorious opportunity in Africa, if whilst you are Consul, you drive such an Enemy, who has been the cause of so much death and slaughter among us, out of Italy? And if, as C. Lutatius had the honour to end the last Punick War, so you have of this? unless Amilcar is to be prefer'd for a General before Annibal, or that War to this, or that Victory may probably be more glorious and honourable than this; if it so fall out, that we, whilst you are Consul, overcome him; would you rather drive Amilcar from Drepanum and Eryce, than drive the Carthaginians and Annibal out of Italy? Even you your self, though you love the glory you have gain'd, more than what you hope for, would boast more of their having deliver'd Spain from War, than you would of freeing Italy from the same misfortunes. Annibal is not yet so abject; but that whoever chuses another War, must needs seem rather to fear, than slight him. Do you prepare for this then, and go thus round about, so as that, when you are got into Africa, you hope Annibal will follow you, rather than bend your Forces straight to the place where Annibal is? Are these the glorious Palms that you aim at for a reward of your ending the Punick War? This ought to take precedence even in Nature, that when you have defended your own Country, you should go to oppose a foreign Land. Make peace in Italy before you raise a War in Africa: and let us be rid of our fear, before we procure any such to others. If you by your Conduct and good Fortune can do both, with all my heart; when you have conquer'd Annibal, take Carthage. But if one of those Victories must needs be left to new Consuls, the former, as it is greater and of more renown, so it will be after that the occasion of another. For now, besides that the Treasury cannot maintain two several Armies in Italy and Africa; besides, that we have not wherewithal to keep up our Navies, nor can supply sufficient provisions for them, who does not see what mighty dangers we run into? P. Licinius will make a War in Italy, and P. Scipio in Africa. What if Annibal (which all the Gods forbid, and I tremble to speak it, though what has happen'd may happen again) should be victorious and advance as far as this City; shall we then send for you, our Consul, out of Africa, as we did for Q. Fulvius from Capua? I need not say, that the event of War will be the same in Africa as here. Your Family, your Father and Uncle, who were slain with their Armies in thirty days, may be an example to you, who by your great Exploits both at Sea and Land had so augmented the fame of your own Family and the Roman People among Foreign Nations. The time would fail me, if I should reckon up the Generals that have rashly ventur'd over into an Enemies Country to the great damage of your own persons and loss of their Arms. The Athenians, a very prudent People, who left a War at home, by the advice of a Youth, who was as active as noble, and went over with a great Navy into Sicily, quite ruin'd their flourishing Commonwealth in one Sea-fight.

But I repeat things that are foreign and ancient. This very same Country of Africa, and M. Atilius may be a signal Example to us of both sorts of Fortune. Let me tell you, P. Cornelius, when you come within sight of Africa, your Conquests in Spain will seem to have been but sport and pastime to you. For what comparison is there? When you went to Spain, you coasted along by Italy and France through a calm and peaceable Sea, till your Navy arriv'd at Emporice, a City belonging to our Allies: where setting your men ashore, you led them all through safe places to the Friends and Associates of the Roman People at Tarraco: from whence again you march'd through Roman Garrisons all along; till you came to the River Iberus, where round about there lay the Armies of your Father and Uncle, who after they had lost their Generals, were incens'd by that very misfortune: and that great man L. Marcius, who though he were a tumultuary Leader, and chosen in haste by the Suffrage of the Soldiery for a time only, yet if he had had the Ornaments of Nobility and equal Honours, would not have been inferior to the most famous Commanders in any part of military skill. Then Carthage was attack'd with all the ease imaginable, whilst we're an one of three Punick Armies would defend their Allies. All other things (nor do I lessen them) were no ways comparable to a War with Africa; in which you have ne're a Port for our Navy, ne're a Country at peace with us, ne're a City that is our Ally, or a King our Friend, no place to iye still, nor no place to march forward in. Where-ever you look about you, all things appear at enmity with you. Rashness is not always successful; and fraud procures it self credit by small things, that when occasion serves, it may cheat to greater advantage. Their Enemies did not circumvent your Father and Uncle with their Arms, sooner than the Celtiberians, their Allies, with fraud: nor were you your self in so much danger from Mago and Asdrubal, the Enemies Generals, as from Mandonius and Indibilis, whom you had receiv'd into friendship. And can you trust the Numidians, who have experienced a defection in their own Soldiers? Both Syphax and Masinilla wish themselves to be the most puissant Princes in all Africa, rather than the Carthaginians should be most powerful; and the Carthaginians to be before any body body else. At present indeed an emulation between them, and all occasions of quarrelling provoke them against each other, because they have no foreign Foe to fear: but do you once shew them Roman Arms and a foreign Army, they will run together as if it were to quench a common Conflagration. Those same Carthaginians who made but a weak defence in Spain, will defend the Walls of their Country, the Temples of their Gods, their Altars and Houses at another guise rate. Now when as they go to Battel, their fearful wives follow them, and their small children meet them. But then besides all this; what if the Carthaginians, confiding in the agreement of Africa, the fidelity of the Kings, their Allies, their own Walls, when they see Italy bereft of that assistance which you and your Army could give it, should either themselves send a new Army over into Italy from Africa, or order Mago who now, we know, having left the Balears, is cruising near the Coast of the Alpine Ligurians, to joyn Annibal? Then certainly we shall be in the same fright, in which we lately were, when Adrubal came over into Italy: whom you, who are now resolv'd to invest not only Carthage, but even all Africa with your Army, sent out of your own hands into Italy. He was conquer'd by you, you'll say; why, therefore I think it the more dishonourable not only for you, but upon the score of the Commonwealth also, that you should permit him, who was vanquish'd by you, to come into Italy. Will you have us assign all the good Fortune that you and the Commonwealth have had to your Conduct, but to attribute all the bad to meer accident and blind chance? The better and more valiant you are, the more your Country and all Italy desire you to stay and look after them. You your self cannot chuse but owne, that where Annibal is, there is the chief Seat and Fortrefs of this War. For you pretend, that you therefore would fain go over into Africa, that you may draw Annibal after you. Wherefore whether here or there your business is like to be with Annibal. Tell me then, pray now, when you will be stronger; by being alone in Africa, or here, when your Collegue and you have joy'd your Armies together? Are not Claudius and Livius, the Consul, a fresh example to shew of what importance that is? What? will the utmost corner of the Bruttian Territories, or Carthage, when he is near it, together with all his Allies in Africa, make Annibal (who has now for a long time in vain desired Auxiliaries from home) more powerful in Men and Arms? What Policy is this; to fight where your Forces are half as little again as they would be, and the Enemies much greater, rather than where you may engage with two Armies against one that has been tired with so many Battels and such a tedious Campaigne? Think with your self, how your designs agree with your Fathers. He, when he was Consul, and gone into Spain, returned out of his Province into Italy, to meet Annibal, as he was coming down from the Alpes: you, on the contrary, now that Annibal is in Italy are going to leave it, not because you think it for the good of the Commonwealth, but because 'tis great and glorious. Just as when you formerly left the Province and the Army without any Law, or Order of Senate; and though you were the Roman Peoples General, committed the publick Fortune and Honour of the Commonwealth, which then were hazarded in your person, to two Ships. Grave Fathers, I am of opinion that P. Cornelius was created Consul for the Commonwealth and us, not for his own private ends: and that the Armies were raised to preserve this City and all the rest of Italy, not for the Consuls, in a proud, Kingly manner, to carry over Seas, to what part of the World they please.

XLIII.

Fabius having moved great part of the Senate, and the Seniors most of all, by this Oration, which he had calculated for that juncture, as also by his Authority and the ancient fame of his Prudence; so that more of them commended the old mans design before the young mans resolution, Scipio is said to have made this Speech: Q. Fabius himself in the beginning of his Speech, Grave Fathers, has told you, that there may some slight be suspected in his opinion. Of which thing I dare not accuse such a great man, so much as either his own words, or the thing it self make him guilty. For he has so extolled his own Honours and the fame of his Exploits, to take away the crime of envy, as if I were in danger of having every little Fellow my Rival, but not of him, who, because he excels all others (though I endeavour, I confess, to be as great as He is) would not have me made his equal: he has made himself so old and honourable, that he has placed me even below his Son; as though the desire of glory extended no farther than the length of a mans life, and the greatest part of it lookt forward toward future ages. But I really believe that every great person does not only compare himself with those that are his Contemporaries, but with the famous men of all ages. Nor do I indeed deny, Q. Fabius, but that I would not only equal your achievements, but if I could (I beg your pardon for saying so) even outdo them. You ought not to be so affected toward me, nor I toward my Juniors, as to be unwilling that any of them should be like us. For that would, be a detriment not only to such men as we envy'd, but to the Commonwealth, and almost all Mankind. He told you what great danger I was running into, if I went over into Africa; that he might seem concerned for me also, and not only for the Commonwealth and the Army. Whence comes he on the sudden to take such care of me? When my Father and Uncle were slain; and their two Armies almost all ruined and destroyed: when Spain was lost; when four Armies of Carthaginians, and four Generals kept all people in dread and arms: when they sought a General for that War, and no body appear'd but I; no one durst give in his name: when the People of Rome on their own accord conferr'd the Generalship upon me, though but four and twenty years of age, why did not any body then mind them of my Age, the strength of the Foe, the difficulty of the War, and the late misfortune of my Father and Uncle? Is there any greater calamity now befallen us in Africa, than was at that time in Spain? Are their Armies now bigger, and their Generals more or greater in Africa, than they were then in Spain? Or was my Age more ripe then for War, than now it is? Is it more proper to wage War with a Carthaginian ginian Enemy in Spain, than in Africa? 'Tis an easie matter, after I have routed and put to flight four Carthaginian Armies, taken so many Cities by storm, or reduced them by fear; after I have subdu'd all Spain, even to the Ocean, so many petty Kings, and so many barbarous Nations, recovering the whole Province to that degree, that there is no tract of any War left in it; after all this, I say, 'tis sure a very easie thing to lessen my actions; yea, truly, as easie as if I should return victorious out of Africa, 'twould be to diminish those things, that now, to keep me here, are so much magnified to make them seem terrible to us. He says, there is no coming to Africa, nor any Ports open. He tells us, that M. Atilius was taken in Africa (as though M. Atilius had miscarried upon his first arrival there) but he does not say, that the Ports of Africa were open even to that unhappy General, or that he did great things the first year; and, in respect to the Carthaginians, remain'd unconquer'd to the last. You therefore, Fabius, shall not at all deter me by that one Example: for seeing that calamity befel us not in this, but a former War; not of late, but forty years ago; why should I e're the less go over into Africa, because Regulus was taken there, than I did into Spain, after the Scipios were slain? Why should I let Xantippus, a Lacedemonian, be more successfully born for the advantage of the Carthaginians, than I am for my own Country? Nay I should have the greater confidence, for that very reason, that the Valour and Conduct of one single Person might be of very great moment. But besides this, the Athenians must be quoted, who, omitting a War at home, went rashly over into Sicily. Why, pray you, since you have so much leisure as to tell Grecian Fables, don't you rather inform us, that Agathocles, King of Syracuse, after Sicily had been long engaged in a Punick War, went over into this same Africa, and turn'd the War from Sicily to that Country, from whence it first came?

But what necessity is there for me to illustrate by old and foreign instances what it is voluntarily to strike a dread into ones Enemy, and removing danger from ones self, to bring another into it? Can there be any greater or nearer example than Annibal now is? There is a great deal of difference between your pillaging of a strange Country, and seeing your own all burnt and destroy'd: and he that is the Aggressor in any danger, has more resolution than he who only defends himself against it: besides, that the terror is far greater when a man is unacquainted with the state of affairs. You may better discern the good and bad circumstances of an Enemy by going into his Country. Annibal could not hope that so many people in Italy would have revolted to him as did after the Battle of Cannæ: how much less firm and stable is any thing in Africa to the Carthaginians, who are as unfaithful Allies, as they are grievous and tyrannical Masters? Moreover, when we were deserted by our Allies, we stood upon our own strength, even the Roman Soldiery: but the Carthaginians have no domestick strength; all their Soldiers are Hirplings; as Africans and Numidians, very fickle people, and apt to alter their resolutions. If you do not hinder me, you shall hear not only that I am got over into Africa, but that at the same time it is all on a flame with War, that Hannibal is removing out of Italy, and that Carthage is besieged. Expect more joyful and frequent messages out of Africa, than you receiv'd out of Spain. The Fortune of the Roman People, the Gods, who are Witnesses that the Enemy have violated their League with the two Kings, Syphax and Masinissa (whom I will so far rely upon, as to be secure from their Treachery) give me these hopes. The War will discover many things which do not yet, at such a distance, appear. And it is the part of a man and a General not to be wanting when Fortune offers her self, but to turn all accidents to his own advantage. I shall indeed, Q. Fabius, have my Much of Annibal, as you say; but I'd rather draw him after me, than he should keep me here. I'll force him to fight in his own Country; and Carthage shall be the reward of the Victory, rather than the half demolish'd Castles of the Bruttii. Let the Commonwealth, whilst I go over, land my Army, and march up to Carthage, should receive any damage: I hope you will not think so meanly of him, as to deny, that now when Annibal is so much shock'd, and almost broken in pieces, P. Licinius who is a Consul, and a very stout man, can do, what you, Q. Fabius, could do when Annibal ran with Victory over all Italy; and that he happen'd not to have this distant Province, because being High-Priest he could not be spared from the management of Holy things. If therefore this War should not be ended any thing the sooner this way that I suppose, yet it will advance the dignity of the Roman People, and their renown among all Foreign Kings and Nations, that we seem to have courage enough, not only to defend Italy, but of our own accord also to make War upon Africa: when no one shall believe, or say, that Annibal did that which no Roman General durst ever attempt; but that Africa, which in the former Punick War (when the contest was about Sicily) was so often attack'd by our Armies and Navies, should be at this time, when Italy is in dispute, all quiet and at peace. Let Italy, which has long been vexed, at last take its ease, and Africa be burnt and pillaged in the stead of it. Let the Roman Camp rather lie at the Gates of Carthage, than we again see the Bulwark of the Enemy from our very Walls. Let Africa be the Seat of War for the future; and let the terror and consternation, devastation of Countries, defection of Allies, and those other calamities which for fourteen years together fell so thick upon us, be now turn'd upon them. As to what concerns the Commonwealth, let it suffice to mention the War that is at hand and the Provinces in question. But take no notice of that long Speech of Fabius's; for as he has lessen'd my actions in Spain, so could I, if I would, diminish his glory, whilst I extolled my own. But I, Grave Fathers, shall do neither; but if in no other thing, at least in modesty and the government of my tongue I'll outdo the old Gentleman, as very a Boy

They heard Scipio with some partiality, because it had been reported, That if the Senate would not agree to his Proposal, and order him the Province of Africa, he would immediately refer it to the People. Wherefore Q. Fulvius, who had been Consul four times, and Censor too, desired the Consul publicly in the Senate to declare, "Whether he would leave it to the Senate to order the Provinces as they thought fit, and stand by their determination, or refer it to the People. To which Scipio answering, "That he would do all for the good of the Publick: Fulvius reply'd, "I did not ask you, because I did not know what you would say or do; for you have given out, That you rather try the Senate than consult them; and that, if we do not presently assign you the Province that you desire, you have a Bill ready to prefer to the Commons. Wherefore I, said he, desire of you, O Tribunes of the People, that you would assist me, if I therefore refuse to give my opinion, because though most Voices are on my side, the Consul will not agree to it. Then there arose a squabble, the Consul denying, "That it was fair for the Tribunes to intercede, and hinder the Senators from giving each one his opinion in order as they were asked. The Tribunes thus decreed: "If the Consul leave the matter concerning the Provinces to the Senate, we will make him stand to what the Senate orders; nor will we suffer any reference to be made of that business to the People: if he doth not leave it to them, we will assist any man that shall refuse to give his opinion in it. The Consul then desired a day to talk with his Colleague: and the next day it was left to the Senate. By whom the Provinces were thus divided: to one of the Consuls Sicily, and the thirty Ships of War which C. Servilius had the year before; with permission to go into Africa, if he thought it were for the good of the Commonwealth. To the other the Bruttii, and the War against Annibal, with that Army which L. Veturius or Q. Caelius had; and L. Veturius and Q. Caelius should cast Lots, or agree between themselves, whether of them should manage the matter among the Bruttii with those two Legions that the Consul had left: and that his Command, to whose Lot that Province fell, should be continued for a year. The Commissions of other Commanders also, except the Consuls and Prætors, who were to preside over Armies and Provinces, were continued. It fell to Q. Caelius's Lot to go along with the Consul into the Country of the Bruttii against Annibal. Then Scipio's Games were celebrated with great throngs and favour of the Beholders. And there were Ambassadors sent to Delphi to carry an Offering to Apollo out of the Booty taken from Asdrubal, whose Names were M. Pomponius Mitho, and Q. Catius; who carried a golden Crown of 200 weight, and the representation of the spoils, made of a thousand pound of Silver. Scipio, though as he did not obtain, so he did not much strive for a Levy, yet had an order to take as many Volunteers as he could get, and because he had said, his Navy should be no charge to the Commonwealth, to take what their Allies would give him toward the building of new Ships. First then the several people of Etruria promised to assist the Consul, each Town according to their abilities. "The Cervites were to give him Corn and Provisions of all sorts, the Populonians Iron, the Tarquinians Linen for Sails, the Volaterrans Tackling for the Ships, and Corn, the Arretines 30000 Shields, and as many Helmets, with javelins, half Pikes and long Spears, fifty thousand of each sort; besides Axes, Mattocks, Sickles, * Baskets or wooden Vessels, and Moles, as many as would serve 40 long Ships. * Alcenios. "Add to these 120000 Bushels of Wheat, with Provisions by the way for the Decurions and Rowers. The Perusines, the Clusines, and the Rusellans gave him Firr-trees to make him Ships of, and a great quantity of Corn. He had Firr out of the publick Woods. The People of Umbria, the Nursines, the Reatinæ, Amiternines, and all the Sabines promised him Soldiers. Besides, with the Marsians, Pelignians and Marrucinians, many of them listed themselves voluntarily into his Navy. The Camertes also, being in League with the Romans, sent him a Regiment of six hundred Men. By which assistance of theirs, he having laid the keels or foundations of thirty Ships, that is to say, twenty of five banks of Oars, and ten of four, he ply'd the work so fast, that upon the fortieth day, after the Wood was brought out of the Forests, the Ships were rigged, armed and launched.

XLV.

He went into Sicily with thirty long Ships, having about 7000 Volunteers on board them. And at the same time P. Licinius came to the two Consular Armies that lay in the Country of the Bruttii, taking that to himself, which L. Veturius, when he was Consul, had. He permitted Metellus to command those Legions, which he had formerly commanded, as thinking that he might do the business with more ease, having those that were used to his Command. The Prætors also were sent into several Provinces. But because he wanted Money to carry on the War, the Questors were order'd to sell that part of Campania, that lies between the Ditch called Fossa Græca and the Sea, allowing, that Information might be made, what Lands belonged to each Campanian, to the end that it might be made the publick Estate of the Roman People. Whereupon he also appointed a reward to the Informer, which was, the tenth part of the value of the Land. And C. Servilius, Prætor of the City, was to take care, That the Campanians should live only where they were allow'd to live by order of the Senate, and to punish them that dwelt any where else. The same Summer Mago, Son to Amil-

car came from Minorca, where he had winter'd, into Italy, with about thirty Ships of War and many of burden, on board of which were a choice number of young men, 12000 Foot and almost 2000 Horse; and having taken Genua, where there were no Garrisons to defend the Sea-coast, by his sudden arrival there, he sail'd thence to the Coast of the Alpine Ligurians, to see if he could cause any disturbances in those parts. The Ingauni (a People of Liguria) at that time had War with the Epanterii that live upon the Mountains. Wherefore the Carthaginian having laid up his Booty at Savo, an Alpine Town, and left ten long Ships in the Harbour for a Guard, he sent the rest to Carthage to defend the Sea-coast, because there was a report, That Scipio was gone over; but himself entering into an Alliance with the Ingauni, whose friendship he prefer'd, he immediately set upon the Mountaineers. Thereupon his Army daily increased; for the Gauls came flocking in from all parts as soon as they heard of his Name. Which News being brought by Letters from Sp. Lucretius, put the Senate into a great solicitude, lest they should have rejoiced at the destruction of Asdrubal and his Army two years before to no purpose, if another War of the same kind should from thence arise, with the General only changed. Wherefore they command M. Livius the Proconsul to lead the Army of Volunteers out of Etruria to Ariminum, and empower'd Cn. Servilius the Prætor, if he thought it for the common good, to order two Legions out of the City, bestowing the Command to whom he pleased. M. Valerius Lævinus led those Legions to Arretium. At the same time eighty Ships of burden belonging to the Carthaginians, were taken by Cn. Octavius about Sardinia, of which he was Governor. Calius says, that those Ships were laden with Corn and Provisions sent to Annibal; but Valerius, that they were taken, carrying the Etrurian Booty and the Captives of the Mountain-Ligurians to Carthage. In the Country of the Bruttii there was hardly any thing done that year worth remembering. A Plague seized equally upon the Romans and Carthaginians, save that besides the disease, a Famine also befet the Punick Army. Annibal spent that Summer near the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he built an Altar, and dedicated it with a large account of the Exploits which he had done, engraven in Punick and Greek Letters.

Mago, who stay'd in Gallia and Liguria, had not only a great number of Men sent him out of Africa, but Money also to hire Auxiliaries; being order'd likewise to join Annibal. 6. Scipio came over from Syracuse into the Country of the Bruttii, and retok Locri, when he had driven out the Punick Garrison, and routed Annibal. 12. A Peace was made with Philip. 10, 11. Cybeles Image (called Mater Idæa) was brought over to Rome from Pessinus, a Town in Phrygia, a Verse being found in the Sibyls Books, That the foreign Enemy might be driven out of Italy, if the Mater Idæa were brought to Rome. It was deliver'd to the Romans by Attalus a King of Alia. 14. There was a Stone which the Inhabitants called, The Mother of the Gods. P. Scipio Nasica receiv'd it, who was the Son of Cneius, that dy'd in Spain, as being by the Senate accounted a very good man, though not of years enough to be a Questor [that is, not 27;] because the Answer was, That that Deity should be entertain'd and consecrated by a very good Man. 16, 17, &c. The Locrians sent Ambassadors to Rome, to complain of the enormities of Q. Pleminius, the Lieutenant, for having taken away the Money belonging to Proserpina, and ravishing their Children and Wives. 22. Pleminius being brought to Rome in Chains, dy'd in Prison. 21, 22. Upon a false rumour that was brought into the City concerning P. Scipio, Proconsul in Sicily, that he was luxurious, the Senate sent Ambassadors to inquire into the truth of it, and Scipio, being acquitted of that scandal, went over into Africa by the Senates permission. 23. Syphax having married the Daughter of Asdrubal, Son of Gisgo, renounc'd the friendship which he himself had contracted with Scipio. 28, &c. Masinissa, King of the Masseylians, fighting for the Carthaginians in Spain, after he had lost his Father Gala, lost his Kingdom also: which though he often endeavour'd by war to regain, he was overcome in several Battels by Syphax, King of Numidia, and totally deprived of it. Then he with 200 Horse being banish'd, join'd himself to Scipio; with whom in the very first War he slew Hanno, Son of Amilcar, and a great body of Men. 35. Scipio, upon the arrival of Asdrubal and Syphax, who were come near him with 100000 Soldiers, being beaten off from the Siege of Utica, made himself strong Winter-quarters. 36. Sempronius, the Proconsul, fought very prosperously against Annibal in the fields of Croton. 37. The Censors sit up a Lustrum [i.e. a Survey of the People:] in which the Pole of the Citizens came to 215000 pounds. There was a remarkable dissention between the two Censors, M. Livius, and Cl. Nero. For Claudius had taken Livius his Colligues Horie from him, because he was condemn'd by the People, and banish'd: and Livius his from Claudius, for having born false witness against him, and not having reconciled him according to the rules of Justice and Honour. The same person also left all the Tribes, save one, disfranchiz'd, because they condemn'd him, though innocent, and afterward made him Consul and Censor.

Scipio, when he came into Sicily, set his Volunteers in orders, and divided them into Centuries: of whom he had 200 young men in the flower of their age, and of great strength to attend his own Person, who knew not either why they were so divided, or armed. Then he chose 300 Horsemen, out of the young Nobility of all Sicily, to go over over with him into Africa; appointing them a day to rendezvous, all ready with Horses and Arms. That Service, being far from home, they thought would give them a great deal of trouble both by Sea and Land, and expose them to a great many dangers; nor were they themselves only concern'd at it, but their Parents and Relations were mightily troubled. When the day appointed came, they appear'd with their Horses and Arms. Whereupon Scipio told them, He heard that some of the Sicilian Horsemen were discouraged at that Expedition, as thinking it would be difficult and tedious to them; if any of them were of that opinion, he would rather they should then declare it, than afterward complain, and prove dull, useless Soldiers to the Commonwealth. Let them speak their thoughts, he would hear them very patiently. At which one of them being so bold to say, That if he might speak his mind freely, he had no mind at all to go to the Wars: Scipio reply'd unto him, and said, Well, young man, since you have been so open-hearted as to tell me your mind, I'll find a Substitute for you, to whom you shall deliver your Arms, your Horse and other Equipage, and taking him home along with you, shall discipline and teach him how to manage your Horse and Arms. The young Man being glad of that bargain, Scipio gave him one Man out of 300 which he had unarmed. When the rest saw that Horseman thus discharged by consent of their General, each of them began to excuse himself, and desired a Substitute. By which means 300 Roman Horsemen were put in the places of 300 Sicilians without any publick charge. The Sicilians had the care of disciplining and teaching them how to behave themselves; because by the General's Edict, He was to go for a Soldier himself in person that did not do so. They say, this became an extraordinary good Squadron of Horse, and did the Commonwealth great service in many Battels. After that he made an inspection into the Legions, out of which he chose all the oldest Soldiers, and especially such as had served under Marcellus: because he thought that they were not only well disciplined, but also that, from the long Siege of Syracuse, they had gained a great experience in storming and attacking of Towns. For he now had no small things in his mind; no less than the taking of Carthage itself. Then he dispersed his men into the several Towns, exacting Corn from the Cities of Sicily, and sparing that which was brought from Italy: besides that he refitted out his old Ships, and with them sent C. Lelius into Africa to forage. The new ones he put into Docks at Panormus, because they were made in haste of green wood, that they might lie dry all the Winter. Having prepared all things for the War, he came to Syracuse, which was not yet altogether at quiet from the great disturbances that had been there by the War. At that time the Sicilian Greeks demanded back from some Italians (who kept what they had got with the same force where-with they had taken it) certain Goods of theirs, which the Senate had granted to them. Scipio therefore supposing it to be his best way to keep up the publick Faith, partly by Edict, and partly by Judgments given against those who pertinaciously refused to do them Justice, gave the Syracusans their Goods again. That action of his was not only well accepted by them, but by all the People of Sicily, who for that reason contributed more chearfully toward the carrying on of the War. The same Summer there arose a great War in Spain by the instigation of Indibilis the Illyrian, upon no other ground than his contemning all other Generals in respect of Scipio: For he thought (he said) Scipio was the only General that the Romans had now alive, the rest being slain by Annibal: so that they had ne're another, now that the Scipios were killed, to send into Spain: and that when they were prest in Italy with a more grievous War, they sent for him to oppose Annibal. That the Romans had nothing but the Names of Generals in Spain, and that the old Army also was carried thence. That all things were in a consternation, and nothing there but a confused crowd of fresh-water Soldiers. That they should never have such another opportunity to deliver Spain. That they had been slaves till that time to the Carthaginians or the Romans; not only alternately, sometimes to the one, and sometimes to the other, but now and then to both at once. That the Carthaginians were driven out by the Romans; and the Romans might, if all people would consent to it, be as well expelled by the Spaniards; and Spain, being for ever freed from all foreign Dominion, return again to its old customs and usage. By these and such like Speeches he excited not only his own Countrymen, but the Ausetans also, a neighbouring Nation, with other people that border'd both upon him and them. By which means within a few days 30000 Foot, and almost 4000 Horse met, as they were order'd, in the Sedetan fields.

II. The Roman Generals also, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, lest the War, by neglect of the first rise thereof, should grow upon them: having join'd their Armies together, march'd through the Ausetan Territories (so unconcern'd, as if the Enemies Country had been all at peace with them) toward the Enemies Quarters; and pitch'd their Camp three thousand paces distant from them. And first they try'd by Ambassadors to make them quit their Arms. But soon after when the Spanish Horse had on a sudden attack'd the Roman Foragers, the Romans sent out a Party of Horse from their Camp, who engaged in a Battel of Horse, though the event was not memorable on either side. The next day at Sunrise they appeared all in Battalia almost a thousand paces from the Roman Camp. The Ausetans were in the middle; the Illyrians in the right Wing, the meaner Spanish people in the left, and between the Wings and the main Body were wide spaces, to let out the Horse at, if occasion should be. The Romans on the other side, when according to their manner, ner, they had put their Army in a readiness, imitated the Foe in this only, that they also left wide Lanes for the Horse. But Lentulus, supposing that side would have the advantage of their Horse, that first sent them into those gaping intervals in their Enemies Army, commanded Ser. Cornelius, a Tribune of the Soldiers, to bid his men let their Horses have their heads, and run into those open spaces in the Enemies Battalion: whilst he himself, having unsuccessfully begun a Foot-fight, and stay'd only till he could bring the thirteenth Legion out of the Rear into the Front, as a Recruit to the twelfth Legion, which gave way, and was in the left Wing opposite to the Illyrians, (when he had made the Fight pretty equal there) came to L. Manlius, who was encouraging his Men in the Van, and bringing Reserves to places where they were lacking. He told him, All things were safe in the left Wing; and that he had just sent Ser. Cornelius to scatter and destroy the Enemy with a storm of Horsemen. He had hardly said so, ere the Roman Horse, charging into the midst of the Enemies, not only put their Foot into disorder, but also block'd up the way in such a manner, that the Spanish Horse could not come in. Wherefore the Spaniards, quitting their Horse-service, fell to it on foot. The Roman Generals seeing their ranks broken, their men in a consternation, and their Ensigns wavering, exhorted and begg'd of their Soldiers, to set upon them in that amazed condition, and not to suffer them to set themselves again in order. The Barbarians could not have sustained so great a shock, had not the petite King Indibilis dismounted with the Horsemen, and posited himself in the Front of the Foot. By which means the Fight continued very sharp for a great while. But at last, when those that were about the King (who stood to it, though half dead, and was afterward stuck with a Javelin to the ground) being overwhelmed with Weapons, fell down, they all began to fly: most of them being slain, because the Horsemen had not time to mount, and because the Romans lay so hard upon them, when they were already in so great disorder. Nor did the Romans retire, before they had made themselves Masters even of the Enemies Camp. Thirteen thousand Spaniards were slain that day, and about eight hundred taken: but not much above two hundred of the Romans and their Allies fell, and those, most of them, in the left Wing. The Spaniards that were beaten out of their Camp, or those that fled from the Fight, being first scatter'd about the Country, soon after returned each man to their own Cities.

Then being called to Council by Mandonius, and there complaining of their misfortunes, with a Reprimand to the Authors of the War, they order'd, That Ambassadors should be sent to deliver up their Arms, and make a Surrender. To whom, since they laid the blame upon the Author of the War, Indibilis and the other Princes, of whom most were slain in the field, and deliver'd up their Arms and themselves, answer was made, That they should be admitted to a Surrender upon no other Terms than this, that they would deliver up Mandonius and the other Authors of the War alive. If not, that they would bring an Army into the Country of the Illyrians, the Ausetans, and the other Nations. This answer to the Ambassadors was carried back to the Council. Then Mandonius and the other Princes were seized and delivered to Justice. The Spanish Nations were again at peace: the Pay of that year was doubled, and a supply of Corn for six months exacted, with Campaigne Coats and Togæ [i. e. Gowns as the Romans wore them] for the Army; besides Hostages for almost thirty Nations. By this means the Tumult in Spain being in a few days raised and allayed, and that with no great trouble, all the terror of the War was turned upon Africa; and C. Lelius being come in the night-time to Hippo Regius [a great City] led his Seamen and Allies at break of day in Battalia to spoil the Country. By which means there was a great devastation brought upon all places, the people, as those that live in peace, being negligent of their affairs. Thereupon immediately certain Messengers themselves in a consternation filled Carthage with a mighty dread, That the Roman Navy, and General Scipio (for there was a report that he was long come over into Sicily) was arrived. Wherefore not knowing well how many Ships they had seen, nor how great the number of Soldiers was, that pillaged the Country, they heard every thing with such concern, that their fear much increased the real calamity. Hence terror and amazement first, and after that sorrow possessed their minds; *That Fortune should so far change upon them; that they who so lately had a victorious Army before the Walls of Rome, conquer'd so many Armies of the Enemy, and receiv'd all the Nations of Italy either through force of free-will by way of Surrender, should now, quite contrary, be in danger to see all Africa ravaged, and Carthage besieged. That they had not such strength to bear those things as the Romans had: for the Roman common people, and all Latium afford them youth enough, still greater and more numerous, that grew up in the room of those many Armies which were slain: whilst that people were not only weak in the City, but in the Country too; so that they were fain to hire Auxiliaries from among the Africans, a Nation very fickle and treacherous whenever there was any hopes of greater gain. That now also the Kings, since Scipio and Syphax had had an interview, were fallen off; Syphax by Scipio's persuasions, and Masinissa (grown a mortal Enemy by the same means) in an open Revolt: Wherefore there was no hope left, nor any assistance to be got. Besides that, Mago out of Gaul made no great stir, nor join'd Annibal, who himself was now grown old both in his fame and strength.*

But though this News at first so much dejected their spirits, the urgent dread again reviv'd them, and put them upon a consultation, how they should obviate the present dangers.

Thereupon they presently order'd a Levy to be made both in the City and Country, sent to hire African Auxiliaries, fortified their City, got a stock of Corn together, provided Weapons and Arms, fitted out Ships to send to Hippo against the Roman Navy. As they were in the midst of this hurry, at last a Messenger came, That Lælius, not Scipio, was come over with no more Forces than were sufficient to plunder the Country; but that the stress of the War was still in Sicily. Then they took breath a while, and sent Ambassadors to Syphax and other petty Kings to strengthen their Alliance. They likewise sent Men to Philip with a promise of two hundred Talents of Silver, if he would come over into Sicily or Italy: and also to their own Generals in Italy, to keep Scipio off with all the terror they could. To Mago likewise they dispatch'd not only Ambassadors, but 25 long Ships, 6000 Foot, 800 Horse, seven Elephants, and a great deal of Money, to hire Auxiliaries, in the strength whereof he might approach more near to Rome, and joyn Annibal. This they contrived, and did at Carthage, whilst Masinissa, roused by the fame of a Roman Navy, came with a few Horsemen to Lælius, who was driving great store of Booty out of the Country, it being unarm'd and void of all defence. To whom he complain'd, that Scipio was too dilatory in his business, in that he had not brought over his Army into Africa at that very time, when the Carthaginians were under such a consternation, and Syphax embarras'd with Wars against his neighbouring Countries; who, he knew very certainly, if he had leisure to compose his affairs according to his mind, would do nothing with any sincerity for the Romans. He therefore desired Lælius, that he would advise and excite Scipio not to tarry any longer: and told him, that he would be ready, though he were beaten out of his Kingdom, with no contemptible Force both of Horse and Foot. Nor would he have Lælius to stay in Africa; for he believ'd there was a Navy already set out from Carthage, with whom in Scipio's absence it would not be safe for him to engage.

V. Masinissa having made this Speech, was dismissed, and Lælius the next day set sail from Hippo with his Ships all full of Plunder; and going back into Sicily, told Scipio what Masinissa said. At the same time the Ships, that were sent from Carthage to Mago, arrived on the Coast of Liguria, where the People called Albingauni dwell, and came to Genoa. On which Coasts it happen'd that Mago at that time had a Navy, who hearing what the Ambassadors said, to wit, That he must raise as big an Army as he possibly could, immediately called a Council of the Gauls and Ligurians (for there was a mighty multitude of both those Nations in that part of the Country) and told them, That he was sent to redeem them from slavery; which that they might be sure of, there were Auxiliaries sent him from home; but it was in their power to say, with what force, and how great an Army that War should be carried on. That there were two Roman Armies, the one in Gallia, and the other in Etruria: and he knew well enough, that Sp. Lucretius would joyn with M. Livius. Wherefore that they also ought to arm a great many thousands, that under the Command of two Generals proportionable resistance might be made against those two Roman Armies. To which the Gauls made answer; That they were very willing so to do; but said, that since the Romans had one Camp within their Confines, and another in the adjacent Country of Etruria, if it were discover'd, that the Carthaginian were assisted by them, the plundering Armies would presently make incursions on both sides into their Territories. Wherefore they desired him, that he would ask such supplies of the Gauls, as he might be privately furnish'd with. But the Ligurians, being that the Roman Camp was a great way distant from their Country and Cities, were free to do anything; so that they ought in justice to arm their Youth and bear a share in the War. The Ligurians did not refuse the Proposal; only they desir'd two months time to make their Levies. In the mean time Mago having dismissed the Gauls, sent privately and hired Soldiers all over their Dominions, having Provisions of all sorts secretly convey'd to him from the Gallick Nations. Then M. Livius brought over the Army of Volunteers out of Etruria into Gallia: and having joyn'd Lucretius, put himself in a readiness to meet Mago, if he should offer to move out of Liguria any nearer to the City. But if the Carthaginian lay still under that corner of the Alps, he himself likewise resolv'd to keep the same Post about Ariminum, and be a Guard to Italy.

VI. After C. Lælius's return out of Africa, when Scipio was incited by Masinissa's advice, and the Soldiers saw a whole Navy laden with spoils from the Enemies Country, they were inflam'd with a desire of going over as soon as they could, but a less weighty design interven'd whilst they were thinking of this greater one; which was, to recover Locri, a City, that upon the revolt of other Italian Towns, had it self also among the rest revolted to the Carthaginians. Now the hopes of effecting that intention of theirs sprang from a very small Fountain; that things were carried in the Country of the Bruttii more by Robberies than a just War, though the Numidians first led the way; whom the Bruttii were ready to follow, not more upon the score of their Alliance with the Carthaginians, than their natural inclination to such villany. At last the Roman Soldiers also, as it were by a kind of contagion, took to stealing, and as far as their Officers would suffer them, made excursions into the Enemies Country: and by them certain Locrians that came out of their City, being circumvented, were carried to Rhegium. Among those Captives there were certain Masons or Carpenters that had been us'd, as it happen'd, to work for the Carthaginians in the Fort at Locri. Those Fellows being known to some Noblemen of Locri, that were in banishment at Rhegium, having been driven from their own City by the adverse Faction, who deliver'd deliver'd Locri up to Annibal; after they had told the Gentlemen (who, as people long absent from a place use to do, ask'd them a great many questions) all that was new at home, put them in hopes, That if they might be redeemed and sent back home, they would betray the Castle to them. For they dwell there, and the Carthaginians trusted them with all they had. Whereupon, as men not only desirous to see their Country again, but also to be reveng'd upon their Enemies, they presently redeemed them and sent them back; and having contrived and agreed upon the method of doing that business, with the tokens which they at a distance should observe, themselves went to Scipio at Syracuse, where part of the banish'd persons then were, and told him what the Captives had promised. By which news they filled the Consul with such hopes of success, that he sent the Tribunes of the Soldiers (and with them M. Sergius and P. Maternus) to carry 3000 Soldiers from Rhegium to Locri, writing also to Q. Pleminius the Proprætor, to be assisting in the affair. They accordingly marching from Rhegium with Ladders that were made proportionable to such an height as the Captives had told them the Tower was of, about midnight, from that place, which they had agreed upon, gave the signal to those that were to betray the Castle; who being prepared and intent upon the business, after they also had let down Ladders, made for that purpose, and receiv'd the Romans as they clamb up in several places, before any noise was heard, they fell upon the Carthaginian Sentinels, who, fearing no such thing, were fallen asleep. Some therefore of them were first heard to groan as they dy'd; which wakening the rest, put them into a sudden consternation and a tumult: of which, though they at present knew no cause, yet at length one rousing another, they saw what the matter was. Then every man gave the Alarm, and cry'd out, That the Enemy was in the Castle, and the Sentinels slain. By which means the Romans, who were no ways equal in number, had been destroy'd, had not the shout set up by them, that were without the Castle (for the Tumult happening in the night-time, increased their apprehensions where there was no ground for it) made it uncertain whence it arose. Wherefore the Carthaginians being fear'd, as though their Castle had been full of Enemies, made no resistance there, but fled into the other Fort (for there are two at a little distance from each other) whilst the Townsfolk kept possession of the City, which was set a stake for them that could win it. Then from the two Forts they made every day some little Excursions to skirmish, Q. Pleminius being Governor of the Roman, and Amilcar of the Punick Garrison; who sending for supplies from the adjacent Towns, augmented their Forces. At last Annibal himself came: nor could the Romans have born the fatigue of it, had not the Locrian Mobile, exasperated by the pride and avarice of the Carthaginians, inclined toward the Romans.

V.I. All soon as News was brought to Scipio, That his affairs at Locri was in greater hazard than ever, and that Annibal himself was coming: lest the Garrison should be in any danger for want of convenience safely to retire, he set sail with a fresh gale, and cross'd the straight from Messina, after the Sea was grown calm, leaving L. Scipio his Brother Governor of the Garrison there. And Annibal at the same time was come from the River Butuntis (which is not far from Locri) having sent a Messenger before him, to order his Men, That at break of day they should joyn Battel with the Romans and Locrians, whilst he himself, when they were all employ'd another way, attack'd the City by surprise behind: and finding at break of day that the Battel was begun, he would neither shut himself up in the Castle, to straiten that narrow place with a crowd of Soldiers; nor had his men brought Ladders to scale the Walls. Then throwing his Baggage all on a heap, and having shewn his Army at a good distance from the Walls for a terror to the Enemy, with his Numidian Horse he rode about the City, whilst Ladders and other Materials necessary for a storm, were made ready, to see where he could best attack it. Then marching up to the Wall, where he that stood next him was wounded with a shot from a Crossbow: he being affrighted at so dangerous an accident, commanded them to sound a Retreat, and fortified his Camp out of the reach of their Artillery. The Roman Navy came from Messina to Locri a good while before night; and being all set ashore, marched into the City before the Sun was down. The next day the Carthaginians from the Fort began the Battel. And Annibal, having now provided Ladders and all other things for the storm, went under the Walls: when on a sudden (he dreading nothing less) the Romans open'd the Gate and sallied out upon him, killing to the number of 200, because they came forth so unexpected. The rest Annibal, when he perceiv'd the Consul to be there, took back with him to the Camp: and having sent a Messenger to them that were in the Castle, to bid them look to themselves, he decamp'd in the night-time and went away. Then those that were in the Castle having set fire on the Houses where they kept, that that tumult might detain the Foe, overtook the body of their Army before night, running away as though they had fled.

V.III. Scipio, when he saw the Castle deserted by the Enemy, and their Camp empty, called the Locrians to an Assembly, and chid them very severely for their revolt: upon the Authors thereof he inflicted certain punishments, and gave their Goods to the Nobility of the other Faction for their great fidelity to the Romans: saying, That he would neither give the Locrians any thing, nor take any thing from them publicly: but that they should send Ambassadors to Rome, and should have such fortune as the Senate thought fit. Yet one thing he was sure of, that though though they had deserv'd but very ill of the Roman People, they would be in a better condition under the Romans, though enraged at them, than they had been under the Carthaginians their pretended Friends. After that he himself leaving Q. Pleminius, the Lieutenant, and the Garrison that had taken the Castle, to defend the City, went over to Messana with the same Force that he brought thence. The Locrians had been so tyrannically and cruelly used by the Carthaginians after their Revolt from the Romans, that they seemed to bear any moderate injuries not only with a patient, but even almost with a willing mind. But indeed Pleminius did so far exceed Amilcar, who had been Governour of the Garrison, and the Roman Soldiers that were there, the Carthaginians, in wickedness and avarice, that they seemed to contend not with arms, but with vices. Nor was there any thing omitted that makes the condition of a more powerful man hateful to the helpless, either by the Commander or his Men: but they committed unspeakable outrages upon their own Bodies, their Wives and Children. Nay more; their avarice did not abstain from Sacrilege it self, for they violated not only other Temples, but that of Proserpina also, wherein were Treasures that had been untouch'd in all Ages; save that they were said to be plunder'd by Pyrrhus, who yet brought back his spoils with expiatory Sacrifices for his crime. And as before the Kings Ships, being torn to pieces in wracks, brought nothing whole to shore, except the Goddesses Money that they carried away; so then also, in another kind of misfortune, that same Money made all of them, who were concern'd in the violating of that Temple, so mad, that they turn'd mortal Enemies to one another, Officer against Officer, and Soldier against Soldier.

IX. Pleminius was Governour of all: though part of the Soldiers, which he brought along with him from Rhegium, were under him, and part under the Tribunes. A Soldier belonging to Pleminius, having stolen a silver Cup out of a Townsmans house, as he was running away with it, those that own'd it pursuing him, he met by chance with Sergius and Marienus, Tribunes of the Soldiery: by whose command the Cup was taken from him. But that caused a noise, a quarrel, and at last a fight too between Pleminius's Soldiers and those of the Tribunes, the multitude and mutiny still increasing, according as every man came seasonably up to his Party. Pleminius's Soldiers, who were overcome, having flock'd to Pleminius, and shewn their blood and wounds not without roaring and indignation, with a relation how he himself also was abused by ill language, he all inflamed with anger, ran out of his house forthwith, and order'd the Tribunes, being called before him to be stript, and the rods made ready. But whilst they were about taking off their cloaths (which was a good while; for they made resistance, and called upon the Soldiers for assistance) there came on a sudden a throng of Soldiers, flush'd with their late Victory from all places, as though they had had an Alarm to fight against an Enemy. And when they saw the Tribunes bodies so cut with the rods, they, being then much more incens'd, fell foul upon the Lieutenant, without any respect either to Authority or even Humanity it self, (having first been very severe upon the Dictors) and having got him apart from his own Men, they tore him in such an hostile manner, that, mangling his Ears and his Nose, they left him for dead. When this News came to Messana, Scipio after a few days came in a Gally with six ranks of Oars to Locri, and having heard the cause between Pleminius and the Tribunes, acquitted Pleminius, whom he left in Garrison there; but condemn'd the Tribunes, and committed them to Prison, in order to their being sent to the Senate at Rome, himself returning to Messana, and thence to Syracuse. Pleminius being unable to contain his passion, and thinking, that the injury done to him was neglected, or at least not sufficiently resented by Scipio; for that no man else could possibly tell how it ought to be revenged, but he that had felt the smart thereof by enduring it, commanded the Tribunes to be brought before him; and having torn them with all the severities that any body is able to suffer, killed them: nor was he satisfied with punishing of them alive only, but threw them forth unburied also. He used the same cruelty likewise to the Locrian Nobility, who, he heard, went to Scipio, to complain of injuries which he had done them: and those things which he had done before so barbarously, through lust or avarice, to them whilst they were his Friends, he then in his anger multiply'd them; insomuch that his actions brought infamy and envy not to himself alone, but to the Emperour.

X. And now the time of the Assembly was at hand, when a Letter came from P. Licinius, the Consul to Rome: That he and his Army were afflicted with a grievous disease; nor could they subsist, unless the same or a worse distemper beset the Enemy. Wherefore, because he could not come to the Assembly in person, he would, if the Senate pleased, declare Q. Cæcilius Metellus Dictator for that Assembly; it being necessary to the good of the Commonwealth that Q. Cæcilius's Army should be disbanded. For there was neither any use of them at present (now that Annibal was gone into his Winter-quarters) but the distemper was so hot in that Camp, that unless they were quickly disbanded, there would not be one man of them left alive. Thereupon the Senate left it to the Consul to do what he thought fit with respect to the common good, and his own integrity. At that time there was a superstitious humor got into the City, which sprang from a Verse found in the Sibylls Books, that were lookt into upon the account of its having frequently that year rain'd stones; and the Verse was this, That whenever any foreign Enemy Enemy invaded Italy, he might be driven thence and vanquished, if the Image of Cybele (called Meter Idea) were brought from Pellinus to Rome. This Verse found out by the Decemviri, moved the Senate so much the more, because the Ambassadors also, who carried the Offering to Delphi, brought word not only that the Entrails, when they sacrificed to Apollo, gave them very joyful tokens, but also that their Oracles answer was, That for a greater Victory than that, out of the spoils whereof they made that Present, was shortly like to happen to the Roman People. To which, as a confirmation of their hopes, they added Scipio's foresight (as it were) concerning the end of the War, when he desir'd the Province of Africa. Wherefore to make themselves sure of that Victory which was thus portended by Prophecies, Omens, and Oracles, they consulted, which way they should get this Goddess over to Rome.

The Roman People at that time had no Alliance with any of the Cities in Asia: yet remembering that Asculapius also was sent for out of Greece, even before they were in League with that Country, upon the score of the Peoples health; and now since they had newly contracted a Friendship with King Attalus by means of their common War against Philip; so that he was like to do all he could for the Roman Peoples sake, they sent Ambassadors to him, to wit, M. Valerius Levinus (who had been twice Consul, and done great things in Greece) M. Cæcilius Metellus, a Prætorian [fit to be a Prætor, or a Prætors Fellow] Ser. Sulpicius Galba, an Edilitian [an Ediles Fellow] and two Questorians [Questors Fellows] C. Tremellus Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. To these men they allotted five Gallies of five banks of Oars, that they might go to those Countries where the Majesty of the Roman Nation was to be kept up, in such a Port as became the Dignity of the Roman People. They therefore in their way to Asia went first to Delphi, and consulted the Oracle there, what hopes it would give them and the Roman People, that they should effect the business, for which they were sent on an Embassy from Rome. To which 'tis said the Oracle made this answer: That by means of King Attalus they should obtain what they sought. And bid them, when they had brought the Goddess to Rome, to take care that the best man in all that City should entertain her. They accordingly came to the King at Pergamus, who receiv'd them very courteously, and carried them to Pessinus in Phrygia: where he deliver'd unto them the Sacred stone, which the Inhabitants said was the Mother of the Gods, commanding them to convey it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco being sent before, brought word from the Ambassadors, That the Goddess was a coming: and that they must seek out the best man in the whole City, to receive her into his house with all due Ceremony. Q. Cæcilius Metellus was at that time declar'd Dictator by the Consul in the Country of the Bruttii to hold the Assembly and his Army disbanded: whose Master of the Horse was L. Veturius Philo. The Dictator therefore held the Assembly; in which they made for Consuls M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, when he was absent in the Province of Greece which was then committed to his Administration. After that they chose Prætors, to wit, T. Claudius Nero, M. Marius Ralla, L. Scribonius Libo, and M. Pomponius Matho. When the Assembly was over, the Dictator quitted his Office. The Roman Games were thrice perform'd anew, and the Plebeian ones seven times. Cneius and L. Cornelius Lentulus were the two Curule Ediles [chief Ediles] of whom Lucius had the Province of Spain; who being chosen in his absence, he though absent, bore that Honour. T. Claudius Asellus, and M. Junius Pennus were the Plebeian Ediles. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the Temple of Virtue at the Gate called Porta Capena, in the seventeenth year after his Father had vow'd so to do in Gaul at Clastidium, when he was first Consul M. Æmilius Regillus also, who was the Flamen Martialis [i.e. Mars's Priest] died that year.

For that two years the affairs of Greece were much neglected. Whereupon Philip seeing the Ætolians quite deserted by the Romans, in whose assistance only they had any confidence, forced them to desire and make a Peace upon what Terms he himself pleased. Which if he had not done with all speed, P. Sempronius, the Proconsul, who was sent as Successor in his Command to Sulpicius, had, with 10000 Foot, 1000 Horse, and 30 Ships of War (which was no small preparation to succour an Ally) most certainly ruin'd him as he was making War against the Ætolians. As soon as the Peace was just made, there came a Messenger to the King, and told him, That the Romans were come to Dyrrachium; that the Parthini and other Neighbour Nations were put in hopes of some innovation: and that Dimallum [a City] was attack'd. For the Romans had turn'd their Forces that way, instead of going, as they were order'd, to assist the Ætolians: being angry, that they had made a Peace with the King against the League, it being done without their consent. When Philip heard that, lest there should any great stir arise among the neighbouring Nations and People, he went great days journeys till he came to Apollonia: whither Sempronius was gone, having sent Latomus, the Lieutenant with part of the Forces, and 15 Ships into Ætolia, to see how things stood, and break off, if he could, the Peace. Philip laid waste the Lands belonging to the Apollonians, and drawing his Men up to the City, gave the Romans an opportunity of fighting. But seeing that they were content only to defend their Walls and be quiet; nor thinking himself strong enough to attack the City, he desired to make, with the Romans, as he had done with the Ætolians, a Peace if he could, or at least a Truce; and without provoking them any more by a fresh quarrel, return'd into his own Kingdom. At that time the Epirotes, tired out with a tedious War, having first inquired into the Romans inclination thereunto, sent Ambassadors to Philip about making a general Peace, saying, That they were sure it would be concluded upon, if he came to a Parley with P. Sempronius the Roman General. He was easily induced (for the King himself was not averse to it) to come over into Epirus. Phenice is a City of Epirus; where the King having first had a Conference with Eropus, Dardus, and Philip, Generals of the Epirotes, he afterward met with Sempronius. There was also at that Conference Aminander, King of the Atbamans; with other Magistrates of the Epirotes and Acarmanians. Of whom General Philip first made a Speech, and begg'd both of the King and the Roman General, that they would make an end of the War, and so far favour the Epirotes. P. Sempronius made the Conditions of Peace, which were, That the Parthini, Dimallum, Bargulum, and Eugenum should be subject to the Romans; but that Atintania (if upon sending Ambassadors to Rome, he could get the Senates leave) should be under the Macedonian. The Peace therefore being made upon those Terms, there were brought into the same League, by the King, Prusias King of Bithynia, the Acheans, Bæotians, Thessalians, Acarmanians, and Epirotes; and by the Romans, the Illyses, King Attalus, Pleuranus, Nabis Tyrant of Lacedæmon, the Eleans, Messinians, and Athenians. These Conditions were signed and sealed, and a Truce made for two months, till they could send Ambassadors to Rome, to get the people there to allow a Peace upon such Conditions. Accordingly all the Tribes consented to it; because since the War was turn'd into Africa, they were willing to be eas'd of all other Wars at that time. P. Sempronius, after the Peace was concluded, went to Rome to mind the affairs of his Consulship.

that

XIII. U. C. 546. When M. Cornelius therefore and P. Sempronius were Consul (which was in the fifteenth year of the Punic War) the Provinces assigned to them were, to Cornelius, Etruria, with the old Army, and to Sempronius the Bruttii, that he might raise new Legions. To the Prætors were allotted, to M. Marcius the City, to L. Scribonius Libo a foreign Province and Gaul also, to M. Pomponius Matho, Sicily, and to T. Claudius Nero, Sardinia. P. Scipio was continued in his Command another year with the same Army and Navy that he had. P. Licinius was also continued to have the Province of the Bruttii with the two Legions there, as long as the Consul should think it consistent with the publick good for him to stay with Commission in that Province. M. Livius and Sp. Lucretius were likewise kept still in, with the two Legions, wherewithal they had guarded Gaul against Mago. Besides whom Cn. Octavius also was order'd, having deliver'd Sardinia and the Legion there up to T. Claudius, himself with 40 long Ships to go and secure the Sea-coast, where-ever the Senate should think fit. M. Pomponius the Prætor had two Legions out of the Army that was at Canna, with him in Sicily. T. Quintius was appointed to be at Tarentum, and C. Hostilius Tubulus (both of them Proprætors) at Capua, with the same Guard as the year before. Concerning the Government of Spain, what two Proconsuls they would please to send into that Province, was refer'd to the People: whereupon all the Tribes consented that the same Proconsuls, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus should have those Provinces, as they had the year before. The Consuls then began to make a Levy, and not only to raise fresh Legions for the Bruttii, but (being so commanded by the Senate) a supplement also for the other Armies.

XIV. Although the Province of Africa was not as yet openly settled upon any person (the Senate I suppose concealing that affair, lest the Carthaginians might be forewarn'd) yet the City was in good hopes, that the Campaigne in Africa would break up that year; and the Punic War be made an end of. That had fill'd their minds full of superstition; and they were very apt not only to tell but believe strange Prodigies; which caus'd a great many such like reports: to wit, That there were two Suns seen; that it grew light in the night-time; and that a stream of fire was seen at Setia to stretch it self from East to West. That a Gate at Tarracina, and at Anagnia, not only a Gate, but the Wall in many places was burnt by Lightning. That in the Temple of Juno Sospita at Lanuvium there was an horrid noise, with a great crash heard. Now in respect to such strange things as those there was a supplication order'd for one whole day: besides that a sacrificing of nine days continuance was order'd upon the account of its having rained stones. To all which you may add their consultation touching their reception of the Mater Idea: of whom, though M. Valerius, one of the Ambassadors, who came before the rest, brought word that she should speedily be in Italy, another fresh Message came that she was already come to Tarracina. The Senate then were mightily at a plunge to find out who was the best man in the City. To be sure, each one of them desired more to carry the day in that respect, than any Commands or Honours that could be bestowed upon them by the Suffrage either of the Senate or the People. At last they judg'd P. Scipio (the Son of Cneius, who was slain in Spain) a young Spark not yet of age to be a Questor [i. e. not 27] to be the best man in all the City. What Virtues he had to make them think so, as I would willingly tell you, if the Authors who lived nearest to that time gave any account of it, so on the other hand I shall foist in my conjectures concerning a matter quite worn out by the mere Antiquity of it. But this however is certain, that P. Cornelius was order'd to go along with all the Matrons to meet the Goddess at Ostia: to take her out of her Ship, and bringing her ashore, deliver'd her to the Matrons to carry to Rome. When therefore the Ship arrived arrived at the mouth of the River Tiber, he, as he was commanded, took shipping down the River, receiv'd the Goddess from the Priests, and brought her ashore. Then the chief Matrons of the City took her of him, among whom there was one more remarkable than the rest, whose name was Claudia Quinta; who, though her reputation (as 'tis said) was before that time a little tainted, made her chastity much renown'd to posterity, upon the account of that religious service which she then perform'd. And they in their Arms, one after another (whilst all the City came out to meet them, putting Censers before their doors in the way that she was brought along, in which they burnt Frankincense, and pray'd, That she might enter the City of Rome willingly and with a propitious inclination) they carried her into the Temple of Victory, which stands in the Palace, upon the 12th of April; which was an Holy-day. For then the people in great numbers brought Offerings to the Goddess in the Palace, where there was a Feast and several sorts of Games set forth, called Megalisia. But after that when they came to talk of the supplement, which was to be made to the Legions that were in the several Provinces, some of the Senators said, It was now time, since by the bounty of the Gods they were deliver'd from all manner of fear, to rid themselves of those things which in their adversity they had been forced to endure. By which words the Senators being put in expectation, they went on and told them, That those twelve Latine Colonies, which, when Q. Fabius, and Q. Fulvius were Consuls, had refused to give them any Soldiers, had had almost a whole year of vacation from all military services, as if it were an honour and a benefit bestow'd upon them; when in the mean time your good and obedient Allies, for their fidelity and compliance to the Roman Government, had been exhaust'd with continual Levies every year.

By these kind of Speeches the Senates memory of a thing they had almost forgotten, was not only refresh'd, but they were also much incens'd. Whereupon not suffering the Consuls to propose any other thing first, they made an Order, That the Consuls should send for the chief Magistrates and Councils of Ten from Nepete, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carsoli, Sora, Suefla, Setia, Circei, Narnia, and Interamna (for those were the Colonies concern'd in that affair) to Rome: and injoin them, that, look how many Soldiers any of those Colonies had supply'd to the Roman People since the Enemy came into Italy, they should each give a double number of Foot, and 120 Horse. And if any Colony could not furnish out that number of Horse, they should for every Horseman supply three Footmen; but that Horse and Foot should be the richest men they could get, who should be sent to any place out of Italy, where there should be occasion for Auxiliaries. If any of them refused, they order'd the Magistrates and Ambassadors of that Colony to be detain'd; nor, though they demand'd it, were they to have Audience of the Senate, till they had done what was injoyn'd them. Moreover, that a Tax of an As [a Roman Coin] should be laid upon each one who had an Estate of 3000 Sesterces, and collected every year: as also that a Poll should be made in those Colonies according to the form prescrib'd by the Roman Censors: which form should be the same as at Rome, and be brought to Rome by the sworn Censors of each Colony, before they went out of their Offices. By this Order of Senate the Magistrates and chief Men in all those Colonies being fetch'd to Rome, after the Consuls had injoyn'd them to raise such and such Soldiers, and to pay such a stipend, some of them refused and boggled at it more than others, saying, They could not raise so many men; no, though they were to do no more than by the form before prescrib'd they had done, they should scarce be able to perform it. Wherefore they begg'd and desir'd, that they might go before the Senate and get it off: for they had done nothing to deserve a total ruine; but said, if they must needs perish too, yet, that neither the Levy, nor the anger of the Roman People could make them raise more Soldiers, than they had. The Consuls were obdurate, and commanded the Ambassadors to stay at Rome; but sent the Magistrates home to make Levies, saying, That ne're a man at Rome would consent to their having an Audience of the Senate, unless they brought thither the Quota of Soldiers that was expected from them. By which means their hopes of appearing before the Senate, and begging the thing off, being frustrated, they with no difficulty at all made a sufficient Levy, the number of their young men being by a long vacation from military service much augmented.

Then another matter, which had been buried in silence almost as long, was reviv'd by M. Valerius Lavinius: who said, That the Money contributed by private persons, when he and M. Claudius were Consuls, ought at length to be restored: nor ought any man to wonder, that when the publick Faith was so far oblig'd, he took such great care. For besides, that the Consul of that year wherein the Money was contributed, was some way concern'd in the affair, that he also was the cause of that Contribution when the Treasury was poor, and the people had not wherewithal to pay their Taxes. That was a Memorial very grateful to the Senate, who having order'd the Consuls to make report of it, decreed, That that Money should be paid at three payments; the first in hand by those that were then in being, and the other two by the Consuls that should be in the third and fifth year following. But then all other cares were swallow'd up in one, after that the calamities of the Locrians, which had been unknown to that day, were, upon the arrival of their Ambassadors, publish'd. Nor did Pleminius's villany provoke the minds of men so much as either the ambition or negligence of Scipio in that business. Ten Ambassadors from Locri, all over squalid and in a fordid guise, with boughs of Olive in their hands (according to the Grecian custom) and in a dress on purpose to move commiseration, appear'd before the Consuls, as they sat in the Assembly, and threw themselves all a long upon the ground with a lamentable outcry before the Tribunal. Of whom the Consuls demanding who they were, they answer'd, They were Locrians, and had suffer'd those indignities from Q. Pleminius, the Lieutenant, together with the Roman Soldiers, that the Roman People would not be willing even the Carthaginians should endure: wherefore they intreated them to give them leave to go before the Senate, and complain of their severe usage.

XVII. Having an Audience of the Senate granted to them, the eldest of them said: I know, grave Fathers, how much you value our complaints; but the greatest weight lies in this, that you know well, not only how Locri was betray'd to Annibal, but also how, his Guards being beaten thence, it was restored to you. For if both the crime of that revolt were far from being the publick design, and it appear that the Town return'd to its obedience toward you, not only with our good liking, but through our assistance and courage also, you may justly conceive the greater indignation, that such inhumane indignities are offer'd to us, your good and faithful Allies, by your Lieutenant and Soldiers there. But I suppose the cause of both our revolts may be better deferr'd till another time for two reasons; the one, that it may be pleaded before P. Scipio, who retok Locri, and who is a Witness of all we did both right and wrong: and the other, in that, whatever we are, we ought not to have suffer'd, what we have done. We cannot deny, grave Fathers, but we, when we had the Punick Forces in our Garrison, suffer'd many base unworthy things from Amilcar, who was the Governour, as well as from the Numidians and Africans. But what were those to that we now endure? Grave Fathers, I beseech you to hear me with patience what I am unwilling to utter. Mankind is now at a stand, and doubts whether you or the Carthaginians are Lords of the World. But truly if the Roman and Punick Government were to be valued according to what we Locrians formerly suffer'd from them, or now so severely feel from your Garrison, there's no man but would wish to have them for his Masters before you. And yet see, how the Locrians are affected toward you. Though we receiv'd much lesser injuries from the Carthaginians, we fled to your General: though we endure more than hostile indignities from the hands of your Garrison, yet we complain to none but you. Either you, grave Fathers, must look upon our calamities, or we have nothing left to desire the immortal Gods. Q. Pleminius was sent as Lieutenant with a Guard to recover Locri from the Carthaginians, and there he was left with that same Guard: but in this Lieutenant of yours (our extreme misery forces us to speak so freely) there is nothing at all, grave Fathers, of a man, save only shape and look, nor of a Roman Citizen, except his mien, his garb, and the meer sound of the Latine Tongue. No, he's a mere nuisance, and a savage beast, like those that Fables tell us infested that Strait by which we are divided from Sicily, and were the destruction of all Sailors. Yet if he alone would be content himself to exercise his villany, lust and avarice upon your poor Allies, we should with our patience hope to satisfy and fill that one deep gulph: but now he has made all your Centurions and Soldiers (so promiscuously would he have all licence and improbity to reign) Pleminius's; they all ravish, spoil, beat, wound and kill as much as he. They vitiate grave Matrons, Virgins, and ingenious Youths, whom they force from the embraces of their Parents. Our City is every day taken and sack'd: both night and day all parts of it sound with cries of Women and Children who are ravish'd and carried away. He that did not know it, would wonder how either we should be able to bear it, or that they who do them, should not be ere this a weary of such enormous actions. Neither can I tell you, nor is it worth your while to hear all that we have undergone. I'll summe them up all together; and tell you, that there is no one house in Locri, or one person, but has been injur'd: nor has any sort of wickedness, lust or avarice been omitted toward any body that was able to endure it. A man can hardly tell which condition of our City was the worst; when our Enemies in War took it, or now that a destructive Tyrant has oppress'd it by force and arms. We have endured all that Cities taken use to suffer, and do so still, grave Fathers, even to this hour: whatever the most cruel and inhumane Tyrants do to miserable men, Pleminius has exercised upon us, our Wives and Children.

XVIII. But one thing there is, Grave Fathers, concerning which in particular not only our Religion, that is implanted in our Souls, compels us to complain, but of which we also desire, if you think fit, that you would be inform'd, and purge your Commonwealth from the abominable guilt. We have observ'd with what devotion you worship not only your own Gods, but with what regard you receive those of foreign Nations too. Now we have a Temple dedicated to Proserpine, of the Sanctity whereof I suppose you may have heard about the time of the War we had with Pyrrhus: who coming back by Sea out of Sicily to Locri, among other foul acts that he did to us for our fidelity toward you, took away the Treasures also of Proserpine, which to that day had been untouch'd; and having put the money on board his Navy, march'd himself away by Land. What became of it, grave Fathers? His Navy was all torn to pieces next day in a violent storm, and all those Ships that had the Holy money on board them were wreck'd upon our Coast. By which calamity the proud King being at length taught, that there are Gods, gather'd all the money together again, and order'd it to be carried back into Proserpines Treasury. But notwithstanding that, he never prosper'd after; but being driven out of Italy, died a dishonourable and ignoble death by chance in the night-time as he just came into Argos. Now though your Lieutenant and Tribunes of the Soldiery had these things and a thousand more, which were related to them, not more to awe them with a religious fear, than to let them know that we and our Forefathers had found the Goddess had often given great demonstrations of her presence there, yet they nevertheless were so audacious, as to lay their sacrilegious hands upon those untouch'd Treasures, contaminating themselves, their Families and their Soldiers with such wicked spoils. For which, grave Fathers, I beseech you upon your own account and the love you bear to your Country, that you would make some Expiation, before you do any thing more either in Italy or Africa; lest they should suffer for the offence which they have committed, not only with their own blood, but also by some publick calamity. Although I must confess the wrath of the Goddess appears even to this day both in your Officers and Soldiers. For they fight sometimes even with one another; Pleminius being the Captain on one side, and two Tribunes of the Soldiers on the other. Nor did they ever engage more vehemently with the Carthaginians than they did among themselves. Yea they would by their fury have given Annibal an opportunity of recovering Locri, had not Scipio, whom we sent for, intervened. But, alas! doth rage possess the Soldiers only who are stain'd with Sacrilege, and nothing of the Goddesses power appear in the punishing of the Officers? No, it was most manifest in them. The Tribunes were whipt with rods by the Lieutenant: and after that the Lieutenant being circumvented by the Tribunes, was not only torn all over his body, but his nose and ears being cut off, he was left for dead. But he at last recovering of his wounds put the Tribunes in Prison, and then having whipt them, put them to all the servile torments he could think on till they dy'd; nor would he suffer them, when dead, to be buried. Thus has the Goddess reveng'd her self of them that spoiled her Temple: nor will she ever cease to torment them, before the Sacred money is again laid up in her Treasury. Our Ancestors heretofore, in the time of a grievous War that we had with the Crotonians, because that Temple was without the City, would have remov'd that money into the Walls. But a Voice was heard out of the Temple in the night, that bid them, hold their hands off of it; the Goddess would defend her own Temple. Whereupon they being afraid to remove the Treasures thence, they resolv'd to inclose the Temple with a Wall at least: but when it was built up to some considerable height, it tumbled down again all on a sudden. For that Goddess not only now, but many other times besides, has secur'd her own Seat and her own Temple, or has taken grievous revenge of such as were the violators thereof. But neither she nor any body else, except you, grave Fathers, can redress our injuries. Wherefore to you and your mercy we humbly fly; not caring, whether you suffer Locri to be under that Lieutenant and that Garrison which is now there, or deliver it up to enraged Annibal and the Carthaginians to exercise their cruelty upon. Yet we do not desire that you should believe us immediately neither, against a person that is absent, and before he has spoken for himself. No, let him come, and hear his accusation, that, if he can, he may make it appear, that he has omitted any one piece of villany that one man can be guilty of toward another: if he do, we shall not refuse our selves again to suffer, if possible, all that we have already undergone, and to have him acquitted of all guilt, whether in respect of God or man.

The Ambassadors having spoken to this purpose, Q. Fabius ask'd them, whether they had made those complaints to P. Scipio; to which they answer'd and said, There were Ambassadors sent to him, but he was taken up with preparing for the War, being either already gone over into Africa, or resolv'd to do so in a few days. Besides, they knew what kindness the General had for the Lieutenant by the case that happen'd between him and the Tribunes, whom Scipio for his sake put into prison, but left him, though he were as guilty or rather more than they, in the same Commission as before. The Ambassadors being order'd to withdraw out of the Temple, not only Pleminius, but Scipio also were severely lash'd in several invective Orations which the Nobility then made. But above the rest Q. Fabius said, He was born to corrupt all military Discipline. That in Spain too he lost full as much by the mutiny of his Soldiers as by the War: for he had a foreign King like way with him, both to indulge the licentiousness of his Soldiers, and to be very severe upon them when he had so done. And then he ended his Speech with this his fatal Opinion: That he would have Pleminius brought in bonds to Rome, and in that condition to plead for himself; so that, if all were true, that the Locrians had said, he should be executed in the Prison, and his Goods confiscated. That P. Scipio, for that he had quitted his Province without the Senates leave, should be recalled; and that they should treat with the Tribunes of the People, to make them propose the abrogating of his Command. That the Senate should tell the Locrians in his hearing, That what injuries they complain'd of as done to them, neither the Senate nor the Roman People would have willingly done. That they should be called good Men, Allies and Friends. That their Wives and Children, with all other things that had been taken from them, should be restored. That as much Money should be rais'd, as had been taken out of Proserpines Treasury, and double that summe, be return'd into that place: as also, that a piacular sacrificing should be appointed by advice first taken of the Colledge of Priests (because the sacred Treasures were so misplaced and prophane'd) what Propitiations, to what Gods and with what Sacrifices they would have them made. That all the Soldiers at Locri should be transported into Sicily: and that four Regiments of the Luine Allies should be carried as a Guard to Locri. The Opinions that day for and against Scipio were not to be number'd, the Senators were so hot on both sides. For besides Pleminius's ill behaviour, and the ruine of the Locrians, they said that his garb was not only not Roman, but not so much even as Military; in that he walk'd in a Cloak and Buskins [after the Greek fashion] in a Gymnasium

[a School of Exercise] giving his mind also to Books and Activity, as Wrestling, &c. That his Regiment was equally slothful and effeminate at Syracuse, taking their pleasure only; for Carthage and Annibal were out of their heads. That all the whole Army was corrupted by licentiousness, and just as they were at Sucro in Spain, and now at Locri, more dreadful to their Allies than any Enemy.

XX.

These things, though partly true, partly mixed, and therefore the more probable, were given out, but Q. Metellus's Opinion at length obtained; who, though he agreed with Maximus in all other things, yet in the case of Scipio dissented from him. For how, said he, can it seem convenient, that he, whom the City had so lately chosen, even in his youth, as the only General fit to recover Spain; whom Spain, retaken from the Enemy, had created Consul on purpose to put an end to the Punic War, with great hopes that he would not only drive Annibal out of Italy, but also subdue all Africa: that he, I say, should be so suddenly recalled from his Province, like Q. Pleminius, and almost condemn'd before his Cause was heard? When even those things that the Locrians complain of as done so unwisely against them, were done in Scipio's absence, as they themselves own, nor can he be blamed for any thing, save his modesty or patience, in that he spared the Lieutenant? That he thought fit, that M. Pomponius the Prætor, to whom the Province of Sicily was allotted, should go the next three days to that Province: and that the Consuls should chuse ten Ambassadors out of the Senate, whom they pleas'd, to send along with the Prætor, with two Tribunes of the People and an Ædile. And that by the assistance of that Council the Prætor should inquire, if those things that the Locrians complain'd of, were done by the order or consent of P. Scipio, to the end, that they might warn him to quit the Province. If Scipio was already gone over into Africa, that the Tribunes of the People and the Ædile, with two of the Ambassadors, whom the Prætor should think most fit, should follow him thither: the Tribunes and the Ædile to bring Scipio back: and the Ambassadors to command the Army, till a new General came over. But if M. Pomponius and the ten Ambassadors found, that such things were not done either by order or consent of P. Scipio, that Scipio should stay in the Army and carry on the War, as he had proposed. This being passed into an Order of Senate, it was refer'd to the Tribunes of the People, either to agree among themselves, or cast Lots, which two of them should go along with the Prætor and Ambassadors. In like manner it was left to the Colledge of Priests to determine of an Expiation for those things that had been touch'd, violated and carried away out of the Temple of Proserpine at Locri. The Tribunes of the People, that went along with the Prætor and the ten Ambassadors, were M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Cincius Alimentus, who had an Ædile also allow'd them: to whom, if Scipio, either in Sicily, should not obey the Prætors commands, or were already gone over into Africa, the Tribunes should give order to lay hold on him, and bring him back by the Authority of their Sacred Power.

XXI.

Their design was to go to Locri before they went to Messana. But as to Pleminius, there is a double report goes. For some say, that he, when he heard what had been done at Rome, went as a banish'd person to Naples, and there by chance met with Q. Metellus, one of the Ambassadors, by whom he was forced back to Rhegium. Others say, that a Lieutenant was sent by Scipio himself with thirty of the noblest Horsemen, to put Q. Pleminius in Chains, and with him the Heads of the Sedition. But they were all committed to custody at Rhegium, either before by Scipio's order, or just then, by the Prætors. The Prætor therefore and the Ambassadors went to Locri, where (as they were order'd) they first took care of what concern'd Religion. For they gather'd together all the Sacred money that either Pleminius or the Soldiers had, and put it, with that which they themselves brought thither, into the Treasury, making a piacular Sacrifice. Then calling the Soldiers into an Assembly, the Prætor bade them march with their Ensigns out of the City, and pitch'd the Camp in the adjacent Plains; with a grave Edict, That if any Soldier either remain'd in the City, or took any thing out with him, that was not his own, he would permit the Locrians, every one to take what they knew to be theirs; and if any thing did not appear, that they should demand it back. But above all, he would needs have the Locrians forthwith to have their bodies at liberty: and that he should suffer very severely, that did not make return of what he had of theirs. After that he called an Assembly of the Locrians, and told them, That the Senate and People of Rome did restore to them their Liberty and Laws. If any of them had a mind to impeach Pleminius, or any other person, they might follow him to Rhegium. If they would complain in publick of P. Scipio, that what was done so wickedly at Locri, either against the Gods and men, was committed by the order or consent of Scipio, that they might send Ambassadors to Messana, where he with the assistance of the Council would inquire into the matter. Thereupon the Locrians gave the Prætor and Ambassadors, with the Senate and People of Rome many thanks, and told him, That they would go to accuse Pleminius. But as for Scipio, though he was not much concern'd at the injuries done to their City, yet he was such a person, as they would rather have to be their friend, than their enemy. For they were sure, that so many horrid outrages could not be committed by the order or consent of P. Scipio; but that he either believ'd Pleminius too much, or them too little. And that it was natural for some men rather to desire, that no offences might be committed, than to be ready enough to punish them. By this means the Prætor and the Council were eased of a great deal of trouble, which they would have have had, in trying Scipio. But they condemn'd Pleminius with 32 men more, and sent them in Chains to Rome: whilst themselves went to Scipio, that they might carry back to Rome a true relation of those things that had been commonly reported not only concerning the General's sloth and garb, but his corrupting of military Discipline.

As they were coming to Syracuse, Scipio provided not words, but things to clear himself. For he order'd all the Army to muster there, and the Navy to be in a readiness, as if he had been that day to engage the Carthaginians both by Sea and Land. The day therefore that they arrived, after he had courteously entertain'd them, the next day he shew'd them a Land and a Sea-Army, not only in Battalia, but made the former exercise in their presence, whilst the Navy rode in the Harbour, and made them some shew of a Sea-fight. Then the Prætor and Ambassadors were carried about to see the Armories and Store-houses with the other preparations for the War: and did so much admire at all things in particular and in general too, that they were very apt to believe, the Carthaginians must be defeated by such a General and such an Army, or they were invincible: bidding him, with good wishes in their mouths, go over, and as soon as possibly he could (even upon that day, on which all the Centuries had made him first Consul) accomplish those hopes that the Roman People had conceiv'd of him. And with that they went their ways very cheerfully, as though they had been to carry the news of a Victory, and not only of magnificent preparations for the War. Pleminius, and those that were in his condition, when they came to Rome, were presently put into prison. From whence at first being brought forth to the People by the Tribunes, they found no mercy, because all men were so much prepossess'd with the story of the Locrian calamities. But afterward, when they had been several times produced, the envy of the people was grown old and feeble, and their passion consequently abated; for the very deformity and neglected drefs of Pleminius, and the memory of Scipio, who was absent, gained him favour among the Commons. Yet he died in prison before the People pass'd their Sentence upon him. Clodius Licinius in his third Book of the Roman Affairs, says, That this Pleminius at the same time when those Games which Africanus, when he was the second time Consul, set forth, were celebrated, in pursuance of a Vow that he had formerly made, endeavour'd in several places to set the City on fire, that he might have an occasion to break prison and make his escape: but that his wicked design being detected, he was put by order of the Senate into the Dungeon: and that there was nothing said of Scipio any where else, save in the Senate only: where all the Ambassadors and the Tribunes so far extoll'd the Navy, the Army and the General, that they induced the Senate to think it convenient, that Scipio should go over into Africa as soon as he could, and to give him leave to chuse out of those Armies, that were in Sicily, such numbers as he pleas'd to go along with him, and to leave whom he thought good as a Guard to that Province.

XXII.

Whilst these things were transacted by the Romans, the Carthaginians also, who having set up Watch-Towers upon all Promontories, and by inquiring and being terrified at every Message that they received, had had a very anxious Winter on't, thought themselves now not a little encouraged to defend Africa, by the Alliance of King Syphax, in confidence of whose assistance chiefly they believ'd the Roman would come over into their Country. For at this time Asdrubal, the Son of Gisgo, had not only contracted an hospitable friendship with that King (of which I told you before) when it happen'd that Scipio and Asdrubal came thither out of Spain together; but there was also some discourse of an Affinity designed between them, as though the King was to marry Asdrubal's Daughter. Asdrubal therefore going to consummate that affair, and appoint the Wedding-day (for the Damsel was now marriagable) as soon as he perceiv'd the King to be inflamed with desire (and indeed the Numidians are more inclined to Veneries than any other Barbarians) he sent for the Maid from Carthage, and hasten'd the Nuptials. At which, among other expressions of kindness, that he might add even a publick League to a private Contract, he made the King and the Carthaginians swear to a mutual Alliance and a faithful Promise, That all people should be equally both friends and enemies to each of them. But Asdrubal remembering what friendship Scipio and the King had contracted, as also how vain and mutable the inclinations of the Barbarians were; he, fearing, that if Scipio should come over into Africa, that Marriage would be but a small obligation, whilst he now saw the Numidian hot upon his new Amour, perswaded him, by the help of the young Ladies endearments too, to send Ambassadors into Sicily to Scipio, to advise him, That he should rely upon his former promises, so as to come over into Africa; for that he was now oblig'd by Marriage to the Daughter of Asdrubal, a Citizen of Carthage, whom he had now at his house, and to the People of Carthage also by a League. And to exhort him first, that the Romans should make War with the Carthaginians, as they had to that day done, a good way from Africa, lest he might be forced to engage in their quarrels, and refusing this or that Party, to be of necessity on one side. If Scipio would not keep out of Africa, but bring his Army to Carthage, that he must needs oppose him, not only in behalf of Africa, the Land in which he and his Wife were born, but also upon his Father's account, and for the sake of his own household Gods.

The Ambassadors, being sent from the King to Scipio with this Message, came to him at Syracuse. Whereupon Scipio, though he were disappointed in his great designs upon Africa, and of his mighty hopes, sent the Ambassadors immediately back into Africa, before the

the matter was divulged, with a Letter to the King: wherein he advised him over and over, That he would not break the Laws of Hospitality by which he was obliged to him, nor forfeit the Alliance which he had enter'd into with the Roman People, nor falsify that Justice, Fidelity and Promise which he had sworn to, or offend the Gods, who were Witnesses and Judges too of their Contract. But since neither the arrival of the Numidians could be concealed (for they went all over the City, and were frequently seen in the Palace) and that if the reason of their coming should be kept secret, there was danger, lest the truth, for that very reason that it was so stilled, might, of its own accord, the more come out; and thereby a fear possess the Army, that they must fight with the King, and the Carthaginians both together, he made men disbelieve the real truth of the matter by prepossessing their minds with a false story. And therefore calling his Soldiers to an Assembly, told them, They must delay the time no longer; but it was high time for him to go over into Africa, having two Kings for his Associates. That Malinilla formerly came himself to Lælius, and complained, that he was too dilatory: and now, that Syphax also had sent Ambassadors, admiring, as the other did, what should be the reason of his long tarrying; and desiring, that either he would at last bring his Armies over into Africa, or, if his mind was alter'd, let him know it, that he might otherwise secure himself and his Kingdom. Wherefore having now all things in a sufficient readiness, since the business admitted of no farther delay, he intended, when he had brought the Navy to Lilybæum, and gotten all his Forces, both Horse and Foot thither, the first day that was fit to set sail in, with the permission of the Gods, to go for Africa. With that he sent a Letter to M. Pomponius, That, if he thought fit, he would come to Lilybæum: where they might consult in common, what Legions chiefly, and what number of men he should carry over into Africa. He likewise sent to all the Sea-coast, to have all the Ships of burden seized, and brought to Lilybæum. When therefore all the Soldiers and Ships, that were in Sicily, were come to Lilybæum, so that neither the City was able to contain the multitude of men, nor the Ports the Ships, they had all such a vehement desire of crossing over into Africa, that they seem'd not to be led to War, but to receive the certain rewards of Victory. Especially those that remain'd of the Army, which had been at Cannæ, believ'd that under him, and no other General, they, by serving the Commonwealth, might put an end to an ignominious Campaign. Nor did Scipio at all despise that sort of men: because he knew, that neither the Battel of Cannæ was lost by their sloth, nor were there any so old Soldiers in all the Roman Army; they being also expert not only upon the score of several Battels which they had fought, but in attacking of Towns also. The Legions of Cannæ were the fifth and sixth which he having declared that he would take over into Africa, he view'd them singly every man; and leaving those behind that he thought unfit to go, he put others in their places, that he had brought along with him out of Italy; filling up such Legions to such a complement, that each of them contained 6200 Foot, and 300 Horse. He also chose both Horse and Foot out of the Latine Allies that were in the Campanian Army.

XXV. How many Men were transported into Africa at that time, creates a great dispute among several Authors. For in some I find they were 10000 Foot, and 2200 Horse: in others, 16000 Foot, and 1600 Horse: and in others above half as many more, that is, that 35000 Foot and Horse were shipt off. But some again do not set down the number; among whom, since the thing is doubtful, I wou'd fain be one my self. Calpurnius, as he doth not mention any particular number, so he makes us believe they were infinite. For he saith, that the Birds fell down to the ground through the mighty noise that the Soldiers made; and that such a vast multitude went on board, that it lookt as if there had not one Soul been left either in Italy or Sicily. But Scipio himself took that care upon himself, that the Soldiers should go orderly and without tumult on board the Ships; and C. Lælius, who was Admiral, kept the Sailers, who were forced to go before, in the Ships. M. Pomponius, the Prætor, was to see the Provisions laden, which were Victuals for forty five days, whereof there was enough for fifteen days ready dress'd. When they were all on board, he sent Boats all about to the several Ships, for the Pilots and Masters of every Vessel, with two Soldiers to come into the Forum and receive Orders. Whither when they came, he inquired of them, if they had got Water for the Men and Beasts for so many days as they had Corn. To which they answering, That they had Water enough for forty five days; he charged the Soldiers, that they should be silent, quiet, obedient, and not disturb the Mariners in the executing of their duties. Then he told them, that he himself and L. Scipio would sail with twenty Ships of War in the right Wing, and that in the left C. Lælius, the Admiral, should be with M. Porcius Cato (who then was Questor) and as many more Men of War, for a Guard to the Ships of burden. That the Men of War should have each of them one Light, and the Ships of burden two: but in the General's Ship a distinguishing mark of three Lights should be set up in the night time. He likewise gave the Pilots order to make toward the chief Ports: affirming, that the Country was very fertile, and consequently abounded with all manner of plenty, the Barbarians being (as it most commonly happens in a fat Soil) effeminate and unfit for War: so that they might very probably be defeated, before any Succors came from Carthage. Having receiv'd these Orders, they were commanded back to their Ships, and the next day, with the assistance of the Gods upon a signal given them, to weigh Anchor for Africa.

Many

Many Roman Navies had formerly set out from Sicily, and at that same Port; yet not only not in that War (nor is that a wonder, because most of those Navies went only a foraging) but in the former also, never was there any Expedition that made so great a show. Though, if you compare the bigness of the Navies, there were two Consuls and two Armies that formerly went over; in which Navies there were almost as many Men of War, as Scipio had Ships of burden. For besides fifty long Ships, he carried over his Army in near four hundred Ships of burden. But then, not only for that Italy was before the seat of War, but also by reason of the great slaughter of so many Armies, the Generals being likewise at the same time slain, the second War appeared much more severe to the Romans than the first. Yet Scipio, who was a General so renowned, partly for his great and valiant actions, and partly by a kind of Fatality design'd to augment that Glory which he had in so great a measure already gain'd, had chang'd their minds, by giving out (which no other General in that War had done) how he was resolv'd to go over, to draw Hannibal out of Italy, and to transfer and finish the War in Africa. All the Town flock'd to the Port to see the show, and those not only such as dwelt at Lilybæum, but all the Ambassadors too from all parts of Sicily: who came not only to attend upon Scipio out of duty, but had followed M. Pomponius the Prætor of that Province. Besides these, the Legions that were left in Sicily march'd forth to follow their fellow-Soldiers: nor was the Navy only a rare Spectacle to them that stood upon the shore, but the shore also, which was so throng all round with crowds of people, was as strange a sight to them that were at Sea.

Allooon as it was day, Scipio, from the General's Ship, having by the Cryer commanded silence, made this Prayer: O Gods and Goddesses, said he, who inhabit either the Sea or Land, I beg and beseech you, that whatsoever has been, is, or shall be done by my Command, may prove of good advantage to me, the People and Commons of Rome, their Allies and all the Latines, who side with the Roman People and with me, or subscribe to my Command and Conduct by Sea, by Land, or upon Rivers. And do you prosper all such actions; increase them daily by your favour; and grant these my fellow-Soldiers, when they have conquer'd their Enemies, may come with safety and victory, adorn'd with spoils, and laden with booty in Triumph along with me home again to Rome. Send us Enemies enough to take our revenge of; and permit me and the Roman People to do those things in the City of Carthage, which the People of Carthage endeavour'd to do against our City. When he had made an end of this his Prayer, he kill'd a Victim, and according to custom, threw the Entrails raw into the Sea; giving a signal with a Trumpet for them to sail. Thereupon setting out with a fresh gale of Wind, they were presently out of sight: and in the Afternoon a Mist arose, so that the Ships could hardly avoid falling foul upon one another; but that the Wind was calmer in the main Sea. The night following the same darkness came upon them again; though at Sun-rising it cleared, and the Wind grew stronger. And now were come within sight of the Land; when not long after the Pilot or Steersman told Scipio, that they were within 5000 paces of Africa: for he saw Mercury's Promontory: and that if he pleas'd that they should steer that way, the whole Navy would soon be in Harbour. Scipio, allooon as he got sight of the Land, beseeching the Gods, that he might see Africa to the Commonwealths and his own advantage, he order'd them to set sail, and make toward any other Port that was below that. Then sailing with the same Wind, about the same time, as the day before, the Mist arose and took from them all sight of Land, and the Wind, through the pressure of the Fog, was allay'd. After which the night also put them into a greater confusion, wherefore they cast forth their Anchors, lest either the Ships should fall foul upon one another, or run a-ground. Again, when it was day, the same Wind arose, and dispersing the Fog, discover'd all the Coast of Africa. Then Scipio inquiring which was the next Promontory, and being told, that it was called Promontorium Pulchrum [or the fair Promontory] I am pleas'd, said he, with the Omen, steer your Ships that way. Thither therefore did the Navy make, and there all their Forces were landed. I believe by the relation of a great many Authors, both Greek and Latine, that their Voyage was very successful without any terror or tumult: only Calpurnius tells us, That besides their Ships being just preserv'd from sinking, they underwent all other terrors both from the Heavens and the Seas; yea that their Navy at last was carried by a storm from Africa to the Island Ægimurus: from whence they with much ado recover'd their course: and that their Ships being almost overwhelm'd, they got ashore in a great tumult, without their General's Order, with Boats and without their Arms, like men that had been shipwreck'd.

XXVIII. Having landed their Men, the Romans pitch'd their Camp upon the adjacent banks. And now a dread and fear had seiz'd not only Sea-coasts, at first to see the Navy, and then after, to hear the noise that they made at their landing, but even the very Cities too were frighted. For not only a crowd of men, women and children mixed all together had filled up all the roads, but the Country-people were driving their Cattel too before them, in such a manner, that you would have thought they had been going immediately to quit the Nation. But they put the Cities into a greater consternation than what they themselves were in: especially Carthage, which was as much concern'd and in almost as great an uproar, as if it had been just taken. For since M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius were Consuls; for near fifty years together they had not seen any Roman Army, except the plundering Sea-men that landed upon the Sea-coast for Forage; and having taken what Fortune threw in their way, retired to their Ships again before the Country-people could have the Alarm. By that means their flight and fear was then far greater in the City. For, to say the truth, they had neither any strong Army at home, nor any General to oppose them. Asdrubal, the Son of Gisgo, was by much the most noted man in all the City for his Birth, Renown, Riches, and at that juncture too, for his Affinity to the King. But they remembred, that he had been defeated and beaten in Spain by that very Scipio in several Battels; nor was a General any more to compare to him, than their tumultuary Army to that of the Romans. Wherefore, as though Scipio had design'd immediately to attack their City, they all gave the Alarm; the gates were presently shut, and Soldiers planted upon the Walls, with Watches and Sentinels at several Posts, where they kept Guard all the following night. The next day 500 Horse, who were sent as Scouts toward the Sea, to put them in confusion as they landed, fell into the Romans hands. For by this time Scipio having sent his Navy to Utica, was got himself not far from the Sea, and had seized the adjacent Banks, where he had very conveniently posted his Horse, whom he had sent a foraging. And they having had a Battle with the Carthaginian Cavalry, kill'd some few upon the spot, but many more as they ran away, among whom was the Prefect Hanno, a noble Youth. Mean while Scipio did not only waste all the Country round about, but took a rich City also, that was hard by, belonging to the Africans. Where besides other things that were immediately sent on board the Merchant-Ships, and carried into Sicily, 8000 Freemen and Slaves were taken. But the arrival of Masiniſſa, when they began their business, was very grateful to the Romans; who, some say, came with not above 200 Horse, but most with 2000. Now since he was much the greatest King of all in his time, and a very great Friend to the Romans, I think it worth my while to make a small digression, and shew you what variety of Fortune he happen'd to have in the loss and recovery of his Fathers Kingdom. His Father dy'd whilst he was a Soldier for the Carthaginians in Spain; whose name was Gala. From whom the Kingdom fell to Oesalces, his Brother (for that's the custom among the Numidians) who was a very old man. Not very long after, Oesalces also dy'd, and the elder of his two Sons, whose name was Capusa (the other being yet but a Child) succeeded him. But since Capusa got the Crown more by the custom of the Country, than any Authority or Power that he had among them; there arose one Mezetulus, a Person of the Royal Blood indeed, but come of a Family that were always Enemies to the Kings (though he mightily stickled for the Sovereign Power against them who at that time had it) who having instigated his Country-men, with whom he had a great sway upon the score of their hatred to Kings, pitch'd his Camp in the face of the Sun, and forced the King to come into the field, to fight for the Kingdom. In that Battle Capusa with many of the Nobility was slain, and all the Nation of the Massylians became subject to Mezetulus. But he refused the Name of King; and contenting himself with the Name of Tutor, Guardian, or Protector only, called Lacumaces, a Lad that was then alive, and of the Royal Family, King. He married a Noble Lady of Carthage, who was Daughter to Annibal's Sister, and the Dowager of King Oesalces, in hopes thereby to make the Carthaginians his Allies: besides that he sent Ambassadors and renewed his former friendship with King Syphax, preparing all the Auxiliaries he could against Masiniſſa.

XXX. Then Masiniſſa, hearing of the death of his Uncle, and after that of his Cousin-German, went over out of Spain into Mauritania, of which one Bochar was at that time King. Of him he humbly desired and obtained (though he could not for the War, yet) as a Convoy in his Journey four thousand Moors. With them, having a Messenger before-hand to his Fathers and his own Friends, when he came to the Confines of his Kingdom, almost five hundred Numidians met him. Then sending the Moors thence back to their King, according to his promise, though the number that met him was somewhat less than he hoped for; nor enough to give him encouragement for the undertaking of so great an Enterprize: he, thinking that by being in action and making a stir, he might gather strength enough to do some part of his business, he happen'd to meet the young King Lacumaces at Thapsus, as he was going to Syphax. With that Lacumaces fearful Retinue flying back into the City, Masiniſſa at the first effected it, and receiving some of the Kings Men by a surrender of themselves, kill'd some others that made any sort of resistance: but the greatest part of them went with Lacumaces himself, amidst the tumult, to Syphax, whither they had first design'd to go. The same of this little thing so prosperously atchieved at the beginning of his Expedition, turn'd all the Numidians to Masiniſſa. And thereupon all the old Soldiers that had served King Gala, flock'd to him from all parts out of the Country-Towns; inviting that Youth to recover his Fathers Kingdom. But Mezetulus was somewhat superior to him in his number of Men. For he had not only that Army, with which he had conquer'd Capusa, but some others also that came in after the Kings death: besides that the young King Lacumaces had brought great Auxiliaries from Syphax; so that Mezetulus had fifteen thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse. With whom Masiniſſa, though he had not near so great an Army, fought a pitch'd Battle; and by the courage of those old Soldiers, together with his own Experience who had been a General brought up in the Roman and Punic Wars, Wars, got the day. The young King fled with his Guardian and a small Band of Massylians into the Confines of Carthage. So Masiniſſa having recover'd his Fathers Kingdom, because he saw he must yet have a far greater contest with Syphax, thought it his best course to reconcile his Cousin-German, and therefore sent Messengers to him, not only to put him in hopes, That if he would commit himself to Masiniſſa's care, he should be at his Court in as much Honour as ever Oesalces was with Gala: and to promise Mezetulus, that, besides impunity, he should have all his Goods very faithfully restored to him. By which means he brought them both over to his Party; (they being desirous to have a small competency at home in their own Country, rather than be banished) though the Carthaginians did all they could to hinder it.

It happen'd that Asdrubal was with Syphax at that very time when these things were transacted. Who, seeing the Numidian, thought it did not much concern him, whether the Kingdom of the Massylians were under Lacumaces or Masiniſſa, told him, He was mistaken, if he thought Masiniſſa would be content with the same things that satisfied his Father Gala, or his Uncle Oesalces: for there was much more spirit and ambition in him, than ever had been in any of his Family. That he often in Spain gave instances of his Valour (so great as are rarely seen among men) both to his Allies and Enemies: and that Syphax and the Carthaginians, if they did not keep that rising fire under, would be quickly all on a mighty flame, when there was no help for it. That his strength was now but tender and frail, nor was he yet well settled in his Kingdom. At last by urging and spurring him on, with much ado he persuaded him to carry his Army to the Confines of the Massylians; and to pitch his Camp in a certain place, concerning which he had had with Gala many disputes not only in words, but with weapons also, as if it had certainly belonged to him: from whence if any one should endeavour to disturb him, (which would be the best thing that could happen for his advantage) that he would fight them: but if, for fear, they yielded and retired out of those parts, he might go into the midst of the Kingdom; and then either the Massylians would surrender themselves to him without fighting, or at least would not be able to cope with him. Syphax being incited by these words, made War upon Masiniſſa; in which upon the first attack he quite routed and defeated the Massylians. Masiniſſa with a few Horsemen ran out of the Battle into a Mountain, which the Inhabitants call Babus: whither some Families with their Tents and Cattel (for that is all the Estate they have) went after him, whilst the rest of the Massylian Mob submitted to the Government of Syphax. The Mountain which those Fugitives were possessed of was grassie and full of water: by which means being good to feed the Cattel, it afforded a sufficient supply of food for the men too, who lived upon flesh and milk. Then they at first by nightly and secret incursions, but afterward with open robbery infested all the Country round about; wasting the Carthaginian Territories more than any other, because there was not only more Booty than among the Numidians, but the robbery might be done with more security also. And now they grew so licentious and insolent in their excursions, that they carried the Plunder down to the Sea-side, to sell it to the Merchants, who touch at that place for that very reason; besides that there were more of the Carthaginians killed and taken, than many times there had been in a just War. The Carthaginians lamented those things before Syphax, whom (being himself inclined) they instigated to prosecute the remaining part of the War. But he thought it scarce became the Dignity of a King to pursue a vagabond Thief among the Mountains.

XXXII. Bocchar therefore, one of the Kings Prefects, who was an acute and an active man, was chosen for that purpose. And to him there were allowed 4000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, with hopes of mighty rewards, if he brought back Masiniſſa's Head, or took him (but that would be an inestimable joy) alive. He then attacking them by surprise, as they straggled and wander'd carelessly about the fields, and having separated a vast number of Men and Cattel from the Garrison where their Soldiers lay, forced Masiniſſa himself with some others into the top of the Mountain. From whence, having now almost made an end of the War, he sent not only a Booty of Cattel and Men, that he took, to the King, but some of the Forces also back, as having more than the remains of that War required for the finishing of it: and then with not above five hundred Foot, and two hundred Horse, pursuing Masiniſſa from the Mountains, shut him up in a narrow Valley, and set a Guard upon the several Avenues on both sides. By which means there was a great slaughter of the Massylians then made: but Masiniſſa with not above fifty Horse, got away from those that follow'd him through the by-passages and secret windings of the Mountain. Yet Bocchar kept at his heels: and having overtaken him in the open Plains, near the City Clupea, so circumvented him, that he killed every one of his Soldiers, excepting four Horsemen: with whom Masiniſſa, though himself also wounded, escaped, in the tumult, out of his hands. Howbeit they were still in sight, and a Party of Horse dispersed over all the Plain, (some one way, and some another, the round about way to meet them) pursued the five Enemies: till at last they ran into a great River (for they did not boggle to leap their Horses into it, when they were in such a fright) by the violence whereof being carried away out of the Numidians reach, two of them were suck'd in by a rapid Whirlpool before the Enemies face, and Masiniſſa himself thought to be drowned: but the two others and he got out among the Officers that grew on the other side. There Bocchar stopt his pursuit of them; because he neither dared to venture into the River, nor thought there was any one left for him now to follow. Thence therefore he return'd to the King with a false story, that Masinissa was drown'd: whereupon there were Messengers dispatch'd to Carthage to carry the joyful News; yea all Africa, being filled with the rumor of Masinissa's death, was variously affected with it. In the mean time Masinissa, whilst he lay in a private Cave and with Herbs was curing his wound, lived for some days by the robberies of his two Troopers. But as soon as ever the scar began to come over it, and it seemed to be in a condition to endure the throwing of a Dart or Javelin, he went again with wondrous audacity to try to recover his Kingdom; and though by the way he had gotten together not above forty Horse, yet when he came into the Massylian Dominions, he told them openly who he was; he caused such a commotion, not only through the former kindness that they bore to him, but by reason of this unexpected joyful accident (that they should see him safe and sound, whom they believed was long before dead) that within a few days six thousand Footmen in Arms, and four thousand Horsemen came in to him; so that he was now not only in possession of his Fathers Kingdom, but also able to plunder the Nations that were Allies of the Carthaginians, and lay waste the Massylian Confines, which was the Kingdom of Syphax. By that means Syphax being provoked to make War against him, he fate down between Cirtha and Hippo in the tops of the Mountains which lye very convenient upon all occasions.

XXXIII. Syphax therefore thinking that a thing of greater concern, than that he should leave the doing of it to his Officers, sent part of his Army with a young Man, his Son, called Vermina, whom he ordered to wheel about, and whilst he himself opposed the Enemy before, to set upon them in the Reer. Vermina therefore going in the night, as being to attack them by surprise, Syphax decamped in the day time publicly, because he resolved to engage them in a pitched Battle. And when the time was come, in which he thought those that he sent about were arrived where they should be, he also, marching up a small Ascent toward the Enemy, in confidence of his numbers, and the Ambuscade that he had planted behind, led his Men up the Mountain. Masinissa likewise, relying upon the place, because it was much more commodious for him to fight in, drew out his own Men. Thereupon there was a sharp conflict, and for a long time very dubious; the place and his Soldiers courage giving that assistance to Masinissa, which Syphax received from his multitude, that was far the greater. And then that multitude being divided, some pressing hard upon the Front, and others having planted themselves about the Reer, gave Syphax all assurance that could be of a Victory: for there was no way for Masinissa's Men so much as to escape, they were so environed both before and behind. Wherefore the rest, both Horse and Foot, being almost all slain or taken, Masinissa order'd two hundred Horsemen that were about him, and divided by Troops into three parts, to break forth, having assigned them a place before-hand, where they should rendezvous after their flight. Then he himself made his escape through the midst of the Enemy, to the place that he intended: but two of the Troops were stopt by the way; the one of them for fear of surrendering themselves to the Foe, whilst the other, being more resolute to make resistance, was shot and cut to pieces. In the mean time Masinissa eluding Vermina, though just at his heels, by turning and winding to and fro several ways, at last so tired him, that despairing to overtake him, he was forced to quit the pursuit. By which means Masinissa came with 80 Horse to the lesser Syrtis; where he lived between the Punick Sea-ports and the Country of the Garamantes, all the time till the arrival of C. Lelius and the Roman Navy in Africa. This makes me believe also that Masinissa came afterward to Scipio with a small, rather than a great supply of Horse: for that great number was suitable indeed to him, when he was in his Kingdom; but this lesser Force is more agreeable to the condition of a person in banishment.

XXXIV. The Carthaginians having lost a Wing of Horse, together with the Colonel of it, but raised more Horsemen by a new Levy, made Hanno Son of Amilcar Commander of them. Then they sent frequent Letters to Asdrubal and Syphax, with Messengers, and at last Ambassadors also to have them come to assist them: bidding Asdrubal make haste to aid his Country, that was now beset almost quite round: and begging of Syphax, that he would succour Carthage and all Africa in general. At that time Scipio had his Camp at Utica, about a thousand paces from the City; it being removed from the Sea-side, where for a few days it was, and joyned the Navy. Hanno, who had not Horsemen near enough, not only to provoke the Enemy, but not so much as to defend the Country from being plunder'd, made it his first business to raise Men, and increase the number of his Horse. In which affair, though he did not slight the Levies of other Nations, yet he hired Numidians before any others, because they are by far the best Horsemen in all Africa. And now he had got four thousand Horse, at what time he took the City of Salera, which was about fifteen thousand paces from the Roman Camp. Which when Scipio heard, and, That the Numidian Horse kept their Summer-Campaigne in houses; he replied, Let them be ever more still, if they will, as long as they have such a General. And therefore thinking that he ought the less to be idle, by how much the more slothful they were; he order'd Masinissa, whom he sent before with with the Horse, to ride up to the Gates, and challenge the Enemy to Battle: and when all the multitude of them were come forth, so that the shock of the Fight was not easily to be endured, that he should give back by little and little; for he would come up in the time of the dispute. Then having stay'd so long, as he thought time enough for Masinissa, who was gone before, to get the Enemy out, he followed with the Roman Horse, and marched without being discovered, because the Hills that were opportunely situate about the turnings of the Roads, concealed his passage. In the mean time Masinissa, as they had agreed, sometimes as if he would scare them, and sometimes as though he feared them, either rode up to the very Gates, or by retiring (which lookt so like fear in him, that it made the Foe the more daring) tempted them to come forth and rashly pursue them. But they were not yet come all forth, ere the General was very much tired upon several accounts; that is to say, with forcing some that were drunk and drowsie, to handle their Arms, and bridle their Horses; and hindring others, that they should not run out at the Gates in a confusion and without their Ensigns. First then Masinissa received them as they went out all in an hurry: but straightway more, following after very thick, made the Battle equal; till at length when all the Horse was now come up and engaged, they could no longer be endured. Notwithstanding that, Masinissa did not turn and run away, but by retreating gradually so long withstood the shock, till he had drawn them on to the Hills that covered the Roman Horse. Who rising out of that place, with entire strength and fresh Horses, inclosed Hanno and the Africans, who were tired with fighting and pursuing, and Masinissa turning his Horse, all on a sudden came back into the Battle. About a thousand that were in the Van, being not able with any ease to retreat, were with their General Hanno environed and killed. The rest who were frightened most of all at the loss of their General, flying away as fast as they could, were for three thousand paces pursued by the Conquerors, and about two thousand Horsemen of them either taken or slain. Among whom it was well known, that there were no less than two hundred Carthaginian Horse, some of which were very remarkable both for their riches and birth.

About the same day that this was done, the Ships that had conveyed the Booty into Sicily returned with fresh provisions: as if they had foreboded, that they were come to take in such another Cargo. All others do not agree, that two Carthaginian Generals of the same Name were killed in two Engagements of Horsemen: for fear, I suppose, lest the same thing being twice related, should deceive the Reader; for Calpis indeed and Valerius say that Hanno was taken. Scipio presented the Officers and Troopers as every man had behaved himself, and especially Masinissa, with extraordinary Gifts: and having put a strong Garrison into Salera, he marched away with the rest of the Army; not only plundering the Country which way soever he went, but also taking some Cities and small Towns. By which means having diffused the terror of the War into all parts far and near, the seventh day after he set forth, he returned to his Camp with a vast number of Men, Cattel, and all kind of Booty: and from thence again sent away several Ships laden with the spoils of the Enemy. Then ceasing to make any little Expeditions, or to plunder the Country, he turned all the force of the War toward the taking of Utica: supposing, that if he had once taken that City, it would be a convenient seat for him to perfect all his other designs in. In order whereunto he drew up not only his Naval Forces on that side of the City that lies to the Sea, but his Land-Army also, from an Hill that stands just over the very Walls of it. He had brought all Instruments and Engines of War along with him, or had them sent with the other provisions out of Sicily: besides that, there were new ones then made in the Armory by a great many Workmen, whom he had shut up there for that end and purpose. The Uticans reposed all their hopes in the people of Carthage, and the Carthaginians in Asdrubal, so that he could but bring Syphax over to his Party: but all things moved much slower than they (who wanted assistance) could have wished. Asdrubal having raised by a most industrious Levy to the number of thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, yet durst not remove his Camp any nearer to the Enemy before Syphax came. Syphax brought with him fifty thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse; and immediately decamping from Carthage, fate down not far from Utica and the Roman Intrenchments. And their arrival did this kindness at least, that whereas Scipio had tryed all he could for almost forty days to take Utica (but all in vain) it forced them to quit their frustrate enterprise. For now the Winter was at hand: wherefore he fortified his Winter-Camp in a certain Promontory, which joyning to the Continent by a small neck of Land, runs out for some space into the Sea. With the same Bulwark also he encompassed the Naval Camp too: and having placed the Legions in the middle of the Hill, the Ships (being got ashore) and the Naval Allies kept on the North side, whilst the Horse took up the Southern Vale which wrought to the other shore.

These things were done in Africa till the latter end of Autumn. Then, besides the Corn XXXVI. that was conveyed thither from all parts of the Country, as Plunder, and the other stores brought out of Sicily and Italy, Cn. Octavius, the Proprætor, came out of Sardinia from T. Claudius, the Prætor, who governed that Province, with a vast quantity of Corn: with which not only the Barns that were already made, but others also, then new built, were filled.

filled. But the Army wanted cloaths: and therefore Octavius was employ'd to talk with the Prætor, and see if any thing might be gotten and sent out of that Province. Nor was that business long a doing: for a thousand two hundred Toge [i. e. Gowns] with twelve thousand Tunicks were sent them in a short time. The same Summer that these things were done in Africa, P. Sempronius, the Consul, who had the Bruttii for his Province, engaged with Annibal in a Skirmish, or tumultuary Battle near Croton upon the Road as he marched along. But they fought in Crowds rather than in Battalia: where the Romans being beaten, in a Tumult rather than a Fight, lost a thousand two hundred of the Consuls Army, and then returned in a consternation to their Camp. But the Enemy durst not attack them there: so the Consul in the dead time of the next night marching thence, and having sent a Messenger before to P. Licinius, the Proconsul, to approach with his Legions, he united the Forces. So two Generals and two Armies returned to Annibal; nor did they make the least delay to fight on either side, the Consul's Forces being now doubled, and the Carthaginian animated by his late Victory. Sempronius placed his Legions in the Front, and Licinius's were put in the Reer. The Consul at the beginning of the Fight vowed to dedicate a Temple to the Goddess called Fortuna Primigenia [i. e. Fortune that has no Original from any thing else] if that day he chanced to vanquish the Enemy; and that Vow was attended with a successful Event: for the Carthaginians being routed and put to flight, there were above four thousand men slain, besides little less than three hundred that were taken alive, with forty Horses and eleven military Ensigns. Annibal being dismayed at this misfortune, led his Army away to Croton. At the same time M. Cornelius, the Consul, in the other part of Italy, kept Etruria in awe not so much by his Arms, as by the terror of his judicial Proceedings; though it were almost wholly inclined to Magno, and through him to the hopes of innovation. For he managed that affair, by order of the Senate, without any severity and respect of persons: and many Noblemen of Etruria, who either themselves had gone, or sent to Magno concerning the Revolt of that Country, were first condemned, being then present; but afterward through shame for what they had done, going into voluntary banishment of themselves, and being in their absence again condemned, they, having withdrawn their bodies, left their goods only, which might be confiscated, as a commutation for their punishment.

Whilst the Consuls were about these affairs in several Countries, in the mean time the Censors, M. Livius and C. Claudius called over the Senate, and again reviewed them. Of whom Fabius Maximus was a second time Princeps, i. e. chosen Chief; and seven were taken notice of more than ordinary, though ne're an one that had late in a curule Chair. They earnestly and with the greatest care imaginable exacted the repairs of Holy places. They made a street from the Forum Boarium, or Beast-market, to the Temple of Venus, and about the Fori publici [i. e. publick Shops] ordering the Temple of the Mater Magna [or great Mother, i. e. the Earth] to be built in the Palace. They also raised a new Tax out of the Salt; which being formerly sold for a Sextans both at Rome and all over Italy, was continued for the same price at Rome, but higher rated in the lesser Cities and Burroughs, and of a different price in some other places. That Tax the people easily imagined was a device of M. Livius's (one of the Censors) who was angry at the people, for that he had formerly been condemned by an unjust Judgment; besides, that they fancied that in the price of Salt the Tribes, by whose means he was condemned, were highest rated. Thence was he surnamed Livius Salinator [i. e. Livy the Salter.] The Survey was set up somewhat the later, because the Censors sent certain persons about all the Provinces to bring them word how many Soldiers and Citizens there were in all the Roman Armies. After which the Poll amounted with them to two hundred sixty five thousand men. C. Claudius Nero set up this Lustrum [or Survey of the People.] Then they took the Poll of the twelve Colonies (a thing never done before) by information of the Censors; that they might have publick Registers of what numbers of Soldiers and what stocks of Money they had. Then they surveyed the Knights, and both the Censors happen'd at that time to have each a publick Horse. When therefore they came to the Tribe called Tribus Pollia, in which M. Livius's Name was, and the Cryer boggled to cite the Censor himself, Nero had him, Cite M. Livius; and whether out of an old grudge, or a vain, unreasonable pride that he then took in shewing his severity, He commanded M. Livius, because he had been condemned by the Judgment of the People, to sell his Horse. So M. Livius on the other hand, when they came to the Tribe called, Tribus Narniensis and his Collegues, ordered C. Claudius also to sell his Horse, for two reasons; the one, because he had born false witness against him; and the other, that he was not heartily reconciled to him. By this means there was a very ungentle contest between them, who should most fully the others reputation, though by the loss of his own. At the end of his Censorship, when C. Claudius had sworn to the Laws, and was gone up into the Treasury, among the Names of such as he left only tributary to the publick (and otherwise totally disfranchised) he gave his Collegue a Name. Then M. Livius came into the Treasury, and, except the Tribe called Tribus Maecia, which had neither condemned him, nor made either Consul or Censor after he was condemned, left all the Roman People, consisting of thirty four Tribes, disfranchised: because not only that they

they had condemned him, though innocent; but being condemned, had made him Consul and Censor: nor could they deny, either that they had offended once in their Judgment, or twice in their Assemblies. That among the thirty four Tribes C. Claudius also should be disfranchised. And if he had any precedent for making the same person twice disfranchised, he would leave C. Claudius particularly by name among those that were so punished. This contest of the Censors to reproach each other was very unbecoming: but their chastising the peoples inconstancy was worthy of the Censorian gravity of those times. By this means the Censors falling under envy, Cn. Babius, supposing that he had a good occasion to raise himself by their ruines, he as Tribune of the People, assigned them both such a day for their Tryal. But that matter was by consent of the Senate set aside, lest the Censorship in time to come might be obnoxious to the popular breath.

The same Summer Clampetia, a Town in the Country of the Bruttii, being taken by the Consul by storm, Consentia and Pandosia, with other meaner Towns, came and made a voluntary surrender. And when the time of the Assembly was now at hand, they thought fit rather to send for Cornelius out of Etruria, where there was no War, to Rome: and he made Cn. Servilius Cæpio, with C. Servilius Geminus, Consuls. Then the Prætorian Assembly was held: wherein were chosen P. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Quintilius Varus, P. Aelius Petus, and P. Villius Tappulus: the last two of which were created Prætors, though they were at that time Ædiles of the People. The Consul having ended, the Assembly returned into Etruria to the Army. Some of the Priests died that year, and in their places were put Tib. Venerius Philo High-Priest of Mars, who was created and inaugurated into the place of M. Æmilius Regillus, who died the year before: and in the room of M. Pomponius Matho the Augur and Decemvir were created, M. Aurelius Cotta, as Decemvir, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, as Augur, though he were but a very Youth, which was a thing mighty extraordinary in the conferring of the Priesthoods. That year there was a golden Chariot set up in the Capitol by the curule or chief Ædiles, C. Livius and M. Servilius Geminus: and the Roman Games were performed two days together, as the Plebeian ones also were by the Ædiles, P. Aelius and P. Villius: besides that there was a Feast called Epulum Jovis [or Jupiters Feast] upon account of those Games.

DECADE III. BOOK X.

The E P I T O M E.

5, 6. In Africa Scipio overcame the Carthaginians, Syphax, King of Numidia, and Ardubal in several Battles, by the assistance of Masiniſſa, took two Camps belonging to the Enemy, in which 40000 Men were cut off by Fire and Sword. 12. He took Syphax by means of C. Lælius and Masiniſſa. 13, 14, 15. Masiniſſa fell presently in Love with Sophonisba the Wife of Syphax, and Daughter of Ardubal, who was at the same time taken, and married her: for which being rebuked by Scipio, he sent her poison which she drank and died. 20, 25. It came to pass through Scipio's many Victories, that the Carthaginians being driven to despair, called Annibal back out of Italy for a Guard to the publick Safety. 30, &c. And he departing out of Italy in the sixteenth year, crossed over into Africa, where he endeavoured by Parley to make a Peace with Scipio. 35. But being that they could not agree upon the Terms of it, he was conquered in a pitched battle. 37. The Carthaginians had a Peace granted to them upon their Petition. Annibal laid violent hands upon Giſgo as he was dissuading the People from Peace; and then excusing the temerity of that action, himself stood up and excited them to the same. Magno, who was wounded in the war that he had with the Romans in the Country of the Infubrians, as he came back for Africa, upon a Summons that he by certain Ambassadors sent to him, dyed of his wound. Masiniſſa had his Kingdom restored to him. Scipio returning into the City, made a noble and a splendid Triumph, which Q. Terentius Culleo, a Senator, followed, with a Cap upon his Head [as though he had been by Scipio redeemed from servitude.] Scipio Africanus (who whether through the favour of the Soldiers, or the love of the People, he were first so surnamed, is uncertain) was certainly the first General that ever was ennobled with the Name of a whole Nation vanquished by himself.

Cn. Servilius Cæpio and C. Servilius Geminus, who were Consuls (in the sixteenth year of the Punic War) having made report to the Senate concerning the War and the Provinces, the Senate thought fit, that the Consuls should either agree among themselves, or cast Lots, which of them should have the Province of the Bruttii against Annibal, with Etruria and Liguria. That he, to whose Lot the Bruttii fell, should have the Army of the Consul, P. Sempronius, P. Sempronius (for he also was continued in Commission as Proconsul a year longer) should succeed P. Licinius; and he come back to Rome; who was also accounted an excellent Warrior, besides his other accomplishments, in which no Citizen at that time out-did him, he having all humane good things amassed together, that either Nature or Fortune could supply. He likewise was of a Noble Family and rich, besides that he was very handsom and strong. He was also reckoned very eloquent; whether he were to plead a Cause, or upon any occasion, either in the Senate, or before the People, were to persuade or dissuade the Audience; being moreover well skill'd in the Jus Pontificium [the Law concerning Religion] but above all, his warlike Experience had qualified qualified him for the Consulate. What was decreed to be done touching one Army in the Country of the Bruttii, the same was also ordered as to the Army in Etruria and Liguria. M. Cornelius was commanded to deliver the Army to the new Consul; and himself had the Province of Gaul continued to him together with those Legions, which the Prætor L. Scribonius had had the year before. Then they cast Lots for the Provinces; the Bruttii falling to Cepio, and Etruria to Servilius Geminus. After that the Prætors took their chances; and of them Petius Ailius had the City, Cn. Lentulus Sardinia, P. Villius Sicily, and Quintilius Varus Ariminum with the two Legions, that had been under Lucretius Spurius. Lucretius also was continued in Commission, to rebuild the Town of Genoa, that had been demolished by Mago the Carthaginian. P. Scipio likewise, not in respect to the present juncture, but what he was then about, was to continue still in Commission, till he had made an end of the War in Africa; and a Supplication order'd to be publickly made, That his going over into the Province of Africa might prove of good consequence to the Roman People, the General himself and all his Army.

II. Three thousand Soldiers were sent over into Sicily, and because, what strength that Province had, was all carried over into Africa, lest any Navy should come out of Africa, they order'd the Sea-coast of Sicily to be guarded by forty Ships. Villius brought thirteen new Ships with him into Sicily, where the other old ones were refitted up again. Of which Navy M. Pomponius, who the year before was Prætor, being (continued in Commission and) made Admiral, man'd the Ships with fresh Soldiers that came out of Italy. The like number of Ships did the Senate decree for Cn. Octavius, who was another Prætor of the precedent year, with the same Power and Authority to defend the Coast of Sardinia. Lentulus, the Prætor, was commanded to put two thousand Men on board the Ships: and the Coast of Italy (because it was uncertain which way the Carthaginians would send their Fleet (but, to be sure, they would fall upon any part that they saw unguarded) was committed to the care of M. Porcius, a Prætor of the year last past, with the same number of Ships. The Consuls raised 3000 Soldiers for that Fleet by order of Senate, besides two City-Legions for the accidental necessities of the War. The Spains with the same Armies and Commissions were allotted to the old Generals, Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus. The Roman affairs that year were managed with 20 Legions in all, and 160 long Ships. The Prætors were order'd to go into their respective Provinces; and the Consuls commanded, That before they went from the City, they should set forth the Ludi magni [or great Games] which T. Manlius Torquatus, when Dictator, had vowed to perform in five year after that time, if the Republick continued in the same state. Then Prodigies, of which relations were brought from several places, created new superstitions in the minds of the people. Crows were believed in the Capitol to have not only gnawed Gold to pieces with their bills, but even to have eaten it. The Mice at Antium gnawed a Crown of Gold. About Capua a mighty swarm of Grasshoppers filled all the Country, so that people could not devise whence they should come. An Horse-Colt was foaled at Reate which had five feet, and at Anagnia there were fires first scatter'd, as it were, all over the Sky, but afterward a great blaze in the Heavens. At Fruinone a Bow encompassed the Sun with a small line; but soon after a greater Sun seemed with its orbit on the outside to inclose that very Circle. At Arpinum the Earth, in a Champaigne place, fell in and made a large hollow. As one of the Consuls was a sacrificing the first Victim, the head or tip was wanting in the Liver. Those Prodigies were taken care of by offering up of greater Sacrifices; and the Colledge of Priests directed what Gods they should offer them unto.

III. Those things being over, the Consuls and Prætors went to their several Provinces: but all had an eye to Africa (as if they had each of them had the particular care of it) either because they believed, that the main stress of the War lay there; or to gratifie Scipio, upon whom all the eyes of the City were at that time turned. Wherefore not only from Sardinia (as I said before) but from Sicily and Spain too, there were transported thither Cloaths, and Corn, and Arms also out of Sicily, with all other sorts of Provisions. Nor did Scipio remit the works of War at any time all the Winter long, but had his hands always full of business. He besieged Utica; his Camp being in sight of Asdrubal. The Carthaginians had launch'd their Ships, and had all their Fleet in a readiness to intercept the Roman Provisions. Amidst all these affairs he had not neglected even the means to reconcile Syphax; if perchance the Honey-Moons were now over between him and his Wife. But from Syphax there was more reason to believe that he would have Terms of Peace which the Carthaginians offered him, that the Romans should depart out of Africa, and the Carthaginians out of Italy, than, if they fought, there was any hopes of his revolting. All this affair was, I suppose, transacted more by Messengers (and so most Authors say) than by Syphax himself, though Antias Valerius tells us he came in person into the Roman Camp. The Roman General at first would scarce hearken to those Conditions; though afterward, to gain an opportunity for his Men to go into the Enemies Camp, he was more calm in his refusal, and gave them some hopes, that, by treating about it to and fro for some time, they might at last agree the matter. The Winter-quarters of the Carthaginians being built of materials which they gathered in an hurry out of the fields, were almost wholly wholly built of wood. The Numidians especially kept in Hutts, for the most part, made of Reeds and Sedge, all about the fields without any order, and some of them that took up their Habitations without any Command from their Officers, lay even without the Trench and Bulwark. These circumstances being told to Scipio, gave him hopes that he might have occasion to burn the Enemies Camp.

He therefore sent, along with the Ambassadors that went to Syphax, certain Centurions that were the first Leaders in each part of the Army, men of known courage and skill, in the habit of Servants or Knaplack-Boys; who, whilst the Ambassadors were at the Parley, might straggle about the Camp several ways, to observe all the Avenues and Passes, with the situation and form not only of the Camp in general, but of each particular Quarter, as well where the Carthaginians as where the Numidians lay, and what distance there was between Asdrubal's Camp and that of the King: and likewise to find out by the manner of their Guards and Watches, whether they were more easie to be attack'd by night or by day. And then amidst their frequent conferences there were sometimes one part, and anon another of them sent, that by a greater number all things might be the better understood. When the thing having been several times discoursed of, had given more hopes every day than other, both to Syphax and the Carthaginians too, of a Peace by his means; the Roman Ambassadors said, They durst not return to their General, unless they had a positive answer. And therefore they desired him, that either he would resolve upon what he had declared, or consult Asdrubal and the Carthaginians, if he thought fit: for it was high time either to conclude of a Peace, or begin the War as fast as they could. But whilst Syphax consulted Asdrubal, and he the Carthaginians, not only the Spies had time enough to view all parts of the Camp, but Scipio also, to prepare such things as were conducive to his purpose: and from the discourse and hopes which they had of a Peace, a neglect (as it usually does) arose among the Carthaginians and Numidians, of taking care, that no Hostility were offer'd to them in the mean time. At last their answer was brought back, some things (because the Roman seemed very earnest for a Peace) being put too hard upon them in respect of that present juncture; which gave Scipio a good opportunity, according to his own hearts desire, to break off the Truce. And therefore the next day, when he had told the Kings Messenger, that he would propose it to a Council of War, he gave him this answer; That he himself was the only person that in vain contended for it, no one man else being for a Peace. Wherefore he might tell the King, that he could not hope for Peace with the Romans upon any other Terms, than by leaving the Carthaginians. He therefore broke off the Truce, that he might freely and with Honour execute his designs: and launching his Ships (it being now the beginning of the Spring) he put all sorts of Instruments and Engines of War on board them, as though he would have attack'd Utica from off the Sea. He sent two thousand Men to take possession of that Hill, which he had formerly been posted upon, above Utica; for fear, lest when he went himself against Syphax and Asdrubal, any Sally might be made out of the Town, and his Camp, left with a slight Guard, thereby attack'd.

These things being prepared, he called a Council, and bade the Spies declare what they had discovered, as likewise Masimissa, who knew all the Enemies methods; proposing at last himself, what he designed against the next night. Then he gave Order to the Tribunes, that when his Tent was cleared, and they had given the signal, immediately to draw the Legions out of the Camp. As he commanded, the Ensigns began to move out of the Camp a little before Sun-setting; and being almost till the first Watch a setting their Men in Array, they about midnight (for it was seven thousand paces off) came at an easie rate to the Enemies Camp. There Scipio gave Lælius one part of the Forces, together with Masimissa and the Numidians; commanding them to attack Syphax's Camp, and to throw fire into it. After which taking Lælius and Masimissa apart from one another, he conjured them, That they would supply by their diligence and care what foresight the night took from them. That he himself would attack Asdrubal and the Punic Camp: but he would not begin before he saw the fire in that of the King. Nor was that matter long deferred. For as soon as the fire was thrown and took in the next Hutts, he presently fell upon all the nearest parts, and from thence going on to the rest, dispersed himself through all the Camp. Thereupon arose a great conternation among the Enemies, as it must needs do, when in the night they saw so great a conflagration. But they thinking it to be an accidental, not an hostile, or a warlike fire, ran out unarmed to quench it, and fell into the hands of the Soldiers, especially those Numidians, whom Masimissa had planted in several convenient passes, according to his knowledge of the Kings Camp. The flame devoured many of them as they lay asleep: whilst as many more, who ran away headlong one over another to make their escape, were trodden to pieces in the narrow Avenues of the Gates.

When the Watchmen or Sentinels of the Carthaginians (who were the first that discovered it) and after them the rest, alarm'd by that nocturnal Tumult, saw the blazing flame, they also, by the same mistake, believed that it happen'd of its own accord. And the clamour that was raised amidst their wounds and slaughter, being not certainly known to proceed from that reason, (for it might arise from the conternation they were in at that time of night) deprived them of all means to find out the true cause. Wherefore each one for himself, they all came out unarmed (as dreading nothing of an Enemy) at every Gate, the nearest way they could, carrying such things only with them, as were fit to quench the fire, and ran upon the Roman Army. Where being all slain, left even so much as one Messenger should escape, Scipio immediately made up to their Gates, which (as it uses to happen in such cases) were in the hurry at that time neglected, and having set fire to the next Huts, the spreading flame at first appeared as though it had been scatter'd in several places; but soon increasing, it crept into the contiguous Tents, and of a sudden put every thing into one common blaze. The Men and Beasts being findg'd at first, blocked up the passes of their Gates by their dishonourable flight, but straightway did the same with their dead bodies; and those that the fire did not consume, were taken off by the Sword: in so much that two Camps were destroy'd by one disaster. Yet both the Generals and of so many thousand Men, two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse half arm'd, were great part of them wounded, and findged by the fire, escaped. There were killed and burnt full forty thousand men, six thousand taken; of which many were Carthaginian Noblemen, eleven Senators, with an hundred seventy eight military Ensigns, and above two thousand seven hundred Numidian Horse; six Elephants were taken, and eight cut off by Fire and Sword, besides a great quantity of Arms that was then lost, which the General set all on fire as a Sacrifice to Vulcan.

VII. Asdrubal ran away with a few about him to the next City belonging to the Africans; and thither also all the rest, that were alive, followed him: but soon after, for fear the Town might be surrendred to Scipio, he quitted it. Nor was it long before the Romans were received into the same with the Gates wide open: but they committed no Act of Hostility, for that the Inhabitants had made a voluntary surrender. After that they took and sack'd two other Cities; distributing the Plunder of them and what they saved out of the burnt Camps, from the fire, among the Soldiers. Syphax sat down about 8000 paces from thence in a place well fortified. Asdrubal went to Carthage, to prevent any effeminate Counsels, that might proceed from their fear there, since the late misadventure. And there the people were at first in so great a consternation, that they fancied Scipio would pass by Utica, and come immediately to besiege Carthage. Whereupon the Suffetes (who are a kind of Consuls in that place) called a Senate: in which they gave three several Opinions; the one, That it was best to send Ambassadors to Scipio for Peace; the second, That they ought to recal Annibal to defend his Country from that destructive War; and the third (which shewed even a Roman constancy in such ill circumstances) was, That they must recruit their Army, and desire Syphax not to lay down his Arms. This last Opinion, because Asdrubal was there present, and all those of the Barchine Faction were more desirous of a War, prevailed. Thereupon a Levy began to be made both in the City and the Country, and Ambassadors were sent to Syphax, who himself did all he could to renew the War: for his Wife had now perswaded him, not as before with blandishments, which yet are powerful enough to incline a Lovers mind, but with her prayers and for pity, begging of him with tears in her eyes, that he would not betray her Father and Country, or suffer Carthage to be consumed in the same flames, in which the Camps had been destroyed. The Carthaginian Ambassadors also brought him very seasonable good News, That four thousand Celtiberians were come up to the City of Obba, which his Officers had raised in Spain, being all brave lusty young Fellows, whom they met: besides that Asdrubal would be there in a short time with a considerable Force. He therefore not only gave the Ambassadors a very kind answer, but shewed them like a great multitude of Numidian Hinds, whom he had armed and mounted in that time, affirming, that he would raise all the Youth in his Kingdom, That he knew they were ruined by fire, not by fair fighting: and that he was the weaker in War, that could be vanquished by Arms. This was his Answer to the Ambassadors. So after a few days Asdrubal and Syphax again united their Forces, which consisted in all of about 30000 fighting Men.

VIII. When Scipio therefore thought that, as to Syphax and the Carthaginians, he had made an end of the War, and was intent only upon the taking of Utica, to the Walls whereof he then applied his Engines, he was diverted by the rumor of the Wars being again renewed: and thereupon leaving some small Party only for a shew of a Siege by Sea and Land, he with the Body of the Army marched toward the Foe. And first he sat down upon an Hill about 4000 paces from the Kings Camp: from whence the next day marching down into the great Plains (as they call them) which lie under that Hill, he spent all that day in making approaches to the Enemies Camp, and attacking them with light Skirmishes: but during the two days following that, they made only tumultuous Excursions upon each other to and fro, and did nothing worth a speaking of. The fourth day they both came into the field; the Roman placing the Principes [their main Body] behind the Hastati [Spearmen] and the Triarii [the best Soldiers in their Army] in the Reer, with the Italian Horse in the right Wing, and the Numidians and Masiniissa in the left. On the other side Syphax and Asdrubal with the Numidians were set against the Italian Horse, and the Carthaginians against Masiniissa; so that the Celtiberians were in the middle in opposition to the Roman Legions. Being thus array'd, they fell to it: and upon the first congress both the Wings, Numidians and Carthaginians too, were routed. For neither could the Numidians, who were were for the most part Country-fellows, sustain the shock of the Roman Horse, nor the Carthaginians, who themselves were new Soldiers, endure Masiniissa, he being so terrible, besides other reasons, upon the account of the late Victory. By this means the main Body of the Celtiberians was naked, without the Wings on either side to cover it, but stood their ground; because there was neither any prospect of their being saved, if they ran away in places which they were unacquainted with; nor could they hope for pardon from Scipio, whom, though he deserved very well of them and their Country, they had come into Africa with mercenary Arms to oppose. Wherefore the Enemy being scattered and defeated round about, fell one over another and obstinately died: but when all the Streets of the day was turned upon them, Syphax and Asdrubal had some time to escape; but then night overtook the victorious Romans, who were now tired with slaughter, rather than fighting.

The next day Scipio sent Laelius and Masiniissa with all the Roman and Numidian Horse, together with the most expedite part of the Foot, to pursue Syphax and Asdrubal; whilst he himself with the strength of the Army subdued all the Cities round about, that were in subjection to the Carthaginians, partly by fear, partly by hope, and partly by force. For that reason Carthage it self was in a great fright, believing that Scipio, who had made use of his Arms against the people there about, and subdued their Neighbours, would very shortly attempt even Carthage it self. They therefore repaired their Walls, and fortified them with Ballions; each man for himself conveying out of the Country what he thought necessary for the holding out of a Siege. They seldom spoke of Peace, but much more frequently of sending Ambassadors to fetch Annibal home, the greatest part of them delirring that the Navy, which was prepared to receive the Provisions, might be sent to surprise the Fleet that lay so neglected at Utica, where it may be they might destroy the Naval Camp too, it being left with so small a Guard. They all inclined most to this advice; but yet they thought fit that Ambassadors should be sent to Annibal too: For though the Navy should have never so good success, and that the Siege at Utica should be in some measure raised, yet there was neither any other General besides Annibal, nor any Army but his, that could defend Carthage. The Ships therefore were the next day launched, and the Ambassadors went for Italy, all things being done by the instigation of Fortune in an hurry; whilst every man thought each neglect of his own to be so far a betraying of the publick safety. Scipio by this time having an Army at his heels, that was laden with the spoils of many Cities, sent the Captives and the other Booty into the old Camp at Utica, and being intent upon Carthage seized Tunis, which was forsaken by those that were set to guard it. That Tunis is about 15000 paces from Carthage, being a place well fortified not only with Works, but by Nature too; and stands so, that you may see that from Carthage, or Carthage from that; not only the City, but the Sea also that runs about it.

There as the Romans were in the heat of raising their Bulwark, they spied the Enemies Fleet coming from Carthage to Utica. Wherefore, omitting their work, they ordered their Men to march, and their Ensigns were posted away in all haste, lest their Ships being turned toward the Land and to a Siege, should be surpris'd when they were not ready for a Sea-fight. For how could a Fleet, that carried nothing but Engines and Instruments of Battery, withstand a Navy which was fitted and armed with all sorts of convenient Light and Sea-Utensils? especially when they were either made use of as Ships of burden, or so applied to the Walls, that they might facilitate the Romans ascent thereunto instead of a Mound and Bridges. For that reason Scipio, contrary to what is usual in Sea-fights, taking the Ships of War, which might have defended the rest, into the Reer of the Fleet next the Land, he planted a fourfold rank of Ships of burden as a Wall against the Foe, and kept them together, left in the tumult of the Fight their ranks should be disordered, with Masts and Sail-yards which lay a-crofs from Ship to Ship, and were fast tied to each other with strong ropes as it were in one single bond; with planks all over them, to make the ranks of the Ships passable; besides that under the very Bridges he made such spaces, as that in them the little Scout-ships could run up toward the Enemy, and be safely received again. Having put things thus tumultuously in a readiness, he man'd those Ships of burden with about 1000 choice Fellows, and stow'd in them a great quantity of darting Weapons, enough to hold out, though the Fight should continue a long time. They therefore, so prepared and set about the business, expected the Enemies approach. But the Carthaginians, who, if they had made haste, might have found all things in a confusion, and seized them at the first Onset, being dismay'd at their misfortunes by Land, and for that reason, though they were more powerful by Sea, distrusting their own ability, spent the day in slothfully cruising up and down, and about Sun-setting arrived at the Port, which the Africans call Ruscinona. The next day at Sun-rising they put their Ships in a fighting posture out at Sea, as though they had designed a Sea-fight, and that the Romans would have met them. And when they had waited a great while, seeing the Enemy did not stir, they at last attack'd the Ships of burden. But this Action was not at all like a Sea-fight, but most nearly resembled so many Ships attempting the Walls of a Town. For the Oncries [or Ships of burden] were somewhat higher than theirs; so that the Carthaginians from their Ships of War threw many Weapons pons (it being upwards) to no purpose toward the Enemy that were above them; whilst the stroke from thence out of the Oneraries was heavier, and by reason of its very weight more steddly. The Scout-ships and other small Vessels, who ran forth through the spaces under the Bridges of Planks, were first overwhelmed even by the very force and bulk of the Men of War; and then too were inconvenient to their own Men, because, being mingled with the Enemies Ships, they often forced them to withhold the Weapons which they would have thrown, for fear they might happen to hit their Friends. At last great harping Irons began to be thrown out of the Punick into the Roman Ships. Which they being not able to cut, much less the Chains by which they hung and were thrown in, to the end that each Ship of War with her stern to the Ship of burden might drag them by that hook after her, you might have seen them cut the Ropes, wherewith they were tied to one another, and the rest of the Ships that were behind move after them. By this means chiefly all the Bridges were dissolved, and the Roman Soldiers that were on board them had hardly time to leap into other Ships: insomuch that there about six of those onerary Ships towed by the Enemies Poops to Carthage. At which the Carthaginians were more rejoiced than the thing deserved; but their success in that was therefore the more grateful to them, in that amidst their daily misadventures and sorrows they had some little glimmerings of good Fortune; besides that, it plainly appeared, the Roman Navy was not far from ruine, if their Commanders had not been idle, or Scipio not come up as he did.

XI. About the same time, when Laelius and Masiniissa in fifteen days were come into Numidia, the Massylians were overjoyed to see their King, whom they so long desired, and delivered him up his Fathers Kingdom. Syphax, seeing his Officers and Guards were driven thence, kept himself within his ancient Dominions, though he could not yet be at quiet. For his Wife and Father-in-law, seeing him mightily in Love, incited him still more and more; besides that, he so abounded in Men and Horses, that the Forces which he had in his eye over all his Kingdom, that had been in a flourishing condition for so many years, might have animated a Soul even less barbarous and tyrannical than his. Wherefore having mustered up all those that were fit for War into one Body, he divided the Horses, Arms and Weapons among them; distributing the Horsemen into Troops, and the Foot into Companies, as he had formerly of the Romans learnt to do. Then with that Army, which though it were no less than that which he before had had, was almost all raw and undisciplined Men, he marched toward the Enemy. And having pitched his Camp pretty near them, at first a few Horsemen went very cautiously from their Post to scout, but were forced back again with darts to their own Party: after which, they made excursions one upon the other; in which those that were worsted being incensed with indignation, gave occasion for others to come on: which is a provocation peculiar to Horse-engagements, when either hope of Victory to such as have the better on't, or rage, among such as are worsted, brings more of their fellow-Soldiers up to them. By that means therefore, though the Fight were begun by a few, at last all the Horse on both sides was very eager to fall on. And whilst the Horse alone were engaged, the shock of the Massylians (for Syphax sent forth great numbers of them) could hardly be endured: but soon after that, when the Roman Foot by running in between their own Horse, who made way for them, had strengthened their Body, and deterred the Enemy from pressing on so fast as before; the Barbarians at first rode somewhat slower, and then standing still, were almost confounded at this new sort of Fight; till at last they did not only give way to the Foot, but could not so much as stand against the Horse, when the Foot with their assistance had put fresh courage into them. And now the Ensigns of the Legions too drew near; whereupon the Massylians could not brook not only the first Onset, but not so much as the sight of them and their Arms: so far did either the remembrance of former misadventures or the present terror prevail upon them.

XII. Then Syphax, as he was charging up to the Enemies Troops, to try, if either by shame or his own danger he could stop their flight, had his Horse wounded under him in his full career, and falling down was taken Prisoner, and dragged alive (which was like to be a more joyful sight to Masiniissa than any body else) to Laelius. Cirtha was the Metropolis of Syphax's Kingdom: and thither a vast multitude of people were fled. But the slaughter in that Battle was less than the Victory, because the Horse alone had there engaged; by which means there were not above 5000 slain, and less than half that number taken, by an Attack made upon the Camp, whither the frightened multitude, when they had lost their King, betook themselves. Then Masiniissa said, Nothing could be more acceptable to him, than being victorious to see his Fathers Kingdom, which he at so great an interval of time had now recovered: yet that he must not be idle in prosperity any more than adversity. If Laelius would suffer him to go before to Cirtha with the Horse, and Syphax in Fetters, he should surprise and put them all into a great consternation; and that Laelius might come after, with the Foot, at his leisure. To which Proposal Laelius consenting, Masiniissa went before to Cirtha, where he ordered all the chief men of the City to be summoned to a Treaty. But they being ignorant what condition the King was in, he could not induce them either by telling them what had happened, by threats or by persuasion to submit, before the King was presented sented before their eyes. With that, when they saw so horrid a spectacle, they all lamented his condition; and partly for fear forsook the Walls, partly by a sudden consent among those that sought to ingratiate themselves with the Conqueror, threw open the Gates. Thereupon Masiniissa, having placed a Guard at the several Gates and all the most convenient places on the Walls, left any of them should run away, rode up on a gallop to seize the Palace. Where, as he just came into the Porch, Sophonisba, Syphax's Wife and Asdrubal's Daughter, met him: and seeing Masiniissa amidst all the throng of Soldiers, who was remarkable not only for his Arms, but his other habit also, she, supposing (as it really was) that he was the King, threw her self at his feet, and said: The Gods, your own courage, and the success you met with, have put it into your hands to do what you please with us; but if a Captive may make but one small request to him that is Lord both of her life and death, if she may touch his knees, or his victorious hand, I beg and beseech thee by the Majesty of a King, to which we had not long ago some pretensions; by the name and honour of the Numidian Nation, which once was common to thee and Syphax; by the Gods that preside over this Palace (who I hope will receive thee with better luck than they sent Syphax hence) grant me this Boon, that you would please, whatever your resolutions are concerning me, to do it your self in person, and not to suffer me to fall into the tyrannical and cruel hands of any Roman. If I had been nothing else but Syphax's Wife, yet I would rather try the justice and honour of a Numidian, and one that was born in Africa, my own Country, than of an Alien and a Foreigner. You know what a Carthaginian may reasonably fear (especially Asdrubal's Daughter) from a Roman. Wherefore if you cannot any other way, I beg and conjure you, that you would by death deliver me out of the clutches of the Romans. She was very beautiful and in the flower of her age: wherefore when she took him by the hand and desired his promise, that she should not be delivered to any Roman; so that her address to him was now more like allurements than intreaties, the Conquerors fury sunk not only into pity, but (as the Numidians are much inclined to Venerie) he fell in Love with his Captive, and giving her his right hand in token that he would do what she required, walked into the Palace. But there he was at a plunge to think how he should perform what he had promised. Which being not able to resolve, he borrowed from Love a rash, impudent stratagem, and ordered all things to be provided for his Wedding that very day, that he might leave no room for Laelius, or even Scipio himself, to have any design upon her as a Captive, who was already married to Masiniissa. The Marriage being consummated, Laelius arrived; and was so far from dissembling his dislike of the fact, that he first of all endeavoured to force her out of the Marriage-bed, and send her with Syphax and the other Captives to Scipio: but afterward being overcome by Masiniissa's intreaties, who desired him, that he would leave the determination of that point to Scipio, which of the two Kings Sophonisba should make more happy: he sent away Syphax and the other Captives, and by the assistance of Masiniissa, took the other Cities of Numidia, which were then in the possession of the Kings Forces.

XIII. When the News was brought, that Syphax was come into the Camp, all the multitude ran out as it had been to see a Triumph. He went foremost, and all the Numidian Nobility followed after. Then, as much as ever each man could, they magnified Syphax and the renown of his Nation to increase the glory of their own Nation, saying, That he was a King, to whose Majesty too the most potent people in the whole World (which were the Romans and Carthaginians) paid such deference, that Scipio, their General, went with two Gallies of five banks of Oars apiece out of his Province of Spain and from his Army, into Africa to desire an Alliance with him: whilst Asdrubal the Carthaginian General not only came himself into his Kingdom to wait upon him, but likewise gave him his Daughter in Marriage: so that he had at one and the same time two Generals in his power, a Roman and a Carthaginian. Who as they had by Sacrifices begged pardon of the immortal Gods, so did they both desire peace of him. That he was a Prince of such prodigious Power, that he drove Masiniissa out of his Kingdom, and reduced him to such a pass, that all his life was eclipsed by a rumor that he was dead, whilst he was fain to lurk in Caves and Woods, as wild Beasts do, and live by robbery. The King being commended by such like Harangues of those that stood about him, was brought into the Prætorium [or Generals Tent] to Scipio: who was much concerned not only at the present condition of the man, compared with his former state, but upon the score of that friendship which they two had contracted, with the Promise and League which they had entered into both publick and private. The same considerations gave Syphax also the courage to speak to the Conqueror. For when Scipio asked him, What he meant by only refusing an Alliance with the Romans, but making a War upon them too on his own accord? He replied, That he had, he must confess, done very ill, and was a mad man for it; but not then when he had already taken up Arms against the Romans; that was the end, not the beginning of his madness. That he was then mad, and then had cast all obligations, both private and publick, out of his thoughts, when he took a Carthaginian Woman into his house. That his Palace was set on fire by those nuptial Torches: for that fury and pest averted and estranged his Soul by all the endearments of Love; nor did she rest, till she had armed his hands against himself as well as his Guest and good Friend. Yet that amidst all his miseries and afflictions he had this comfort still, that he saw the same pest and fury was got into the house and family of a man that was, of all mankind, his greatest Enemy:

and that Masinissa was not more prudent or constant than Syphax, whose youth too made him the more careless: and, for that reason, Masinissa certainly was more unwise, and shewed less government of himself than could be expected from him, in marrying of her.

XIV.

Having said thus, not only out of hostile hatred to Masinissa, but jealousy also, (for that he saw the Woman whom he loved in the keeping of his Rival) he made Scipio likewise much concerned. And besides that, the Marriage which he so hastily stole almost in Arms, before he had consulted or seen Lælius, made the accusation the more believed: for he did it in such an hurry, that the same day he saw the Captive Queen, he married her, and offered Sacrifice to his own Household Gods before those of another. But these things seemed the more unhandfom to Scipio, because, when he was a young man in Spain, no Captives beauty had moved him. As Scipio was revolving thus with himself, Lælius and Masinissa came in: whom after he had received with the like gracious countenance, and had given them very great commendations before a whole Prætorium full of people, he took Masinissa aside, and said to him to this purpose: Masinissa, I believe that you saw some good things in me, not only when you came at first into Spain to contract a friendship with me, but afterward also, when in Africa, you committed both your self and all your hopes to my protection. But there is no virtue, for which I seem to be a fit object of your affections, wherein I glory so much, as in the government and mastery I have over my lusts. And this I would have you also, Masinissa, add to your other extraordinary qualifications. For there is not (believe me) so much danger to be feared in our Age from armed Foes, as from pleasures that surround us on every side. He that by his temperance has bridled and tamed them, truly he has gained more glory to himself, and a greater Victory, than we have by conquering Syphax. What you did so stoutly and bravely in my absence, I not only am pleased to commemorate and remember; but as for other things, I had rather you should recollect them your self, than blush when I tell you of them. Syphax was both conquered and taken by the conduct and good fortune of the Roman People: wherefore not only he, but his Wife, Kingdom, Country, Towns, Inhabitants, and in short all that belonged to Syphax, is your Booty: and we ought to send both the King and his Wife, though she were not a Citizen of Carthage, though we did not know that her Father was the Enemies General, to Rome, for the Senate and People of that City to judge and dispose of her; who is reported to have alienated the King, our Ally, from us, and forced him headlong into Arms. Subdue your passion, and have a care you do not deform many virtues with one vice, and destroy the love you have gained by so many meritorious actions with a fault much greater than the cause of it.

XV.

When Masinissa heard that, he not only blush'd, but the tears also stood in his eyes; having said, That, for his part, he would be at the Generals disposal; and prayed him, that as much as possibly the thing would bear, he would consult his honour, which he had rashly engaged; as having promised, not to deliver her into any other mans hands, he went in a confusion out of the Prætorium into his own Tent. And there, when no body was by him, after he had spent some time in sighs and groans, which those that stood about the Tent could easily hear, at last giving a grievous groan, he called a trusty Servant of his, under whose custody (according to the custom of Kings) against a casual exigence of Fortune his Poyson was, and having mingled it in a Cup, bade him carry it to Sophonisba, and tell her therewithal; That Masinissa would willingly have performed his first promise to her, as an Husband ought to his Wife. But since they that were able to do it had taken that power out of his hands, he was resolved to make good his second promise; that she should not be, whilst alive, in the hands of any Romans; as being mindful of her Father, who was a General, her Country, and the two Kings, to which she had been married: and that she therefore should consult her own good. The Servant, carrying this Message, and the Poyson at the same time, when he came to Sophonisba: I accept, said she, this nuptial Present; nor is it unwelcome to me, if my Husband could do no more for me. Yet tell him this from me; That I should have dyed much better, if I had not been married at my Funeral. Nor was her passion greater, when she said so, than her concern was small, when she took the Cup and drank it off without any more ado. Which when Scipio heard of; left the young man, being troubled in mind, should do himself or any body else any injury, he presently sent for him, and one while comforting him up, another while he calmly chid him, that he revenged one rashness with another, and did a sadder thing than was any ways necessary to be done. The next day, that he might divert his mind from the present disturbance, he ascended the Tribunal, and ordered an Assembly to be called: in which, when he had saluted Masinissa by the Title of King, and praised him above the Skies, he presented him with a golden Crown, a golden Cup, a Chair of State, an Ivory Staff, a flower'd Gown, and a palm'd Tunick: to which he added this verbal Honour; That neither the Romans knew any thing more magnificent than a Triumph; nor had any that triumphed a more august Garb than that, of which the Roman People thought Masinissa the only Foreigner, that was truly worthy. After he had so done, he gave Lælius a very great Character and a Crown of Gold too at the same time. He likewise made Presents to other military men, according as they had behaved themselves. With those Honours the Kings mind was softened, and he put into great hopes, that when Syphax was once taken off, he should have all Numidia.

Scipio having sent C. Lælius with Syphax, and other Captives to Rome, along with whom also went Ambassadors from Masinissa, himself removed his Camp back to Tunis, and perfectd those Fortifications that he had begun. Mean while the Carthaginians, being filled not only with a short, but almost a vain joy, by reason of their present good success in opposing the Roman Navy, when they heard that Syphax was taken, in whom they had reposed more hopes, if possible, than in Asdrubal and all their own Army, were dismay'd, when they heard no body now speak any more for a War, and sent thirty of the ancient Nobility as Envoys to desire a Peace. For that was their great Council, and the best means they had to rule even the Senate it self. Who when they came into the Roman Camp and to the Prætorium, they threw themselves (using the fashion, I suppose, of that Country whence they originally came) prostrate on the ground. And their Speech was suitable to such an humble posture: For they did not excuse themselves, but laid all the original blame upon Annibal and such as favoured his ambition. They begged pardon for their City, which had been twice already overthrown by the temerity of its Citizens, but might again be restored through the bounty of their Enemies. That the Roman People sought for Empire over their conquered Foes, not their ruine: and that they were ready to serve them patiently, let their Commands be what they would. To which Scipio answer'd, That he came into Africa with that hope, which by the prosperous event of the War was increased, that he should carry Victory, not Peace back with him home: yet though he had a Victory just at hand, he did not refuse a Peace: that all the World might see, the People of Rome did not only with justice undertake, but also put an end to their Wars. But he would make these Terms of Peace with them; That the Captives, Renegades and Fugitives should be all sent back: that they should draw their Armies out of Gaul and Italy: that they should not meddle with Spain: that they should quit all the Islands that lye between Italy and Africa: that they should deliver up all their long Ships, excepting twenty; and give him 500000 bushels of Wheat, and 300000 of Barley. What sum of Money he enjoyned them to pay, is not agreed upon; for I find in some Authors that they were assessed at 5000 Talents, and in others 500 pounds of Silver bullion, and in others a double stipend to the Army. And upon these conditions, said he, I'll give you three days to consult, whether you are willing to conclude a Peace. If you like them, make a Truce with me, and send Ambassadors to the Senate at Rome. The Carthaginians, being thus dismissed, were of opinion that they ought not to refuse any Terms whatsoever (for they sought all means to delay the time till Annibal came over into Africa) and therefore sent some Ambassadors to Scipio, to make a Truce, and others to Rome, to desire a Peace, carrying along with them some few Captives, Renegades and Fugitives for a show, that the Peace might be the more easily obtained.

XVII.

Lælius with Syphax and the noblest Numidian Captives was come to Rome many days before; and told the Senate in order all that had been done in Africa, to their great joy at present, and their hopes for the future. Thereupon the Senate having advised of the matter, thought fit to send the King Prisoner to Alba; and keep Lælius there, till the Carthaginian Ambassadors came. Then they decreed a Supplication to be made for four days together. P. Lælius the Prætor, when the Senate was adjourn'd, and an Assembly immediately after called, went up with C. Lælius into the Rostra [the place for Orations]: where the people hearing, that the Carthaginian Armies were defeated, that a King of high Renown was conquered and taken, and that all Numidia was over-run with a mighty Victory; they could not contain their satisfaction in silence, but with shouts and other ways, as the Mob use, expressed their immoderate joy. Wherefore the Prætor immediately gave Order, That the Sextons should open all the Temples in the City, and give the people leave to go about, to salute all the Gods, and give them thanks all day long. The next day he brought Masinissa's Ambassadors into the Senate: Who first of all congratulated the Senate, that P. Scipio had been so successful in Africa; and next gave thanks, for that he had not only called Masinissa King, but also made him one, by restoring him to his Fathers Kingdom; in which, when Syphax was taken off, he was like to reign without any fear or molestation. And furthermore, that having praised him before a publick Assembly, he had also honoured him with several great Presents; of which Masinissa not only already had done, but always would do his endeavour to make himself seem worthy. That they desired the Senate by Decree to confirm the Name of King, together with those other favours and bounties which Scipio had conferred upon him; and, if they pleased, that Masinissa desired also, that the Numidian Captives, who were in custody at Rome, might be sent back: for that would be a great advantage to him among his Country-men. To which the Ambassadors received this Answer; That they, as well as the King, congratulated the success of their affairs in Africa; and that Scipio did well, and as he ought to do, in calling him King: as also, that whatever else he had done, that might be for Masinissa's honour, the Senate did both approve and commend. Besides which they decreed, That the Ambassadors should carry certain Presents to the King; to wit, two Purple Soldiers Cloaks, with each a golden Button, and a Tunick studded with the figure of a broad Nut-head: two Horses with Trappings, and two Suits of Arms for an Horseman, with Coats of Mail, and Tents and other military Furniture, such as it was the fashion to present to a Consul. The Prætor was order'd to send these things to the King: And to make the Ambassadors themselves each of them Presents of at least 5000 Ases [i. e. 290 L.] and their Retinue each of them 1000 Ases [i. e. 58 L.] with two Garments to the Ambassadors, but only one apiece to their Attendants and the Numidians, who, being let out of Prison, were to be restored to the King. Besides which there were Houses, places in the Theatre, and Banquets appointed for the Ambassadors.

The

XVIII. The same Summer that these things were decreed at Rome, and done in Africa, P. Quintilius Varus, the Prætor, and M. Cornelius the Proconsul fought a set Battle in the Country of the Insubrian Gauls with Mago the Carthaginian. The Prætors Legions were in the main Body; whilst Cornelius kept his in the Reer, being himself on Horse-back in the Front: and before the two Wings the Prætor and the Proconsul exhorted their Soldiers to fill upon the Enemy as hard as they could. But seeing that they could not any ways move them, Cornelius told Quintilius; Our Soldiers, you see, grow more unwilling to fight, and the Enemies fear is so hardened beyond all hope by the resistance which they have been able to make, that I am afraid it may turn to audacity. We therefore must of necessity raise a storm of Horse, if we would disorder them, and make them quit their ground: wherefore either do you maintain the fight in the Front, whilst I bring in the Horse, or I will manage the matter here in the Van, whilst you send forth the Horse of the four Legions against the Enemy. The Proconsul being willing to take which part of the duty the Prætor pleased, Quintilius the Prætor with his Son, whose forename was Marcus, an active Youth, goes up to the Horse, and having commanded them to mount, sent them forthwith against the Enemy. The clamor raised by the Legions increased the tumult of the Horse: nor would the Enemies Army have stood their ground, had not Mago, upon the first motion of the Horse, brought Elephants which he had ready there, into the Battle. At the noise, smell and looks whereof the Horses being affrighted made their Riders aid to no purpose. And as, when they came hand to hand, where they could use their Javelin and Sword, the Roman Horse had more strength; so, at a distance, when the Horses were frightened, the Numidians had the advantage of them in slinging of their darts. Besides that too, the twelfth Legion of the Foot being great part of them slain, kept their Post more out of shame than by any strength they had: but they would long have kept it, had not the thirteenth Legion, brought out of the Reer into the Van, received the doubtful Battle. Mago also from the Reer opposed the Gauls to that whole Legion: but they being quickly routed, the Spear-men of the eleventh Legion drew themselves close up together, and set upon the Elephants, who were now putting the Body of the Foot also in disorder. Upon whom, standing very thick together, the Soldiers threw their Javelins without missing scarce so much as once, and turned them all back upon their own Party; though four of them died of their wounds. Then began the Enemies Body first to give way, the Roman Foot at the same time running upon them, when they saw the Elephants turn away, to increase their dread and tumult. But as long as Mago stood before the Ensigns, the ranks retiring very softly, kept up the tenour of the Fight; though when they saw him run through the thigh, and falling to be carried out of the Fight almost dead, they all immediately fled. There were 5000 of the Enemies that day slain, and eighteen military Ensigns taken. Nor was it an unbloody Victory this to the Romans; for 2000 and 300 of the Prætors Army with the far greatest part of the twelfth Legion were lost, among whom were two Tribunes of the Soldiers, M. Cosconius and M. Menius. Of the thirteenth Legion also, which came in at the latter end of the Fight, Cn. Helvius, a Tribune of the Soldiers fell whilst they were restoring the Battle, besides about eighteen Horse, all brave men, who were trod under feet by the Elephants, and with some Centurions, perished. The Fight too had continued much longer, if the Victory had not been given up, by reason that the General was wounded.

XIX. Mago in the dead of the next night going as far as he could for his wound, arrived after long journies near the Sea in the Country of the Ligurian Inganni. And there Ambassadors from Carthage, who some few days before came into the Sinus Gallicus [i.e. the Gulph of Lyons] applying themselves to him, and bade him, as soon as possibly he could to go over into Africa, for his Brother Annibal (to whom also there were Ambassadors gone with the same Message) would do the same. That the Carthaginians were not in a condition to conquer Gaul and Italy. Mago being moved not only by the Command of the Senate, and the danger his Country was in, but fearing also, lest the victorious Enemy would come upon him too fast, and the Ligurians themselves seeing Italy deserted by the Carthaginians, would revolt to them in whose power they were likely soon to be; and hoping at the same time, that his wound would not be jogged so much in sailing, as riding, but that there were all things more commodious for the Cure, he put his Men on board and set out, but was not got any farther than Sardinia, before he died of his wound. Some Ships also of the Carthaginians, being disabled in the main Sea by the Roman Navy, which was about Sardinia, were taken. These things were done by Sea and Land, in that part of Italy that lies toward the Alpes. The Consul Servilius having done no memorable thing in his Province of Etruria and Gaul (for thither also was he gone) but received his Father C. Servilius, and his Uncle C. Lutatius after sixteen years out of slavery, having them about him, the one on one side, and the other on the other, he returned to Rome with a private rather than a publick Triumph. Then there was a Proposal made to the People, That C. Servilius should not suffer, for having been, contrary to Law, whilst his Father, who had sate in a curule Chair, was alive, Tribune and Aedile of the People, because he did not know of it. Having preferred and passed this Bill, he returned into his Province. Then Consentia, Ussugum, Vergæ, Besidia, Hericulum, Syphenum, Argentanum, Clamptia, and many other mean people, seeing the Punick War

War decline, revolted to C. Servilius the Consul, who was at that time in the Country of the Bruttii. The same Consul also fought a set Battle with Annibal in the fields of Croton: where Valerius Antias says there were 5000 of the Enemies slain. But that is so great a number, that the story is either impudently feigned, or the truth negligently omitted. This only is certain, that Annibal did nothing more after that in Italy. For there came Ambassadors from Carthage to him too, to call him into Africa, at the same time, as it happen'd, when the others came to Mago.

'Tis said, that he heard the Ambassadors with great indignation and sorrow, inasmuch that he could hardly refrain from tears. But when they had done their Message; Now, said he, they do not recal me tacitly, but openly, though they long ago drew me backward, by forbidding any Supplies or Money to be sent to me. Annibal therefore is overcome not by the People of Rome, whom he has so often maimed and routed, but by the malice and envy of the Carthaginian Senate. Nor will P. Scipio rejoyce and boast of this my dishonourable retreat so much, as Hanno, who oppress our Family (when by no other means he could) with the ruine of Carthage. He had prepared his Ships before-hand, for that he in his mind prefiged this very thing. And therefore sending the useles crowd of his Soldiers, under pretence of a Guard into the Towns of the Bruttii, which though few were kept in subjection more by fear than love, he carried all the strength of his Army over into Africa; having basely killed a great many of the Italian race in the very Temple of Juno Lacinia, because, refusing to follow him into Africa, they had fled into that place for refuge, which to that day was never violated. They say, that no man hardly was ever more sorry to leave his Country when he went into banishment, than Annibal at his going out of an Enemies Country. That he lookt back oftentimes upon the Italian shore, accusing both the Gods and Men, and cursing himself too, that he did not lead his Army to Rome whilst they were yet reeking in blood just after the Victory at Cannæ. Saying also that Scipio was so bold to go to Carthage and take no notice of a Punick Enemies being in Italy, though he were Consul: whilst he himself having slain 100000 men at Thrasymenum and Cannæ, grew old with staying so long at Casilinum, Cumæ, and Nola. With these accusations and complaints in his mouth he was at last forced out of the long possession of Italy.

At the same time News was brought to Rome, that Mago and Annibal both were going off. Of which double congratulation the joy was the less, not only because the Generals seemed to have no great courage or strength to retain them, (though by the Senate they were so ordered to do) but also, because they were solicitous what would become of them, when all the streis of the War lay upon one General and one Army. At that time also came Ambassadors from Saguntum; bringing along with them certain Carthaginians, which they had laid hold on, with the Money which they brought over into Spain to raise Auxiliaries. They put 250 of Gold, and 800 pound of Silver in the Porch of the Senate-house. But the Senate having received the men, and put them in prison, gave the Ambassadors their Gold and Silver back again with thanks to them: besides that, they had Presents made to them, and Ships allowed, wherewith to return into Spain. Then the Seniors of the Senate began to say, That men were less sensible of favours than injuries. That they remembered how much terror and dread Annibal's going over into Italy had given them. What tragical events, what sad misfortunes thereupon ensued? The Enemies Camp was seen from the City-walls. Then what vows did each particular person and all the people in general make? How often were they, lifting their hands to Heaven, heard to say; Would the day never come, wherein they should see Italy free from all Enemies, and flourishing in calm Peace? That the Gods at last had granted their request in the sixteenth year after they made it; and yet there was none that thought fit to give them thanks: for men are so far from remembering a kindness when it is once past, that they do not receive it as beboves them, when first offer'd. Then they cry'd out from all parts of the Court, that P. Aelius the Prætor should propose it: whereupon it was decreed, That for five days Supplication should be made in all Temples, and the greater sort of Sacrifices offer'd up, to the number of an hundred and twenty. And now having dismissed Lælius, with Masinissæ's Ambassadors, when they heard that Ambassadors from Carthage that were coming to the Senate about a Peace, were seen at Puteoli, and that they would come from thence by Land; they thought good to recal C. Lælius, that the Treaty concerning Peace might be in his Prefence. Q. Fulvius Cillo, Scipio's Ambassador, brought the Carthaginians to Rome; who though they were forbid to come into the City, were entertain'd in the Villa publica [a part of the Campus Martius] and had an Audience of the Senate in the Temple of Bellona.

There they made much what the same Speech as before Scipio; turning all the blame off of the publick upon Annibal only. That he past not only the Alpes, but the River Iberas also without any order from the Senate, nor did he make War upon the Romans only, but formerly too upon the Saguntines, all on his own head. That the Senate and People of Carthage, if men would consider things as they really were, had kept their League with the Romans inviolable. Wherefore they were commanded to desire nothing else, but that they might continue in that Peace, which they had last made with the Consul Lutatius. When the Prætor, according to an ancient custom, had granted the Senators leave to ask the Ambassadors any questions that they had a mind to; so that the Seniors, that had been at the making of the League, asked some one thing, and some another; to which the Ambassadors (who were all but young Men) replied, They could not remember, it was so long ago, they all cryed out from every part of the Senate-house, This was a Punick Cheat, to chuse such Ambassadors as should desire the old Peace, that they themselves could not remember.

XXIII. Then putting the Ambassadors out of the Court, the several Opinions of the Senate began to be asked. M. Livius thought fit, That C. Servilius the Consul, who was nearer at hand, should be sent for, that he might be present at the Treaty of Peace. For since they could not have a matter of more importance, than that to fall under their consideration, he did not think it consistent with the dignity of the Roman People, that such a thing should be transacted in the absence of both or either of the Consuls. Q. Metellus, who three years before had been Consul and Dictator, said, That seeing Scipio, by slaying their Armies, and pillaging their Country, had driven the Enemy to such necessity, that they humbly sued for Peace: and that no man could better tell, what their design was in desiring that Peace, than he who was engaged in a War before the very Gates of Carthage: they ought to accept or refuse a Peace upon no other persons advice, save his alone. M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Consul, said, They were Spies, not Ambassadors, that were come from Carthage: and that they ought not only to command them to depart out of Italy, but send a Guard along with them to their Ships; as also to write to Scipio, not to remit the War. Laelius and Fulvius added; That Scipio's hopes of Peace too lay in not having Annibal and Mago recalled out of Italy. That the Carthaginians would make any pretence in the world, whilst they expected those Generals and their Armies; but when they were once arrived, they, forgetting all Leagues, though never so lately entered into, and heedless of the Gods themselves, would carry on the War. By this means they grew more inclined to Levinus's opinion; and the Ambassadors were dismissed without any Peace made, yea almost without an Answer.

XXIV. At that time C. Servilius the Consul, not doubting but he should have all the Honour of appealing Italy, crossed over into Sicily, as though he had pursued his routed Enemy Annibal, but resolved to go from thence into Africa. Which when it was related at Rome, the Senate first thought good, that the Prætor should write to the Consul, and tell him, That the Senate was of opinion, he ought to return into Italy: but after that, when the Prætor said, He would despoise a Letter from his hand, P. Sulpicius, who was created Dictator for that very end, according to the Authority of his greater Office, called the Consul back into Italy. The rest of his year he spent with M. Servilius, Master of the Horse, in going to all the Cities in Italy, which had been alienated by the War, and inquiring into the several reasons of their defection. In the time of the Truce an hundred onerary Ships with Provisions, under a Convoy of twenty Men of War, came over out of Sardinia from Prætor Centulus, the Sea being free both from the Enemy and storms. But Cn. Octavius, who came out of Sicily with two hundred Ships of burden, and thirty long ones, had not the same Fortune. For when he was come almost within sight of Africa with a prosperous course, first the Wind failed him; but soon after turning toward Africa, it disorder'd and scatter'd all his Ships. He himself with the Men of War, getting with much ado and hard tugging of his Oars through the mighty Surges, arrived at the Promontory of Apollo: whilst most part of the onerary Vessels got into Ægimurus, an Island, at the end of the Bay (next the main Ocean) where Carthage stands, about 3000 fathom from that City: but some were driven to a place called Aque Calide [i. e. hot Waters] over against the very City. All were in sight of Carthage; wherefore they ran from all parts of the City into their Forum, the Magistrates summoning a Senate, and the People grumbling at the Court-door, for fear so great a Booty as that should be lost out of their sight and power. To which when some opposed the promise of a Peace, which had been desired, and others the obligation of the Truce (for the time was not yet expired) the Senate and the People being well-nigh mingled in Council together, they at last agreed, That Asdrubal should go with a Navy of fifty Ships to the Island Ægimurus; and from thence gather together the Roman Ships that were dispersed about the Shores and Ports of it. So those onerary Ships that were deserted by the Seamens running away from them, were tow'd, first from Ægimurus, and then from the Waters, by their Poops to Carthage.

XXV. The Ambassadors were not yet come back from Rome, nor could they tell what the Senate of Rome's opinion was either of War or Peace; nor was the time of the Truce yet expired. Wherefore Scipio thinking it the greater indignity, that they themselves who desired a Peace and a Truce, should violate all hopes of Peace, and the obligation of the Truce too, sent M. Rabius, L. Sergius, and L. Fabius as Ambassadors immediately to Carthage: who being like to have been abused by a concourse of the Rabble, and seeing also that their return would be very dangerous, they desired of the Magistrates, who kept the Crowd off of them, that they would send some Ships after them. Thereupon they had two Gallies of three banks apiece allowed them, which when they were come to the River Bagrada, in sight of the Roman Camp, returned to Carthage. The Punick Navy was in Harbour at Utica; out of which three Gallies of four banks apiece (either by a private Order sent from Carthage, or of Asdrubal's own accord, who being Admiral, durst do such such a thing, without any damage to the publick) from the main Sea surpris'd one of five belonging to the Romans, as she had just got beyond the Promontory. But they neither could hit her with their beaks, she slid away so fast from them, nor could their Soldiers leap out of their lower ones into her, who was an higher Vessel. Insomuch that she was bravely defended, as long as their Weapons lasted: which when they failed, and she had now nothing else to defend her, but the nearness of the Land, and the multitude that came out of the Camp down to the Sea-side, they rowed as hard as they could, and running her on ground, lost the Ship, but saved all the Men. Thus by one ill thing upon another, the Truce being without all doubt broken off, Laelius and Fulvius came from Rome along with the Carthaginian Ambassadors. To whom Scipio having said, That though not only the Truce was broken by the Carthaginians, but even the Law of Nations too was violated in his Ambassadors, yet he would do nothing to them that should be either unworthy of the Roman Government, or his own Morals, dismissed the Ambassadors, and prepared for the War. When Annibal was now come nigh to the Land, he bade one of the Mariners go up to the main top, to see what Coast they made; who telling him, that the Prow of the Ship lookt toward a demolished Sepulchre; he, being dissatisfied at that ominous name, bade the Pilot steer by that place, and so arriving at Leptis, he there put all his Men ashore.

These things were done that year in Africa. What follows must be referred to that year, in which M. Servilius Geminus (who then was Master of the Horse) and Tib. Claudius Nero were Consuls. But in the end of the precedent year, the Ambassadors of the associated Cities in Greece having made complaint, That their Country was wasted by the Kings Guards, and that their Ambassadors, whom they had sent into Macedonia to demand a Reprisal of their Goods, were not admitted to King Philip's presence; and also told them, that it was reported, Four thousand Soldiers were gone over into Africa under the Command of General Sopater, to be a Guard to the Carthaginians; and that a certain sum of Money was also sent along with them; the Senate thought fit to send an Embassy to the King, to tell him, that they lookt upon all these things contrary to the League that was between him and them. Whereupon they sent C. Terentius Varro, C. Mamilius, and M. Aurelius: to whom they allowed three five bank'd Gallies. This year was remarkable for a great fire (that burnt down all the Clivus Publicus [a street so called] to the very ground) the Waters being mightily out, and every thing to extraordinary cheap; for besides that all Italy was by Peace opened to them, M. Valerius Falco, and M. Fabius Buteo, who were the Curule Ædiles, distributed to the People through every street a great quantity of Corn that was sent out of Spain, at four Asses a Bushel. The same year Q. Fabius Maximus died, after he had lived to a great age: if at least it be true, that he was Augur sixty two years, as some Authors say. He was a Person truly worthy of that great Surname [Maximus, i. e. the greatest] yea even if it began in him: for he outdid his Fathers, and equalized his Grandfathers great Actions. Indeed his Grandfather Rullus was famous for more Victories and greater Battles; but Annibal is such an Enemy, that can alone compare with all those together. Yet this same Fabius was reckoned rather cautious than eager; and as you may doubt, whether he were in his Nature more given to make delays, or that such delays were, in the War then in hand, very convenient to be made; so nothing is more certain than this, That one man by his delays restored our Commonwealth, as Ennius has it. Q. Fabius Maximus's Son, was chosen Augur in his room; and in his place as Pontifex (for he had two Priesthoods) succeeded Ser. Sulpicius Galba. The Roman Games were celebrated one day, and the Plebeian Sports thrice all over by the Ædiles, M. Sextius Sabinus, and C. Tremellius Flaccus: who were both made Prætors, with C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. Divers Authors make it uncertain, who held the Assembly of that year; whether it was C. Servilius the Consul, or (because he was employed by Order of Senate at that time in Etruria to make inquiry into several Conspiracies among the Nobility there) P. Sulpicius, who was by him declared Dictator.

In the beginning of the next year, M. Servilius and Tib. Claudius, having summoned a Senate into the Capitol, propos'd the business of the Provinces. Among which they desired that for Italy and Africa they might cast Lots, because they both would fain have had Africa. But Q. Metellus was so active in that affair, that Africa was neither given nor denied. The Consuls were order'd to treat with the Tribunes of the People; That if they thought good, they might ask the People, which of them they would have to go and make War in Africa. Thereupon all the Tribes voted for P. Scipio. But notwithstanding the Consuls put the Province of Africa (for so the Senate had decreed) upon the chance of Lots. T. Claudius had the luck to have it, and was to go into Africa with a Fleet of fifty Ships, all five bank'd Gallies, and be in the same Commission as Scipio. M. Servilius had Etruria; Caius Servilius being continued in the same Province, if the Senate had a mind the Consul should stay in the City. As to the Prætors, M. Sextius had Gaul, and P. Quintilius Varus was to deliver to him the two Legions as well as the Province: C. Livius was to have the Bruttii and those two Legions, that P. Sempronius the Proconsul the year before commanded: Cn. Tremellius to have Sicily, and the two Legions there from P. Villius Tappulus, who was Prætor the year before. That Villius the Proprætor with twenty long Ships and a thousand Soldiers should defend the Coast of Sicily: and that from thence with the other twenty Ships should carry the 1500 Men to Rome. C. Aurelius Cotta happen'd to have the City for his Province; and to the rest, according as each of them then had possession of Provinces and Armies, their Commands were continued. The Empire that year was defended with no more than sixteen Legions. But then, that they might appease the Gods, and so begin all that they had to do, it was decreed, That the Consuls, before they went to the War, should celebrate those Games, that T. Manlius the Dictator (when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quintus were Consuls) had vowed to set forth, with such greater Sacrifices as he had resolved on, if the Commonwealth for that five years continued in the same state. The Games therefore were performed in the Cirque four days together: and the Victims offered to such Gods as they were devoted to.

XXVIII. Amidst these things, both their hope and their fear increased each day, nor could they be sufficiently satisfied; Whether they ought most to rejoice, that Annibal, by departing out of Italy after sixteen years continuance there, had left the possession of it clear to the Roman People, or rather to fear his going over into Africa with an healthful and a stout Army. For the place, they thought, not the danger, was alter'd; Q. Fabius, who was lately dead, being us'd to prophesie, and that very probably, of a great Fight which they should have there: and that Annibal would be a more grievous Enemy in his own Country, than he had been in a foreign Land. Nor would Scipio now have to do either with Syphax, a rude and barbarous King, whose Army, of Fellows that were half Scullions, Statorius was wont to lead, or with his Father-in-law, Adrubal, a General more apt to run away than fight, or with tumultuary Armies raised in an hurry out of an half-armed crowd of Country-fellows; but with Annibal, who was almost born in his Fathers Tent (who was a very warlike General) nursed and brought up among Arms, a Soldier long ago, whilst yet a Boy, and a General, though hardly even yet a Man: who being already grown an old Man for his Conquests, had filled the Spaniards, the Gauls, and all Italy, from the Alpes to the Streights, with Monuments of his Exploits: and now had an Army at his heels, who had been Soldiers as long as himself; and were harden'd with enduring all sorts of labour, which it is hardly credible that men could ever undergo: that had been a thousand times embrued in Roman blood; and still bore the spoils not only of common Soldiers, but of Roman Generals also. That Scipio would meet many persons there, who had slain Roman Prætors and Generals too with their own hands, adorned with mural and vallare Coronets [i.e. Crowns that they had for first scaling a Wall, or getting up a Bulwark.] that had straggled through Roman Camps, and Roman Cities too, which they had taken. That there were now so many Fasces [bundles of Rods] belonging to the Roman Magistrates, as Annibal could shew, that he had taken from Generals that he had slain. Revolving these dreadful apprehensions in their minds, they themselves increased their own cares and fears; for that they had been us'd for some years past to have a War in several parts of Italy, which was protracted by such slow degrees, that they had no near prospect of seeing any end of it; but that now Scipio and Annibal, being Generals of an equal match, and fit to try the last push, had put all people into an expectation. And those also, who had a great confidence in Scipio, with hopes of Victory, the nearer view their minds had of it, the more concerned they were. The Carthaginians also were in the same condition; For they one while repented, when they considered Annibal, and the great Actions that he had done, that they ever desired a Peace; but another while, when they remembered that they had been twice conquered in set Battles, that Syphax was taken, themselves beaten out of Spain and Italy, and all by the sole courage and conduct of Scipio, they were terrified at the thoughts of him, as of a fatal General, born to be their ruine.

XXIX. Annibal was now come to Adrumetum: where taking some few days to refresh his Soldiers, after their having been tossed upon the Sea, he was alarm'd with fearful News, That all the parts about Carthage were full of Soldiers, and therefore hastied by great marches to Zama. Zama is five days journey from Carthage: from whence the Spies, that he sent before, being taken by the Roman Guards, and brought to Scipio; he committed them to the Tribunes of the Soldiers, and bade them, without any fear, to visit all parts of the Camp, ordering them to be carried which way they would. And then having asked them, Whether they had seen as much as they thought necessary? he order'd some Men of his to be their Convoy, and sent them back to Annibal. Annibal was not well pleased to hear any thing that they told him (for they said, among other things, that Masinissa also chanced to come that very day with 6000 Foot, and 4000 Horse) but was most dismay'd at the confidence of his Enemy, which he thought was not built upon an ill foundation. Wherefore though he himself were the cause of that War, and that by his coming he had broken the Truce, and frustrated the hopes of their mutual Leagues; yet, supposing that he might obtain an easier Peace, if he desired it, whilst his Army was still entire, than when it was conquered, he sent a Messenger to Scipio, to desire the favour of a Parley. Whether he did so of his own accord, or by publick advice, I cannot positively say. But Valerius Antius says, That he was overcome in the first Battle by Scipio, in which there were 12000 Soldiers slain upon the place, 1700 taken, and that the former Ambassadors with ten more came into the Camp to Scipio. Who not refusing to come to a Parley, both the Generals by consent advanced their Camps, that they might meet at a nearer distance. Scipio fate down not far from the City of of Nadagara, that being a place convenient, as upon other accounts, so also, for that they could have water within a Darts cast of it. Annibal posted himself upon an Hill 4000 paces from thence, which was safe and otherwise very convenient, save only, that their watering place was a great way off. And in the midst between them both there was a Plain, that they might look all over, and see that there were no Ambuscades laid.

They therefore leaving their Arms at an equal distance behind them, came together with each of them an Interpreter, being not only the two greatest Generals of their time, but equal to any King or Commander that ever was heard of in any Country. For some small time they gazed upon each other, and silently stood almost astonish'd with mutual admiration: till Annibal first began; Since the Fates have so decreed, That I, who first made War upon the Roman People, and who so often had Victory even in my hands, should come of my own accord to desire a Peace; I am glad that I have happen'd to meet with you, above all men living, to beg it of. Nor will it be, amidst all their glories, the least of their commendations, that Annibal, to whom the Gods had given the Victory over so many Roman Generals, should yield to you; and that you should put an end to this War, which was more remarkable for yours, than for our misadventures. My Case presents you also with this strange turn of Fortune, that I, who took up Arms when your Father was Consul, and fought a set Battle with him, as Roman General, should now come to his Son unarmed to sue for Peace. It had indeed been best for our Forefathers, if the Gods had given them such minds, as that you might have been content with Italy, and we with Africa: for Sicily and Sardinia do not make even you amends for so many Navies, so in my Armies, and so many brave Generals as you have lost. But what is past may more easily be reprehended than amended. We have so far desired other peoples possessions, that we have fought for our own: nor was there only a War upon you in Italy, and upon us in Africa; but you also have seen, almost at your very Gates and upon your Walls, the Ensigns and Arms of your Enemies, and we from Carthage it self have heard the noise of a Roman Camp. What therefore we should most abominate, and you above all things wish, we come to treat of Peace whilst you are in prosperity: and we who are concerned in the Treaty are such sort of persons, not only whose greatest interest it is to have a Peace, but also to whom, whatsoever we do, our Cities will ratifie and confirm. We only want a mind that does not abhor the thoughts of quiet. For my part, my age has now instructed me (who am going an old Fellow into the Country, whence I came a meer Boy) nor only age, but prosperity and adversity, both have so far taught me, that I had rather follow Reason than Fortune. But I fear thy youth and perpetual felicity are too unruly both to endure the advice of quiet thoughts. For he does not easily consider the dubious events of Fortune, whom she hath never deceived. What I was at Thrasymenum and at Cannæ, that you are now. Fortune has never failed you, though you were hardly old enough to bear Arms when you were first put into Commission; for you attempted all things with the greatest audacity imaginable. You revenged your Fathers and your Uncles death, and from the misfortune of your Family receivedst signal renown for thy Courage and Piety; you have recovered the two Spains that were lost, and driven out four Punick Armies thence. Then being created Consul, when others had not courage enough to defend Italy, you went over into Africa, and having here slain two Armies, and at the same time taken and burnt two Camps, taken Syphax, a most puissant King, Prisoner, with so many Cities belonging both to him and us, hast drawn me also, who have staid there now full sixteen years, out of Italy. Your mind may well desire Victory rather than Peace. I know you have a great rather than an useful Spirit: and Fortune favour'd me too once as she now does you. But if in our prosperity, the Gods would infuse into us good thoughts, we should consider not only what had, but what might happen. But that you may forget all others, I am a sufficient example for you in all cases. For I who lately, having pitch'd my Camp between the River Anien and the City, you saw just ready to scale the Walls of Rome, am now before you (bereft of two stout Men that were my Brothers, and famous Generals) near the Walls of my almost besieged Country, to deprecate those things for the sake of mine own, wherewith I terrified your City. A man should always give least credit to the greatest Fortune. Now you are prosperous, and we in doubtful circumstances, you look upon Peace to be great and specious in you who grant it; but in us, who desire it, it seems rather necessary than honourable. Yet, let me tell you, a certain Peace is better and more safe, than a Victory we only hope for. The former is in their disposal, but the latter in the power of none but the Gods only. Do not venture the happiness of so many years upon the hazard of one hour. Consider not only your own strength, but the force of Fortune, and the common casualties of War. There will Swords and Men on both sides fall. Events answer our expectations no where less than in War. You will not add so much to that glory which, though you grant me a Peace, you now may have, if you should get the day, as you will lose, if any thing should happen contrary to your expectation. The Fortune of one hour may overthrow all the honour both that you have gained and that you hope for. All things, now we talk of Peace, are in your power (P. Cornelius) but then you must take such Fortune as the Gods will give you. Among the few examples of courage and success M. Atilius had been one of old in this same Country, if he had granted a Peace to our Forefathers, when they desired it: but he, by setting no bounds to his happiness, nor restraining his exorbitant Fortune, the higher he was raised, the greater was his fall. It is indeed his part that gives, not his that desires it, to make the Conditions of Peace; but perhaps we may not seem unworthy to lay a mulct upon our own heads. We are are willing you should have all those things for which the War was first undertaken; to wit, Sicily, Sardinia, Spain, and all the Islands that are contained in the whole Sea between Africa and Italy. Let us Carthaginians, inclosed within the Shores of Africa, see you (since Heaven will have it so) govern those foreign Dominions by Sea and Land. I do not deny, but because we did not more sincerely of late desire and expect a Peace, you suspected our Punick way of dealing. But 'tis of great consequence, Scipio, to the preserving of a Peace, to take care by whom it be desired. And I hear, that your Senate also denied it for this reason, among others, that there were no Men of Quality concerned in the Embassy. But I am Annibal that now desire Peace of you; who would not yet make such a request, if I did not think it advantageous; and for the same advantage that I desired it, will I keep it. And as I, because the War was begun by me, suffer'd no man to repent of it, till the Gods themselves began to envy me; so will I endeavour, that no man shall repent of the Peace obtained by my means.

XXXI. To this the Roman General answer'd thus; I was not ignorant, Annibal, that their hopes of your arrival made the Carthaginians break off not only the present Truce, but decline the hopes of a future Peace. Nor dost thou indeed deny it, who withdrawst all things out of the former Conditions of Peace, save them alone which are long since in our power. But as it is your care to make your Country-men sensible what a burden they are cas'd of by your assistance, so I must endeavour to hinder them from having that which they formerly agreed to, now taken out of the Conditions of Peace, and made the reward of your perfidiousness. You who have still the same Conditions offer'd to you, are very unworthy if you desire to make advantage by your fraud. Neither did our Fathers before us make War for Sicily, nor we for Spain. No, the danger that the Marmertines our Allies were then in, and the sacking of Saguntum now moved us to take up just and pious Arms. That you provoked us, both you your self confess, and the Gods are our Witnesses, who also gave us success in that War according to justice and equity, as they now do and will do of this. As for my part, I both remember humane infirmity, and consider the force of Fortune, knowing that all we do is subject to a thousand mischances. But as I should owe my self to have acted very proudly and severely, if, before I was come into Africa, when you had of your own accord quitted Italy, and putting your Men on board several Ships, had come in person to desire a Peace, I should have slighted you; so now, when I have forced you, so much against your inclination, over into Africa, I am oblig'd by any ties of modesty to answer your request. Wherefore if any addition be made to those things, for which we were then like to conclude a Peace (you know what they are: the mullets due for taking our Ships and Provisions during the time of the Truce, and abusing our Ambassadors) I have somewhat to propose to the Council. But if even those things also seem grievous to you, prepare for War, because you could not endure Peace. Thus being come back from the Parley to their Party without concluding of a Peace, they declared, They had spent all their breath to no purpose; for they must dispute it with their Swords in their hands, and accept of such Fortune as the Gods would please to give them.

XXXII. Allsoon as they came into the Camp, they both gave Orders, That the Soldiers should make ready their Arms, and prepare their minds for the last push, whereby they were like to be Conquerors, not for one day only, but, if they succeeded, for ever. That they should know before the next day at night, whether Rome or Carthage should give Laws to the World. For not only Africa or Italy, but the whole Universe would be the reward of their Victory; though the danger would prove equal to the reward to those that happen'd to lose the day. For neither had the Romans any way to escape, as being in a foreign Country, wherewith they were unacquainted: and Carthage, which must now produce its last Auxiliaries, seem'd to be liable to present ruine. To this Combate therefore the next day march'd forth the two far most renowned Generals of two Nations that were the most opulent, and with them two the bravest Armies; with resolutions that day either to augment or overturn all the Trophies they had formerly erected. Their minds therefore were doubtfully divided betwixt hope and fear: and whilst they view'd one while their own, and another while the Enemies Army, by weighing their strength more with the outward eye, than that of reason, they were at once both glad and sorry. But what did not of its own accord come into their thoughts, the Generals by admonition and exhortations suggested. The Carthaginian remind'd them of the actions they had performed for sixteen years together in Italy, where they killed so many Roman Generals, and totally vanquished so many Armies, with the particular Exploits of every signal Person, that he had occasion to mention upon the score of his memorable behaviour in any Battle. Scipio discourf'd of the Spains, his late Battles in Africa, and the confession of the Enemy, how they were forced through fear to sue for Peace, but could not continue in it by reason of their natural perfidiousness. Besides which, he added the Conference between him and Annibal in private, which, because he was at his liberty to say what he pleas'd, he wrested whither he would. He likewise fortold them (that the Gods had given encouragement to them to go out to fight as to their Forefathers, when they formerly engag'd at the Islands called Ægateis, and therefore that) there would be an end of the War, and they should be at rest: that the Booty of Carthage was as good as in their hands, and that they should very shortly return into their Country, to their Parents, Wives, Children, and Household-Gods. All which he spoke with such an haughty carriage and pleasant aspect, that you would have thought he had already gained the Victory.

XXXIII. Then he plac'd the Spear-men first, and behind them the Principes [the first Soldiers in the the Van of the Army who were furnished with a Javelin, &c.] and put the Triarii in the Reer. He did not set the Regiments each in close Order before their Ensigns, but the Maniples [or Companies] at some distance one from the other, that the Enemies Elephants might have room enough when they came in, so as not to break their Ranks. He plant'd Laelius (who had formerly been his Lieutenant, but that was Queltor by an Order of Senate, without drawing Lots for it) with the Italian Horse in the left Wing, and Masiniſſa with the Numidians in the right. He also fill'd up the wide spaces between the Maniples with the Velites of the Antesignani [or light-arm'd Soldiers that fought among those that were before the Ensigns] to whom he gave a charge, That at the coming up of the Elephants they should either retire directly behind the Ranks, or applying themselves to the Antesignani, by running to the right and left among them, should give the beasts way, to rush in upon the dangerous Weapons. Annibal, for a terror, set the Elephants (which were eighty in number, and more than he had ever had in any Battle before) first in Array: and after them the Ligurian and Gallick Auxiliaries, with the Bulgarians and Mores mixt among them. In the second Division of the Army he plac'd the Carthaginians, Africans, and the Legion of Macedonians: and then, leaving a small interval, he put the Italian Soldiers in the Reer, who were most of them Bruttians, that of force and necessity, more than any good will, had follow'd him out of Italy. He also rang'd the Horse all round the Wings, the Carthaginians in the right, and the Numidians in the left. His address to the Army was very various, being made to so many different sorts of men, whose Language, Manners, Laws, Arms, Garb, Complexion, and ground of War was no ways the same. The Auxiliaries, he said, should have a present and manifold reward out of the Booty. The Gauls were inflamed with a natural and peculiar hatred toward the Romans. The Ligurians had the fruitful Plains of Italy, being brought down out of craggy Mountains into great hopes of Victory, shewn unto them. The Mores and Numidians he terris'd with the tyrannical sway that Masiniſſa was like to bear over them: infusing several hopes and fears into the rest of them: and minding the Carthaginians of the Walls of their Country, their Household-Gods, the Sepulchres of their Ancestors, their Parents, Children, fearful Wives, and how they must expect either destruction and slavery, or to be Emperors of the whole World; but said no more thing to them that tended to promote either their hope or fear. And just as their General was saying this among his Country-men to the Carthaginian Officers that led their own People, and to the Foreigners also by Interpreters that were mingled among them, the Trumpets and Cornets sounded from the Roman Army; and there was such a noise set up, that the Elephants ran upon their own Men, especially in the left Wing, where the Mores and Numidians stood. Masiniſſa seeing that, with ease increased their dread, and bereft the Army on that side of all assistance from their Horse. But some few of the Beasts being unaffrighted, were driven up into the Enemy, and made a greater slaughter among the light-arm'd Soldiers, though they receiv'd many wounds themselves. For the light-arm'd Men retiring into the Maniples, and having made way for the Elephants, to save themselves from being trod to pieces, threw their Spears on both sides into them: nor were the Antesignani with their Javelins idle; till such time, as being by the Weapons which fell upon them from all parts, forced out of the Roman Army, they put to flight even the Carthaginian Horse in their own right Wing. Laelius, when he saw the Enemy in a confusion, supplied fresh matter of terror to them.

The Punick Army was now on both sides bereft of its Horse, when the Foot fell on, notwithstanding it was not equal to the Enemy either in hopes or strength. Besides which, (though it be a small thing to speak of, it was of great moment in the managing of the same affair) the clamour or shout the Romans made, was all of one tone, and consequently so much the greater and more terrible: whilst the Enemies voices were dissonant, because their Languages were so different. The Fight likewise on the Romans side was steddily, because they lay heavy upon the Enemy, not only through their own weight and strength, but that of their Arms too: whilst on the other side there was only more swiftness and agility than strength shown in their first Onset. Wherefore upon the first effort the Romans made the Enemy immediately give way; and then with their Elbows and Bucklers punching them on still, as they got ground upon them, they proceeded for some time without resistance, the Reer pressing on the Van, allsoon as they perceived the Enemies Body to move; which very thing also conduced very much to the routing of them. On the other hand, among the Enemies, the second Division of their Army, consisting of Africans and Carthaginians, were so far from enduring the Retreat of their Auxiliaries in the Front, that they gave back, left the Enemy, when they had killed the Vanguard, should have fallen upon them. Wherefore the Punick Auxiliaries immediately turned their backs upon the Romans, and facing their own Men, fled partly into the second Division, part of which they also flew for not receiving them; as being c'rewhiles not assisted by them, and then moreover excluded. And now there were in a manner two Battles, the Carthaginians being forced to engage not only with the Enemy, but their own Party also. Yet notwithstanding they did not let them into their Body, when they were so dismay'd and furious; but, closing their Ranks, turned them out into the Wings and the open Plains beyond the

the Army; because they were afraid to mingle men in such a consternation and so much wounded, with a fresh and steady Army. But the heaps of dead Men and Arms had so filled up the place, in which the Auxiliaries a little before had stood, that their passage that way was full as difficult, as it had been through the main Body of the Enemy. Wherefore the Spear-men, that were first, pursuing the Enemy over the Carcasses and Arms, through blood, as well as they could, put their Ensigns and their Ranks all into disorder. The Principes also began to waver, seeing the Division before them so confused. Which when Scipio saw, he order'd them to sound a Retreat to the Spear-men; and having drawn all the wounded into the Rear, he put the Principes and the Triarii into the Wings, that the main Body of the Spear-men might be the more secure and firm. Hence there arose a new Engagement; for they now came up to their real Enemies, who in the sort of Arms which they bore, their experience in War, their fame for the Exploits they had done, and the greatness of their hope, as well as danger, were equal to them. But indeed the Romans were above them both in numbers and courage; in that they had routed both the Horse and the Elephants, and having defeated the first Division of their Army, were now upon the second.

XXXV. Lalium and Masinissa having pursued the Horse, whom they had driven too off some distance, returning, fell seasonably on upon the Body of the Enemy that was now a flying. And that last effort of the Horse made the Enemy run. But many of them, being circumvented, were slain in the field; whilst others that were scatter'd all over the Plain, where the Horse prevailed, died in great numbers. There were slain that day, of Carthaginians and their Allies, above 20000: and almost the like number taken, with 133 military Ensigns and eleven Elephants, though the Romans lost not above 2000 men. Annibal who escaped with some few Horse-men got away to Adrumetum; having tried all ways both in the Battle and before, and gained, by Scipio's own confession, and that of all good soldiers, a great deal of credit by setting his Army in so good a posture at that time. For he placed the Elephants in the Van: whose fortuitous force, and intolerable shock might hinder the Romans from following their Ensigns, and keeping their Ranks entire, in which they placed most of their hopes. Then he put the Auxiliaries before the Carthaginians, lest they being a mixture of all Nations, who served for pay, not for love, might have any way to escape. And besides, that they might receive the first effort and shock of the Enemy, and if they did nothing else, at least with the wounds they received, spoil the edge of the Romans Swords. Behind them again, he set the Africans and Carthaginians, in whom he reposed his greatest hopes, that they, as they were equal in all other respects, might now, when they yet fresh engaged with men that were tired and wounded, become superiour: placing the Italians at some distance in the Rear of all, because he did not know, whether they were Friends or Enemies. Having given this last instance of his Courage and Conduct, Annibal, when he was got to Adrumetum, and from thence being sent for to Carthage in the six and thirtieth year after he came a Boy out of that City, he openly confessed in the Senate, That he was not only beaten in the Battle, but overcome in respect of the whole War; so that there was no hopes now left, save in their petitioning for a Peace.

XXXVI. Scipio immediately after the Battle, having taken and rifled the Enemies Camp, returned with a vast Booty to the Sea and the Ships; having News brought him, That P. Lentulus was arrived at Utica with fifty Ships of War, an hundred Oncriaries [or Ships of burden] and all sorts of Provisions. Wherefore supposing it the best course to augment as much as he was able the dread that Carthage was now in, having sent Lalium to Rome with the News of the Victory, he order'd Cn. Octavius to march by Land with the Legions to Carthage: whilst he himself joyning Lentulus's new Fleet to his own old one sailed from Utica to the Port of Carthage. But when he was come pretty near unto it, there came a Ship out adorned with white Linen Flags and Olive-branches to meet him: in which there were ten Ambassadors, of the best Men in the City, who, by Annibal's advice, were sent to desire a Peace. They therefore coming up to the Poop of the Admiral's Ship; toward which they held forth those Badges of Petitioners, desired and begged that Scipio would be favourable and merciful to them: but received no other answer than this, That they must come to Tunis; for thither he would remove his station. Yet he, having taken a view of the situation of Carthage, not so much to be satisfied in that at present, as to terrify the Enemy, returned to Utica, whither he recalled Octavius also. Then, as they were going to Tunis, News was brought them, That Vermina, Syphax's Son, was coming with more Horse than Foot to assist the Carthaginians. Part therefore of their Army with all their Horse was sent out: which setting upon the Numidians about the beginning of the Saturnalia [Feast of Saturn, answering to our Christmas] he soon routed them. And as they ran away, being intercepted on all sides by the Horse that surrounded them, there were 15000 of them slain, and 1200 taken Prisoners, with 1500 Numidian Horse, and 72 military Ensigns. The young King himself with some small number in the Tumult made his escape. Then they pitch'd their Camp at Tunis in the same place, as before, and thirty Ambassadors came from Carthage to Scipio: who (since their condition forced them to it) made much more moan than the former, but were heard with somewhat less pity, by reason of their late perfidiousness.

fidiousness. In the Council, though just anger incited all of them to destroy Carthage; yet they considering, not only how great an affair it was, but also how long the Siege against a City so well fortified and strong might continue; and likewise, that Scipio was concerned, for that he expected a Successor to come and reap the Glory of ending a War which had been accomplish'd by the labour and danger of another Person, they were all inclined to grant a Peace.

The next Day therefore, calling back the Ambassadors, whom they admonished with many reproofs for their perfidiousness, That now they had been instructed by so many misfortunes, they would at last believe there were Gods, and that an oath was an obligation, they gave them conditions of Peace, which were these, That they should live free under their own Laws, having the same Cities, the same Lands, with the same bounds as before the War, and that the Romans should that day cease from plundering their Country. That they should deliver up all the Renegadoes, Fugitives, and Captives, with all their Ships of War, excepting ten Gallies of three Banks apiece, and all the tamed Elephants that they had, without ever taming any more. That they should wage no War either in or out of Africa without the consent of the Roman People. That they should restore Massinissa to his Inheritance, and make a League with him. That they should provide Corn and Pay for the Soldiers, till such time as the Ambassadors came from Rome. That they should pay for fifty years together ten thousand Talents of Silver by such and such equal sums. That they should give a hundred Hostages, such as Scipio thought fit, not above thirty, nor under fourteen years of Age. That he upon these terms would grant a Truce if they would restore the Ships they had taken during the former Truce, and the things that were in them; otherwise, they should neither have a Truce, nor was there any hopes of a Peace. When the Ambassadors, who were bid to carry these conditions home with them, declar'd them openly in the Assembly, Gisgo stood forth to dissuade them from Peace; but being that he made his speech before the unfettered and cowardly Rabble, Annibal was vexed that he should talk at that rate at that time, and therefore catching hold of Gisgo, pull'd him down from the place where he stood. The sight of which unusual Action, in a City so free as that was, having moved the People to murmur, the Warrior being disturbed at the extravagant liberty which that City enjoy'd, said, I went from you at nine years of age, and came back at 36. By this time therefore I think I well enough understand all Military Arts (which my condition, sometimes private and sometimes publick, has taught me) but you must teach me the Privileges, Laws and Customs of the City and Court. Having excus'd his want of knowledge, he made a long speech for Peace, how reasonable and necessary it was. But the greatest difficulty was, that, out of the Ships which were taken in the time of the Truce, nothing appear'd besides the bare hulks of them; nor was it easie to inquire into the matter, because they who were said to have such Goods were Enemies to the Peace. However they ordered that the Ships should be restored, and the Men lookt after, That Scipio should set a value upon what was wanting, and the Carthaginians pay for it out of their common stock. There are some that say Annibal came out of the Army to the Sea, where having provided himself a Ship, he immediately went over to King Antiochus; and that when Scipio required, That Annibal should be first of all delivered into his hands, the Carthaginians made him this answer, That Annibal was not in Africa.

When the Ambassadors were come back to Scipio, the Questors or Purfers were ordered to make an Inventory of all the publick Stores that were in the Ships out of their Books of Accounts, and the private Owners, to tell what peculiarly belong'd to them; for all which, there was twenty five Thousand Pound of silver Bullion at present required, and a Truce granted to the Carthaginians for three Months, with an injunction, That they should send no Ambassadors all the time of the Truce any whither else than to Rome; and that whatever Ambassadors came to Carthage, they should not permit to go away, till they had informed the Roman General who they were, and what they came for. Along with the Carthaginian Ambassadors, there were sent to Rome L. Veturius Philo, M. Marcius Ralla, and L. Scipio the Generals Brother. After which time, Provisions coming out of Italy and Sardinia had made every thing so cheap, that the Merchants left the Marriners their Corn for the freight of it. They had been in a great consternation at Rome upon the first News of the Rebellion of the Carthaginians; and Tib. Claudius was ordered to go with the Fleet in all haste into Sicily, and thence into Africa; but the other Consul, M. Servilius, to stay at home till they heard in what posture the Affairs of Africa were. All things were carryed on very slowly in order to the raising and setting out the Fleet for the Consul Tib. Claudius, because the Senate thought Scipio a better judge, what terms of Peace ought to be given, than he was. Certain Prodigies also, that were told of just as the news of the Rebellion came, put them into a fright. At Cumæ, the circle of the Sun seemed to be lessened, and it rained stones; and about Velitra the Earth sunk into mighty Caverns, in which whole Trees were buried. At Aricia, their Forum, with the shops all about it, and at Frusinone, the Wall in some places, and a Gate, were burnt by lightning; besides that it rained stones in the Palace. That Prodigie was, after the Country fashion, expiated with Holy Rites that lasted nine Days, and the rest with the greater sort of Sacrifices. Among which also an unusual rising of Waters was thought to deserve their religious care. For the Tiber so overflowed, that the Games called Ludi Apollinares [in honour of Apollo] when the Cirque was overwhelmed, were prepared to be celebrated celebrated without the Gate called Porta Collina, near the Temple of Venus Erycina. But upon the very Day that they were to be performed, a sudden serenity arising, the pomp that was beginning toward the Gate Collina, was recall'd and carried into the Cirque, they having news, That the water was all flown out of it; by which means the ancient feat being restored to that solemn spectacle, made the People overjoyed, and the Games more thronged.

XXXIX.

When Claudius the Consul was gone from the City, and was got between the two Ports called Portus Cofanus and Portus Laurentinus, a violent tempest, that arose, put him into a great fright. From thence coming to Populoni, after he had staid there till the storm was over, he went to the Isle of Illa, from Illa to Corfica, and from Corfica over into Sardinia. Where as he passed the Mountains called Montes Insani [the mad Mountains] a tempest much feverer, and in a worse place arising, scatter'd his Fleet; of which many Ships were shock'd and disabled, whilst some were broken to pieces. But the Fleet, though so much torn and haras'd, got into Carales, where as they were careening and mending of the Ships, the Winter came upon them, and the Year was gone about; so that, since no one propos'd his continuing in Commission, Tib. Claudius brought the Navy back to Rome upon the account of the Assembly, declared C. Servilius Geminus Dictator, and went into his Province. The Dictator made P. Aelius Master of the Horse. But Tempests often hindered the Assembly from being held, though it were appointed; so that, the old Magistrates being gone out of their Office on the sixteenth of March, and no new ones in their Places, the Commonwealth was without any chief Magistrates at all. L. Manlius Torquatus, the High Priest, died that Year, and in his room they put C. Sulpitius Galba. The Roman Games were all thrice repeated and performed by L. Licinius Lucullus, and Q. Fulvius, who were the Ædiles. The Clerks and Messengers belonging to the Ædiles being discovered to have privately carried Money out of the Treasury, were condemned for it, not without some reflexion upon Lucullus. P. Aelius Tubero and L. Latorius, who were Ædiles of the People, being unduly chosen, quitted their Places, after they had set forth Games, and upon that score made a Feast to Jupiter, and laid up three Ensigns in the Capitol, made out of the Silver taken for Mulets. The Dictator and the Master of the Horse celebrated the Games of Ceres by an order from the Senate.

XL.

When the Roman and the Carthaginian Embassadors came out of Africa to Rome, there was a Senate held in the Temple of Bellona, where when L. Veturius Philo had told them to their great joy, That they had fought the last Battel they were like to have with Annibal and the Carthaginians, and that they had at last put an end to that lamentable War, he added, that Vermina also, son of Syphax (which was no small accession to their happiness) was overcome. Whereupon he was ordered to go into the publick Assembly, and tell that good News to the People. Then all the Temples in the City were flung open for joy, and supplications ordered to be made for three Days together. The Embassadors from the Carthaginians and King Philip (for from him too there were Embassadors come) desiring to have audience of the Senate, had this answer by order of Senate from the Dictator, That the new Consuls should give it them. Thereupon an Assembly was held, and they chose for Consuls Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Petrus: for Prætors, M. Junius Pennus, who happened to have the City for his Province; M. Valerius Falto, who had the Bruttii; M. Fabius Buteo, who had Sardinia, and P. Aelius Tubero, who had Sicily. But they would not do any thing touching the Provinces of the two Consuls, till the Embassadors from the Carthaginians and King Philip were first heard. They foresaw in their minds that the end of one War would be the beginning of another. Cn. Lentulus the Consul had a great desire to have the Province of Africa, because he thought, if there were a War, he should gain an easie Victory; or if it were already finished, that he should have the honour of seeing so troublesome a War quite made an end of. He therefore said, he would not suffer them to treat of any thing else, before he had Africa assign'd to him; to which his Colleague consented, being a moderate and a prudent Man, who knew, besides that he could not in justice do it, he was not able to contend with Scipio in point of Glory and Renown. Q. Minutius Thermus and Manius Glabrio, Tribunes of the People, said, That Cn. Cornelius attempted what Tib. Claudius the year before had to no purpose tryed. That the Senate had referred it to the People, who should be the Governour of Africa, and that all the thirty five Tribes had given that charge to P. Scipio. The matter therefore having been bandied with many disputes, both in the Senate and among the People, was at last brought to this Issue, that they would leave it to the Senate. The Senators thereupon being sworn (for so it was agreed) thought fit, That the Consuls should agree of the Provinces between themselves, or cast lots for them, which should have Italy, and which should have a fleet of fifty Ships. He that had the Fleet, was to go into Sicily; and, if they could not conclude a Peace with the Carthaginians, from thence into Africa. That the Consul should act by Sea; and Scipio by Land with the same Commission as before. But if the terms of Peace were agreed upon, that the Tribunes of the People should refer it to the Commons, whether they would have the Consul or P. Scipio to make the Peace; and who, if the victorious Army was to be brought out of Africa, should bring it. That, if they ordered Scipio to conclude the Peace and bring the Army out of Africa, the Consul should not go over from Sicily into Africa. And that the other

Consul

Consul, who happened to have Italy, should receive the two Legions from M. Sextius the Prætor.

P. Scipio was continued in his Commission of General over those Forces, that he had, in the Province of Africa; and M. Valerius Falto the Prætor had the two in the Province of the Bruttii, which C. Livius the year before had been Commander of. It was further ordered, that the Prætor P. Aelius should have the two Legions in Sicily of Cn. Tremellus. One Legion was assigned to M. Fabius in Sardinia, which P. Lentulus the Prætor had formerly commanded. M. Servilius also was continued in his Commission of General over those two Legions, which he, when he was Consul the Year before, had commanded in Etruria. As for the Spains, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus had been there already for some Years; but the Consuls should treat with the Tribunes, if they pleased, to ask the Peoples pleasure, who they would make Governour of Spain; and that he (whoever it was) should unite all the Roman Souldiers, that were in those two Armies, into one Legion, dividing the Latine Allies into fifteen Regiments, wherewith he should keep and maintain the Province; but L. Cornelius and L. Manlius should bring the old Souldiers into Italy. To Consul Cornelius was assigned a Navy of fifty Ships out of the two Navies of Cn. Octavius, which was in Africa, and P. Villius, which guarded the Coast of Sicily; of which he was to pick and chuse what he would. That P. Scipio should have the fifty long Ships, that he formerly had had; of whom, if he had a mind that Cn. Octavius should be Commander, as before he was, Octavius being Proprætor, should be likewise Admiral for that Year; but if he made Lælius Admiral, Octavius should go to Rome, and bring back those Ships that Scipio had no use of. M. Fabius also in Sardinia had ten long Ships allotted him; the Consuls being ordered to raise two City Legions, that the Commonwealth might be that Year maintained by fourteen Legions and a hundred long Ships.

XLI.

Then they spoke of the Embassadors from King Philip and the Carthaginians; of which they ordered the Macedonians to be first introduc'd. And they made different kinds of addresses; some, To purge themselves from what the Embassadors sent from Rome to their King, had complained of, touching the plundering the Roman Allies; and some, to accuse, not only the Allies of the Roman People, but M. Aurelius much more; who, of the three Embassadors sent to their Court, made a Levy by the way, and raised a War upon them, against the League, fighting several pitched Battels with their Prefects [i.e. Governours of Places or Provinces]: some again, to desire, that the Macedonians, and their General Sopater, who had fought for pay under Annibal, and being taken, were then Prisoners, might be restored. To all which M. Furius, who was sent out of Macedonia by Aurelius, for that purpose, answered, That Aurelius was left behind the rest, for fear the Roman Allies, tired out with being plundered and haras'd, should revolt to the King, and therefore did not go beyond the Consines of their Allies, but endeavour'd to revenge them of those that came to ravage their Country. That Sopater was one of the great Noble Men about the King, and was lately sent with four thousand Macedonians and Money too, into Africa, to aid Annibal and the Carthaginians. The Macedonians being interrogated upon these several points, they gave so perplexed an answer, that the Romans prevented them with this, *That the King had a mind to a War, and, if he went on, should shortly have his desire. That the League was violated by him in a double respect; not only, in that he had injured the Allies of the Romans, whom he haras'd with War and Hostilities, but had likewise assisted their Enemies with Succours and Money. And farther, that P. Scipio did nothing but his duty in looking upon them as Enemies, and keeping them under restraint, who, whilst they bore Arms against the Roman People, were taken Prisoners. That M. Aurelius also, not only consulted the honour and safety of the Commonwealth, but had obliged the Senate also, in defending their Allies by the Sword, since he could not do it by virtue of the League. The Macedonians therefore being dismiss'd with this unwelcome answer, the Carthaginians were call'd in, whose Ages and Dignities being considered (for they were the best Men in all Carthage) each Senator said, They certainly came to treat of Peace. But Asdrubal (whom his own Countrymen surnamed Hædus) was the most remarkable Person among them, being always for a Peace, and an Enemy to the Barcine Faction. Wherefore upon that account he had the more Credit, when he transferred the blame of the War off of the Commonwealth in general upon the ambition of some few. Who when he had made a long and various speech, one while to excuse their faults, and another while confessing some particular things, lest, if they impudently denyed things that were true and certain, they should be the more hardly pardoned; and anon, admonishing the Senate, *That they would use their success with modesty and moderation; for if the Carthaginians would have listened to him and Hanno, and made use of their opportunity, they should have submitted to those terms of Peace, which they then demanded. But Men had very seldom good Fortune and good Inclinations at the same time. That the Roman People were therefore unconquerable, because in their prosperity they forgot not to advise and consult; and indeed, it were to be wondered at, if they should do any otherwise. That Men, who were not used to it, when they had good fortune, grew mad for joy; but that it was now customary and almost obsolete for the Roman People to be happy in victory, who had increased their Empire full as much by sparing those they conquered, as by conquering. The rest made speeches rather to move pity, reminding the Senate, From what an height the Carthaginians were fallen; who, though they had lately gotten almost the whole World by strength of Arms, had now nothing else but the bare Walls of Carthage. That being inclosed therein, they could see no manner of thing either by Sea or Land that they could call their own. Yea, that they should keep

keep the City it self and their household Gods by no other means, than the People of Rome's not being too severe upon them. Hereupon when the Senate in general seemed to be moved with pity, they say, one of the Senators, who hated the Carthaginians for their perfidiousness, cried out, What Gods would they call to witness when they made a League, now that they had disappointed and affronted those to whom they formerly obliged themselves for the performance of what they said? The same Gods, said Asdrubal, as are so severe upon such as break Leagues.

XLIII. Seeing therefore they were all inclined to Peace, the Consul Cn. Lentulus, who had the Fleet for his Province, interposed against the order of Senate. Whereupon M. Atilius and Q. Minutius, Tribunes of the People, referr'd it to the Commons, Whether they would yield, that the Senate should order a Peace to be made with the Carthaginians. And desired them also to declare who should conclude that Peace, and who bring the Armies out of Africa. As soon as all the Tribes were ask'd about the Peace, they commanded, That Scipio should conclude the Peace, and likewise bring home the Armies. Upon which order of theirs, the Senate decreed, That P. Scipio, according to the opinion of the ten Embassadors, should make a Peace with the Carthaginians upon what terms he should think fit. Then the Carthaginians gave the Senate thanks, and desired, That they might go into the City and talk with their Countrymen, who were there in Prison. For there were among them some that were their Relations and Friends, being Noble-men, and some, to whom they had messages from their Friends. Which being allowed them, when they desired a second time, to have leave to redeem such of them as they thought fit, they were bid to tell their Names. Whereupon they having named about two hundred, the Senate ordered, That Embassadors from Rome should carry two hundred of the Captives, whom the Carthaginians pleas'd, to P. Cornelius Scipio in Africa, and tell him, that if the Peace were concluded on, he might restore them to the Carthaginians without ransom. The Heralds being commanded to go into Africa to make the League, had, by their own request, this order of Senate made, That each of them should carry his own flint Stones and his own vervain: that the Roman Prætor should command them to strike the League, and they ask him for vervain. That kind of Herb is used to be taken out of the Castle and given to the Heralds. The Carthaginians being thus dismiss'd out of Rome, when they came into Africa to Scipio, they made a Peace upon the terms that I before told you of; delivering the long Ships, Elephants, Renegadoes, Fugitives and Captives, to the number of four Thousand, among whom was Q. Terentius Culleo, a Senator. He ordered the Ships, when they were a good way out at Sea, to be set on fire (of which some say there were five Hundred of all sizes that were rowed) the sight of which fire so on a suddain, was as sorrowful a spectacle to the Carthaginians, as though even Carthage it self had been in a flame. The Renegadoes were punish'd more severely than the Fugitives, those that were Latines being beheaded, and the Romans hanged upon a Cross.

XLIV. Forty Years before there was a Peace made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius were Consuls. The War began twenty three Years after, when P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, and was ended in the eighteenth Year, when Cn. Cornelius and P. Aelius Pætus were Consuls. After that, they report that Scipio would often say, That Tib. Claudius first of all, and after that Cn. Cornelius's Ambition, was the hinderance why that War did not end in the destruction of Carthage. But the Carthaginians finding it very difficult at first to raise the Money, now they were so exhausted by the Expences of so long a War, so that there was nothing but sorrow and wailing in the Senate, they say Annibal burst out of laughing; for which, when Asdrubal Hædus reproved him, he being himself the cause of all their grief, he replied, If as the face appears to the outward, so also a Mans Soul could be seen within, you would easily be convinced, that this laughter of mine which you reprove me for, did not proceed from joy, but almost madness it self wherewith I am possess'd upon such dismal thoughts as in my heart I conceive; and yet it is not so unseasonable neither as those your absurd and effeminate tears are. You should then have cryed, when our Arms were taken from us, our Ships burnt, and we forbid the making of any foreign Wars; for by that wound we fell; nor do you think that the Romans have so ordered things out of hatred to you. No great City can be long at quiet; if it have not an Enemy abroad, it finds one at home; as strong Bodies seem safe from all outward annoyances, but are oppressed by their own weight. We are so far sensible of the publick misfortunes, as concerns our own private affairs, in which nothing stings us more than the loss of Money. Wherefore when Carthage, being vanquished, was also pillaged, when you saw it unarmed, and destitute amidst so many armed Nations of Africa, none of you gave one groan; but now, seeing you must pay a tribute out of your private Estates, you make as much lamentation as at a publick funeral. I am very much afraid that you ere long will find you have cryed this day for your least misfortune. Thus spake Annibal to the Carthaginians. Then Scipio calling an Assembly presented Massinissa, besides his Fathers Kingdom, with the Town of Cirta, as also other Cities and Lands that the Roman People had then possession of as formerly belonged to the Dominions of King Syphax. He ordered Cn. Octavius to deliver the Navy which he conducted into Sicily, to Cn. Cornelius the Consul; and the Carthaginian Embassadors to go to Rome, to get what he had done according to the opinion of the ten Embassadors, confirmed by Authority of the Senate and consent of the People.

XLV. Having now made Peace both by Sea and Land, he shipped off his Army and went over to Lilybæum in Sicily. From whence sending great part of his Soldiers by Sea, himself went through Italy (which was no less joyced at the Peace than at his Victory; and where, not only only all Inhabitants of the Cities came out to do him homage, but the Country People too with crowds fill'd up the Roads) and came to Rome, whereinto he was carried with the greatest Triumph that ever was seen. He brought into the Treasury a hundred thirty three Thousand Pound of silver Bullion, and gave forty Asles apiece to all his Souldiers. Syphax at that time was taken off by Death, being an example of humane frailty, rather than of triumphant Glory, who dyed not long before at Tyber, whither he had been from Alba Polybius, an Author of very good credit, says that this King was led in triumph. Q. Terentius Culleo followed Scipio in his Triumph with a Cap upon his Head, and respected him all his life after as the author of his Liberty. Whether the favour of the Souldiery or popular breath first gave him the fir-name of Africinus, or whether as that of Felix Sulla, and Pompey the Great fore fathers, it first arole from the usage of his fawning Familiars, I am not certain: But this is evident, that he was the first General who was ennobled with a fir-name taken from a Nation which he himself had vanquished; by whose example, other Families, not at all equal to him in Victories, made themselves Glorious Titles upon their Images, and famous Surnames.

DECADE IV. BOOK I.

The EPILOGUE.

14. Why the war against King Philip of Macedon, which had been intermitted, was renewed, these are the reasons: at the time of the Initia [i. e. holy Rites in honour of Ceres] two young Men of Acarnania, who had not as then been initiated, came to Athens, and went into Ceres's Temple with others of their own Country. For which, as though they had committed the greatest wickedness that could be, they were slain by the Athenians. Wherefore the Acarnanians, being concern'd for the death of their Countrymen, desired aid of King Philip in order to revenge it. 5. A few Months after the Peace was concluded with the Carthaginians, in the five hundred and fiftieth Year after the building of Rome, when the Athenian Embassadors, their City being besieged by Philip, came to desire the Senates assistance, the Senate agreed to give it them; but the Commons, who were tired with the continual fatigue of warfare, dissented from them. Notwithstanding the Authority of the Senate prevailed so far, that the People at last committed to P. Sulpicius the Consul, who having led an Army into Macedonia, engaged with Philip very successfully in several Horse Battels. 16, &c. The Abydenes being besieged by Philip, like the Saguntines, kill'd themselves and all their fellow Citizens. 21. L. Furius being Prætor overcame the Gauls of Infubria, that then rebell'd, and Amilcar, the Carthaginian, who made war in that Country in a set Battel. In that war Amilcar and thirty five Thousand Men were slain. 15, &c. It further shews the expeditions of King Philip, and Sulpicius the Consul, with the taking of several Cities by them both. 46. Sulpicius the Consul, made War with the help of King Attalus and the Rhodians. 49. L. Furius the Prætor triumphed over the Gauls.

I AM as glad, as if I also had been a sharer in the trouble and danger, that I am come to the end of the Punick War. For though I dare say, it is not convenient for one that writes all the Roman History, to be tired in the compiling each part of such a vast Work; yet when I consider, that sixty three Years (for so many they are from the first Punick War to the end of the second) has taken me up as much Paper as four Hundred eighty eight did from the building of the City to the time of Appius Claudius's being Consul, who first made War upon the Carthaginians; I already foresee, like those who going into the shallow Water next the Shore are entering into the Sea, that whatsoever steps I make forward, I shall still be plunged into a vaster depth, and as it were a main Ocean; yea, that that Work does even grow upon my hands, that seemed, when I had done all the first parts, to be much less. The Peace with Carthage was attended by a War with Macedonia, though not to be compared with the other, either in respect to the danger, the courage of the General, or strength of the Souldiers; and yet in regard to the renown of those ancient Kings, the celebrated Fame of that Nation, and the greatness of their Empire, which comprehended heretofore many parts of Europe, and the greater part of Asia, it was full as honourable. But the War, that had been begun against Philip nigh ten Years before, was laid down three Years since, the Ætolians having been the cause both of the War and Peace. But then the Romans having nothing to do, by reason that they had made a Peace with the Carthaginians, and being much displeased with Philip, for that he had not only not faithfully kept the Peace which he made with the Ætolians and others their Allies in the same Region, but upon the score of Auxiliaries and Money which they lately sent into Africa to Annibal and the Carthaginians, were farther infligated by the Petitions of the Athenians (whom he, having wasted all their Country, had forced into their Walls) to renew the War. Besides that, about the same time there came Embassadors from King Attalus and the Rhodians, to tell them, That the Cities of Asia also were solicited. To which the answer was, That the Senate would take care of Asia.

II. The Consultation touching the Macedonian War, was totally referr'd to the Consuls, who were then in the Field engaged with the Boii. In the mean there were three Embassadors sent to Ptolemy King of Egypt, whose names were C. Claudius Nero, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, to tell him that Annibal and the Carthaginians were overthrown; and give the King thanks, for that in their adversity, when even their neighbouring Allies deserted the Romans, he had been true to them: and to desire him, that if they were forced by injuries to undertake a War against Philip, he would preserve the same affection as formerly toward the Roman people. At the same time P. Aelius the Consul in Gaul, having heard that the Boii made Incursions into their Allies Confines before his arrival there, raised two Legions all o' the sudden upon the score of that tumult, to which having added four Regiments of his own Army, he order'd C. Oppius, Governour of the Allies, to go with this tumultuary Band through Umbria (which they call Tribus Sappinia) and invade the Country of the Boii; whilst he himself went the same way, but in the open rode, through the Mountains. Thereupon Oppius going into the Confines of the Enemy at first was very successful and secure in his ravagings of their Country. But soon after, though he chose a very convenient place near Castrum Mutilum [a Towns name] going to reap the Corn (which then was full ripe) before he had either inquired into the conveniences and inconveniences thereof, or set Guards strong enough to defend the rest whilst they were unarmed and about their work, he and his Reapers were all circumvented by a sudden Sally of the Gauls. Thereupon a dread seiz'd even the arm'd party themselves; and seven thousand men, who were stragling about the Corn, were all kill'd; among whom the Prefect C. Oppius himself was one. The rest being forced for fear to run into their Camp, from thence, without any certain Leader, but only by mutual consent among themselves, the next night, leaving great part of their Baggage behind them, they came through places almost unpassable to the Consul. Who having done nothing else that is remarkable in that Province, but wasted the Territories of the Boii, and made a League with the Ingauni of Liguria, return'd to Rome.

III. When he first called a Senate, they all desired, that he would do nothing of business before that which concerned Philip and the complaints of their Allies, and therefore report was presently made of it, so that in a full Senate it was decreed, That P. Aelius the Consul should send any one that he thought fit in Commission, to take the Fleet, which Cn. Octavius was then bringing back out of Sicily, and go over into Macedonia. M. Valerius Levinus the Proprætor being sent, and having received thirty eight Ships of Cn. Octavius near Visbo, crossed over into Macedonia. To whom when M. Aurelius the Embassador was come and had told him, what great Armies, and what a mighty number of Ships the King had got; as also how through all the Cities, not only on the Continent, but even in the Isles too, he, partly by going himself in person to them, and partly by his Embassadors, endeavoured to put the people all in Arms; and that therefore the Romans must be more industrious and nimble in their preparations for that War, lest, if they delayed, the King might then dare to do what Pyrrhus had formerly in a Kingdom somewhat less attempted; He made Aurelius send all this account in a Letter to the Consuls and the Senate.

IV. At the end of this Year, when there was a fresh Discourse concerning the Lands belonging to the old Souldiers, who had ended the War in Africa under the Conduct and happy Success of P. Scipio, the Senate decreed, That M. Junius, Prætor of the City, if he thought good, should choose ten men, to measure and divide all that part of the Samnite and Apulian Territories, that was the publick possession of the Roman people. Accordingly he chose P. Servilius, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, C. and M. Servilius (who were both surnamed Geminus) L. and A. Hostilius Cato, P. Villius Tappulus, M. Fulvius Flaccus, P. Aelius Petus, and Q. Flaminius. At that time P. Aelius holding the Consular Assembly, there were chosen for Consuls P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta: and for Prætors, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Fulvius Gillo, and Cn. Sergius Plancus. The Roman Playes were perform'd there very magnificently and with great preparations by the Curule Ediles, L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Quintius Flaminius two dayes together: besides that they divided a vast quantity of Corn, which the Pro Consul had sent out of Africa, with the greatest fidelity and kindness among the people for four Asses a Bushell. The Plebeian Games too were thrice repeated quite through by the Ediles of the people, L. Apustius Fullo, and Q. Minutius Rufus, who from being Edile was made a Prætor: at which time likewise there is a Feast called Jupiters Feast, upon the score of those sports.

V. In the Year 550. from the Building of the City, when P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius were Consuls, the War began with King Philip, some few months after the Peace was concluded on with the Carthaginians. The Consul P. Sulpicius propos'd that matter, first of all on the Ides of March, whereon they then took upon them the Consulship: and thereupon the Senate decreed; That the Consul should offer great Sacrifices to what Gods they pleas'd with this Prayer; That the design of the Roman people and Senate concerning the Commonwealth, and their entering upon a new War might succeed very happily to the Roman people, their Allies, and all the Latine Race. When they had done their Sacrifice and ended their Prayer, that they should consult the Senate touching the Commonwealth and the Provinces. At that time there came Letters very seasonably to excite their minds, from M. Aurelius the Embassador, and M. Valerius Levinus the Proprætor, with a new Embassy from Athens, to tell them, that the

the King was come very near to their confines, and that in a short time, not only their Country, but their City too would be in his hands, unless the Romans would assist them. Then the Consuls having declared, That the Religious Duty was rightly performed, and that the Gods assented to their Prayer; the Southsayers answered, That the entrails also were very good, whereby the propagation of their limits, and Victory and Triumph were portended: After which the Letters from Aurelius and Valerius were read, and the Athenian Embassadors had their Audience. Whereupon an order of Senate was made, That the Allies should be thanked for that, though they had been long solicited, they had not departed from their engagements, no not for fear of a Siege. But they said, they would give their answer concerning the sending of Auxiliaries, after the Consuls had cast lots for the Provinces; and that that Consul, who happened to have Macedonia for his Province, had propos'd to the People, that War might be declared against King Philip.

P. Sulpicius happened to have Macedonia, and therefore preferr'd a Bill, desiring the Commons, That they would be pleas'd to order, that War might be declared against King Philip and all the Macedonians under his Dominion, for injuries, and hostilities which he had offer'd to the Allies of the Roman People. Aurelius, the other Consul, happened to have Italy for his Province. And then the Prætors chose their Provinces, Cn. Sergius Plancus the City, Q. Fulvius Gillo Sicily, Q. Minutius Rufus the Bruttii, L. Furius Purpureo Gaul. The Bill concerning the Macedonian War was reject'd by almost all of them at the first Assembly. For as all People in general, being tired with a long grievous War, the toil and danger of which had been very tedious to them, complain'd of their own accord; so Q. Bibius, Tribune of the People, going in the old way of laying all the blame upon the Senate, accus'd them, That they still created one War out of another, for fear the People should ever enjoy the blessings of Peace. The Senate took that very ill, and reviled him mightily in the Senate for it, whilst every one of them exhorted the Consul, To summon a fresh Assembly for the passing of that Bill, and that he would chastise the sloth of the People; and give them to understand what a damage and disgrace the delaying of that War would prove to the Commonwealth.

The Consul therefore, calling an Assembly in the Campus Martius, before he put the Centuries to voting, made this speech before all the People, Romans, said he, I am apt to think you are ignorant, that you are at the present consulted, not to know, whether you will choose War or Peace (for Philip will not give you that liberty, seeing he prepares for a mighty War both by Sea and Land) but whether you will transport your Legions into Macedonia, or receive the Enemy into Italy. Of what importance this is, you had experience, if ever, in the last Punick War. For who doubt but that, if when the Saguntines were besieged and desired our aid, we had immediately lent it them, as our forefathers did to the Mamertines, we should have turned the whole War upon Spain; which by delaying to our great mischief we received into Italy? Nay without doubt we kept this very Philip, even after he had agreed with Annibal by Embassadors and Letters to come over into Italy, in Macedonia, by sending Lævinus with a Fleet to make an offensive War upon him. What therefore we then did, when we had Annibal our Enemy, and in Italy, shall we stick to do, now that we have driven Annibal out, and vanquished the Carthaginians? Shall we suffer the King to try our sloth in the sacking of Athens, as we did Annibal in the case of Saguntum? He will not come thence into Italy the fifth Month, as Annibal did from Saguntum, but the fifth day after he weighs Anchor from Corinth. Do not ye compare Philip with Annibal, nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians, though you may certainly to Pyrrhus, I mean, to show how far one Man, or one Nation exceeds another. Epirus was always the least accession to the Kingdom of Macedonia, and is so to this day. Philip has all Peloponnesus under him, and Argos it self, which is enobled as much by the Death of Pyrrhus, as any other ancient famous event that happened there. Now compare our strength with his. How much more flourishing an Estate was Italy in, and in how much better plight the Commonwealth (whilst our Generals were safe, and so many Armies with them, whom the Punick War after that destroyed) when Pyrrhus set upon us, and even then shock'd us, coming victorious almost to the very City of Rome. Nor did the Tarentines only, and that part of Italy, which they call the greater Greece (who, a Man would think, had joyned with Pyrrhus upon the score of his Language, and that he call'd himself a Greek) but the Lucanians, the Bruttians and the Samnites revolted from us. And do you believe, that, if Philip come over into Italy, these People will be quiet or true to you? You know how they serv'd you afterward in the Punick War. No, those People will always revolt from us as long as they have any one to revolt to. If you have been loth to go over into Africa, you might have seen your Enemy Annibal and the Carthaginians to this day in Italy. Let Macedonia therefore, rather than Italy, be the seat of War; and let the Enemies Cities and Countrys be laid waste with Fire and Sword. We have already experienced, that our Arms are more successful, and much more powerful abroad than at home. Proceed then to voting, in the name of the Gods, and what the Senate have determin'd of, do you consent to. Not only the Consul, but the Gods too advise you to this; who, when I sacrific'd and pray'd, that this War might prove successful to me, to the Senate, to you, and our Latine Allies, together with the Armies and Fleets, that we are now setting forth, gave me all the signs of joy and prosperity that could be.

After this speech they went to voting, and, as the Consul had propos'd, consented to the having of a War. Thereupon a supplication was appointed by the Consuls for three days, days, pursuant to an order of Senate, and Prayers were made to the Gods in all Temples, That the War, which the People had consented should be levied against Philip, might meet with good and happy success. The Heralds also were consulted by the Consul Sulpicius, to know, whether they must order the War, that was to be declared against King Philip, to be denounced before himself in Person, or whether it were enough to do it in the confines of his Kingdom, at the next Garrison they came to; to which the Heralds made answer, that either way would serve turn. Thereupon the Consul had leave of the Senate to send which of the Heralds he thought fit, to declare the War against the King. After which they treated touching the Armies of the Consuls and the Prætors. The Consuls were commanded to raise two Legions, and to disband the old Armies. Sulpicius, to whom was assigned the Menage of a new and a mighty War, had leave to get as many Volunteers as he could out of that Army which P. Scipio had brought out of Africa, but should not take any one of the old Soldiers against their Wills. That the Consul should give L. Furius Purpureo, and Q. Minutius Rufus five Thousand of their Latine Allies; with which guards the one of them should defend the Province of Gaul, and the other that of the Bruttii. Q. Fulvius Gillo also was ordered to chuse out of that Army, which P. Aelius the Consul had commanded, all the youngest Soldiers, till he likewise had made up the number of five Thousand Allies and Latines; who, if occasion were, might be sent into several parts of Italy, which were infected with being concerned in the Punick War, from whence they had contracted great animosities. The Commonwealth that Year was like to use six Roman Legions.

IX. But as they were just in the midst of their preparations for the War, there came Embassadors from King Ptolemy, to tell them, That the Athenians desired aid of their King against Philip. But that, though they were common Allies to both, yet, unless he had the People of Rome's consent for his so doing, their King would send neither Fleet nor Army into Greece, to defend or offend any Body whatsoever; that he would either lye still in his own Kingdom, if the People of Rome could defend their Allies, or would, if they pleased, let the Romans be at quiet, and himself send Auxiliaries, that should easily be able to defend Athens against the power of Philip. The Senate returned the King thanks, and this answer, That the People of Rome designed to defend their Allies; and that, if they wanted any thing in order to the carrying on of that War, they would send the King notice of it, whose forces they knew to be the firm and faithful reserves of their Commonwealth. Thereupon the Embassadors had each of them five Thousand Allies by order of Senate sent to them. But when the Consuls were making the Levy, and all preparations for the War, the City, being in a Religious humour, as it most commonly was at the beginnings of new Wars (having already made Supplications and Prayers in all the Temples) left they should omit any thing that ever had upon such an occasion been done, commanded the Consul to vow Games and an Offering to Jupiter, that had Macedonia for his Province. But Licinius the High Priest put a stop to that publick vow, by saying he ought not to make such a vow of an Offering out of uncertain Money; Because that Money could not be made use of to carry on the War, but ought to be immediately laid up, and not mixt with other Money; which unless it were so ordered, his vow could not rightly be performed. In which case, though both the thing and the Author moved them; yet the Consul was commanded to refer it to the Colledge of Priests, whether a vow could be made of a sum uncertain. To which they answered, that it might, yea, that it was the best way. The Consul therefore made his vow in the same form (the High Priest saying it before him) wherein the vows of five Years were used formerly to be made; except that he then vowed to lay out upon his Games and his Offering as much Money as, when it was paid, the Senate should think fit. The great Games had been many times before vowed to be set forth at the expence of a certain sum, but those were the first that were so at an uncertain one.

X. But now, when all Peoples minds were set upon the Macedonian War, and that they feared nothing less at that time, immediately they had news brought them of a tumult in Gaul. For the Insubrians, Canomani, and Boii, having stirred up the Salii, Illuates and other Ligustine People, under the Conduct of Amilcar, who had halted, out of Asdrubal's Army, in those parts, had invaded Placentia: and having sack'd that City, and in their fury burnt great part of it, insomuch, that between their burning and otherwise destroying of it, they left not above two thousand Men alive, they had passed the Po, and were going to rife Cremona. But the misfortune of their neighbour City, which they had heard of, gave the Inhabitants timely warning to shut their Gates, and plant Guards about their Walls, that they might be at least besieged before they were taken, and have time to send to the Roman Prætor for assistance. L. Furius Purpureo, who then was Governour of that Province, having by order of the Senate disbanded all the rest of the Army, except five Thousand Allies and Latines, lay with those Forces in the very Confines of that Country about Ariminum. He then wrote to the Senate in what a tumult the Province was, That of two Colonies, which had escaped the tempest of the Punick War, the one was taken and rifled by the Enemy, and the other now attempted. Nor should he prove strong enough with his Army only to defend the labouring Hinds, unless he would expose five Thousand Allies to forty Thousand Enemies (for so many there were then in Arms) to be murdered by them, and by that great loss increase the Enemies courage, which was already too great since their destroying of the last Roman Colony.

This

This Letter being read, they decreed, that C. Aurelius the Consul should order that Army, which he had charg'd to meet upon such a day in Etruria, should Rendezvous the same time at Ariminum; and that either he himself, if he could without any damage to the publick, should go and suppress the Gallick Insurrection; or write to L. Furius the Prætor, that, seeing the Legions were come to him out of Etruria, he should send five thousand Allies in their stead, to be in the mean time a Guard to Etruria, and go himself to raise the Siege from before the Colony. They also thought fit, that Embassadors should be sent into Africa, the same persons to Carthage and into Numidia too to Massinissa. To Carthage, to tell them, That a Citizen of theirs, called Amilcar, that was left in Gaul, they did not well know, whether out of Asdrubal's Army before, or Mago's afterward, made War there against the League; and instigated the Gallick and Ligurian Armies against the people of Rome: wherefore, if they had a mind to be at Peace, they must recal him and deliver him up to the Roman people. Wherewithal they were likewise bid to say, That all the Renegades were not restored to them, but that great part of 'em were seen in the streets at Carthage every day: whom they ought to seize, and get together, in order to their being sent to Rome. This was their Message to the Carthaginians. But they were ordered to congratulate Massinissa, for that he had not only recover'd his Father's Kingdom, but had increased it too by the addition of the most flourishing part of Syphax's Dominions. Besides which they were to inform him, That there was a War levied against King Philip, for assisting the Carthaginians, and molesting the Allies of the Roman people, during the War in Italy; whereby they were forced to send Fleets and Armies into Greece. And for that he by detaining their Forces, had been the chief cause of their going so late over into Africa. Wherefore they were bid to desire him, that he would send them, for the carrying on of that War, some Auxiliaries of Numidian Horse. They had large Presents to carry to the King, Golden and silver Vessels, a purple Gown, a palm'd Coat, with an Ivory walking-stall, a toga prætecta [i. e. a white Gown garded with purple] and a Chair of State; besides all which they were bid to promise him, that if he thought he wanted any thing to confirm and augment his Kingdom, the people of Rome would supply it with all their hearts upon the score of his merit. At the same time also came Embassadors from Vermina, the Son of Syphax, to the Senate, excusing his error, and youthfulness, and laying all the blame upon the Carthaginians, who deluded him. That Massinissa was become, instead of an Enemy, a Friend to the Romans; and that Vermina also would endeavour to shew, that neither Massinissa, nor any man else should outdo him in respect to the Roman people. And therefore to desire, that their King might be, by the Senate, stiled an Ally and a Friend to the Roman people. To which they had this Answer, that not only his Father Syphax had become, of a Friend and Ally, a sudden Enemy to the Roman people; but also that he himself had been bred from his very youth in perpetual hostility to the Romans. Wherefore he ought first to desire peace of the Roman people, before he should be call'd either King, Ally, or Friend by them. That the Romans used to give that Title to such as had deserved very greatly of them. That there would be Embassadors from Rome very shortly in Africa; to whom the Senate would give order, that they should offer Vermina terms of Peace; in which the Roman people should leave all to their disposal. And if he thought fit to have any thing added to, taken from, or alter'd in them, he must again apply himself to the Senate. The Embassadors sent into Africa upon that Errand were C. Terentius Varro, P. Lucretius and Cn. Octavius, to each of whom there was allow'd a Gally of five Banks of Oars on a side.

Then was the Letter from Q. Minutius the Prætor, whose Province was the Bruttii, read in the Senate; to this purpose: That the money at Locri was privately taken out of Proserpines Treasury in the night time, nor could they possibly find out who did it. Whereupon the Senate took it very ill, that they should not abstain from such sacrilegious actions; nor be deterred even by Plinius, who was so late and famous an instance both of the guilt and the punishment for it. Cn. Aurelius therefore was order'd to write into the Province of the Bruttii, to the Prætor, and tell him; The Senates pleasure was, that the inquisition concerning the treasure that was then stolen should be managed in the same manner, as it had been three years before by M. Pomponius, the Prætor. That what money they found, should be laid up in the same place again. If they found less, that they should make it up out of the goods of those that were guilty of the Sacrilege, or out of the publick stock, if that were not enough; and moreover, that particular Sacrifices should be made, if they thought fit, according as the Priests before had order'd them, to atone for that violation. At that time Prodigies also happen'd in many places, as 'twas reported. In Lucania they said the Heavens were all of a flame. At Privernum, that in a clear season the Sun was red all day long. And that at Lanuvium in the Temple of Juno Sospita a great noise was heard in the night time. There were also many monstrous Births of Animals talkt of. Among the Sabines there was an infant born, which they could not tell whether it were Male or Female. And another also there was of sixteen years of Age, whose Sex was doubtful. At Eruſinon a Lamb with a Pigs Head, at Sinuſſa an Hog with the Head of a Man: and in Lucania, in the publick Fields, a Colt with five Feet. All which were monstrous ugly, and seem'd to be the errors of nature mistaking one species for another: But above all the rest, those Hermaphrodites were most abominated, and therefore order'd immediately to be thrown into the Sea; as a little before that time, when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consuls, the like monstrous Birth was disposed of. Notwithstanding ing they bid the Decemviri look into their Books concerning that portent. Whereupon the Decemviri out of their Books enjoined the same sacrifices, as had been before made upon the sight of that Prodigy. But besides that, they ordered an Hymn to be sung by twenty seven Virgins through the City, and a present to be made to Juno Regina [i. e. Juno the Queen of Heaven]. Of all which C. Aurelius the Consul, according to what the Decemviri had laid, took care. The Hymn (as Livius in their fore-fathers time, so) P. Licinius Tegula then composed.

XIII. Having made an end of all their Religious Duties (for the sacriledge at Locri also was traced quite through by Q. Minutius, and the money raised out of the goods of the guilty laid up in the Treasury) as the Consuls were making ready to go into their Provinces; a great many private Persons, to whom, out of the money that they had lent the Publick when M. Valerius and M. Claudius were Consuls, the third payment was that Year due, went to the Senate; because the Consuls seeing the publick stock would scarce suffice to defray the expences of the new War, which was to be carried on with such a great Fleet and such vast Armies, had told them, there was no money at present to pay them. The Senate could not endure their complaints, when they said, That if the money which they lent to carry on the Punick War must be employed by the Commonwealth in the Macedonian War too, what would it be but confiscated for their kindness, as though they had been guilty of some great crime? When therefore those private Persons desired nothing but what was just, and yet the Commonwealth was not able to discharge the Debt, they decreed, as a Mean between what was just and what was convenient for them, That, seeing a great many of them said that Lands were commonly bought and sold every day, and they had an occasion to buy some, they should have the refusal of all the publick Lands between that and the fiftieth stone [i. e. fifty miles off] That the Consuls should set a value upon them, and the quit-rent of an As upon every Acre, to shew that they were the publick Lands; to the end, that if any one, when the People was in a capacity of paying them, would rather have their Money than the Land, he might restore the Land to the Publick. The private Men were glad of those terms, and that Land was called Trientius [from tres, three] and Tabulius [from Tabula, the Table in which the account was] because it was given in lieu of the third part of the Money.

XIV. Then P. Sulpicius, after he had made his vows in the Capitol, going out of the City with the Lictors before him in a Generals Robe, came to Brundisium, where having taken the old Volunteers out of the African Army into the Legions, and chosen certain Ships out of the Consul Cornelius's Fleet, the next day after he set sail from Brundisium, arrived in Macedonia. There the Athenian Embassadors applied themselves to him, desiring, That he would come and deliver them from the siege which then was laid against them. Whereupon C. Claudius Cento was presently sent to Athens with twenty long Ships and a good number of Soldiers. For it was not the King himself that besieged Athens; he, at that time, was most intent upon Abydos, after he had tryed his strength with the Rhodians and Attalus in two Sea-Fights, in neither of which he had any good fortune. But that which gave him the greater courage, besides his natural audacity, was the League he had made with Antiochus King of Syria; and that he had shared with him in all the riches of Egypt, which, when they heard of Ptolemy's Death, they both look'd very eagerly after. Now the Athenians had brought the VVar with Philip upon themselves upon no good ground at all; retaining nothing of their ancient condition except their resolution and courage. Two young Men of Acarnania (in the time of the Initia [Feasts dedicated to Ceres]) who were not initiated went in with the crowd into Ceres Temple, not knowing any thing at all of the Religious usage in that case. Wherefore their speech soon betrayed them, by their asking several absurd questions: and thereupon being carried before the Priests of the Temple, before whom it was plainly proved that they came thither by mistake, they were put to Death as for an hainous Offence. Which barbarous and hostile Act the Acarnanians told Philip of, and obtained of him, that he would assist them with Macedonian Auxiliaries to make VVar upon the Athenians. And that Army, having first of all laid wast the Attick Territories with Fire and Sword, returned into Acarnania with all sorts of Plunder. That was the first provocation they received; but after that, they, by publick Decrees of their City, declared a just War. For King Attalus and the Rhodians, who followed Philip as he retired into Macedonia, when they came to Agina, the King [i. e. Attalus] crossed over the Piræus [the chief Port of Athens] to renew and confirm his alliance with the Athenians. VWhereupon all the City running out to meet him with their VVives and Children, and the Priests with their Robes and Ensigns, yea, even the very Gods themselves almost walked forth to receive him, as he came into the City.

XV. Immediately the People were summoned to an Assembly, that the King might say what he pleased before them; but afterward, They thought it more for his honour, that he should write to them what he thought fit, rather than either, when present, blush at the relation of what good things he had done for the City, or at the shouts and exclamations of the multitude, who would by their immoderate praises put his modesty out of countenance. Now in the Letters, that he sent into the Assembly, there was, first, A commendation of his kindnesses shown to that City, which was his Ally: Secondly, Of the Actions he had performed against King Philip: and lastly an

exhortation

Exhortation to take up Arms, as long as they had himself, the Rhodians, and, at that time, the Romans on their sides. That they hereafter would seek such an occasion, if they now let that slip, when it was too late. Then the Rhodian Embassadors had Audience, who had done them a very fresh piece of service, in that they had sent back four long Ships belonging to the Athenians, that the Macedonians had lately taken, and they retaken. Wherefore by general consent a War was decreed against Philip: and immoderate honours paid to Attalus first, and then to the Rhodians. And then was the first mention made of the Tribe, which they called Attalis, being to be added to the ten old ones. The Rhodians on the other hand had a Crown of gold presented to them upon the score of their valour, and were made free of the City, as they had formerly made the Athenians. After these things King Attalus went to the Navy at Agina, whilst the Rhodians sailed from thence to Cia, and so along through the Isles to Rhodes, making an Alliance with them all by the way, except Andrus, Parus, and Cythus, which were in the possession of the Macedonians. Certain Messengers, that he sent into Etolia, and Embassadors, that he expected from thence, kept Attalus for some time at Agina without doing any thing at all: in which time as he could not get them to fight, because they desired a Peace with Philip upon any terms whatsoever, so, on the contrary, had he and the Rhodians made a brisk attack upon Philip, they might have had the glory of having themselves delivered Greece. And then again by suffering him to go over into Hellepont, and, taking possession of the most convenient places in all Greece, to re-inforce himself, they cherish'd the War; and gave the glory of waging and ending of it wholly to the Romans.

Philip behaved himself more like a King; who though not able to endure the shock of Attalus and the Rhodians, was not for all that affrighted at the Roman War which was then at hand, but sending Philocles, one of his Prefects with two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse to ravage the Country of the Athenians, and committing the Fleet to Heracles, to go to Maronea withal, went himself by Land the same way with two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse of his most expedite Souldiers. And indeed he took Maronea upon the first Assault. Thence he marched to Enna, which he attempted at first with great difficulty, but at last took, by the treachery of one Ganymede Prolomies Prefect. After which he got possession of several Castles, Cypsela, Doriscum, and Serrheum. From whence going to Chersonesus he took Eleus, and Alopeconesus by Surrender. Callipolis also and Madytos were surrender'd, with other Castles of less note. But the Abydenes, besides that they did not admit his Embassadors, shut their Gates against the King. And his attempt upon those people gave Philip a long diversion, nor had their Town been taken, if Attalus and the Rhodians had made any halt. For Attalus sent only three hundred Souldiers to their relief, and the Rhodians but one Gally of four Banks on a side, out of his Fleet, that lay at Tenedus. Yea afterward when they could hardly hold out the Siege, and Attalus himself came that way, he only made a show of aid at some small distance, assisting his Allies neither by Sea nor Land.

The Abydenes at first, planting their Engines of War upon the Walls, did not only beat them off that came to assault them by Land; but made the station where their Ships also lay uneasy to the Foe. After which, when part of their Wall was broken down, and the Enemy had now Mined under it, all on a sudden, as far as the opposite Wall, they sent Embassadors to the Kings for terms of Surrender. Whereupon they agreed, That the Rhodian Gally with its Naval Allies, and King Attalus's men should freely pass away; and they themselves would march out of their City with each of them one Garment apiece. To whom seeing Philip would not afford any hopes of Peace, unless they would grant all that he desired; the Answer sent by that Ambassy, through indignation and despair, so far enraged them, that they, growing as mad as the Saguntines, caused all their Matrons to be shut up in the Temple of Diana, and their Freeborn Boyes, and Girls, and Infants, with their Nurseries, in a Gymnasium [or place of Exercise:] their Gold and Silver to be carried into the Market-place; their precious attire to be thrown into two Ships, the one a Rhodian, and the other a Cyzicene, that were in their Harbour: the Priests and their Victims to be brought thither, and Altars set in the midst of it. And there they first chose out such persons, who, when they saw their Army all slain as they fought before the ruined Wall, should kill their Wives and Children: throw all the Gold, and Silver, and the Garments that were in the Ships into the Sea: and set fire, in as many places as they could, to the Buildings, both private and publick. To which they were obliged by an Oath which the Priests repeated in an execrable Form before them; and all that were able to bear Arms were sworn, not a man of them to stir from the place, till they had got the Victory. They therefore out of reverence to the Gods fought so pertinaciously, that when the night was ready to part them, the King, affrighted at their resolution, retreated first. The Nobility, who underwent the greatest part of the Fatigue, seeing some few, though very much wounded and tired, yet alive, sent the Priests in their Sacred Robes at break of day to Philip to surrender the City.

But before the Surrender was made, M. Aemilius, though the youngest of those Roman Embassadors, that were sent to Alexandria, came by consent of the other three, when they heard that Abydos was Besieged, to Philip; complaining, that he made an offensive War upon Attalus and the Rhodians, besides, that even at that time he attempted Abydos. To which the King making Answer, That he was set upon by Attalus and the Rhodians without any provocation: Æmylius reply'd; What? and did the Abydenes too set upon you without provocation? At which the King, being not used to hear truth, thought his Language too pert to be used before a King, and told him; Your Age, Beauty, and above, your name, as a Roman, makes you too saucy. I would have you first remember their Leagues and keep the Peace you made with me. For if you provoke me to it, I am resolv'd, you shall find that the Kingdom and name of the Macedonians may be as Renowned in War as that of the Romans. Then dismissing the Ambassador, Philip took all the Gold and Silver, that was there heaped up together; but lost the Booty of the men. For the multitude were so enraged, that, on a sudden, thinking them betrayed, who died in the fight, and upbraiding each other with perjury, especially the Priests, who had made a Surrender to the Enemy of those very men alive that they had devoted to Death, ran all forthwith and kill'd their Wives and Children, together with themselves, by all ways of Death that were. The King amazed at their Fury, restrained the violence of his Souldiers, and declar'd, he would give the Abydenes three dayes time to die in; in which space the conquered committed more outrages upon themselves than the insulting Conquerours before had done. Nor was there any one of them taken Prisoner, unless he were hindered from destroying himself either by being in Bonds, or some other necessity. Philip having put a Guard into Abydos returned into his Kingdom. But even now, when the destruction of the Abydenes (as that of Saguntum did Annibal) had animated Philip for the Roman War, the news met him; That the Consul was already come into Epirus; having put all his Land-Forces into Apollonia, and all his Naval Forces into Corcyra, for Winter Quarters.

XIX. In the mean while the Embassadors that were sent into Africa, concerning Amilcar, General of the Gallick Army, had this Answer from the Carthaginians; That they could do no more than banish him, and confiscate his Estate. That they had sent back all the Renegadoes and Fugitives which they could find out: and, that about that matter, they would send Embassadors to Rome, to satisfy the Senate. And that they sent two hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat to Rome, and as many to the Army in Macedonia. From thence the Embassadors went into Numidia to the Kings; giving the Presents to Massinissa, and telling him what they had to say. Thereupon he would have given them two thousand Horse, but they accepted of only one thousand; which he himself took care to have Shipped off; and sent them with two hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat, and as many of Barley, into Macedonia. The third part of their Embassy was to Vermina: who going to the very Frontiers of his Kingdom to meet the Embassadors, he let them write down what terms of Peace they pleased. For he said, That any kind of Peace between him and the Roman people would be good and just. They therefore gave him terms of Peace, for a confirmation whereof they bad him send Embassadors to Rome.

XX. At the same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Pro-Consul returned out of Spain, who having told the Senate what things he had perform'd with courage and success for many years together, and desired to enter into the City in Triumph; The Senate lookt upon what he had done to deserve a Triumph: but they had no precedent for it; that any one, who was not either a Dictator, a Consul, or a Prætor, when he performed such and such exploits, had ever triumph'd. Now he was Pro Consul of Spain, and not Consul or Prætor. Yet they condescended so far, that he make his Entry into the City Ovant; though T. Sempronius Longus, Tribune of the People, was against it, saying, that that was equally as much against the Custom of their Ancestors, and all Precedents. But at last overcome by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the Tribune was fain to yield; and by an order of Senate L. Lentulus came into the City Ovant. He brought, as booty, along with him, forty four thousand pounds of Silver Bullion, and of Gold two thousand four hundred pounds, giving each of his Souldiers a hundred and twenty Asses apiece.

XXI. By this time the Consuls Army was brought from Arretium to Ariminum, and five thousand of the Allies of the Latine Race were coming over out of Gaul into Etruria. Wherefore L. Furius making great marches from Ariminum against the Gauls who then were a besieging Cremona, he pitched his Camp fifteen hundred paces from the Enemy. He had a good opportunity to have done his business, had he gone straight on and attacked the Enemies Camp. For they santered and stragled about the Country, without leaving any strong Garison there behind them. But he feared his Souldiers were too weary, because they had marched so very fast. Thereupon the Gauls, being recalled by the shouts of their own Party, left the Booty that they had gotten, and made back to their Camp; coming the next day into the field. Nor did the Romans delay the fight; though they had hardly time to set their men in Battalia, the Enemy ran in upon them with such speed. The right Wing (for he had an Army of Allies divided into Wings) was planted in the Van, and the two Roman Legions in the Reer. M. Furius Commanded the Right Wing, M. Cæcilius the Legions, and L. Valerius Flaccus the Horse, being all of them Lieutenants. The Prætor had with him two Lieutenants, Cn. Letorius, and P. Titinius, by whose help he might be able to look about him and be ready for all the Enemies sudden efforts. First then the Gauls with with all their whole Body gathered into one place, hoped to overthrow, and rout the right VVing, which was in the front; but seeing they had no success in that attempt, they endeavoured to wheel about from their Wings and enclose the Enemies Army; which to such a multitude against so few, seemed very easie. VVhen the Prætor saw that, he also went about to dilate his Army, and therefore drew the two Legions out of the Reer to the right and left, in order to cover the VVing that fought the Front; and vow'd to build a Temple in honour of Jupiter, if that day he routed the Enemy. After which he ordered L. Valerius, that on the one side, he should send forth the Horse that were in the two Legions, and on the other side, those of the Allies against the Enemies VVing, or suffer them to surround or circumvent their Main Body. And at the same time he himself, as soon as he saw the Gauls Main Body grown thin, after the widening and spreading of their VVings, commanded his men, at their close Order, to attack them and break their Ranks: by which means, the Wings were beaten by the Horse, and the main Body by the Foot. Whereupon of a sudden, the Gauls being slain in great numbers on every side, turned their backs, and ran toward their Camp as hard as they could drive. Whither the Horse first pursuing them, and by and by the Foot also, they made an attack upon their Camp. Little less than six thousand men made their escape thence; there being killed and taken above thirty five thousand, with eighty military Ensigns, and Gallick Waggons laden with much Booty, to the number of above two hundred. Amilcar the Carthaginian General fell in that Battle, and three noble Generals of the Gauls. Of the Placentine Captives there were full two thousand Freeman delivered back to the Inhabitants.

This was a great Victory and the cause of much joy at Rome; concerning which, when the Letters came, a supplication was decreed to be made for three Days together. There fell, of Romans and their Allies, in that Battel, two Thousand, many of them belonging to the right VVing, upon which the Enemy at first made their fiercest Attack. Now, though the Prætor had almost made an end of the VVar, yet C. Anselmus the Consul also, having perfected what was to be done at Rome, going into Gallia; took the Victorious Army from the Prætor; whilst the other Consul, being coming into his Province about the latter end of Autumn, wintered near Apollonia. C. Claudius and the Roman three-bank'd Gallies (as I told you before) who were sent, from the Navy, that was in Harbour at Corcyra, to Athenis, being arrived at the Pyræus, revived the hopes of their Allies, who were now in a very desponding condition. For neither were those incursions by Land, that used to be made from Corinth, through Megara, into their Country, any longer continued, nor durst the Thieves and Pirates of Chalcis (that had infested, not only the Sea, but all the Maritime Country also belonging to the Athenians) pass Suntium, or appear in the open Sea without the streights of Euripus. Besides these there came three Rhodian four-bank'd Gallies, and there were three Attick open Ships, on purpose to defend the Sea Coast. VVith this Navy, though Claudius was of opinion that the City and Country of Athenis might be for the present sufficiently defended, he had a greater thing offered to him by mere chance.

Certain banished Persons that were driven from Chalcis by injuries which they received at Court, brought him word, That Chalcis might be taken without the trouble of fighting for it. For the Macedonians, because there was no fear of any Enemies being near them, straggled up and down, and the townsmen, relying upon the Macedonian Garrison, neglected the keeping and securing of their City. By their advice therefore he set out; but though he came so soon to Suntium, that he might by day-light have got as far as the entrance into the streights of Eubæa, yet left, if he pass'd the Promontory [or Cape] he might be discovered, he kept his Navy in the same station till night. As soon as it was night he moved; and sailing gently to Chalcis, a little before day, in that part of the City that is least inhabited, he with a few Men scaled and took the adjoining Tower, and the Wall about it. Then finding, in some places, the Sentinels asleep, and in others no Sentinel at all, they went forward to those places where there were more Houses; and there having kill'd the Watch, and broke open the Gate, they let in the other multitude of their own Souldiers. Whereupon they ran all about the City, increasing the tumult by setting fire on the Houses, that were about the Market Place. The Kings store-houses also and his Armory were burnt, with great quantities of VVarlike Instruments and Engines. Then there began to be made a slaughter both of such as fled, and such as made resistance too in all parts: nor was there any one, fit to bear Arms, that was not either slain or put to flight; besides, that Sopater also, an Acaranian, who was Governour of the Garrison, was kill'd; by which means all the spoil was first carried into the Market Place, and then put on board the Ships. The Prison likewise was broken open by the Rhodians, and the Captives let out, whom Philip had put into it, as the safest place to secure them. After that, having thrown down the Kings Statues, and cut off their Heads, they gave the signal for a retreat, and went on board their Ships, returning to the Pyræus, from whence they came. Now had there been such a number of Roman Souldiers, as that Chalcis might have been kept, and the Athenian Garrison not left unmanned, the taking of Chalcis and Euripus from the King at the very beginning of the War had been of great consequence; for, as by Land the streights of Thermopylae are the barriers of Greece; so, by Sea, is that of Euripus.

Philip

XXIV.

Philip was then at Demetrias, where when the news came of the destruction of that associated City, though it were too late to help them, yet he, desiring revenge (which is next to Aid) set forth immediately with five Thousand Foot, and three Hundred Horse, and went as fast as he could till he came near Chalcis, not doubting in the least but he might surprize the Romans. But being disappointed in his hopes of that, and, when he came, seeing nothing but an hideous spectacle of an allied City, that was half demolished, and still smoaking; he left some few, scarce enough to bury them that were kill'd in the Battel, and going full as fast as he came by a Bridge over the Euripus, marched through Boeotia to Athens, supposing that a like event would answer a proportionable enterprize. And so indeed it had, had not a Scout (which sort of Men the Greeks call Hemerodromi, because they run a great way in one day) who discovered the Kings Army from a certain Watch-Tower, gone before Midnight to Athens: where he found the same drowziness, and the same negligence, that some few dayes before had betrayed Chalcis. But the General of the Athenians, and Dioxippus, Colonel of a Regiment of Auxiliaries, that fought for pay, being soon alarm'd at the frightful News, call'd all their Souldiers into the Market-place, and ordered the Trumpet to give such a signal from the Castle, that all people might know, the Enemy was come. Thereupon they ran from all parts to the Gates, and then to the Walls. And some few hours after, Philip, though a little before day, approaching near the City, when he saw a great many Lights, and heard the noise of men as in a consternation (which in such cases is very usual) he made an halt, Commanding his Army to sit down and rest themselves: for he resolved to use open force, since Policy would not do his business. Then he came to that part of the City called Dipylon; which is a Gate in the Front of the City, somewhat bigger and wider than the rest: and within as well as without it, broad streets; whereby not only the Townsmen could lead an Army from the Market-place to the Gate, but without also the way that led for a thousand paces together into the Academy, afforded room enough for the Enemies Horse and Foot. That way the Athenians, with the Guards of Attalus, and Dioxippus's Regiment, having set their Army in Array within the Gate, bore forth their Ensigns. Which when Philip saw, supposing that he had his Enemies at his mercy, with the long-wished-for slaughter of whom he might now glut himself (for he hated no City of Greece more than that) he exhorted his men, that they would look upon him, whilst they fought; and know, that there the Ensigns, there the main body of the Army ought to be where the King was: and with that he rode in full Career up toward the Enemy, being heated not only with anger, but vain glory too; for that the Walls being fill'd with vast numbers of people that came to look on, he thought it a brave thing for him to be seen so warmly engaged in the fight. Then riding up somewhat before the Army with a few Horsemen to attend him into the midst of the Enemies, he not only very much encouraged his own men, but put the Foe into as great a fright. For having wounded a great many of them with his own hand, both near him and at a distance, he himself pursued them to the very Gate; and though he kill'd a greater number of them in that narrow pass, made a safe Retreat from his rash Enterprize; because those that were upon the Towers of the Gate forbore to throw their Weapons down, lest they should hit their own men too, who were mingled among the Enemies. After that, the Athenians keeping their men within the Walls, Philip founded a Retreat, and pitched his Camp at Cynosarges, where was the Temple of Hercules, and a place of Exercise, with a Grove round about it. But this Cynosarges, and the Lycaum with all things else that were either sacred or pleasant about the City, were set on fire; and not only the Houses but the Sepulchres also demolish'd; nor had they, through the violence of their fury, any respect either to divine or humane Laws.

XXV.

The next day, the Gates, that had been first shut, being on a sudden flung open; because the Guards of Attalus entred the City from Aegina, and the Romans from the Piræus; the King removed his Camp from the City about three thousand paces. From whence going to Eleusis, in hopes to surprize the Temple and the Castle too, that joins to and encompasses the Temple, he found the Watches well attended, and a Fleet coming from the Piræus to their relief; wherefore, omitting that attempt, he marched to Megara, and thence straight to Corinth: where hearing that there was a Council of the Achaens held at Argos, he, without the Achaens knowledge, came into the Assembly. Now they were consulting about a War against Nabis, Tyrant of the Lacedæmonians; who having transferred the Sovereign Power from Philopæmenes to Cycliades, a General not at all equal to him, and seeing the Achaen Auxiliaries much weakened, had renewed the War, and was then a wasting the Neighbouring Countries; being terrible now even to the Cities also. Against this Enemy, seeing they consulted how many men they should raise out of each City; Philip promised them, That, as to Nabis and the Lacedæmonians, he would take the trouble off their hands: nor would he only save the Territories of their Allies from being any longer pillaged, but also, by leading his Army immediately that way, would turn all the terror of the War upon the Laconians. This Speech of his was mighty grateful to them; but then he told them: But, Gentlemen, I ought so to defend you with my Arms, as in the mean time not to leave my own Dominions without any Guard at all. Wherefore, if you please, raise so many men, as may serve to defend Oreum, Chalcis, and Corinth; that, when my Towns behind me are safe, I may the better make War against against Nabis and the Lacedæmonians. The Achaens were well aware what his design was in making that kind promise, and offering his assistance against the Lacedæmonians; for he proposed the getting the Achaen Youth out of Peloponnesus, as so many Hostages to engage their Nation in the Roman War. To which Cycliades, General of the Achaens, thinking it to no purpose to speak, said only this, that by the Laws of the Achaens it was not lawful to propose any other thing in Council, but what they were called together about; and so making a Decree for the raising of an Army against Nabis, he dismissed the Council with the same Courage and freedom that he held it, though before that time he was lookt upon to be one of King Philip's Creatures. Philip therefore being frustrated in his great hopes, raised some few Volunteers, returned to Corinth and so into Attica.

At that very time when Philip was in Achaia, Philocles, the Kings Prefect coming out of Eubœa with two thousand Thracians and Macedonians, to ravage the Confines of the Athenians, he passed over the Mountain Cytheron over against Eleusis. Where sending half of his men round about to plunder the Country, he lay with the rest close in a place very fit for an Ambuscade; that if any Sally should be made from the Castle of Eleusis upon his men, whilst they were at their work, he might surprize the Enemy as they came thronging out. But his Ambuscade was discovered; and therefore, having recall'd those Souldiers that were gone a plundering, and put them in a way to attack the Castle, he went to Eleusis; but coming back from thence much wounded, he joined himself to Philip, who was then coming out of Achaia. The King himself also attempted to take that Castle. But the Roman Ships coming from Piræus, with a Guard, that was admitted into it, forced him to desist from the Enterprize. After that having divided his Army, the King sent Philocles with part of it to Athens, and with the rest went himself to Piræus: to the end, that whilst Philocles, by drawing near their Walls, and threatening them with an Assault, kept the Athenians within their City, he might have an opportunity to take the Piræus, when it was left with so small a Guard. But his attempt upon the Piræus was full as difficult, as that upon Eleusis, because there were almost all the same persons to defend it. Wherefore from the Piræus he immediately marched to Athens: from whence being repulsed by a sudden eruption of the Foot and Horse, between the two half demolished Walls, that join the Piræus to Athens, he desisted from attacking the City; and having again divided the Army between himself and Philocles, went to pillage the Country. But having committed the former outrage, by demolishing of the Sepulchres about the City; he caused all the Temples of their Gods, that were lookt upon as sacred in any Village, to be burnt and demolished. The Country of Attica being very curiously adorned with that sort of works, by reason both of its native Marble, and the ingenuity of its Artificers, gave occasion to this mad action of his. For he was not content only to demolish the Temples and overturn the Statues, but he ordered the stones also to be broken a pieces, lest, if they were left whole, they might serve to repair the Ruines. And when his fury (was not so much satisfied, as it) wanted matter to work upon, he went out of the Enemies Country into Boeotia, nor did he do any thing else worth the speaking of in Greece.

The Consul Sulpicius at that time was Encamped between Apollonia and Dyrrbachium, near the River Apfus: whither he sent for T. Apufius his Lieutenant, and dispatched him away with part of the Forces to plunder the Enemies Confines. Whereupon Apufius having pillaged all the Borders of Macedonia, and taken Corrhagum, Gerrhunium, and Orgessus, three Castles, at the first Effort, came to Antipatria, a City situate in a very narrow avenue. Where first, calling out the chief men of the place to a Parley, he endeavoured to persuade them to put themselves under the protection of the Romans: but afterward seeing that they slighted what he said, as trusting in their numbers, their Walls, and the situation of their City, he stormed, and took it; killing all those that were of Age, and giving all the plunder to the Souldiers; besides, that he demolished the Walls, and burnt the whole Town. This dreadful news made Codrion, a Town sufficiently fortified and strong enough, surrender it self to the Romans without any more ado. Where having left a Guard, he took Ilion (a name more known upon the account of a City so called in Asia, than upon the score of this Town) by force of Arms. But as the Lieutenant returned to the Consul with a vast Booty, one Athenagoras, a Prefect of the Kings, setting upon his Reer, whilst he passed a certain River, put the hindmost of his men into disorder. Upon whose shouts and consternation, the Lieutenant riding swiftly back again, made the Army face about; and having placed the Baggage in the middle, set his Army in Array; but the Kings men could not endure the shock of the Romans. Many of them were slain, and more taken: so that the Lieutenant leading his Army safe back to the Consul, was thence sent forthwith to the Fleet.

The War being begun with such success, the petit Kings and Princes, that border upon Macedonia, came to the Roman Camp; Pleuratus son of Scordiletus, Aminander King of Athamanes, and of the Dardanes, Bato son to Longarus (Longarus had waged War upon his own account against Demetrius Philip's Father;) Who promising their assistance, received this answer from the Consul, That when he brought his Army into Macedonia, he would make use of the Dardanes and of Pleuratus as Auxiliaries, imploying Aminander to instigate the the *Ætoli*ans. To Attalus's Embassadors (for they also were come thither at the same time) he gave order, That the King their Master, should stay for the Roman Navy at Agina, where he wintered; and joining it, should engage Philip, as he had done formerly in a Sea Fight. Nor did Philip prepare more slowly for the War, being now got into Macedonia, sending his Son Perseus, a very Boy (and some of his Favourites to instruct and guide the Lads nonage) with part of his Forces to besiege the Streights that are at Pelagonia. Then he demolished Sciathus and Peparethus, lest they might prove a prey and a reward to the Enemy; sending Embassadors to the *Ætoli*ans, lest that Nation, being disturbed at the coming of the Romans, should revolt. Now there was a Convention to be of the *Ætoli*ans upon a set day, which they call Panætolium [a meeting of all the *Ætoli*ans] at which, that they might be present, not only the Kings Embassadors made great haste, but L. Furius Purpureo also sent from the Consul, came in quality of an Embassador. Embassadors likewise from the Athenians met at that Convention.

XXIX. But first the Macedonians, with whom they had made the latest League, had Audience, VVho, seeing there was no new matter, said, They had nothing of News to tell them; for upon the same grounds that they, having tried how useless the Roman Alliance was, had made a Peace with Philip, they ought still to keep it since it was once concluded. Or would you, said one of the Embassadors, rather imitate the licentiousness (shall I say?) or levity of the Romans; who, though they formerly gave order for this answer to be made to their Embassadors at Rome, Why do you, *Ætoli*ans, come to us, without whose advice or consent you have made a Peace with Philip? yet now (the very same People) desire, that you would take their part in a War against Philip. They formerly pretended they took up Arms for your sakes and in your quarrel against him; but now they will not suffer you to be at Peace with Philip. They went over first into Sicily to assist Mellana; and a second time to free Syracuse from being oppressed by the Carthaginians. Yet they themselves are Lords of Mellana and Syracuse, yea, and all Sicily now, having made it a Province tributary to their Rods and Axes. That is to say, as you, at Naupactum, call a Council by your Laws, and by Magistrates chosen by you, to make whom you please your Ally or Enemy, and determine upon Peace or War as you think good; so do the Romans appoint all Councils or Conventions in the Cities of Sicily, at Syracuse, Mellana, or Lilybæum. The Roman Prætor holds the Assembly, and by his Authority they are summoned together. There they see him on an high Tribunal giving Laws to them, and encompassed with a company of Lictors. The Rods are ready for their Backs, and the Axes for their Necks; besides, that every year they have a new Lord over them. Nor ought they, or can they wonder at that, when they see the very Cities of Italy, as Rhegium, Tarentum, and Capua, not to mention the neighbouring places, out of whose ruins the City of Rome was augmented, submit to the same slavery. Capua indeed it self, the Sepulchre and Monument of the Campanians, remains, though its People are dead and banished thence; but it is a maimed place, without a Senate, without a People, and without Magistrates; a monstrous thing; which it was more cruelty to leave so inhabited, than if it had been totally destroyed. It is a madness, if Foreigners, who are divided from them more in their Languages, Manners, and Laws, than by Seas or Tracts of Land, have these places in possession, to hope that any thing will continue in the same state. Does Philips Reign seem any way to obstruct their liberty; who, though he were no more severe upon you than you deserved, and desired nothing of you but peace and friendship, wants that Peace which he made with you, at this very day? Accustom your foreign Legions to those Countries, and take their yokes upon your necks; you will too late when 'tis in vain, after you have got the Romans to be your Lords, desire Philips alliance. Some slight differences for a time may divide the *Ætoli*ans, the Acarnanians, and the Macedonians, men of the same language, and as little a matter makes them friends again; but with Aliens, and Barbarians, all the Greeks, not only at present have, but always will maintain eternal Hostility; for they are Enemies, not by accident, but by nature. But my Speech shall end where I began. You are the very same Persons, who three years ago resolved upon a Peace with the same Philip, and these are the very same Romans, who, not only then were against that, but would now dissolve this Peace which you have made and concluded. But I see no reason, that you should alter any thing in a determination, wherein fortune has made no manner of alteration.

XXX. After the Macedonians, the Athenians (by consent and order of the Romans) who had suffered great indignities, and could more justly inveigh against the Cruelty and Barbarity of the King, were introduced. They deplored the wasting and miserable ravaging of their Country: Nor did they (as they said) complain, that they had suffered hostilities from an Enemy. For there were certain Laws of War; according to which it was just for them both to act and suffer. That their Corn should be burnt up, their Houses demolished, and whole droves of men as well as Cattle taken from them, was rather their misfortune than an ill thing done by the Foe. But they complained, that he who called the Romans Aliens, and Barbarians, should so far violate all Laws both divine and humane, as, in the former plunder to wage a Cursed War, as it were, with the infernal, and, in the second, with the Cœlestial Gods. For all the Monuments and Sepulchres in their Confiners were demolished, the manes [or Ghosts] of all their dead stripped there, nor any mans Bones covered with Earth. That they had Temples too, which their Ancestors, who heretofore dwelt in Villages, had consecrated in these small Forts and Hamlets, and did not leave without Potaries even after they were united [by Theseus] into one City. That about all those Temples

Philip had thrown destructive flames; and that the Images of their Gods lay half-burnt, with their Heads off, among the ruined Timber. And such as he had made the Country of Attica, which once was gloriously adorned and opulent; such, if he might, he would in time make Ætolia and all Greece. That their City too had like to have been as much defaced, had not the Romans come. For with the same wicked intent he aimed at the very tutelæ Gods of their City, and the Protectress of their Castle Minerva, as he did at Eleusis, at the Temple of Ceres, and in Piræus, at the Temple of Jupiter and Minerva both; but being repulsed, not only from their Temples, but even from our Walls by force of Arms, exerted his rage upon such holy places as were left defenceless, save by the sanctity of them. Wherefore they desired and be g'd of the *Ætoli*ans, that, in pity to the Athenians (since they had the immortal Gods to be their Leaders, and the Romans also, who, next to the Gods, were the most powerful Commanders) they would levy a War against Philip.

Then the Roman Embassador spoke: The Macedonians (said he) first, and then the Athe- XXXI. nians, have quite altered the whole frame of what I had to say. For the Macedonians, though I came to complain of injuries done by Philip to so many Cities, that are allied to us, by accusing the Romans, have made it more eligible to me to make a defence, than an accusation; and the Athenians, by relating his wicked and inhumane behaviour toward the Gods, both Infernal and Cœlestial, have left no room for me, or any body else to make any farther objections. You may imagine that the Cianians, Abydenes, Æneans, Maronites, Thalians, Parians, Samians, Lari- lians, with the Mellianians also from Achaia, complain of the same things; and they with much greater reason, whom he was more capable of hurting. Now, as to what he has objected against us, it is so far from needing a defence, that it rather deserves the greatest commendations than any excuse. He laid Rhegium, and Capua, and Syracuse to our charge. To Rhegium, I confess, in the time of the War with Pyrrhus, we, at the request of the Rhegians themselves, sent a Legion to assist them; who made themselves Masters of that City, that they were sent to defend. But did we approve of that injustice? No, we persecuted that wicked Legion; which when we had subdued and forced to give our Allies satisfaction at the expence of their Necks, we restored their City, Country, and all they had, with their Liberties and Laws, back to the Rhegians. When the Syraculans were oppressed by Foreign Tyrants, (to make their oppression appear the more grievous) after we had assisted them, and been fatigued for three years together, both by Sea and Land, in attacking well fortified Cities, seeing that the Syraculans themselves chose rather to be enslaved to Tyrants, than to be taken by us, we took and restored their City, when we had freed it, with the same Arms. Nor do we deny, that Sicily is our Province, or that some Cities that were on the Carthaginians side, unanimously making War against us, as their Allies, are stipendiary and tributary more to us. But on the other hand we would have both you and all People else to know, that we have made each of their conditions proportionable to their deserts. Must we repent for punishing the Campanians; an act which they themselves cannot complain of? These People, after we had fought for them against the Samnites, almost seventy years, to our great loss; after we had obliged them to us first by a League, secondly by intermarriages (and consequently by all the bonds of consanguinity) and lastly, by making them free of our City; these very People (I say) in the time of our misfortunes, were the first in all Italy, who, having barbarously murdered our Garrison, revolted to Annibal; and then, being incensed that we should besiege them, sent Annibal to attack Rome. Now if neither their City, nor so much as a man of them were yet alive, who could say, but they had suffered according as they deserved? More of them through consciousness of the ill things, which they had done, kill'd themselves, than were put to death by us. And from the rest, we only so far took away their Town and Country, that we still allowed them an habitation: letting their innocent City stand as secure, as that, whosoever at this day sees it, will find no sign at all of its being stormed, or taken. But what do I talk of Capua? when we granted a Peace and liberty even to Carthage after we had conquer'd it? Our greatest danger is, left by pardoning those we conquer too easily, we incite more people for that very reason to try the fortune of War against us. So much in our defence and against Philip: whose domestick Parricides, and slaughters of his nearest Relations and Friends, with his Lust, more inhumane (if possible) than his Cruelty, you who live nearer to Macedonia, are better acquainted with, than we are. As for you, *Ætoli*ans, we undertook a War upon your account against Philip; and you made a Peace with him without our knowledge. But perhaps you'll say, that when we were engaged in the Punic War, you were forced for fear to admit of Terms of Peace from him, who then was more powerful; and that we also, having greater things upon our hands, our selves omitted the War, that you had laid down. 'Tis true: but now by the bounty of the Gods, seeing the Punic War is made an end of, we bend all our strength against Macedonia, and you have good opportunity of restoring your selves into our Friendship and Alliance; unless you had rather perish with Philip, than conquer with the Romans.

When the Roman had said this, all of them were inclined to the Roman side; but Damocritus Prætor of the *Ætoli*ans, who, as the report goes, had received money from the King [Philip] assenting to neither party, said, That nothing was so injurious to publick Counsels as hastiness. For it was attended with swift repentance, though too late, and to no purpose; since counsels hurried so precipitately on, could not be either recalled or amended. But that a time might be now appointed for that deliberation, whereof he thought they ought to wait the maturity or ripeness. And since the Laws provided, that they should not treat of War or Peace, but in a Panætolick, or a Pylaick Assembly [of all the *Ætoli*ans, and at Pylæ or Thermopylæ] he therefore advised them immediately to resolve, that the Prætor, when he had a mind to treat of Peace or War, should without any design fairly summon an Assembly; and that whatever was then proposed or decreed should be as valid, and of the same force, as if it had been the act of a Panætolick or Py-læick Council. The Embassadors being thus dismissed without any positive Answer; he said, He had taken the best course for the safety of their Nation; for now they would be on that side which happened to have the best luck. These things were done in the Council of the Ætolians.

XXXIII. Mean while Philip made preparation for the War both by Sea and Land, drawing all his Naval Forces to Demetrias in Thessaly; supposing that Attalus and the Roman Fleet would move from Ægina in the beginning of the Spring, he made Heracles Admiral of the Navy (as he had done formerly) with a charge to look to the Sea Coast. But he himself mustered up all the Land Forces he could; believing that he had gotten two great Auxiliaries from the Romans, the Ætolians on the one side, and the Dardanes on the other, whilst his Son Perseus blocked up the streights at Pelagonia. The Consul in the interim did not prepare for, but actually wage a War; leading his Army through the Confines of the Dassaretians, where he kept the Corn, that he brought from his own Winter-Quarters, entire, because that Country afforded supplies sufficient for his Souldiers. The Towns and Villages surrendered themselves, partly of their own freewill, and partly for fear: some being also taken by storm, and others found to be deserted by the Barbarians, who fled into the adjacent Mountains. After which he pitched his Camp at Lycus near the River Bevus; from whence he sent for Corn to all the Storehouses of the Dassaretians that were thereabout. Philip saw all People round about in a consternation and great fear; but not knowing which way the Consul was bent, sent a Party of Horse to find out whither the Enemy intended. The Consul was at the same loss. For though he knew the King was gone out of his Winter Quarters, he knew not what Country he was bound for. Wherefore he likewise had sent some of his Horse, as Scouts, to watch his motions. Which two adverse Parties, after they had a long time straggled about the Dassaretian Territories to and fro, at last met in the same road. Whereupon they both knew, as soon as they heard the noise of the Men and Horses, though at a good distance, that the Enemy was at hand; so that before they came in sight of one another, they made ready their Horses and Arms. Nor did they stick to fall on as soon as they each saw their Enemy. And being, as it happened, very equal both in number and Courage (for they were chosen men on both sides) they fought with equal strength for some hours, till they and their Horses being quite tired, they drew off, not knowing who had the better on it. There were slain of the Macedonians forty Horse, and of the Romans thirty five. Nor did they ever the more inform either the King or the Consul, in what part of the Country the Enemies Camp was. But that was known by Fugitives, which their levity of inclination to inquire into the affairs of both Enemies produces in all Wars.

XXXIV. Then Philip supposing that he should not only ingratiate himself with the Macedonians, but also make them the readier to undertake any dangerous Enterprize for him, if he took care to bury the Horsemen, who were fallen in that Expedition, commanded them to be brought into the Camp, that they might all see the pomp of their Funeral. Nothing is so uncertain, or unaccountable as the minds of the mobile. For that which he thought would have made them more ready to engage in any fight, struck them with terror and dullness. For they who being used to fight with the Greeks and Illyrians, with Spears and Darts, had rarely seen any Wounds made with Lances; when they beheld their Bodies lye so with their Arms, and their Heads cut off, their Bowels out, and other dreadful Wounds; they were generally affrighted to think, against what Weapons, and what Men they must engage. Yea the King himself was dismay'd, having never yet fought the Romans in a pitched Battle. Wherefore recalling his Son, and that Party which was at the streights of Pelagonia, he made way for Pleuratus and the Dardanes to come into Macedonia. But he himself with twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse (the Fugitives being his Guides) marched toward the Enemy, and a little more than two hundred paces from the Roman Camp, fortified a Bank near Athacus, with a Trench and a Bullwark: under which seeing the Roman, he, they say, admired not only the structure of it in general, but the particular divisions of it, how they lay in such order, and kept such a regular distance; saying, that no one would think that the Camp of Barbarians. The Consul and the King kept their men within their Mound for two days, in expectation the one of the others coming forth; and the third day the Roman drew all his Forces into the Field.

XXXV. But the King being afraid to put the hazard of the whole Battle upon so sudden a push, sent four hundred Trallians (who are a people in Illyria, as I told you elsewhere) and three hundred Cretans (to which Foot he added an equal number of Horse) under the Command of Athenagoras, one of his great Courtiers, to provoke the Enemies Horse. By the Romans on the other hand, whose main Body was little more than five hundred paces off, were sent out a Party of light-arm'd Foot, and near two Troops of Horse; that their Foot and Horse might equal the Enemy even in number too. Thereupon the Kings men believed they should see such a sort of fighting as they had been used to; that is to say, that the Horse mutually following, and flying from each other, would sometimes use their Weapons, and sometimes turn their backs; that the swiftness of the Illyrians would be of use for for Excursions and sudden Attacks: and that the Cretans would sling their Darts at the Enemy as they came furiously up to them. But the sharp as well as resolute onset which the Romans made, put them besides that way of fighting. For just as though they had engaged with their whole Army, not only the light-armed men having first flung their Spears, came up hand to hand and fought with their Swords, but the Horse also, as soon as they were once got into the Foe, made their Horses stand still, whilst they, partly off their back, and partly dismounting, so as to mingle with the Foot, maintained the Battle. By which means neither was the Kings Horse equal to that of the Romans, being unaccustomed to a standing fight, nor his Foot neither (being only swift, wandering, and almost half-naked) able to cope with the Enemies light-arm'd men, who had a Shield and Sword, and were sufficiently armed both to defend themselves and offend the Macedonians. These therefore could not endure the shock; and for that reason, relying upon nothing, save their swiftness, they fled back into their Camp.

Then, intermitting one day, the King, being to ingage with all his Horse and light Ar- XXXVI. mour, had planted the Shieldmen, whom they called Peltastæ, between the two Camps in an Ambuscade, commanding Athenagoras and the Horsemen, That if they were like to come to an open Battle, they should try their fortune; if not, that by retiring gradually, they should draw the foe to the place where the Ambuscade lay. Accordingly the Horse gave back; but the Captains of the Shieldmen, by not staying long enough to expect the signal, but alarming their Men before the time, lost the opportunity of doing the business with success. The Roman therefore, being victorious in that open fight, and delivered from the wile of their Ambuscade, retreated into his Camp. The next day the Consul came into the Field with all his Forces, having placed his Elephants in the Front, which kind of Auxiliaries the Romans then first used, as having many of them which they took in the Punic War. But seeing the Enemy lay still within their Bullwark, coming up thither, he reproached them for their Cowardise; and since even by that means he could not provoke them to fight, he, considering, that, whilst their Camps were so near to one another, it would be dangerous Foraging (for the Enemies Horse would soon set upon his Souldiers as they dispersed themselves about the Country) removed his Camp about eight thousand paces from thence, to a place called Ostolophus, where he might get Provisions with greater safety. But when the Romans were a Foraging in an adjacent place, the King at first kept his men within their Works, that the Enemy might grow more negligent and bold. Whom when he saw come forth in vast numbers, he marched forth in haste, with all his Horse, and the Cretan Auxiliaries, as fast as the swiftest Foot could keep pace with them that rode, and got with his Ensigns between the Foragers and the Roman Camp. Where dividing his Forces he sent some in pursuit of the straggling Foragers, with a charge, to leave never a man of them alive; and with the rest himself staid behind to block up all the Avenues, by which he thought the Enemies might return to their Camp. Now therefore there was nothing but death and flying for it all over the Country; nor was there as yet any one, that came back to the Roman Camp to bring the news of it: because those that ran homeward fell into the hands of the Kings men, and there were more slain by them that blocked up the passes, than those that were sent out for the purpose. But at last some, that escaped through the midst of the Enemies, being in a consternation themselves, occasioned a Tumult rather than brought any certain Relation of it into the Camp.

The Consul commanding the Horse to relieve those distressed persons all wayes that they XXXVII. possibly could, himself drew the Legions out of the Camp, in a square Body, up to the Enemy; whilst the Horsemen, who were dispersed about the Fields, ran to and fro out of the way, being deceived by different noises that they heard from contrary places. But part of them met the Enemy, and they fought them in several places at the same time. The Kings Party made the fiercest resistance; for that was not only of it self almost a compleat Army for multitude of Horse and Foot, but a great many Romans also, because it lay in the mid way, were got among them. The Macedonians too had the better of it upon another account; because the King himself was present to encourage them. The Cretan Auxiliaries likewise wounded a great many by surprize, as being set in close order and prepared to fight against men that were dispersed and confused. Now had they observed any measure in their pursuit, they might have advantaged themselves, not only in respect to the glory of that present conflict, but the whole menage of the War: but following on too eagerly out of a greedy desire they had to kill the Enemy, they light upon the Roman Cohorts, or Regiments, that were gone before along with the Tribunes of the Souldiers. Then the flying Horsemen also, when they first saw the Roman Ensigns, turned back upon the Foe, who came in disorder after them; so that the Fortune of the Battle was quite changed all in a moment, and they ran away who so lately were in pursuit. By this means many of them, who stood to it, were slain, and many others, as they fled away. Nor did they only die by the Sword, but several of them being thrown into the Fens perished, they and their Horses, in the deep mud. The King also was in danger, for his Horse being wounded, with whom he fell Headlong to the ground, he had like to have been caught whilst he was down: but a Trooper saved him, who immediately himself alighted and mounted the King upon his Horse. The Trooper

Trooper afterward being not able, on Foot, to keep pace with the flying Horse, was cut to pieces by the Enemy, who came up with greater speed when they saw the King fall. The King when he had rode all about the Fenns, both pervious and pathless, in great consternation, at last, though most people despaired ever again to see him alive, came safe to the Camp. Two hundred Macedonians perished in that fight, about an hundred were taken, and eighty Horses very well caparison'd, were brought thence, with spoils of Armour at the same time.

XXXVIII There were some, who this day accused the King of rashness and the Consul of sloth. For they say, That Philip should have lain still, when he knew, That the Enemy, by exhausting all the Forage round about them, would, in a few dayes, have been reduced to extrem want: and that the Consul, when he had routed the Enemies Horse and Light armour, and almost taken the King himself, ought to have marched immediately to the Enemies Camp: for that, in such a consternation, they would not have continued there, but he might have made an end of the War in a moment. But that was easier, as most other things are, to say than to do. For if the King had engaged with all his Foot Forces too, perhaps, amidst the tumult, when they all, being conquer'd and terrified, had ran out of the Battle into their Works, over which the Enemy would probably have pursued them, the King might have been forced out of his Camp. But now, since all his Foot stayed behind in the Camp, and that there were Guards and Sentinels planted before the Gates, and in all convenient places, what would the Consul have done, but imitated the rashness of the King, who a little before, ran out in pursuit of the Roman Horse in such confusion? For even the Kings first design, when he attacked the Foragers that were dispersed about the Fields, was not to be found fault with, if he had set any bounds to his success. But 'tis the less to be wonder'd at, why he should try his Fortune for this reason also, because he had heard, That Pleuratus and the Dardans, were come with vast numbers out of their own Territories into Macedonia: with whose Forces if he should have been surrendred, it might have been supposed that the Romans would with ease have made an end of the War. Wherefore Philip, believing that, after two unfortunate Engagements with his Horse, his stay in the same Camp would be much more dangerous, and having a mind to remove without the Enemies knowledge, he sent an Herald, before Sun-setting, to the Consul, to desire a Truce for so long as he could bury his dead Horsemen; but cheated the Enemy, and went away silently at the second Watch, leaving many Fires behind him through all his Camp.

XXXIX. The Consul was now refreshing himself, when the news was brought to him, that the Herald was come, and what he came for. But he having only this Answer given him, That the next morning he should have his Audience, the King had what he desir'd, that night and part of the next day being given him to make his advance. He therefore marched over the Mountains, where he knew the Romans with their heavy Armour would not come. The Consul at break of day, having granted the Truce and dismissed the Herald, when he perceived, not long after, that the Enemy was gone, not knowing which way to follow him, spent some dayes in the same place a Foraging. After that, he removed to Stuberæ, and gathered all the Corn that was in the Country together out of Pelagonia. Thence he went forward to Pellina, having not yet found out, whither the Enemy was gone. In the mean time Philip who Encamped first of all at Bryannum, went thence cross the Country, and put the Enemy into a sudden fright. The Romans therefore moved from Pellina, and pitched their Camp by the River Osphagus. The King also himself fate down not far from that place, having drawn a Line upon the Banks of the River, which the Inhabitants call Erigonum. From whence, being told for certain, that the Romans would march toward Eordæa, he went before, to seize the streights, lest the Enemy should get through that pass which was so narrowly inclosed. And there he blocked up some places with a Bullwark, some with a Trench, some with heaps of Stones, in the nature of a Wall, and others with whole Trees, as the place required, or materials lay convenient for him; making the way (as he thought) which in its own nature was very rough, by Works that he raised in all the Avenues, unpassable. There were a great many Woody places all about, very incommmodious to the Macedonian Phalanx especially [i.e. a Body of Souldiers of a form peculiar to the Macedonians] who, unless they could keep their long Spears like a Bullwark before their Shields (which to do would require an open Plain) were of no use at all. Their Swords also, which were of such a vast length, among the Branches of the Trees, that stood in their way on all sides, hindered the Thracians. The Cretan Regiment only was of use to them; and yet even that too, as, when an Horse or its Rider lay open to them, they could hit them with their Darts, so against the Roman Shields, they had neither force enough to strike through, nor were their Bodies exposed in any part to that kind of Artillery. Wherefore, when they found by experience that to be a foolish sort of Weapons, they set upon the Enemy with Stones that lay in great quantities all over the Vale. That clattering upon their Shields, which made more noise than Wounds, detained the Romans for some time as they were coming up. But soon after despising such trifles, they went part of them with their Shields close over their Heads, through the opposing Enemies; and part of them who going a little about had got to the top of the Hill, forced the frightened Macedonians from their Posts, and, and, since the places thereabout were so rough, that they could not escape, cut off a great many of them.

The Consul therefore, having passed the streights with less opposition than he proposed to himself, he marched into Eordæa; where, when they had waited all the Country, he went into Elimeæ. Thence he made an inroad into Orestis [a Country] and attack'd a Town called Celetrum, situate in a Peninsula [Land that is almost an Island, save only one neck, that joins it to the Continent] about which Town there is a Lake, except on one side, where a strait neck of Land leads you to the Continent. The Inhabitants therefore at first, relying upon the very situation of the place, refused to submit, and shut their Gates; but soon after, when they saw the Ensigns coming near, and that the Romans were got, by putting their shields close over their Heads [which they call'd, Tektada, as looking somewhat like the back of a Tortoise, or rather, a multitude of Tortoises join'd together] up to the Gate. and that the streights were full of the Enemy, would not put it to the hazard of a fight, but were frighted into a surrender. From Celetrum he went on into the Country of the Dassaretians, where he took the City Pelium by storm, carrying thence all the slaves with other Booty, but dismiss'd the freemen without ransom, and gave them their Town again, not but that he put a strong guard into it, because it was very conveniently situate for the making IncurSIONS into Macedonia. Thus having marched through all the Enemies Dominions, the Consul led his forces back into peaceful Places about Apollonia, whence the War first began. For the Ætolians, the Athamans, the Dardans, and so many several Wars breaking out in divers places one upon the neck of another, had diverted Philip; who, in opposition to the Dardans, that were now marching out of Macedonia, sent Athenagoras with his nimblest Foot and the greater part of his Horse, commanding him to lye very hard upon their rear, and pressing them behind to make their army the more slow in their motion forward home. Damocritus the Prætor, who had formerly occasioned that delay in their resolutions concerning a War at Naupactum, had now himself in the next Council perswaded the Ætolians to take up Arms; after he had heard of the Horses engaging at Oolophus; the coming over of the Dardans and Pleuratus with the Illyrians into Macedonia; the arrival of the Roman Fleet at Oreum, and, against so many Macedonian Countries as lye round about, a Sea siege also near at hand.

These reasons brought Damocritus and the Ætolians over to the Romans; and thereupon marching, forced, with Amynander, King of the Athamans, joyned to them, they besieged Cercinium. The Inhabitants had shut their Gates, whether by force or freely, is uncertain, because they had a party of the Kings Soldiers to guard their Town. However, within a few days, Cercinium was taken and burnt. Those that survived out of that great Massacre, were carry'd away, both slaves and free-men too, among the rest of the booty. That terrible news made all those that lived round the fenn Bæbe, leave their Cities and fly into the Mountains. But the Ætolians, for want of plunder, departed thence and went into Perrhæbia, where they took Cyretia by storm, and rifled it in a miserable manner; but accepted of a voluntary surrender and an alliance with the Inhabitants of Malleæ. From Perrhæbia Amynander advised them to go to Gomphi, to which City Athamania is so near, that they might take it without any great difficulty. Then the Ætolians made toward the fertile Fields of Theffaly for plunders sake; and Amynander followed them, though he did not approve either of their exorbitant devastations, or the pitching of their Camp at a venture in any place, without any distinction, or care to fortifie it. Wherefore, lest their rashness and negligence might be the cause of any miscarriage to him and his Men, when he saw them encamping in the Plains under the City Phecadum, he seiz'd a bank a little more than five Hundred Paces from thence, though defended with no great fortification whereupon to post his Soldiers. Now since the Ætolians, save that they plundered all before them, did not seem to think they were in an Enemies Country; some of them stragling half-arm'd about the Fields, and the rest, who lay in the Camp without any Guards, sleeping and drinking, turning the day into night, Philip surpriz'd them. Of whose coming, when some that were in the Fields came trembling to bring the news, Damocritus and the rest of the Commanders were in a great fright, it being then noon, as it fell out, when many of them, whose Bellies were full, were fallen asleep. At that news therefore they waked one another, and bad them take up their Arms, sending some to call those back who were straggled for forage about the Country. And thereupon so great was their consternation, that some of the Horsemen went out without their Swords, and many of them did not put on their Coats of Mail. Thus being hurried forth, scarce full six Hundred in all, both Horse and Foot, they light into the hands of the Kings Horse, who were too many for them every way. Wherefore they were defeated at the first onset; and having scarce offered to fight, ran shamefully back to their Camp; though some of them, which the Horse intercepted from the body of those that fled, were slain and taken.

Philip, when his Men were come near to the Bulwark, ordered the Trumpets to sound a retreat; for the Horses and their Riders too were both tyred, not only with fighting, but with the length of their Marches and their extraordinary haste that they made. Wherefore he commanded the Horse to go by Troops, and, in their turns, the maniples of light-armour, to water and to dinner; keeping some still with him, expecting the coming of the Foot who marched much slower, by reason of the weight of their Arms. Who when they came, he ordered them too, that, setting up their Ensigns, and laying down their Arms before them, they would immediately refresh themselves, sending two and two, or three and three, at most, out of the Mamples to water together; whilst the Horse and Light-Armour stood ready Array'd, if the Enemy should move one way or other. The Ætolians (for now that multitude which had been scattered about the Fields, was come again into the Camp) set Guards about the Bullwark and the Gates, as though they would have secured their Fortifications, and were themselves very much animated to see, from that safe station, their Enemies lye so still. But when the Macedonian Ensigns were removed, so that they began to come in Battalia toward the Bullwark, the Ætolians presently all left their Posts, and, through the hinder-part of the Camp ran to the Bank, into the Athamanean Camp; in which confused flight, many of them were taken and slain. Philip not doubting, but that, if he had had Day-light enough, he might have forced the Athamaneans out of their Camp, having spent that day in the Battle first, and then in plundering the Ætolian Camp, sat down under a Bank in the adjacent Plain, resolving next Morning, as soon as it was light, to set upon the Enemy. But the Ætolians, in the same fright wherein they had left their own Camp, the next Night fled thence dispersed several wayes. Amynder was most useful, by whose Conduct the Athamaneans, who knew the wayes over those high Mountains, through paths unknown to all Mankind besides, whilst the Enemy pursued them, marched into Ætolia. Some few, that ran they knew not whither, fell into the hands of the Macedonian Horse, whom Philip had sent at break of day (as soon as he saw the Bank forsaken) to pursue the Enemy.

XLIII. At that time also Athenagoras, the Kings Prefect, having over-taken the Dardans, as they were going home, first put their Reer into disorder: though afterward when the Dardans had faced about and put their men into a fighting posture, they engaged as in a pitched Battle. When the Dardans began again to march forward, the Kings men teased the Dardans, (who had no such sort of Auxiliaries, but were loaded with heavy, cumbersome Armes) with their Horse and Light-Armour; besides, that the very place it self was also assitant to them. Yet but a very few of them were kill'd, though several were wounded, nor was there any man taken, because they did not go out of their Ranks, but fought and retired in close order. Thus had Philip recovered the losses that he sustained in the Roman War, by giving a check to those two Nations in these two very seasonable Expeditions, which he undertook with great Courage, and very good success. And after that too another accident lessened the number of his Ætolian Enemies. Scopas a Nobleman of that Country who was sent by King Ptolomy from Alexandria with a great quantity of gold, carried six thousand Foot and Horse, whom he hired to fight for pay, away with him to Egypt. Nor would he have left ever a young man in Ætolia, had not Damocritus, by putting them one while in mind of the present War, and another while of the future solitude (which whether he did out of care for his Country, or malice to Scopas, because he himself was not so well-bribed, is uncertain) chastized and kept part of the Juniors at home. These things were done that Summer by the Romans and Philip.

XLIV. The Navy that came from Corcyra in the beginning of that same Summer with Apustius the Lieutenant, having passed by Malca, about Scyllaeum, in the Country called Ager Hermionicus, joined King Attalus. Whereupon the City of Athens poured forth all that hatred to Philip, which for a long time through fear it had concealed, in hopes of the present aid which they were like to have. Nor are there in that City men ever wanting, that are ready to incense the people; that being a sort of Cattle, which as in all free Cities, so especially in Athens, where Eloquence is most prevalent, are cherished by the favour of the Mobile. Thereupon immediately they preferred a Bill, and the people passed it; That all the Statues and Images of Philip, with the Titles thereof, as also those of his Ancestors, both Men and Women, should be removed and defaced: and that the Festivals, sacred Rites and Priests, that had been instituted, appointed, or made in honour of him or his Ancestors, should be all profaned. That the places too, in which any thing was set up, or written, as an Inscription, in honour of him, should be accursed, nor ought after that time ever placed or dedicated in them, which was to be put or dedicated in an holy place. That their publick Priests, as often as they had occasion to pray for the people of Athens, their Allies, Armes, or Navies, should so many times detest and curse Philip, his Children, his Kingdom, and his Land and Sea-Forces, together with all the whole race and name of the Macedonians. To which Decree there was this addition made; That if any man, after that time, should propose any thing, that tended to the stigmatizing, or dishonouring of Philip, the people of Athens would admit of it every syllable, be it what it would; and that if any one, on the contrary, should say or do any thing to take off ignominy from him, or to his honour, he that killed such a person, should be acquitted of course. The last Clause was; That all those things, that had been formerly decreed against the Pisistratidæ [or Family of Pisistratus, a Tyrant of Athens] should be in force against Philip. But the Athenians waged War against Philip by Letters and words only, in which alone their strength lies.

XLV. Attalus and the Romans, being gone from Hermione to Piræus, when they had stayed there some few days, and were as much offended at the immoderate honours bestowed upon their their Allies, as at the Decrees which the enraged Athenians made against the Enemy, they sailed from Piræus to Andrus. Where as they rode in the Port called Gaureleon, they sent certain Messengers, to try the Townsmens inclinations, whether they would rather voluntarily surrender their City, or stand a bruff for it. But they returning Answer, that the King had a Garrison in their Castle, so that they were not at their own disposal, the King and the Roman Lieutenant, when they had landed their men and all the Engines which they had for the attacking of Towns, drew near to the City at several distant places. The Roman Ensigns and Arms, which before that time they never saw, together with the spirit of the Souldiers, coming so briskly up to their Walls, put the Greeks into a greater fright than ordinary. Wherefore they ran immediately into the Castle; so that the Enemy took possession of the City; but when they had continued in the Castle for the space of two days, relying upon the strength of the place, more than their own Arms, both they and the Garrison yielded upon condition, That they might be transported with each of them one Garment to Delium in Beotia. The City it self then the Romans delivered to King Attalus; but themselves carried away the spoil and Ornaments thereof. Attalus, lest the Island should be totally deserted, persuaded most of the Macedonians, and some of the Andrians, to stay there. After that, those persons, who by compact had been transported to Delium, were recalled by the Kings Promises, as being the more inclined to believe him, because they had a mind to return into their own native Country. From Andrus they crossed over to Cythus; where having spent some dayes to no purpose in attacking the City, seeing it was scarce worth their while to take it, they went their wayes. At Prasie (a Town upon the Continent in Attica) twenty Ships of the Issians were joined to the Roman Fleet, which were sent to plunder the Carystian Territories. The rest of the Navy lay at Garestum, a famous Port of Eubœa, till the Issians returned from Carystum. Then all of them setting Sail together, through the main Ocean, passed by the Island of Scyros, and arrived at Icu. Where being detained some few dayes by a strong Northwind, as soon as the weather grew a little calmer, they put over to Scyathus, a City that Philip had lately ruined and rifled. There the Souldiers, stragling about the Fields, brought back to their Ships all the Corn and other things that they found fit to eat. But there was no plunder left, nor had the Greeks deserved to be rifled. Thence going to Cassandra, they first took Mendis, a Village on the Sea-Coast belonging to that City: and then, having passed the Cape, in order to bring their Fleet about to the very Walls of the City, they were almost drowned in a storm which then arose; by which means being dispersed, and having lost a great part of their Artillery, they got as fast as they could ashore. That Tempest too was an omen [a foreboding sign] to them to make them fight by Land. When therefore they had gathered all their Ships into one place, they landed their men, and attacked the City, but being repulsed with many Wounds (for there was in it a strong Garrison of the Kings) they retreated from that vain Enterprize, and went over to Canastum in Pallene. From whence passing by the Cape of Torona, they sailed towards Acanthus. Where having first wasted the Country, and then taken the City it self by storm, they plundered it. Then going no farther forward (for their Ships were already laden with spoils) they returned to Scyathus, and thence for Eubœa, from whence they came.

Then leaving their Fleet there they entered the Malian Bay with ten Ships, to go and confer with the Ætolians about the management of the War. Sipyrrhicus an Ætolian was the chief person employed in that Embassy, who came to Heraclea to advise with the King and the Roman Lieutenant. Attalus was required, according to the League, to send out a thousand men: for he owed them that number now that they had engaged in a War against Philip. But that was refused; because the Ætolians themselves had formerly showed themselves very backward to go and plunder Macedonia, at that time, when Philip being a burning up all things both sacred and profane about Pergamus, they might have drawn him thence to defend his own Country. By this means the Ætolians were dismissed with hopes rather than aid, though the Romans promised them all the assistance that could be. Apustius returned with Attalus to the Fleet; where they began to consult about the taking of Oreum; a City very well fortified, not only with Walls, but, because it had been formerly attempted, with a strong Garrison too. Twenty Rhodian Ships, with close Decks [men of War] had joined them after the taking of Andrus, under the Command of the Prefect [Admiral] Agessimbrotius; which Fleet they ordered to Harbour at Zelasum (a Cape of Isthmia, opportunely seated on the other side above Demetrias) that if the Macedonian Ships should move from thence, they might secure those parts. Heracles the Kings Admiral was with his Fleet at Demetrias; but resolved to make no attempt by force so much as upon occasion, if, through the Enemies negligence, he had an opportunity. The Romans and King Attalus attacked Oreum in several places, the Roman upon that side, where the Castle stands to the Sea, and the Kings men against the Valley which lies between the two Castles, where the City is also divided by a Wall. And as their Posts were distant, so also the matter of their attacke was very different. For the Romans used Tortoises [sheds of Boards to keep off Arrows, &c.] and Hurdles, with battering Rams, which they applied to the Walls; whilst the Kings men used Cross-Bows, huge Slings, and all other sorts of Warlike-Engines, throwing vast Stones, and making Mines, with all other devices that they had tried in the former attack.

But

But now there were not only more Macedonians there than before, to defend that City, but they had likewise more Courage, having been chastized by the King for their former fault, and being mindful of both his threats and promises for the future: insomuch that the Romans had little hopes so suddenly to take it. Wherefore the Lieutenant thinking it the best way to employ himself elsewhere in the mean time, left men enough to finish the Works, and so crossed over into the adjacent parts of the Continent: where he, by his sudden arrival took Larissa (not that famous City, so called, in Thessaly, but another, whom they name Cremaste) all but the Castle. Attalus also surprized Ageleon, whilst the Inhabitants, at the time when the other City was besieged, feared nothing less. But when the Works at Oreum were finished, the Garrison within being quite tired out with continual labour, and watching day and night, besides their Wounds, part of their Wall also was struck down with a battering Ram, and had gaps in it at several places. So that the Romans brake through in the night time over those ruined places, and another way above the Port into the Castle. Attalus at break of day, having the signal given him by the Romans, himself also marched into the City, after the Walls were part of them demolished. Whereupon the Townsmen and the Garrison fled into the other Castle, from whence two days after they made a Surrender. The City fell to the Kings share, but the Captives to the Romans.

XLVII. By this time it was the Autumnal Equinox; and the Eubæan Bay, which they call Cela, is look'd upon by the Mariners as a dangerous place at that time to pass. Wherefore desiring to get out of it before the stormy Winter came, they went back to Pyræus, from whence they had set out to the War. Apollonius, having left thirty Ships there, sailed by Malea to Corcyra; but the King stayed till the Initia [Feasts celebrated in honour of Ceres] were over, because he had a mind to be present at that solemnity. Which being over, he likewise went back into Asia, having sent Agememnon and the Rhodians home again. These things were done that Summer by Sea and Land against Philip, and his Allies, by the Roman Consul and Lieutenant, with the assistance of King Attalus and the Rhodians. The other Consul, C. Aurelius, when he was come into the Province at the conclusion of the War, did not conceal his animosity against the Prætor, for having carryed on the business in his absence. Wherefore, sending him into Etruria, he himself led the Legions into the Enemies Country, and pillaging all before him, made War upon them so as to gain more spoils than glory by it. L. Furius, besides that he had nothing to do in Etruria, had a great desire to triumph for his Conquest over Gaul; which he thinking he might the more easily obtain in the Consuls absence, came unexpectedly to Rome, and had a Senate summoned in the Temple of Bellona; where having told what exploits he had done, he desired, That he might ride into the City in Triumph.

XLVIII. With great part of the Senate he prevailed not only upon the score of what mighty things he had done, but the favour which they had for him. But the Seniors all denied his Triumpling; not only because he had acted with another mans Army, but also, because he had left the Province out of a greedy desire of stealing an opportunity to triumph: for which he had no precedent. The Consular Party especially said, That he ought to stay till the Consul came. For he might by pitching his Camp before the City, and being as a Guard upon the Colony, have chosen to fight, and protracted the time till the Consul had come; and therefore what he, as Prætor had not done, the Senate ought to do. Wherefore they desired, that they would stay till the Consul came; because, when they heard the Consul and Prætor both Face to Face they might better judge of the case. But great part of the Senate were of opinion, that they ought only to take notice of nothing more, than whether he did such and such things whilst he was invested with lawful authority, and by his own conduct. For (said they) when of two Colonies, that were set up as barriers to restrain the tumults in Gaul, the one was rifled and burnt, and the fire like to catch, as it were among contiguous Houses, in the other Colony, which was so near it, what could the Prætor do? For if he must have done nothing without the Consul, either the Senate were to blame who committed the Army to the Prætors Conduct (since the order of Senate, if they had been minded that the business should be done not by the Prætors but the Consuls Army, might have ended thus; That it should not be managed by the Prætor but by the Consul) or the Consul, who, when he had ordered his Army to march out of Etruria into Gaul, did not meet it at Ariminum, that he might have been present in that War, which could not lawfully be managed in his absence. That the time of War could not endure long waiting, and the delays of every Commander: and a man must fight sometimes, not because he had a mind to it, but because the Enemy forces him. That the fight it self and the event of it ought to be considered. That the Enemy was routed and slain, their Camp taken and rifled, and the Colony delivered from the Siege; the Captives belonging to the other Colony recovered and restored to their Friends again, and that the War was made an end of in one Battle. That not only men rejoiced at that Victory, but there were supplications also made to the immortal Gods for three dayes together: and that the publick business was well and happily, not basely and rashly managed by L. Furius the Prætor, to whose Family the fates themselves seemed to commit the Conduct of the Gallick Wars.

XLIX. With this kind of Speeches made by himself and his Friends in favour of the Prætor, who was then present, was the majesty of the absent Consul overcome: and the Senate decreed in full Assembly, that L. Furius should triumph. Thereupon L. Furius the Prætor rode in Triumph

Triumph whilst he was yet in his Office. He brought into the Treasury three hundred and twenty thousand pounds of Brass money, and of Silver a hundred and seventy thousand pounds; but there were neither any Captives led before his Chariot, nor spoils carried before him, nor Souldiers that followed after. For it was evident, that all other things, except the Victory, belonged to the Consul. Then those Games, which P. Cornelius Scipio had vowed to set forth when he was Pro-Consul in Africa, were performed with great preparation. And then also there was a Decree made concerning his Souldiers, that look how many years each of them had served in Spain or Africa, they should for each year have two Acres of Land apiece; which Land the Decemviri should set out. After that C. Terentius Varro, L. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Cornelius Scipio, the Son of Cneius, were made Triumviri, to supply and make up the number of the Venusine Colony, because in the War with Annibal the strength of that place was much impaired. They therefore sent more fresh Inhabitants to Venusia. The same Year C. Cornelius Cethegus, who was Pro-Consul in Spain, defeated a great Army of the Enemies in the Sedetane Dominions. 'Tis said, that there were fifteen thousand Spaniards slain in that Battle, and seventy eight military Ensigns taken. C. Aurelius the Consul, being come from his Province to Rome to hold the Assembly, did not complain, as they thought he would have done, That he was not expected or stayed for by the Senate, so that he might have had the opportunity of discoursing with the Prætor face to face: but that the Senate had Decreed a Triumph in such a manner, that they would not hear any man but him who was to triumph; no not those that had been engaged in the War. That their Ancestors therefore appointed the Lieutenants, Tribunes of the Souldiers, Centurions and private Sentinels also to be present at each Triumph, that the truth of those things that he had done, who had that honour paid him, might publicly appear. Instead of which, there had not been (not only never a Souldier, but not) so much as a Snapjack Boy of that Army which had fought with the Gauls, whom the Senate could ask, what truth or falsehood the Prætor had told them. Then he set the day for the Assembly, in which L. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Villius Tappulus, were chosen Consuls: L. Quintius Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, and Cn. Babius Tampilus being then also created Prætors.

Provisions also were that year very cheap: for M. Claudius Marcellus, and Sex. Aelius Patrus distributed a great quantity of Corn among the people at two Asses a Bushel; and set forth the Roman Games with great preparation, which they were a whole day in performing: laying five brazen Ensigns, made out of the mulct-money, up in the Treasury. The Plebeian Games too were all played thrice over by L. Terentius Massa, and Cn. Babius Tampilus, the Ædiles, the latter of which two was designed for Prætor. There were likewise Funeral Games performed that Year for four dayes together in the Forum, upon the account of M. Valerius Leuinus's Death, by his two Sons, Publius and Marcus, with a Fencing prize by them also set up, at which there were twenty five pair of Combatants. Then also M. Aurelius Cotta, Decemvir of the sacred Rites, died; in whose place they put Manius Acilius Glabrio. At that Assembly also there were by chance both the Curule Ædiles chosen, who could not immediately enter upon their Office. For C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his absence, when he was at his Province in Spain: and C. Valerius Flaccus, whom they had created whilst present, because he was Flamen Dialis [or Jupiter's High-Priest] could not swear to observe the Laws: now it was not lawful for any man to bear any Office above five dayes, but he that had sworn to keep the Laws. Wherefore when Flaccus desired to be acquitted from the obligation of the Laws, the Senate decreed, That if the Ædile would provide such a person, as the Consuls should approve of, to swear for him, the Consuls if they thought fit, should treat with the tribunes of the people, in order to refer it to the people. Thereupon he produced his Brother Valerius, who was designed to be Prætor, to swear for him: and then the Tribunes proposed the matter to the people, who resolved, That it should be as good, as if the Ædile himself had sworn. Touching the other Ædile also there was an Act made by the Commons (at the request of the Tribunes, to know what two they would send into Spain, with Commission to the Armies) that C. Cornelius, the Curule Ædile, should come home to bear his Office, and that L. Manlius Acidinus should depart that Province after many years continuance there; Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and L. Stertinus being ordered to go into Spain with the Commission and Character of Pro-Consuls.

DECADE IV. BOOK II.

The E P I T O M E.

1. There are a great many Prodigies spoken of in divers Countries. 9. Among which, that in the Poop of a long Ship in Macedonia, a Laurel-Tree sprung up. T. Quintius Flaminius, being Consul, fought with success against Philip in the streights of Epirus. 12, 13. Whom Quintius having defeated, forced to return into his own Kingdom again. The same Quintius harassed that part of Thessaly which Borders upon Macedonia, by the assistance of the Aetolians and Athamans. L. Quintius Flaminius, the Consuls Brother, took all Euboea and the Sea-Coast in the Sea-fight, with the help of King Attalus, and the Rhodians. The Achæans were taken again into favour. 20, 23. The Conspiracy entered into by the Slaves, to free the Carthaginian Hostages, was frustrated. 26. The number of the Prætors was augmented, so as that there were six chosen. Cornelius Cethegus being Consul routed the Insubrian Gauls in a Battle that he had with them. 30. They made an alliance with the Lacedæmonians, and their Tyrant Nabis. Afterward you have several relations of Cities that were taken in Macedonia.

I. THE Consuls and Prætors, having entered upon their several Offices on the Ides of March, had their several Provinces allotted to them. L. Lentulus had Italy, and P. Villius Macedonia: the Prætors, L. Quintius, the City, Cn. Bebius Ariminum, L. Valerius Sicily, and L. Villius Sardinia. Lentulus the Consul was ordered to raise new Legions, and Villius to take the Army from P. Sulpicius: and had leave (to make up the complement thereof) to raise as many Souldiers, as he thought good. The Prætor Bebius had those Legions which C. Aurelius the Consul had so committed to him, that he was to keep them till another Consul came with a new Army. Who as soon as he should come into Gaul, that all the old Souldiers should be disbanded and sent home, excepting five thousand of the Allies; they being enough to Guard the Province about Ariminum. The Prætors of the Year foregoing were continued in Commission; Cn. Sergius, that he might take care for the assigning of their shares of Land to those Souldiers who had served for many years in Spain, Sicily and Sardinia: and Q. Minucius, that he might make an end of those Inquisitions concerning the Conspiracies, which, when he was Prætor, he with so much fidelity and care, had been employed in: and to send those, whom he had convicted and caused to be carried Prisoners to Rome, to Locri, to receive their punishment; taking care likewise, that what had been taken out of the Temple of Proserpine, might be restored with expiatory Sacrifices for that crime. The Latine Festivals were renewed by Decree of the Chief Priests: because the Ardean Embassadors had complained in the Senate, That they who were Latines had not flesh given them in the Alban Mount, as they were used to have. Then there was news brought from Snesia, that the two Gates, and the Wall between them, were burnt by lightning; but by the Formian Embassadors, that Jupiters Temple, and so likewise by the Ostians, that Jupiters Temple with them was so burnt; but from Velitra, that Apollos and Sanguis Temples both were so served; and that hair grew up in the Temple of Hercules. From the Bruttians Q. Minucius the Pro-Prætor wrote word, that there was a Colt foaled with five Feet, and three Cock- Chickens with three Feet apiece. After which there was a Letter came from P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consul out of Macedonia, in which among other things there was this remark, that a Laurel-Tree sprung up in the poop of a Ship.

II. Upon the account of the former Prodigies the Senate ordered, That the Consul should make the greater sort of Sacrifices to what Gods he thought good: but for the last only the Soothsayers were called into the Senate, and according to their Answer supplication was appointed to be made one whole day, and religious duties were perform'd at every Altar and Temple in the City. The Carthaginians first brought the money, imposed upon them as a stipend for the Souldiery, that year to Rome. Which money seeing the Questors declared to be nought, and having tryed it found the fourth part to fly away, the Carthaginians were fain to borrow money at Rome, to make up what was lacking. Whereupon when they desired that their Hostages, if the Senate pleased, might be restored to them, an hundred of them were accordingly sent home: besides, that they gave them hopes of having the rest, if they continued faithful to the Romans. And when those Hostages, that were not restored, desired, that they might be carried from Norba, where they were uneasy, to any other place, the Senate gave them leave to remove to Signia and Ferentinum. The Gaditanes also, upon their Petition, had the immunity granted them, not to have a Prefect or Governour sent to their Town of Gadeis, contrary to the Agreement between them and L. Marcus Septimus, when they first put themselves under the protection of the Romans. And when the Narnian Embassadors complained, that they had not their full number of Inhabitants, but that there were some got in among them, who, though they were not of their race, pretended to be part of the Colony, L. Cornelius the Consul was ordered to create Triumviri upon the score of those matters. Accordingly he created P. and Sextus Atilius (whose Surnames both were Patris) and Cornelius Lentulus.

Lentulus. But though the Petition of the Narnians, wherein they desired to have their Colonies number augmented, was allowed, the Cofans met not with the same success in the same affair.

When they had made an end of what they had to do at Rome, the Consuls went to their Provinces, P. Villius, at his coming into Macedonia, was received with a fierce mutiny among the Soldiers, which having been sometime before raised, had not been sufficiently stilled in the beginning. Those were the two Thousand Men, that had been brought out of Africa, after Annibal was quite vanquished, into Sicily, and thence almost an Year into Macedonia for Volunteers. But they said they were not willing to come, For they drew back when the Tribunes were going to put them a-board; but however, whether they had put themselves into that service by force or free-will, they had born the brunt of it, and now it was time to put some end to that Campaign. That they had not seen Italy in many Years, but were grown old under their armour in Sicily, Africa, and Macedonia. That they were quite tired out with labour and toil, having lost all the blood in their veins through the wounds that they received. To which the Consul said, They gave a good reason for their being disbanded, if they had made their address with modesty; but that, neither that, nor any thing else could be the just cause of a mutiny among them. Wherefore, if they would stay by their Ensigns, and obey him, he would write to the Senate touching their being dismiss'd, and that they would obtain their ends by modesty sooner than by stubbornness.

At that time Philip attacked Thaumaci [a Town] as fiercely as he could with Mounds and Engines planted against it; yea, was just going to apply his ram to the Walls, but was forced from his enterprize by a sudden fall of the Aetolians, who, under the command of Archidamus, having got through the Macedonian Sentinels into the Walls, made constant eruptions night and day, one while upon the Guards, and another while into the Works. In which the very nature of the place was assistant to them. For Thaumaci is situate, as you go from Pyla and the Malian Bay through Lamia, on an high place, just by the streights called Gale. And if you travel over the rougher parts of Thessaly, where the Roads are hard to find, they will so strangely through the several Vallies there; when you come to this City, there is such a large Plain laid open, as it were a vast calm Sea, before your view, that you can hardly see to the end of it. From which strange situation of that Town it is called Thaumaci [from Thauuma, i. e. a Wonder]. Nor is this City secure in its height only, but also by its being seated upon a steep Rock cut smooth on every side. These difficulties, and its not being worth so much toil and hazard, made Philip desist from the attempt. Besides, it was now just Winter too, when he departed thence, and led his Forces back to Winter Quarters in Macedonia.

And there the rest all the time they had to rest themselves, refreshed both their Minds and their Bodies; but Philip, by being at ease from the daily fatigues of marching and fighting, was so much the more intent upon, and solicitous for, the general event of the War; not only fearing the Enemies, that press'd him both by Sea and Land, but being jealous of the affections, sometimes of his Allies, and otherwhiles of his own Countrymen; lest the former should revolt out of hopes of an alliance with the Romans; or the latter be desirous to make any Innovation. Wherefore he sent Embassadors into Achaia also, not only to exact an Oath from that People (for so they had agreed, To swear fealty to Philip every year) but likewise to restore to the Achæans, Orchomenon, Heraa, and Triphylia; and to the Megalopolitans, Aliphera, being they challenged it and said, It never was a City belonging to Triphylia, but ought to be restored to them, because it was one of those that were allotted to the building of Megalopolis. By which means he confirmed his alliance with the Achæans. Then he reconciled the Macedonians with Heraclides. For seeing that he was the greatest grievance in all his Kingdom, as being loaded with so many accusations, he put him in Prison, to the great joy of all the People. After which he made preparations for the War with as much care as ever he had done in all his time before, and disciplined both the Macedonians and the mercenary Soldiers; sending, in the beginning of the Spring, all the foreign Auxiliaries, with what light armour he had, under the command of Athenagoras through Epirus into Chaonia, to seize those streights near Antigonis, which the Greeks call Sthena [i. e. narrow passes]. And himself in a few days after following with an heavier Army; when he had viewed all the situation of the Country, he thought the fittest place to encamp in, to be by the River Aous. Which River runs between the two Mountains, one of which the Natives call Aëropus, and the other Asinaus, in a narrow Vale, with a very strait passage upon the bank of it. And of those Hills, he ordered Athenagoras to take possession of, and to fortifie Asinaus, whilst he himself pitched his Camp in Aëropus. Where the Rocks were smooth and steep, a small guard was kept; but where it was less secure, he fortified some parts with Trenches, some with Bulwarks, and others with Turrets. There was also a great quantity of Engines (that they might be able at a distance to repel the Foe) planted in convenient places; besides that the Kings Tent was set before the Bulwark on the top of the Hill, for a terrour to the Enemy, and an encouragement to his own Men.

The Consul, being informed by Charopus an Epirote, where the King with his Army lay, after he had wintered in Corcyra, came in the beginning of the Spring over into the Continent, and marched toward the Enemy. When he was about five Thousand Paces from the Kings Camp, leaving his Legions in a fortified Place, himself went forward with the number of his Men to view the Country, and the next day held a Council, to advise, Whether he should attempt to make his way through the Streights that the Enemy was then possessed of, though it were like to cost him a great deal of trouble and hazard; or bring his Men about the same way that Sulpicius the year before had come into Macedonia. But whilst he was in this deliberation, which held him several days, there came a Messenger and told him, That P. Quintius was made Consul, and having by lot gain'd the Province of Macedonia, was now got over as fast as he could into Corcyra. Valerius Antias says that Villius went into those Streights, and because he could not go in a direct Road (the ways being all block'd up by the King) following the Vale, through the middle of which runs the River Aous, he made a tumultuary Bridge to the bank upon which the Kings Camp lay, and marching over it engag'd them in a set fight; that the King was routed, put to flight, and forced from his Camp; twelve Thousand of the Enemy were slain in that Battel, two Thousand two Hundred taken Prisoners, besides one Hundred thirty two military Ensigns, and two Hundred and thirty Horses. As also, that a Temple was vow'd [i. e. religiously designed to be dedicated] to Jupiter, in that Battel, if the business succeeded well. But the other Greek and Latine Authors, whose Annals I have read, do not mention any thing memorable that was done by Villius, but say also, that T. Quintius the succeeding Consul manag'd the whole War.

Kings

VII.

Whilst these things were transacted in Macedonia, the other Consul L. Lentulus, who staid at Rome, held an Assembly for the creating of Censors. Upon which occasion, though a great many famous Men stood for the Office, yet P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Atilius Patus were made Censors. These two lived very lovingly together, and took a survey of the Senate without branding e'r a one of that Society. They likewise let out the Tolls of things that were sold at Capua and Puteoli, as also the Toll of the Camp at Puteoli [that formerly was] where the Town now stands; and sent three Hundred Inhabitants thither (for that was the number appointed by the Senate) selling the Land belonging to Capua under Tifata [a Mountain]. About the same time L. Manlius Acidinus departing out of Spain, was hindered by M. Portius Leca, Tribune of the People, from coming home overt, though he had obtained the favour of the Senate; and therefore, making his entrance into the City as a private Person, he brought into the Treasury twelve hundred Pound of Silver, and near thirty Pound of Gold. The same Year Cn. Babius Tamphilus, who had received the Province of Gaul from C. Aurelius who was Consul the Year before, having entered very rashly into the Confines of the Insubrian Gauls, had like to have been circumvented with his whole Army: for he lost above six thousand six hundred men; so great a damage did he receive from that War which now began to be slighted. That accident brought L. Lentulus the Consul from the City: who as soon as he came into the Province, which was full of uproar, having received the frightened Army, he chid the Prætor very severely, bidding him depart the Province and go to Rome. But the Consul himself did not do any memorable exploit, as being called back to Rome to hold the Assembly, which was obstructed by M. Fulvius, and Manius Curius, Tribunes of the People; who would not suffer T. Quintius Flaminius to stand for the Consulship, when he was yet but Questor: saying, That noble men now nascent the Aediles and Prætors Office, nor did they by degrees of honour, and approving themselves in several Stations rise gradually to the Consulship, but by leaping over the middle continued the highest to the lowest employments. From a Debate in the Campus Martius the business came into the Senate; who gave their opinions and said, they thought it reasonable, that the people should have full power to chose whom they pleased, provided he desired no honour but what he lawfully might stand for. The Tribunes submitted to the Decree of the Senate: and there were chosen for Consuls T. Quintius Flaminius, and Sex. Atilius Patus. Then they held the Assembly for Prætors; in which were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Portius Cato, and C. Helvius, who had been Tribunes of the People. By them the Plebeian Games were renewed, and a Feast made to Jupiter upon the score of those Games: the Roman Games being at the same time set forth by the Curule Aediles, C. Valerius Flaccus, Jupiters High-Priest, and C. Cornelius Cethegus, with great preparation. Ser. and C. Sulpicius Galba the Chief Priests died in that Year: in whose places M. Aemilius Lepidus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio were elected, and put.

VIII.

Sex. Atilius Patus, and T. Quintius Flaminius the Consuls, at the entrance upon their Office having had a Senate in the Capitol, that Court decreed, That the Consuls should either agree between themselves, or cast Lots for the Provinces of Macedonia and Italy; and that he to whose share Macedonia fell, should raise, as a Supplement to the Legions, three Thousand Roman Foot, and three Hundred Horse; and likewise of the Latine Allies, five Thousand Foot, and five Hundred Horse. To the other Consul they assign'd all the new Forces. L. Lentulus, who was Consul the Year before, was continued in Commission, and charged not to stir out of his Province, or bring away the old Army, before the Consul came with the new Legions. The Consul then cast Lots for their Provinces; of which Atilius happened to have Italy, and Quintius Macedonia. The Prætors, L. Cornelius Merula had the City, M. Claudius, Sicily, M. Porcius, Sardinia, and C. Helvius, Gaul. Then also they began to make a Levy. For besides the consular Armies, the Prætors were also ordered to raise new Forces: for Marcellus, to go into Sicily, Sicily, four Thousand Foot of the Latine Allies, and three Hundred Horse; and for Cato, to go into Sardinia, of the same sort of Soldiers, three Thousand Foot, and two Hundred Horse; so that both these Prætors, when they were come into their Provinces, disbanded all their old Foot and Horse. After that the Consuls brought the Embassadors from King Attalus into the Senate: who having told the Court, That their King was always ready to assist the Romans with his Navy, and all the Forces he had both by Sea and Land, and had to that time done what the Roman Consuls commanded with all expedition and obedience, they added, That now, they fear'd, he could not do so any longer for King Antiochus, who had invaded Attalus's Kingdom when it was destitute of Sea and Land Forces. Wherefore, that Attalus desired the Senate, if they had a mind to employ his Navy and his other Forces in the Macedonian War, that they would themselves send a Guard to secure his Kingdom; if not, that they would permit him to return home with his Fleet and what forces he had left, to defend his own Country. To which the Senate caus'd this answer to be given, That whereas King Attalus had assisted the Roman Generals with his Fleet, and other Forces, the Senate took it very kindly; but that they would neither send any Auxiliaries to Attalus against Antiochus, who was the Ally and Friend of the Roman People; nor detain Attalus's own Auxiliaries any farther than should stand with his convenience. That the Roman People had always used foreign Soldiers according to the pleasure of those foreign Allies that sent them; and that both the beginning and end of their Action was at the disposal of them, who were so kind as to assist the Romans. But they would send Embassadors to Antiochus, to tell him, that the People of Rome did then employ Attalus his Ships and Soldiers against Philip, their common Enemy; and that he would gratifie the Senate very much, if he would not meddle any farther with Attalus's Dominions, but desist from the War. That it was fit all Kings, that were Allies and Friends of the Roman People, should preserve Peace among themselves also.

The Consul, T. Quintius, having so made the Levy, that he chose out those Soldiers of known Courage, who had served in Spain or Africa, was now making all hast into his Province, but was detain'd by Prodigies, that he heard of, being fain to stay at Rome to take care of certain Religious Duties upon that account. The publick street at Veii, and the Forum with Jupiters Temple at Luvuvium, were burnt with Lightning: Hercules's Temple at Ardea; and at Capua, the Wall, certain Turrets, and the Temple which is called Alba. At Arretium the Heavens seemed to be all on Fire: and the Earth at Velitra fell in with a vast hollow for the space of three Acres. At Sueffa Aurunca, they said, there was a Lamb with two Heads, and at Simessæ, a Pig with a Mans Head. Upon the score of those Prodigies there was a supplication made one whole day; the Consuls being employed in the performance of the Divine Rites. But having appeased the Gods they went into their Provinces. Atilius, with C. Helvius the Prætor into Gaul; and delivered the Army that he received from Lentulus, which he ought to have disbanded, to the Prætor, resolving himself to carry on the War with those new Legions, that he had brought with him: but he did nothing worth our taking notice of. T. Quintius also, the other Consul, being come over from Brundisium sooner than former Consuls were used to do, lay at Corcyra with eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse. From whence he crost over in a Fire-bank'd Gally into the Borders of Epirus, and marched toward the Roman Camp by great Journeys. Then sending away Villius, he staid some few dayes whilst his Forces came after him out of Corcyra, and held a Council: whether he should attempt to go streight through the Enemies Camp; or, not venturing upon an enterprize attended with so much trouble and danger, should rather go into Macedonia by way of the Dalfaretians and Lycus [a Town so called] a safe rode, though about. And that opinion had prevailed, had not he feared, lest, when he was so far from the Sea, by letting the Enemy escape him, if (as he had formerly) the King would defend himself in Defarts and Woods, the Summer might be spent without any action. Wherefore be it how it would be, he resolv'd in that very place, though so inconvenient for him, to attack the Foe. But indeed he resolv'd to do so, before his Council had told him, or he found out the way how he should do it: for they spent forty days without any attempt in sitting down within sight of the Enemy.

Then Philip had hopes of making a Peace through the mediation of the Epirotes, and therefore in a Council that he called, there were, for the carrying of the affair, Pausanias their chief Magistrate, and Alexander Master of the Horse, who brought the Consul and the King to a Parley at that place, where the River Aous is the narrowest. The Substance of what the Consul demanded was this; That Philip would draw out all his Guards out of the several Cities; and restore all the goods that could be found, to those persons, whose country and Cities he had plundered; and set a competent value indifferently upon the rest. To which Philip made answer; That the condition of his Cities was very different; as for those that he had taken, he would set at liberty: but as to those that were delivered to him from his Ancestours, he would never quit the just and hereditary possession of them. If those cities that he had had war with, complained of any damage by them sustained, he would reserve the arbitration of it to any people, with whom they both had peace. The Consul replied; there was no need of a Judge or Umpire in such a case; for who did not know, that the injury sprung from him, who was the first aggressor? And that Philip, though never provoked by any body whatever, was himself the original cause of all that violence, which in that war had been committed. After that, when they came to discourse of what Cities should should be set at liberty, the Consul named the Theſſalians first of all. At which the King was so incens'd with Indignation, that he cryed out, What, T. Quintius, could you injoin me to do that were more grievous, if I were a conquered King? and with that he flung away from the Parley. Thereupon they could hardly forbear from engaging each other with darts and such like Weapons at a distance, since they were parted by the River running between them. The next by excursions from their stations, there were first a great many light skirmishes in the Plain which was wide enough for that purpose; but soon after, the Kings Men retiring into the narrow and rough places thereabouts, the Romans also out of an eagerness to fight them got in thither too. On the Roman side, their Order, Military Discipline, and a sort of Arms fit to streighten the Foe, was their advantage; and on the Enemies side, the Places, the vast Engines and Cross-bows, planted upon almost all the Rocks as it were upon Walls. But when they had received a great many Wounds on both sides, and some also, as in a form'd Battel, were slain, night came on and put an end to that Fight.

XI. When things were in this posture, a certain Shepherd sent from Charopus, a Noble Man of Epirus, was brought to the Consul, who told him, That he kept sheep in that Lawne, where the King was now encamped; that he knew all the turnings and by-ways in all those Mountains. If therefore he would send a party along with him, he would lead them a very convenient easie way till they came upon the very heads of their Enemies: but told them withal, that Charopus said, He would have him give credit to what he delivered, only so far, as that the effecting of the matter might be in the Consuls, and not in the Shepherds power. Hereupon the Consul being more inclinable, than daring to believe the fellow, and having a mind fill'd both with joy and fear, he was moved by the authority of Charopus, and resolved to try the event of what was favourably offered to him. And to prevent all suspicion, he, for the next two days, continually provoked the Enemy, planting his Men on all sides, and putting fresh Men into the places of such as were tired. Then he chose out four Thousand Foot and three Hundred Horse, whom he committed to the Conduct of a Tribune of the Soldiers, bidding him lead the Horse as far as the ways would suffer it; and when the Horse could go no farther, to place them in some Plain. That the Foot should go which way the Guide directed them; and when, according to his promise, they came upon the Heads of the Enemy, they should give a sign by smoak; but not set up a shout before they had received that sign, and they might suppose thereby that the Battel was begun. He likewise ordered them to march in the night (for the Moon at that time happened to shine all Night long) and in the Day time to refresh themselves with Victuals and Sleep, delivering the Guide to the Tribune, with a great many promises of a vast reward, if he proved honest, but bound at the same time. And having thus dismiss'd these Forces, the Roman was so much the more intent upon taking the Enemies Stations.

XII. In the mean time when the Romans upon the third day made a sign with smoak, that they had taken and were then seiz'd of the Hill, which they designed, the Consul, having divided his Forces into three parts, came and stood in the midst of the Vale with the strength of all his Men, drawing the Enemies right and left Wings toward the Enemies Camp. Nor were the Enemies more slow to meet him; but whilst through their greedy desire of fighting they ran beyond their Fortifications, the Roman was far too hard for them, not only in courage and skill, but in their sort of Weapons also. But when the Kings Men, many of which were wounded and slain, retreated into places either naturally or artificially fortified, the danger turned upon the Romans, who went into places that were cumbersome, and too narrow well to receive them. Nor had they escaped thence without being punished for their rashness, had not first of all a shout which they heard behind them, and after that also the Fight which was by that time begun, made the Kings Men mad with sudden dread. Thereupon part of them ran away as fast as they could; and part of them, who stayed behind, rather because they had no way to make their escape, than out of any heart that they had to fight, were circumvented by the Foe who prest upon them both before and behind. The whole Army might have been destroyed, if the Conquerors would have pursued them that fled away; but the narrowness and roughness of those places hinder'd the Horse as their heavy armour did the Foot. The King at first fled as fast as he could in some disorder, and without looking back: but when he was got forward about five thousand paces, supposing by the roughness of the passage (as it really was) that the Enemy could not follow him, he stopt upon a certain Bank, and sent his men over all the Hills and Vales, to gather the straglers into a Body. And having lost not above two thousand men, all the rest, as though they had followed some Ensign, met together, and in a full Body marched toward Theſſaly. The Romans having pursued them as far as it was safe for them, killing and spoiling the slain, rifled the Kings Camp, which, even without any Body to defend it, was very inaccessible: and continued that night in their own Camp.

XIII. The next day the Consul pursued the Enemy through those very streights, where the River runs between the Vales. The King came at break of day to a place called Castra Pyrrhi [i. e. Pyrrhus's Camp] which is in Triphylia a part of Melotis. Thence the next day he went forward a great way (fear forcing him) to the Mountain Lingus. The Mountains of Epirus, are between Macedonia and Theſſaly, lying Westward from the latter, and Southward ward from the former; covered with frequent Woods, though on the tops of them there are large Plains and constant running streams. There the King for some dayes was Encamped, but wavered in his mind, whether he should go immediately into his own Kingdom, or return into Theſſaly. But he at last being most inclined to send his Army into Theſſaly, went the nearest way he could to Tricca, from whence he passed through the Cities that were in his rode as speedily as he might. There he raised all the men that could follow him, burnt their Towns; and gave the Owners leave to carry all they could along with them; making the rest free plunder to his Souldiers. Nor could they have suffered any thing more severe from an Enemy, than what they did from him though their Ally. For what he did was tedious even to Philip himself; though he however had a mind to deliver at least the Bodies of his Allies out of a Country, that was likely in a short time to be the Enemies. For that reason he laid waſt several Towns, as Phacium, Ireſia, Eubhydrium, Eretria, and Palaphatus. But marching toward Thera, he was shut out: wherefore because it required some stay, if he would have taken it, and he could not spend so much time, he let it alone and went over into Macedonia. For there was a report that the Aetolians were very near: who having heard of the Battle, that was fought by the River Aous, and first laid waſt the adjacent Country about Sparchia and Macra Come (as they call it) went over thence into Theſſaly, and made themselves Masters of Cymine and Angea upon the first attack. But from Metropolis, as they were spoiling the Country, they were repulsed by a concourse of Townsmen, who came together to defend the walls. Then going to set upon Callithera, the more hardly endured the like effort of the Townsmen: and having forced them, that sallied forth, back into their walls, they were content with that victory, because there was no very great hopes of taking it, and went their wayes. Then they took and rifled two villages called Theuma and Calathana, gaining Achorra by surrender. Xynia also was deserted by the Inhabitants in the same fright. And this fugitive multitude of the Xynians light into the hands of a Guard belonging to the Athamanes, which was set to secure their foraging, by whom this disordered and unarmed rout were all killed. Xynia being deserted was rifled. After that the Aetolians took Cyphara, a Castle that lies very conveniently upon Dolopia. Now all these things were done by the Aetolians on a sudden, within a few Days; nor did Amynder and the Athamanes, after they heard of the Romans success, lye still.

But Amynder, because he durst not trust his own Soldiers, desiring a small supply from the Consul, went to Gomphi and the streights that divide Athamania from Theſſaly. Then going to Gomphi, which the Inhabitants defended very bravely for some days, he rear'd his Ladders against the Walls, and forced them at last to a surrender. This surrender of Gomphi put all the Theſſalians into a great fright. Whereupon the Inhabitants, or possessors of Argens, Pherinus, Thimar, Lifina, Simon, Lampisus, and other small Castles hardly surrendered themselves. But whilst the Aetolians and the Athamanes, being delivered from all fear of the Macedonians, made anothers Victory their Booty; and that Theſſaly was waſted by three Armies at one time, not knowing which to call their Foe, and which their Friend; the Consul, having got through the streights, which the flight of the Enemy had opened, into the Country of Epirus, though he knew, what side all the Epirotes, except Prince Charopus, favoured; yet seeing they did all they could to satisfy him, he look'd upon them as they were at present, rather than as they had been, and by being easie to pardon past faults, reconciled their affections for the future. Then having sent Messengers to Coreyra, for the onerarie Ships to come in the Bay called Sinus Ambracius, he himself went forward with short Marches, and the fourth Day encamped upon the Mountain Cerceanus, sending for Amynder also thither with his Auxiliaries; not so much because he wanted his assistance, as to have some body to lead him into Theſſaly. For the same reason likewise a great many of the Epirotes were taken in as Volunteers among those Auxiliaries.

XV. The first City that he attacked in Theſſaly was Phaleria, in which there was a Garrison of two Thousand Macedonians. Who at first resisted with all the force they had, as much as Arms and Walls could defend them. But the Siege continuing very brisk both day and night without any intermission, the Consul believing that would be a great point gained against the rest of the Theſſalians, if the first could not sustain the shock of the Romans; and therefore he resolved to conquer the stubbornness of the Macedonians. When he had taken Phaleria, there came Embassadors from Metropolis and Piera, to surrender their Cities, who upon their humble Petition were pardoned. Phaleria was rifled and burnt. From thence we went to Aeginum. Which place when he saw to be secured even with a small Guard, and almost impregnable, having thrown some few darts into the station next to him, turn'd his Army toward Gomphi. And then going a little out of the Road into the Plains of Theſſaly, when he saw that his Army wanted all sorts of necessaries, for that he had spared the Country of Epirus, he sent scouts to enquire, whether the onerarie Ships were come to the Port of Leucas, or into the Ambracian Bay, and then dispatched away his Regiments by turns to Ambracia for Corn. Now from Gomphi to Ambracia, though it be a difficult and a cumbersome passage, yet it is but a very little way. Wherefore within a few days, they got so much Provisions thence by Sea, that their Camp was full of all sorts of necessaries. From thence he marched to Atrox, which is about ten Thousand Paces from Larissa, situated upon upon the River Penens, and its Inhabitants originally Perrabians. The Thessalians were not at all disinclined at the first arrival of the Romans. And Philip, as he durst not go forward into Thessaly, so being encamped within the Lawne, called Tempe, as each place was gradually attempted by the Enemy, he sent them private aid as occasion serv'd.

XVI.

About the same time, when the Consul first pitched his Camp against Philip in the streights of Epirus, L. Quintius (the Consul's Brother) whose charge it was in the Senate to take care of the Fleet and secure the Sea Coast, going over with two five-bank'd Gallies to Coryra, when he heard that the Navy was gone from thence, he thought it no time to stay, but having overtaken them at the Island Zama, dismiss'd Apustius, whose Successor he was, and sail'd very slowly (for he towed those Ships most of the way, which followed with Provisions) to Malea. From Malea, bidding the rest to make what hast they could after him, he himself went before with three five-bank'd Gallies to Piræus, where he received the Ships that L. Apustius the Lieutenant had left for a Guard to Athens. At the same time two Fleets that came out of Asia, the one with King Attalus (consisting of twenty four five-bank'd Gallies) and the other from Rhodes, being twenty Ships of War, of which Agessimbrotus was Admiral. These two Fleets, being united about the Island of Andrus, came over into Eubœa, which is divided from that Island by nought but a narrow Gulph. There they first plundered the Carystian Territories; and after that, when Carystus seem'd secure enough in a Garrison sent thither in all hast from Chalcis, they proceeded to Eretria. Thither also came L. Quintius with those Ships that had been at Piræus, when he heard of King Attalus's arrival, and gave order, That what Ships of his own Navy were come, should sail into Eubœa. Thereupon Eretria was assaulted very briskly; for, not only all the Ships in those three united Fleets brought all sorts of warlike Instruments and Engines to sack Cities withal along with them, but the Fields too afforded a plentiful provision of Materials for the raising of new Works. The Townsmen at first were very active in the defence of their Walls, but soon after some of them being tired and wounded, besides that they saw part of their Wall o'rthrown by the Enemies Works, they were inclined to surrender. But there was a Garrison in it of Macedonians, whom they fear'd no less than they did the Romans; and Philocles the Kings Præfect, or Governour, sent Messengers from Chalcis to tell them, That he would be with them time enough, if they would but hold out the Siege. This hope and fear together forced them to protract the time beyond what they were either willing or able to do. But afterward when they heard that Philocles himself was repulsed and ran back in a consternation to Chalcis, they sent Envoys immediately to Attalus, desiring his Pardon and Protection. Whilst therefore, being intent upon the hopes of Peace, they the more slowly performed the duties of War, opposing armed Guards on that part only, where the Wall was broken down, and neglecting all the rest; Quintius, in the night time, on that side that was least suspected, making an attack, scaled and took the City. The whole crowd of the Townsmen with their Wives and Children ran into the Castle; but soon after came to a surrender. There was not much Money, or Silver and Gold: but there were a great many Ensigns, old Tables of Art, and ornaments of that kind more than could be expected in such a City, considering their other stock.

XVII.

Then they went back to Carystus, where, before the Forces were landed, all the People left the City, and ran into the Castle: from whence they sent Agents to beg the protection of the Romans. Whereupon the Townsmen had their Lives and Liberties immediately granted them: but the Macedonians were to pay each of them three Hundred Sesterces as a ransom, and march away without their Arms. They therefore being redeemed at that rate, went over into Bœotia unarmed. Then the Naval Forces, having within a few days taken two famous Cities in Eubœa, sailing about a promontory of Attica, went toward Cenchreae, a Port belonging to the Corinthians. The Consul in the mean time had a longer and a more severe Siege of it than any body expected, and the Enemy made resistance on that part, where he least imagined they would have done. For he supposed, That all the difficulty would lye in demolishing the Wall; and that, if once he had made a breach for his Soldiers to march through into the City, he should rout and kill the Enemy, as People use to do when they take Cities. But when he had battered down part of the Wall with his Rams, so that his Men went over the very ruins into the City, that was but as it were the beginning of a new and a fresh toil. For the Macedonians that were in Garrison there, being not only numerous, but choice Men too, and thinking it would be a mighty honour to them, if they could defend the City by dint of Arms and Courage, rather than by the help of Walls, so doubled their Ranks and strengthened their main Body within, that when they saw the Romans coming over the Ruines, they beat them out again through a narrow difficult pass that would hardly give them room to retreat. That the Consul took very hainously; and considering that that dishonour did not tend to the hindrance of his taking one City only, but had an influence upon the issue of the whole War in general, which many times depended upon very small and trivial circumstances; having clear'd the place, which was incumbered with the ruins of the Wall, he apply'd to it a Tower of a mighty height, which would carry a great number of armed Men upon the several floors that were one above another in it, and send forth several Regiments in Battalia, by turns to break through, if they could,

could, the Cuneus [i.e. Wedge, a Body of Men in form of a Wedge] of the Macedonians, which they themselves call a Phalanx. But in Places so narrow, the space that was broken down in the Wall being not very wide, the sort of Arms that the Enemy used and their manner of fighting was more convenient. For when the Macedonians had put themselves into their close order, with their Spears of a vast length before them, so thick, that their Bucklers joyn'd together and made, as it were, a Testudo [i.e. a Military Engine in form of a Tortoise] the Romans, who, seeing it was to no purpose to sling their Javelins at them, had drawn their Swords, could neither come near them, nor cut off their Spears; or if they perchance had cut, or broken e'r an one off, the staff of it with its sharp broken end between the Iron points of those Spears, that were still entire and fill'd up and kept the fence still as strong as before. Besides which, the remaining part of the Wall that was yet standing, preserv'd both their flanks; nor could they conveniently either give back, or make any fally forth; a thing which usually put the ranks into disorder. But to animate them the more yet, there was another thing that happened by mere chance. For there was a Turret, built upon the Mound, before the Earth was grown firm, with one wheel sunk so deep into a rut, that it hung all on one side, so that the Enemies thought it would fall, and the Soldiers who stood upon it were even distracted for fear.

Seeing therefore that nothing succeeded, as he would have it, the Consul was unwilling to have any comparison made either between the Souldiers, or their sorts of Weapons; and at the same time had no good prospect, either of taking the Town, or any means of Wintering so far from the Sea, and in places that were already laid wast by the misfortunes and ravage of the War. Wherefore quitting the Siege, because there was never a Port on all the Coast of Acarnania and Ætolia, that would at once both contain all the Ships of burden, that brought in Provisions for the Army, and afford Huts for the Legions to winter in; Anticyra in Phocis, lying toward the Bay of Corinth, was lookt upon as most conveniently situated, not only because there they should not be far from Thessaly, and the Enemies Quarters, but also, because Peloponnesus was over-against them, divided from it by a small Arm of the Sea, Ætolia and Acarnania being behind them, and Locris and Bœotia of each side. In Phocis he took Phanotea upon the first Assault, without fighting for it; nor did Anticyra hold out very long. Then he became Master of Ambrysus and Hyampolis; but Daulis because it stood upon a high Hill, was impregnable, either by scaling or any other works. But yet by pelting those that were in Garrison there with Darts and such like Weapons that they had to throw upon them, when they had provoked them to fally forth, with running away from and pursuing them by turns, so as to have some light Skirmishes though to little or no purpose, they brought them to that degree of contempt and negligence, that the Romans prest in with them at the Gate as they made their Retreat. Six other mean Castles of Phocis came into their hands through fear more than by strength of Arms. Elatia shut their Gates; resolving, unless they were compelled to it, not to admit the Roman General or his Army into their Walls.

But whilst the Consul was a besieging Elatia, he had hopes of a thing of far greater consequence; to wit, that the Acheans would revolt from the King and enter into an Alliance with the Romans. For they had expelled Cycliades, the Head of that Faction that were for Philip; and Arifstæus, who had a mind to have that Nation make a League with the Romans, was then the chief Magistrate. The Roman Fleet then lay at Cenchreae, with Attalus and the Rhodians, where they were all in Consultation how to attack Corinth. He therefore thought it the best way, before they went about that affair, to send Embassadors to the Acheans, with a Promise, that if they would revolt from the King, they should have Corinth into the antient Council of that Nation. Accordingly by advice of the Consul there were Embassadors sent to the Acheans from his Brother L. Quintius, Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians; and at Sicyon they had their Audience. Now the inclinations of the Acheans were very various: for the Lacedæmonian, a grievous and continual Enemy, scared them on the one hand, as the Romans did on the other: besides, that they were obliged both by ancient and late kindnesses received from the Macedonians; though they suspected the King himself upon the score of his Cruelty and perfidiousness, and valued him not upon what he just then did for them, but foresaw that he would be a Tyrannical Master to them after the War was ended. Nor were they only ignorant what each particular person in their Senate, or in the publick Assemblies of all the Nation delivered as their opinion; but even they themselves could not well tell, what in their own minds they desired or wished for. The Embassadors therefore being introduced to men of such unstable resolutions, had leave to speak; the Roman Embassador, whose name was L. Calpurnius first, and King Attalus's Embassadors next, and after them the Rhodians. Then Philip's Embassadors too had their Audience: and last of all the Athenians were heard, to the end that they might confute what the Macedonians said. They most of them inveighed severely against the King, for that no men had undergone more hardships, or suffered so severely as they had. And that Assembly was adjourned a little before Sun-setting, the day being spent in continued Speeches made by so many Embassadors.

20. The next day the Council was called again, in which when the Cryer had, as the Custom

XX.

Custom is among the Greeks, giving leave, by authority of the Magistrates to any one, that would, to speak, and no one came forth: they stood a good while silent looking upon one another. Nor was it any wonder, that they, who by meditating voluntarily upon things repugnant one to another, were grown stupid, should be disturbed at these long Speeches that were made from Morning till Night, with all the nicety and subtlety that was to be imagined. At last Ariston the Prætor (or chief Magistrate) for fear he should dismiss the Assembly without saying any thing, spoke thus: Where, said he, is now that animosity, Achæans? that makes you in your Feasts and publick Meetings hardly able to refrain from fighting one another, when any mention happens to be made of Philip and the Romans? Now in a Council appointed on purpose for that business and nothing else, though you have heard the Speeches of the Embassadors on both sides, though the Magistrates propose it to you, and the Crier invites you to speak, you are dumb. If care for the publick good cannot, yet the different respects methinks that you bear to this or that Party, might open some of your mouths. Especially seeing there is no man so dull, as that he can be ignorant, that now is the time for every man to give his opinion what he thinks most advisable, before we resolve upon any particular. When it is once decreed every man is bound to defend that as a good and useful League, which before displeased him. This Exhortation of the Prætors did not fail of making any body speak, but even of extorting from that great Assembly, though made up of so many several Nations, so much as a hum or murmur.
